was intersected by that which descended ravine, securing thus against the possibility tranger eluding them, by turning into the lat-
before they came up with them.

ingle horseman had mended his pace, when observed the three riders advance rapidly to-im; but when he saw them halt and form a hich completely occupied the path, he checked
e, and advanced with great deliberation; so
h party had an opportunity to take a full sur-he other. The solitary stranger was mounted able horse, fit for military service, and for t weight which he had to carry, and his rider
l his demipique, or war-saddle, with an air owed it was his familiar seat. He had a bright
d head-piece, with a plume of feathers, to-
with a cuirass, thick enough to resist a mus-and a back-piece of lighter materials. These e arms he wore over a buff jacket, along with gauntlets, or steel gloves, the tops of which
up to his elbow, and which, like the rest of our, were of bright steel. At the front of his saddle hung a case of pistols, far beyond the r size, nearly two feet in length, and carrying of twenty to the pound. A buff belt, with a ilver buckle, sustained on one side a long double-edged broadsword, with a strong and a blade calculated either to strike or push.
right side hung a dagger of about eighteen in length; a shoulder-belt sustained at his musketoon or blunderbuss, and was crossed adelier containing his charges of ammunition.
ieces of steel, then termed taslets, met the
his huge jack-boots, and completed the equi-
a well-armed trooper of the period.

ppearance of the horseman himself corres-
well with his military equipage, to which he air of having been long inured. He was ie middle size, and of strength sufficient to th ease the weight of his weapons, offensive nsive. His age might be forty and upwards, countenance was that of a resolute weather-veteran, who had seen many fields, and brought t token more than one scar. At the distance
t thirty yards he halted and stood fast, raisself on his stirrups, as if to reconnoitre and n the purpose of the opposite party, and his musketoon under his right arm, ready for ccasion should require it. In every thing but s, he had the advantage of those who seemed to interrupt his passage.

eader of the party was, indeed, well mounted
d in a buff coat, richly embroidered, the half-dress of the period; but his domestics had rse jackets of thick felt, which could scarce
cted to turn the edge of a sword, if wielded
ong man; and none of them had any weave swords and pistols, without which gentle-
their attendants, during those disturbed times, stirred abroad.

i they had stood at gaze for about a minute,
nger gentleman gave the challenge which was then common in the mouth of all strangers who met in such circumstances—"For whom are you?"

"Tell me first," answered the soldier, "for whom are you?—the strongest party should speak first."

"We are for God and King Charles," answered the first speaker.—"Now tell your faction, you know ours."

"I am for God and my standard," answered the single horseman.

"And for which standard?" replied the chief of the other party—"Cavalier or Roundhead, King or Convention?"

"By my troth, sir," answered the soldier, "I would be loath to reply to you with an untruth, as a thing unbecoming a cavalier of fortune and a soldier. But to answer your query with beseeming veracity, it is necessary I should myself have resolved to whilk of the present divisions of the kingdom I shall ultimately adhere, being a matter whereon my mind is not as yet precisely ascertained."

"I should have thought," answered the gentleman,
"that, when loyalty and religion are at stake, no gentleman or man of honour could be long in choosing his party."

"Truly, sir," replied the trooper, "if ye speak this in the way of vituperation, as meaning to impugn
my honour or gentility, I would blithely put the same to issue, venturing in that quarrel with my single person against you three. But if you speak it in the way of logical ratiocination, whilk I have studied in my youth at the Mareschal-College of Aber deen, I am ready to prove to ye logice, that my resolution to defer, for a certain season, the taking upon me either of these quarrels, not only becometh me as a gentleman and a man of honour, but also as a person of sense and prudence, one imbued with humane letters in his early youth, and who, from thencefor-ward, has followed the wars under the banner of the invincible Gustavus, the Lion of the North, and under many other heroic leaders, both Lutheran and Calvinists, Papist and Arminian."

After exchanging a word or two with his domestics,
the younger gentleman replied, "I should be glad,
sir, to have some conversation with you upon so interesting a question, and should be proud if I can determine you in favour of the cause I have myself espoused. I ride this evening to a friend's house not three miles distant, whither, if you choose to accompany me, you shall have good quarters for the night,
and free permission to take your own road in the morning, if you then feel no inclination to join with us."

"Whose word am I to take for this?" answered
the cautious soldier—"A man must know his guarantee, or he may fall into an ambuscade."

"I am called," answered the younger stranger,
"the Earl of Menteith, and, I trust, you will receive my honour as a sufficient security."

"A worthy nobleman," answered the soldier,
"whose parole is not to be doubted." With one motion he replaced his musketoon at his back, and with another made his military salute to the young nobleman, and continuing to talk as he rode forward to join him—"And I trust," said he, "my own assurance, that I will be bon camarado to your lordship in peace or in peril, during the time we shall abide together, will not be altogether vilipended in these doubtful times, when, as they say, a man's head is safer in a steel-cap than in a marble palace."

"I assure you, sir," said Lord Menteith, "that to judge from your appearance, I most highly value the advantage of your escort; but, I trust, we shall have no occasion for any exercise of valour, as I expect to conduct you to good and friendly quarters."

"Good quarters, my lord," replied the soldier, "are always acceptable, and are only to be postponed to good pay or good booty,—not to mention the honour
of a cavalier, or the needful points of commanded duty. And truly, my lord, your noble proffer is not the less welcome, in that I knew not precisely this night where I and my poor companion" (patting his horse) "were to find lodgments."

"May I be permitted to ask, then," said Lord Menteith, "to whom I have the good fortune to stand quarter-master?"

"Truly, my lord," said the trooper, "my name is Dalgetty—Dugald Dalgetty, Ritt-master Dugald Dalgetty of Drumthwacket, at your honourable service to command. It is a name you may have seen in Gallo Belgicus, the Swedish Intelligencer, or, if you read High Dutch, in the Fliegenden Mercour of Leipsic. My father, my lord, having by unthrifty courses reduced a fair patrimony to a nonentity, I had no better shift, when I was eighteen years auld, than to carry the learning whilk I had acquired at the Mareschal-College of Aberdeen, my gentle blud and designation of Drumthwacket, together with a pair of stalworth arms, and legs conform, to the German wars, there to push my way as a cavalier of fortune. My lord, my legs and arms stood me in more stead than either my gentle kin or my book-lear, and I found myself trailing a pike as a private gentleman under old Sir Ludovick Leslie, where I learned the rules of service so tightly, that I will not forget them in a hurry. Sir, I have been made to stand guard eight hours, being from twelve at noon to eight o'clock of the night, at the palace, armed with back and breast, head-piece and bracelets, being iron to the teeth, in a bitter frost, and the ice was as hard as ever was flint; and all for stopping an instant to speak to my landlady, when I should have gone to roll-call."

"And, doubtless, sir," replied Lord Menteith, "you have gone through some hot service, as well as this same cold duty you talk of?"

"Surely, my lord, it doth not become me to speak; but he that hath seen the fields of Leipsic and of Lutzen, may be said to have seen pitched battles. And one who hath witnessed the intaking of Frankfort, and Spanheim, and Nuremberg, and so forth, should know somewhat about leaguers, storms, onslaughts and outfalls."

"But your merit, sir, and experience, were doubtless followed by promotion?"

"It came slow, my lord, dooms slow," replied Dalgetty; "but as my Scottish countrymen, the fathers of the war, and the raisers of those valorous Scottish regiments that were the dread of Germany, began to fall pretty thick, what with pestilence and what with the sword, why we, their children, succeeded to their inheritance. Sir, I was six years first private gentleman of the company, and three years lance speisade; disdaining to receive a halberd, as unbeconing my birth. Wherefore I was ultimately promoted to be a fahn-dragger, as the High Dutch call it, (which signifies an ancient,) in the King's Leif Regiment of Black Horse, and thereafter I arose to be lieutenant and ritt-master, under that invincible monarch, the bulwark of the Protestant faith, the Lion of the North, the terror of Austria, Gustavus the Victorious."

"And yet, if I understand you, Captain Dalgetty,—I think that rank corresponds with your foreign title of ritt-master"——

"The same grade precesely," answered Dalgetty; "ritt-master signifying literally file-leader."

"I was observing," continued Lord Menteith, "that if I understood you right, you had left the service of this great Prince."

"It was after his death—it was after his death, sir," said Dalgetty, "when I was in no shape bound to continue mine adherence. There are things, my lord, in that service, that cannot but go against the stomach of any cavalier of honour. In especial, albeit the pay be none of the most superabundant, being only about sixty dollars a-month to a ritt-master, yet the invincible Gustavus never paid above one third of that sum, whilk was distributed monthly by way of loan; although, when justly considered, it was, in fact, a borrowing by that great monarch of the additional two thirds which were due to the soldier. And I have seen some whole regiments of Dutch and Holsteiners mutiny on the field of battle, like base scullions, crying out Gelt, gelt, signifying their desire of pay, instead of falling to blows like our noble Scottish blades, who ever disdained, my lord, post-poning of honour to filthy lucre."

"But were not these arrears," said Lord Menteith, "paid to the soldiery at some stated period?"

"My lord," said Dalgetty, "I take it on science, that at no period, and by no possible could one creutzer of them ever be recovered self never saw twenty dollars of my own time I served the invincible Gustavus, unle from the chance of a storm or victory, or the in some town or doorp, when a cavalier of who knows the usage of wars, seldom f make some small profit."

"I begin rather to wonder, sir," said Le teith, "that you should have continued so the Swedish service, than that you shou ultimately withdrawn from it."

"Neither I should," answered the Ritt "but that great leader, captain, and king, of the North, and the bulwark of the Protest had a way of winning battles, taking towi running countries, and levying contributio made his service irresistibly delectable to all cavaliers who follow the noble profession Simple as I ride here, my lord, I have mys manded the whole stift of Dunklespiel on th Rhine, occupying the Palsgrave's palace, co his choice wines with my comrades, calling tributions, requisitions, and caduaces, and n to lick my fingers, as became a good cook. all this glory hastened to decay, after our gr ter had been shot with three bullets on th Lutzen; wherefore, finding that Fortune had sides, that the borrowings and lendings we before out of our pay, while the caduaces and c were all cut off. I even gave up my commis took service with Wallenstein, in Walter Irish regiment."

"And may I beg to know of you," said Le teith, apparently interested in the adventure soldier of fortune, "how you liked this cl masters?"

"Indifferent well," said the Captain—" different well. I cannot say that the Empe much better than the great Gustavus. F knocks, we had plenty of them. I was ofte to run my head against my old acquaintar Swedish feathers, whilk your honour must to be double-pointed stakes, shod with iron end, and planted before the squad of pikes t an onfall of the cavalry. The whilk Swedish although they look gay to the eye, resemt shrubs or lesser trees of ane forest, as the pikes, arranged in battalia behind them, co to the tall pines thereof, yet, nevertheless, altogether so soft to encounter as the plum goose. Howbeit, in despite of heavy blews pay, a cavalier of fortune may thrive ind well in the Imperial service, in respect his casualties are nothing so closely looked to Swede; and so that an officer did his dut field, neither Wallenstein nor Pappenheim, Tilly before them, would likely listen to t gations of boors or burghers against any con or soldado, by whom they chanced to be sc closely shorn. So that an experienced cavalie ing how to lay, as our Scottish phrase r head of the sow to the tail of the grice,' n out of the country the pay whilk he could n from the Emperor."

"With a full hand, sir, doubless, and with i said Lord Menteith.

"Indubitably, my lord," answered Dalget posedly; "for it would be doubly disgracefu soldado of rank to have his name called in for any petty delinquency."

"And pray, sir," continued Lord Menteith made you leave so gainful a service?"

"Why, truly, sir," answered the soldier, ' cavalier, called O'Quilligan, being major o giment, and I having had words with him before, respecting the worth and precedenc several nations, it pleased him the next day his orders to me with the point of his batoon and held aloof, instead of declining and tr same, as is the fashion from a courteous co ing officer towards his equal in rank, thoug be, his inferior in military grade. Upon this

i private rencontre; and as, in the ch followed, it pleased Walter Butler,
onel, to give the lighter punishment
n, and the heavier to me, whereupon, ich partiality, I exchanged my com-
under the Spaniard."

found yourself better off by the ord Menteith.

m," answered the Rutt-master, "I omplain of. The pay was somewhat urnished by the rich Flemings and Low Country. The quarters were od wheaten loaves of the Flemings
the Provant rye-bread of the Swede,
e was more plenty with us than ever
beer of Rostock in Gustavus's camp,
as none, duty there was little; and ught do, or leave undone, at our ellent retirement for a cavalier some-eld and leaguer, who had purchased is much honour as might serve his sirous of a little ease and good living."
sk," said Lord Menteith, "why you,
as I suppose, in the situation you
rom the Spanish service also?"

nsider, my lord, that your Spaniard," Dalgetty, "is a person altogether his own conceit, wherethrough he ecount of such foreign cavaliers of ased to take service with him. And t is to every honourable soldado, to postponed, and obliged to yield prepuffing signor, who, were it the should first mount a breach at push apt to yield willing place to a Scot-Moreover, sir, I was pricked in cong a matter of religion."

I have thought, Captain Dalgetty," obleman, "that an old soldier, who rvice so often, would have been too
at head."

n, my lord," said the Captain, "since
e duty of the chaplain of the regiment
atters for me, and every other brave ich as he does nothing else that I ay and allowances. But this was a my lord, a casus improvisus, as I k I had no chaplain of my own pers my adviser. I found, in short, that ng a Protestant might be winked at,
was a man of action, and had more
all the Dons in our tertia put together,
rison, it was expected I should go to egiment. Now, my lord, as a true nd educated at the Mareschal-College as bound to uphold the mass to be l papistry and utter idolatry, whilk I unwilling to homologate by my
it is, that I consulted on the point
countryman of my own, one Father Scottish Convent in Wurtzburg"—— observed Lord Menteith, "you obinion from this same ghostly father?"
could be," replied Captain Dalgetty,
e had drunk six flasks of Rhenish, utchkins of Kirchen-wasser. Father ed me, that, as nearly as he could etic like myself, it signified not much o mass or not, seeing my eternal per-
d and sealed at any rate, in respect
t and obdurate perseverance in my
r. Being discouraged by this response, ich pastor of the reformed church,
thought I might lawfully go to mass,
the prophet permitted Naaman, a valour, and an honourable cavalier of his master into the house of Rimmon,
idol, to whom he had vowed service,
wn when the king was leaning upon neither was this answer satisfactory use there was an unco difference be-ited King of Syria and our Spanish
I could have blown away like the gan, and chiefly because I could not find the thing was required of me by any of the articles of war; neither was I proffered any consideration, either in perquisite or pay, for the wrong I might thereby do to my conscience."

"So you again changed your service?" said Lord Menteith.

"In troth did I, my lord; and after trying for a short while two or three other powers, I even took on for a time with their High Mightinesses the States of Holland."

"And how did their service jump with your humour?" again demanded his companion.

"O! my lord," said the soldier, in a sort of enthusiasm, "their behaviour on pay-day might be a pattern to all Europe—no borrowings, no lendings, no offsets, no arrears—all balanced and paid like a banker's book. The quarters, too, are excellent, and the allowances unchallengeable; but then, sir, they are a precease, scrupulous people, and will allow nothing for peccadilloes. So that if a boor complains of a broken head, or a beer-seller of a broken can, or a daft wench does but squeak loud enough to be heard above her breath, a soldier of honour shall be dragged, not before his own court-martial, who can best judge of and punish his demerits, but before a base mechanical burgo-master, who shall menace him with the rasp-house, the cord, and what not, as if he were one of their own mean, amphibious, twenty-breeched boors. So not being able to dwell longer among those ungrateful plebeians, who, although unable to defend themselves by their proper strength, will nevertheless allow the noble foreign cavalier who engages with them nothing beyond his dry wages, which no honourable spirit will put in competition with a liberal license and honourable countenance, I resolved to leave the service of the Mynheers. And hearing at this time, to my exceeding satisfaction, that there is something to be doing this summer in my way in this my dear native country, I am come hither, as they say, like a beggar to a bridal, in order to give my loving countrymen the advantage of that experience which I have acquired in foreign parts. So your lordship has an outline of my brief story, excepting my deportment in those passages of action in the field, in leaguers, storms, and onslaughts, whilk would be wearisome to narrate, and might, peradventure, better befit any other tongue than mine own."

CHAPTER III.

> For pleas of right let statesmen vex their head,
> Battle's my business, and my guerdon bread;
> And, with the sworded Switzer, I can say,
> The best of causes is the best of pay. DONNE.

THE difficulty and narrowness of the road had by this time become such as to interrupt the conversation of the travellers, and Lord Menteith, reining back his horse, held a moment's private conversation with his domestics. The Captain, who now led the van of the party, after about a quarter of a mile's slow and toilsome advance up a broken and rugged ascent, emerged into an upland valley, to which a mountain stream acted as a drain, and afforded sufficient room upon its greensward banks for the travellers to pursue their journey in a more social manner.

Lord Menteith accordingly resumed the conversation, which had been interrupted by the difficulties of the way. "I should have thought," said he to Captain Dalgetty, "that a cavalier of your honourable mark, who hath so long followed the valiant King of Sweden, and entertains such a suitable contempt for the base mechanical States of Holland, would not have hesitated to embrace the cause of King Charles, in preference to that of the low-born, roundheaded, canting knaves, who are in rebellion against his authority?"

"Ye speak reasonably, my lord," said Dalgetty, "and, cæteris paribus, I might be induced to see the matter in the same light. But, my lord, there is a southern proverb,—fine words butter no parsnips I have heard enough since I came here, to satisfy me that a cavalier of honour is free to take any part in this civil embroilment whilk he may find most convenient for his own peculiar. Loyalty is your password, my lord—Liberty, roars another chield from the other side of the strath—the King, shouts one war-cry—the Parliament, roars another—Montrose, for ever, cries Donald, waving his bonnet—Argyle and Leven, cries a south-country Saunders, vapouring with his hat and feather. Fight for the bishops, says a priest, with his gown and rochet. Stand stout for the Kirk, cries a minister, in a Geneva cap and band.—Good watchwords all excellent watchwords. Whilk cause is the best I cannot say. But sure am I, that I have fought knee-deep in blood many a day for one that was ten degrees worse than the worst of them all."

"And pray, Captain Dalgetty," said his lordship, "since the pretensions of both parties seem to you so equal, will you please to inform us by what circumstances your preference will be determined?"

"Simply upon two considerations, my lord," answered the soldier. "Being, first, on which side my services would be in most honourable request;—And, secondly, whilk is a corollary of the first, by whilk party they are likely to be most gratefully requited. And, to deal plainly with you, my lord, my opinion at present doth on both points rather incline to the side of the Parliament."

"Your reasons, if you please," said Lord Menteith, "and perhaps I may be able to meet them with some others which are more powerful."

"Sir, I shall be amenable to reason," said Captain Dalgetty, "supposing it addresses itself to my honour and my interest. Well, then, my lord, here is a sort of Highland host assembled, or expected to assemble, in these wild hills, in the King's behalf. Now, sir, you know the nature of our Highlanders. I will not deny them to be a people stout in body and valiant in heart, and courageous enough in their own wild way of fighting, which is as remote from the usages and discipline of war as ever was that of the ancient Scythians, or of the salvage Indians of America that now is. They havena sae muckle as a German whistle, or a drum, to beat a march, an alarm, a charge, a retreat, a reveillé, or the tattoo, or any other point of war; and their damnable skirlin' pipes, whilk they themselves pretend to understand, are unintelligible to the ears of any cavalier accustomed to civilized warfare. So that, were I undertaking to discipline such a breechless mob, it were impossible for me to be understood; and if I were understood, judge ye, my lord, what chance I had of being obeyed among a band of half salvages, who are accustomed to pay to their own lairds and chiefs, allenarly, that respect and obedience whilk ought to be paid to commissionate officers. If I were teaching them to form battalia by extracting the square root, that is, by forming your square battalion of equal number of men of rank and file, corresponding to the square root of the full number present, what return could I expect for communicating this golden secret of military tactic, except it may be a dirk in my wame, on placing some M'Alister More, M'Shemei or Capperfae, in the flank or rear, when he claimed to be in the van? Truly, well saith holy writ, 'if ye cast pearls before swine, they will turn again and rend ye.'"

"I believe, Anderson," said Lord Menteith, looking back to one of his servants, for both were close behind him, "you can assure this gentleman, we shall have more occasion for experienced officers, and be more disposed to profit by their instructions, than he seems to be aware of."

"With your honour's permission," said Anderson, respectfully raising his cap, "when we are joined by the Irish infantry, who are expected, and who should be landed in the West Highlands before now, we shall have need of good soldiers to discipline our levies."

"And I should like well—very well, to be employed in such service," said Dalgetty; "the Irish are pretty fellows—very pretty fellows—I desire to see none better in the field. I once saw a brigade of Irish, at the taking of Frankfort upon the Oder, stand to it with sword and pike until they beat off the blue and yellow Swedish brigades, esteemed as stout as any that fought under the immortal Gustavus. And although stout Hepburn, valiant Lumsdale, courageous Monroe, with myself and other cavaliers, made entry elsewhere at point of pike, yet, had we all met with such opposition, we had returned with great loss and little profit. Wherefore these valiant Irishes, being all p sword, as is usual in such cases, did noverth immortal praise and honour; so that, for th I have always loved and honoured those of th next to my own country of Scotland."

"A command of Irish," said Menteith, " could almost promise you, should you be di embrace the royal cause."

"And yet," said Captain Dalgetty, "my se greatest difficulty remains behind; for, al hold it a mean and sordid thing for a soldad nothing in his mouth but pay and gelt, like callions, the German lanz-knechts, whom I ed before; and although I will maintain it sword, that honour is to be preferred before quarters, and arrears, yet, ex contrario, a sol being the counterpart of his engagement of becomes a wise and considerate cavalier to what remuneration he is to receive for his ser from what funds it is to be paid. And truly, from what I can see and hear, the Convento pursemasters. The Highlanders, indeed, ma in humour, by allowing them to steal cattle; the Irishes, your lordship and your noble m may, according to the practice of the wars cases, pay them as seldom or as little as y your pleasure or convenience; but the same treatment doth not apply to a cavalier like must keep up his horses, servants, arms, an age, and who neither can, nor will, go to upon his own charges."

Anderson, the domestic who had before now respectfully addressed his master.—"I b lord," he said, "that, under your lordship's could say something to remove Captain Dalg cond objection also. He asks us where we a leet our pay; now, in my poor mind, the r are as open to us as to the covenanters. The country according to their pleasure, and d the estates of the King's friends; now, were in the Lowlands, with our Highlanders and at our backs, and our swords in our hands find many a fat traitor, whose ill-gotten wea fill our military chest and satisfy our soldie sides, confiscations will fall in thick; and, in g nations of forfeited lands to every adventurous who joins his standard, the King will at once his friends and punish his enemies. In short joins these Roundhead dogs may get some m pittance of pay—he that joins our standa chance to be knight, lord, or earl, if luck ser

"Have you ever served, my good friend?" Captain to the spokesman.

"A little, sir, in these our domestic quarre swered the man, modestly.

"But never in Germany or the Low Cou said Dalgetty.

"I never had the honour," answered And

"I profess," said Dalgetty, addressing Lo teth, "your lordship's servant has a sensible pretty idea of military matters; somewhat i though, and smells a little too much of sa bear's skin before he has hunted him.—I will matter, however, into my consideration."

"Do so, Captain," said Lord Menteith; "you the night to think of it, for we are now near t where I hope to ensure you a hospitable recep

"And that is what will be very welcom the Captain, "for I have tasted no food su break but a farl of oat-cake, which I divided horse. So I have been fain to draw my sw three bores tighter for very extenuation, lest and heavy iron should make the gird slip."

CHAPTER IV.

Once on a time, no matter when,
Some Glunimies met in a glen;
As deft and tight as ever wore
A durk, a targe, and a claymore,
Short hose, and belted plaid or trews,
In Uist, Lochaber, Skye, or Lewes,
Or cover'd hard head with his bonnet;
Had you but known them, you would own it.

A HILL was now before the travellers, cove an ancient forest of Scottish firs, the topmost

ner scathed branches across the western learned ruddy in the setting sun. In the co wood rose the towers, or rather the chim e house, or castle, as it was called, destined of their journey.

at this period, one or two high-ridged nar
s, intersecting and crossing each other, corps de logis. A projecting barrizan or the addition of small turrets at the angles, embling pepper boxes, had procured for reach the dignified appellation of a castle. It anded by a low court-yard wall, within the usual offices.

travellers approached more nearly, they dis
arks of recent additions to the defences of which had been suggested, doubtless, by ory of those troublesome times. Additional for musketry were struck out in different e boarding, and of its surrounding wall. The had just been carefully secured by stan
iron, crossing each other athwart and end
the grates of a prison. The door of the was shut; and it was only after cautious
that one of its leaves was opened by two both strong Highlanders, and both under Briareus and Pandarus in the Æneid, ready to entrance if ought hostile had ventured an

he travellers were admitted into the court, additional preparations for defence. The scaffolded for the use of fire-arms, and one
the small guns, called sackers, or falcons,
ted at the angles and flanking turrets.
musketeers, both in the Highland and Lowland mainly rushed from the interior of the man
some hastened to take the horses of the while others waited to marshal them a way
ra-ling-house. But Captain Dalgetty refu offered assistance of those who wished to
of the charge of his horse. "It is my cus ends, to say Gustavus (for so I have called my invincible master) accommodated my re old friends and fellow-travellers, and as the use of his legs, I always lend him in e service of my tongue, to call for whatever reason for;" and accordingly he strode into after his steed without farther apology.

Lord Menteith, nor his attendants paid the ntion to their horses, but, leaving them to al care of the servants of the place, walked to the house, where a sort of dark vaulted splayed, among other miscellaneous arti
ge barrel of two-penny ale, beside which two or three wooden quaichs, or bicker would appear, for the service of whoever pear to employ them. Lord Menteith appli to the spigot, drank without ceremony, and ed the stoup to Anderson, who followed his example, but not until he had flung out the e which remained, and slightly rinsed the ry.

the devil, man," said an old highland servant
to the family, "can she no drink after her without washing the cup and spilling the e tainted to her!"

bred in France," answered Anderson, body drinks after another out of the same
it be after a young lady."

's in their nicety!" said Donald; "and if grace, fat the waur is't that another man's in in the quaich before ye?"

's companion drank without observing the
which had given Donald so much offence,
f them followed their master into the low
one hall, which was the common rendez Highland family. A large fire of peats in the ney at the upper end shed a dim light
e apartment, and was rendered necessary
op, by which, even during the summer, the was rendered uncomfortable. Twenty rgets, as many claymores, with dirks, and guns, both match-lock and fire-lock, and
, and cross-bows, and Lochaber axes,
of plate armour, and steel bonnets, and head-pieces, and the more ancient habergeons, or shirts of re-vaulted mail, with hood and sleeves corresponding to it, all hung in confusion about the walls, and would have formed a month's amusement to a member of a modern antiquarian society. But such things were too familiar, to attract much observation on the part of the present spectators.

There was a large clumsy oaken table, which the hasty hospitality of the domestic who had before spoken, immediately spread with milk, butter, goat-milk cheese, a flagon of beer, and a flask of usquebae, designed for the refreshment of Lord Menteith; while an inferior servant made similar preparations at the bottom of the table for the benefit of his attendants. The space which intervened between them was, according to the manners of the times, sufficient distinction between master and servant, even though the former was, as in the present instance, of high rank. Meanwhile the guests stood by the fire—the young nobleman under the chimney, and his servants at some little distance.

"What do you think, Anderson," said the former, "of our fellow-traveller?"

"A stout fellow," replied Anderson, "if all be good that is upcome. I wish we had twenty such, to put our Tweedies into some sort of discipline."

"I differ from you, Anderson," said Lord Menteith; "I think this fellow Dalgetty is one of those horse-leeches, whose appetite for blood being only sharpened by what he has sucked in foreign countries, he is now returned to batten upon that of his own. Sharpe on the pack of these mercenary swordsmen! they have made the name of Scot through all Europe equivalent to that of a pitiful mercenary, who knows neither honour nor principle but his month's pay, who transfers his allegiance from standard to standard, at the pleasure of fortune or the highest bidder; and in whose insatiable thirst for plunder and warm quarters we owe much of that civil dissension which is now turning our swords against our own bowels. I had scarce patience with the hired gladiator, and yet could hardly help laughing at the extremity of his impudence."

"Your lordship will forgive me," said Anderson, "if I recommend to you, in the present circumstances, to conceal at least a part of this generous indignation; we cannot, unfortunately, do our work without the assistance of those who act on baser motives than our own. We cannot spare the assistance of such fellows as our friend the soldado. To use the cant-ing phrase of the saints in the English Parliament, the sons of Zeruiah are still too many for us."

"I must dissemble, then, as well as I can," said Lord Menteith, "as I have hitherto done, upon your hint. But I wish the fellow at the devil with all my heart."

"Ay, but still you must remember, my lord," resumed Anderson, "that to cure the bite of a scorpion you must crush another scorpion on the wound—But stop, we shall be overheard."

From a side-door in the hall glided a Highlander into the apartment, whose lofty stature and complete equipment, as well as the eagle's feather in his bonnet, and the confidence of his demeanour, announced to be a person of superior rank. He walked slowly up to the table, and made no answer to Lord Menteith, who, addressing him by the name of Allan, asked him how he did.

"Ye manna speak to her e'en now," whispered the old attendant.

The tall Highlander, sinking down upon the empty settle next the fire, fixed his eyes upon the red embers and the huge heap of turf, and seemed buried in profound abstraction. His dark eyes, and wild and enthusiastic features, bore the air of one who, deeply impressed with his own subjects of meditation, pays little attention to exterior objects. An air of gloomy severity, the fruit perhaps of ascetic and solitary habits, might, in a Lowlander, have been ascribed to religious fanaticism; but by that disease of the mind, then so common both in England and the Lowlands of Scotland, the Highlanders of this period were rarely infected. They had, however, their own peculiar superstitions, which overclouded the mind with thick coming fancies, as completely as the puritanism of their neighbours.

"His lordship's honour," said the Highland servant, sidling up to Lord Menteith, and speaking in a very low tone, "his lordship maunna speak to Allan even now, for the cloud is upon his mind."

Lord Menteith nodded, and took no further notice of the reserved mountaineer.

"Said I not," asked the latter, suddenly raising his stately person upright, and looking at the domestic, "said I not that four were to come, and here stand but three on the hall floor?"

"In troth and ye say sae, Allan," said the old Highlander, "and I'se warrant the fourth man coming clanking in at the yett even now frae the stable, for he's shod like a partan, wi' iron on back and breast, haunch and shanks. And am I to set her chair up near the Menteith's, or down wi' the honest gentlemen at the foot of the table?"

Lord Menteith himself answered the inquiry, by pointing to a seat beside his own.

"And here she comes," said Donald, as Captain Dalgetty entered the room; "and I hope gentlemen will all tak the bit and the sup, as we say in the glens, until better meat be ready, until the Tormaich comes back to the hill wi' the ... and then Dugald Cook will see wi' himsell w' his bad red hill venison."

In the meantime Captain Dalgetty had entered the apartment, and walked up to the seat placed next Lord Menteith, who was leaning on the back of it with his arms folded. Anderson and his companion waited at the bottom of the table, in a respectful attitude, until they should receive permission to seat themselves; while three or four Highlanders, under the direction of old Donald, ran hither and thither to bring additional articles of food, or stood still to give attendance upon the guests.

In the midst of these preparations, Allan suddenly started up, and snatching a lamp from the hand of an attendant, held it close to Dalgetty's face, while he perused his features with the most heedful and grave attention.

"By my honour," said Dalgetty, half displeased, as, mysteriously shaking his head, Allan gave up the scrutiny—"I trow that lad and I will ken each other when we meet again."

Meanwhile Allan strode to the bottom of the table, and having, by the aid of his lamp, subjected Anderson and his companion to the same investigation, stood a moment as if in deep reflection; then, touching his forehead, suddenly seized Anderson by the arm, and before he could offer any effectual resistance, half led and half dragged him to the vacant seat at the upper end, and having made a mute intimation that he should there place himself, he hurried the soldado with the same unceremonious precipitation to the bottom of the table. The Captain, exceedingly incensed at this freedom, endeavoured to shake Allan from him with violence; but, powerful as he was, he proved in the struggle inferior to the gigantic mountaineer, who threw him off with such violence, that after reeling a few paces, he fell at full length, and the vaulted hall rang with the clash of his armour. When he arose, his first impulse was to draw his sword and to fly at Allan, who, with folded arms, seemed to await his onset with a calm and scornful indifference. Lord Menteith and his attendants interposed to preserve peace, while the Highlanders, snatching weapons from the walls, seemed prompt to increase the broil.

"He is mad," whispered Lord Menteith, "he is perfectly crackbrained, and it were in vain to quarrel with him."

"If your lordship is assured that he is non compos mentis," said Captain Dalgetty, "the which his bearing and behaviour seem to testify, the matter must cease here, seeing that a madman can neither give an affront, nor render honourable satisfaction. But by my soul, if I had my provant and a bottle of Rhenish under my belt, I should have stood otherways to him. And yet it's a pity he should be sae weak in the intellectuals, being a strong proper man of body, fit to handle pike, morgenstern,* or any other military implement whatsoever."

Peace was thus restored, and the party seat
selves agreeably to their former arrangem which Allan, who had now returned to his
the fire, and seemed once more immersed in tion, did not again interrupt. Lord Menteith, ing the principal domestic, hastened to st
theme of conversation which might obliterat
recollection of the fray that had taken place. "
is at the hill then, Donald, I understand, a English strangers with him?"

"At the hill he is, an it like your honour,
Saxon caballeros are with him sure enough;
is Sir Miles Musgrave and Christopher H
from the Cumbrick, as I think they call their

"Hall and Musgrave!" said Lord Mentei
ing at his attendants, "the very men that w
to see."

"Troth," said Donald, "an' I wish I ha seen them between the een, for they're come
us out o' house and ha'."

"Why, Donald," said Lord Menteith, "yo use to be so churlish of your beef and ale; s
though they be, they'll scarce eat up all t
that's girzing on the castle mains."

"Tell care an they did," said Donald, "
were the warst o't, for we have a wheen cant
men here that wadna let us want if there wa
a beast atween this and Perth. But this is job—it's nae less than a wager."

"A wager!" repeated Lord Menteith, w surprise.

"Troth," continued Donald, to the full as tell his news as Lord Menteith was curious them, "as your lordship is a friend and ki
the house, an' as ye'll hear enough o't in les hour, I may as weel tell ye mysell. Ye sall b then to know, that when our Laird was up land, where he gangs oftener than his fri wish, he was biding at the house o' this Musgrave, an' there was putten on the tabl
dlesticks, that they tell me were twice as m
the candlesticks in Dunblane kirk, and nei brass, nor tin, but a' solid silver, nae less their English pride, has sae muckle, and little how to guide it! Sae they began to Laird, that he saw nae sic graith in his ain p
try; and the Laird, scorning to hae his cou
down without a word for its credit, swore, li Scotsman, that he had mair candlesticks, a candlesticks, in his ain castle at hame, than lighted in a hall in Cumberland, an Cumb
the name o' the country."

"That was patriotically said," observed L teith.

"Fary true," said Donald; "but her hon
better hae hauden her tongue; for if ye say amang the Saxons, that's a wee by ordir
cleik ye down for a wager as fast as a Low
would hammer shoon on a Highland shelty.
the Laird behoved either to gae back o' his wager twa hunder marks; and so he e'en
wager, rather than be shamed wi' the like
And now he's like to get it to pay, and I'm that's what makes him sae swear to come e'en."

"Indeed," said Lord Menteith, "from n your family plate, Donald, your master is lose such a wager."

"Your honour may swear that; an' wh get the siller I kenna, although he borrow twenty purses. I advised him to pit the tw gentlemen and their servants cannily into the tower till they gae up the bargain o' fre
but the Laird winna hear reason."

Allan here started up, strode forward, and
ed the conversation, saying to the domestic

* This was a sort of club or mace, used in the earlier part of the seventeenth century, in the defence of breache
When the Germans insulted a Scotch regiment th in Trailsund, saying they heard there was a ship Denmark to them laden with tobacco pipes, "One diers," says Colonel Robert Munro, "showing th
with a morgenstern, made of a large stock bande
like the shaft of a halbert, with a round globe at t
cross iron pikes, saith, 'Here is one of the tob wherewith we will beat out your brains when yo storm us.'"

', "And how dared you to give my brother
lourable advice? or how dare you to say se this or any other wager which it is his lay?"
Allan M'Aulay," answered the old man,
my father's son to gainsay what your fa-
thinks tit to say, an' so the Laird may no is wager. A' that I ken against it is, that dlestick, or ony thing like it is in the house,
uld airn branches that hae been here since eth's time, and the tin sconces that your
be made by auld Willie Winkle the tinkler,
en that deil an ounce of siller plate is about ta', forby the lady's auld posset dish, that over and anc o' the legs."
old man!" said Allan, fiercely; "and do men, if your reflection is finished, leave this clear; I must prepare it for the reception
ithern guests."
way," said the domestic, pulling Lord Men-steeve; "his hour is on him," said he, look-Allan, "and he will not be controlled."
the hall accordingly, Lord Menteith and being ushered one way by old Donald,
o attendants conducted elsewhere by an-lander. The former had scarcely reached thdrawing apartment ere they were joined ot the mansion, Angus M'Aulay by name, glish guests. Great joy was expressed by for Lord Menteith and the English gentle-well known to each other; and on Lord
introduction, Captain Dalgetty was well re-he Laird. But after the first burst of hos-gratulation was over, Lord Menteith could
t there was a shade of sadness on the brow land friend.
ast have heard," said Sir Christopher Hall,
fine undertaking in Cumberland is all The militia would not march into Scot-
our prick-ear'd Covenanters have been too
r friends in the southern shires. And so,
ing there is some stirring work here, Mus-
, rather than sit idle at home, are come to paign among your kilts and plaids."
you have brought arms, men, and money
said Lord Menteith, smiling.
me dozen or two of troopers, whom we ast Lowland village," said Musgrave, "and ugh we had to get them so far."
money," said his companion, "we expect ply from our friend and host here."
I now, colouring highly, took Menteith a and expressed to him his regret that he nto a foolish blunder.
l it from Donald," said Lord Menteith,
to suppress a smile.
take that old man," said M'Aulay, "he very thing, were it to cost one's life; but ng matter to you neither, my lord, for I rour friendly and fraternal benevolence, as man of our house, to help me out with the
to these pock-puddings; or else, to be
, the deil a M'Aulay will there be at the curse me if I do not turn Covenanter rather ese fellows without paying them; and, at shall be ill enough off, getting both the
the scorn."
y suppose, cousin," said Lord Menteith, "I vell equipt just now; but you may be assurdeavour to help you as well as I can, for the kindred, neighbourhood, and alliance."
ye—thank ye—thank ye," reiterated M'Auas they are to spend the money in the ice, what signifies whether you, they, or e are a' one man's bairns, I hope? But elp me out too with some reasonable ex-
e I shall be for taking to Andrew Fer-ike not to be treated like a bar or a bragwn board-end, when, God knows, I only pport my honour, and that of my family
."
s they were speaking, entered, with rather e than he might have been expected to lering the impending fate of his master's purse and credit. "Gentlemens, her dinner is ready, and her candles are lighted too," said Donald, with a strong guttural emphasis on the last clause of his speech.

"What the devil can he mean?" said Musgrave, looking to his countryman.

Lord Menteith put the same question with his eyes to the Laird, which M'Aulay answered by shaking his head.

A short dispute about precedence somewhat delayed their leaving the apartment. Lord Menteith insisted upon yielding up that which belonged to his rank, on consideration of his being in his own country, and of his near connexion with the family in which they found themselves. The two English strangers, therefore, were first ushered into the hall, where an unexpected display awaited them. The large oaken table was spread with substantial joints of meat, and seats were placed in order for the guests. Behind every seat stood a gigantic Highlander, completely dressed and armed after the fashion of his country, holding in his right hand his drawn sword, with the point turned downwards, and in the left a blazing torch made of the bog-pine. This wood, found in the morasses, is so full of turpentine, that, when split and dried, it is frequently used in the Highlands instead of candles. The unexpected and somewhat startling apparition was seen by the red glare of the torches, which displayed the wild features, unusual dress, and glittering arms of those who bore them, while the smoke, eddying up to the roof of the hall, overcanopied them with a volume of vapor. Ere the strangers had recovered from their surprise, Allan stept forward, and pointing with his sheathed broadsword to the torch-bearers, said, in a deep and stern tone of voice, "Behold, gentlemen cavaliers, the chandeliers of my brother's house, the ancient fashion of our ancient name; not one of these men knows any law but their Chief's command—Would you dare to compare to THEM in value the richest ore that ever was dug out of the mine? How say you, cavaliers?—is your wager won or lost?"

"Lost, lost," said Musgrave, gayly—"my own silver candlesticks are all melted and riding on horseback by this time, and I wish the fellows that enlisted were half as trusty as these.—Here, sir," he added to the Chief, "is your money; it impairs Hall's finances and mine somewhat, but debts of honour must be settled."

"My father's curse upon my father's son," said Allan, interrupting him, "if he receive from you one penny! It is enough that you claim no right to exact from him what is his own."

Lord Menteith eagerly supported Allan's opinion, and the elder M'Aulay readily joined, declaring the whole to be a fool's business, and not worth speaking more about. The Englishmen, after some courteous opposition, were persuaded to regard the whole as a joke.

"And now, Allan," said the Laird, "please to remove your candles; for, since the Saxon gentlemen have seen them, they will eat their dinner as comfortably by the light of the old tin sconces, without scomfishing them with so much smoke."

Accordingly, at a sign from Allan, the living chandeliers, recovering their broadswords, and holding the point erect, marched out of the hall, and left the guests to enjoy their refreshment.*

CHAPTER V.

Thereby so fearlesse and so fell he grew,
That his own syre and maister of his guise
Did often tremble at his horrid view;
And if for dread of hurt would him advise,
The angry beastes not rashly to despise,
Nor too much to provoke: for he would learne
The lion stoup to him in lowly wise,
(A lesson hard,) and make the tibbard sterne
Leave roaring, when in rage he for revenge did earne.
SPENSER.

NOTWITHSTANDING the proverbial epicurism of the English,—proverbial, that is to say, in Scotland at

* Such a bet as that mentioned in the text is said to have been taken by MacDonald of Keppoch, who extricated himself in the manner there narrated.

the period,—the English visiters made no figure whatever at the entertainment, compared with the portentous voracity of Captain Dalgetty, although that gallant soldier had already displayed much steadiness and pertinacity in his attack upon the lighter refreshment set before them at their entrance, by way of forlorn hope. He spoke to no one during the time of his meal; and it was not until the victuals were nearly withdrawn from the table, that he gratified the rest of the company, who had watched him with some surprise, with an account of the reasons why he ate so very fast and so very long.

"The former quality," he said, "he had acquired while he filled a place at the bursar's table at the Mareschal-College of Aberdeen; when," said he, "if you did not move your jaws as fast as a pair of castanets, you were very unlikely to get any thing to put between them. And as for the quantity of my food, be it known to this honourable company," continued the Captain, "that it is the duty of every commander of a fortress, on all occasions which offer, to secure as much munition and vivers as their magazines can possibly hold, not knowing when they may have to sustain a siege or a blockade. Upon which principle, gentlemen," said he, "when a cavalier finds that provant is good and abundant, he will, in my estimation, do wisely to victual himself for at least three days, as there is no knowing when he may come by another meal."

The Laird expressed his acquiescence in the prudence of this principle, and recommended to the veteran to add a cup of brandy and a flagon of claret to the substantial provisions he had already laid in, to which proposal the Captain readily agreed.

When dinner was removed, and the servants had withdrawn, excepting the Laird's page, or henchman, who remained in the apartment to call for or bring whatever was wanted, or, in a word, to answer the purposes of a modern bell-wire, the conversation began to turn upon politics, and the state of the country; and Lord Menteith inquired anxiously and particularly what clans were expected to join the proposed muster of the King's friends.

"That depends much, my lord, on the person who lifts the banner," said the Laird; "for you know we Highlanders, when a few clans are assembled, are not easily commanded by one of our own Chiefs, or, to say the truth, by any other body. We have heard a rumour, indeed, that Colkitto, that is, young Colkitto, or Alaster M'Donald, is come over the Kyle from Ireland, with a body of the Earl of Antrim's people, and that they had got as far as Ardnamurchan. They might have been here before now, but, I suppose, they loitered to plunder the country as they came along."

"Will Colkitto not serve you for a leader, then?" said Lord Menteith.

"Colkitto!" said Allan M'Aulay, scornfully; "who talks of Colkitto? There lives but one man whom we will follow, and that is Montrose."

"But Montrose, sir," said Sir Christopher Hall, "has not been heard of since our ineffectual attempt to rise in the north of England. It is thought he has returned to the King at Oxford for farther instructions."

"Returned!" said Allan, with a scornful laugh; "I could tell ye, but it is not worth my while; ye will know soon enough."

"By my honour, Allan," said Lord Menteith, "you will weary out your friends with this intolerable, froward, and sullen humour.—But I know the reason," added he, laughing; "you have not seen Annot Lyle to-day."

"Whom did you say I had not seen?" said Allan, sternly.

"Annot Lyle, the fairy queen of song and minstrelsy," said Lord Menteith.

"Would to God I were never to see her again," said Allan, sighing, "on condition the same weird were laid on you!"

"And why on me?" said Lord Menteith, carelessly.

"Because," said Allan, "it is written on your forehead, that you are to be the ruin of each other." So saying, he rose up and left the room.

"Has he been long in this way?" askec teith, addressing his brother.

"About three days," answered Angus wellnigh over, he will be better to-mo come, gentlemen, don't let the tappit-hen be emptied. The King's health, King Char and may the covenanting dog that refu Heaven by the road of the Grassmarket

The health was quickly pledged, and ceeded by another, and another, and an a party cast, and coloured in an earne Captain Dalgetty, however, thought a enter a protest.

"Gentlemen cavaliers," he said, "I healths, primo, both out of respect to this and hospitable house, and, secundo, be it not good to be precise in such matters, but I protest, agreeable to the wars and c this honourable Lord, that it shall be free withstanding my present complaisance, vice with the Covenanters to-morrow, shall be so minded."

M'Aulay and his English guests stare declaration, which would have certainly h gentleman, had Lord Menteith not taken and explained the circumstances and con trast," he concluded, "we shall be ab Captain Dalgetty's assistance to our own

"And if not," said the Laird, "I pr Captain says, that nothing that has pass ing, not even his having eaten my bre and pledged me in Bourdeaux, or shall prejudice me, or avail him, to the sa

"You shall be right welcome," said "recovering my sword cannot keep my h has done a worse turn than your feu make for me."

Here Lord Menteith again interposed. cord of the company being with no sm restored, was cemented by some deep car Menteith, however, contrived to break earlier than was the usage of the Castl tence of fatigue and indisposition. This what to the disappointment of the valo who, among other habits acquired in the tries, had acquired both a disposition to capacity to bear, an exorbitant quanti liquors.

Their landlord ushered them in person sleeping gallery, in which there was a fe with tartan curtains, and a number of c hampers, placed along the wall, three of stuffed with blooming heather, were pre reception of guests.

"I need not tell your lordship," said Lord Menteith, a little apart, "our Hig of quartering. Only that, not liking you in the room alone with this German b have caused your servants' beds to be the gallery. By God, my lord, these are men go to bed with a throat half and s swallowed brandy, and before next mo be gaping like an oyster-shell."

Lord Menteith thanked him sincerely was just the arrangement he would hav for, although he had not the least app violence from Captain Dalgetty, yet An better kind of person, a sort of gentlema always liked to have near his person."

"I have not seen this Anderson," sa "did you hire him in England?"

"I did so," said Lord Menteith; "you man to-morrow; in the meantime, I wi night."

His host left the apartment after the c tation, and was about to pay the same to Captain Dalgetty, but observing hir gaged in the discussion of a huge pitche brandy posset he thought it a pity to di so laudable an employment, and took hi out farther ceremony.

Lord Menteith's two attendants enter ment almost immediately after his dep good Captain, who was now somewhat

er, began to find the undoing of the our a task somewhat difficult, and son in these words, interrupted by a Anderson, my good friend, you may that he that putteth off his armour himself like to that putteth it on, s not the right word of command; th of it is, I am like to sleep in my an honest fellow that never waked unloose this buckle." our, Sandalie," said Anderson to the

w!" exclaimed the Captain, turning tonishment, "here's a common fel-y with four pounds a-year and a ks himself too good to serve Ritt-talgetty of Drumthwacket, who has at the Mareschal-College of Aber-half the princes of Europe!" etty," said Lord Menteith, whose lot ea's maker throughout the evening, stand that Anderson waits upon no ur I will help, Sir, and to undo your h pleasure."

ouble for you, my lord," said Dal-it would do you no harm to practise harness is put on and put off. I out of mine like a glove; only to-ot fortia, I mean the classic phrase, atus."

was unshelled, and stood before the a face of drunken wisdom on the ning. What seemed chiefly to inter-character of Allan M'Aulay. "To nglishmen so cleverly with his High-se eight bare brow-ched Boors for six s! it was a master-piece—a tour de fect legerdemain—and to be a mad-doubt greatly, my lord." (Shaking I must allow him, notwithstanding, o your lordship, the privileges of a nd either batoon him sufficiently to ce offered to my person, or else bring mortal arbitrement, as becometh an "

hear a long story," said Lord Men-se et right. I can tell you how the Allan's extra accounts so well for his r, as to put such satisfaction entirely m."

, my lord," said Captain Dalgetty, good cup of right and a warm st shoeing horn for drawing on a d since your lordship is pleased to o tell it, I shall rest your patient and said Lord Menteith, "and you, Sib-... I must indulge your curiosity, that ow to behave to him in time of need. step to the fire then."

assembled an audience about him, t down upon the edge of the four-Captain Dalgetty, having the relics om his beard and mustaches, and t verse of the Lutheran psalm, All-n den Herren, &c. rolled himself into of rosos, and thrusting his shock een the blankets, listened to Lord in a most luxurious state, between ing.

said Lord Menteith, "of the two and Allan M'Aulay, was a gentle-ation and family, being the chief of a of good account, though not nume-e mother of these young men, was a good family, if I may be permitted to arly connected with my own. Her urable and spirited young man, ob-es the Sixth a grant of forestry, and over a royal chase adjacent to this xercising and defending these rights, unate as to involve himself in a quar-our Highland freebooters or cater-ans, of whom I think, Captain Dalgetty, you must have heard."

"And that I have," said the Captain, exerting him-self to answer the appeal. "Before I left the Mare-schal College of Aberdeen, Dugald Garr was playing the devil in the Garioch, and the Farquharsons on Dee-side, and the Clan Chattan on the Gordons' lands, and the Grants and Camerons in Moray-land. And since that, I have seen the Cravats and Pan-dours in Pannonia and Transylvania, and the Cos-sacks from the Polish frontier, and robbers, banditti, and barbarians of all countries besides, so that I have a distinct idea of your broken Highlandmen."

"The clan," said Lord Menteith, "with whom the maternal uncle of the M'Aulays had been placed in feud, was a small sept of banditti, called, from their houseless state, and their incessantly wandering among the mountains and glens, the Children of the Mist. They are a fierce and hardy people, with all the irritability, and wild and vengeful passions, proper to men who have never known the restraint of civil-ized society. A party of them lay in wait for the un-fortunate Warden of the Forest, surprised him while hunting alone and unattended, and slew him with every circumstance of inventive cruelty. They cut off his head, and resolved, in a bravado, to exhibit it at the castle of his brother-in-law. The laird was absent, and the lady reluctantly received as guests, men against whom, perhaps, she was afraid to shut her gates. Refreshments were placed before the Chil-dren of the Mist, who took an opportunity to take the head of their victim from the plaid in which it was wrapt, placed it on the table, put a piece of bread between the lifeless jaws, bidding them do their office now, since many a good meal they had eaten at that table. The lady, who had been absent for some household purpose, entered at this moment, and, upon beholding her brother's head, fled like an arrow out of the house into the woods, uttering shriek upon shriek. The ruffians, satisfied with this savage tri-umph, withdrew. The terrified menials, after over coming the alarm to which they had been subjected, sought their unfortunate mistress in every direction, but she was nowhere to be found. The miserable husband returned next day, and, with the assistance of his people, undertook a more anxious and distant search, but to equally little purpose. It was believed universally, that, in the ecstacy of her terror, she must either have thrown herself over one of the nu-merous precipices which overhang the river, or into a deep lake about a mile from the castle. Her loss was the more lamented, as she was six months advanced in her pregnancy; Angus M'Aulay, her eldest son, having been born about eighteen months before.—But I tire you, Captain Dalgetty, and you seem in-clined to sleep."

"By no means," answered the soldier; "I am no whit somnolent; I always hear best with my eyes shut. It is a fashion I learned when I stood sentinel."

"And I dare say," said Lord Menteith, aside to An-derson, "the weight of the halberd of the sergeant of the rounds often made him open them."

Being apparently, however, in the humour of story-telling, the young nobleman went on, addressing himself chiefly to his servants, without minding the slumbering veteran.

"Every baron in the country," said he, "now swore revenge for this dreadful crime. They took arms with the relations and brother-in-law of the murder-ed person, and the Children of the Mist were hunted down, I believe, with as little mercy as they had themselves manifested. Seventeen heads, the bloody trophies of their vengeance, were distributed among the allies, and fed the crows upon the gates of their castles. The survivors sought out more distant wil-dernesses, to which they retreated."

"To your right hand, counter-march and retreat to your former ground," said Captain Dalgetty; the mili-tary phrase having produced the correspondent word of command; and then starting up, professed he had been profoundly attentive to every word that had been spoken.

"It is the custom in summer," said Lord Menteith, without attending to his apology, "to send to the upland pastures to have the benefit of the grass; and the maids of the village, and of the family, go there to milk them in the morning and evening. While thus employed, the females of this family, to their great terror, perceived that their motions were watched at a distance by a pale, thin, meagre figure, bearing a strong resemblance to their deceased mistress, and passing, of course, for her apparition. When some of the boldest resolved to approach this faded form, it fled from them into the woods with a wild shriek. The husband, informed of this circumstance, came up to the glen with some attendants, and took his measures so well as to intercept the retreat of the unhappy fugitive, and to secure the person of his unfortunate lady, though her intellect proved to be totally deranged. How she supported herself during her wandering in the woods could not be known—some supposed she lived upon roots and wild-berries, with which the woods at that season abounded; but the greater part of the vulgar were satisfied that she must have subsisted upon the milk of the wild does, or been nourished by the fairies, or supported in some manner equally marvellous. Her re-appearance was more easily accounted for. She had seen from the thicket the milking of the cows, to superintend which had been her favourite domestic employment, and the habit had prevailed even in her deranged state of mind.

"In due season the unfortunate lady was delivered of a boy, who not only showed no appearance of having suffered from his mother's calamities, but appeared to be an infant of uncommon health and strength. The unhappy mother, after her confinement, recovered her reason—at least in a great measure, but never her health and spirits. Allan was her only joy. Her attention to him was unremitting; and unquestionably she must have impressed upon his early mind many of those superstitious ideas to which his moody and enthusiastic temper gave so ready a reception. She died when he was about ten years old. Her last words were spoken to him in private; but there is little doubt that they conveyed an injunction of vengeance upon the Children of the Mist, with which he has since amply complied.

"From this moment, the habits of Allan M'Aulay were totally changed. He had hitherto been his mother's constant companion, listening to her dreams, and repeating his own, and feeding his imagination, which, probably from the circumstances preceding his birth, was constitutionally deranged, with all the wild and terrible superstitions so common to the mountaineers, to which his unfortunate mother had become much addicted since her brother's death. By living in this manner, the boy had gotten a timid, wild, startled look, loved to seek out solitary places in the woods, and was never so much terrified as by the approach of children of the same age. I remember, although some years younger, being brought up here by my father upon a visit, nor can I forget the astonishment with which I saw the infant-hermit shun every attempt I made to engage him in the sports natural to our age. I can remember his father bewailing his disposition to mine, and alleging, at the same time, that it was impossible for him to take from his wife the company of the boy, as he seemed to be the only consolation that remained to her in this world, and as the amusement which Allan's society afforded her seemed to prevent the recurrence, at least in its full force, of that fearful malady by which she had been visited. But, after the death of his mother, the habits and manners of the boy seemed at once to change. It is true he remained as thoughtful and serious as before; and long fits of silence and abstraction showed plainly that his disposition, in this respect, was in no degree altered. But at other times, he sought out the rendezvous of the youth of the clan, which he had hitherto seemed anxious to avoid. He took share in all their exercises; and, from his very extraordinary personal strength, soon excelled his brother and others, whose age considerably exceeded his own. They who had hitherto held him in contempt, now feared, if they did not love him; and, instead of Allan's being esteemed a dreaming, womanish, and feeble-minded boy, those who encountered him in sports or military ex complained that, when heated by the s too apt to turn game into earnest, and t

he was only engaged in a friendly trial o
But I speak to regardless ears," said Lo [illegible] himself, for the Captain's no
the most indisputable signs that he was in the arms of oblivion.

"If you mean the ears of that snorin
lord," said Anderson, "they are, indeed,
tion; that you can say; nevertheless, the unfit for more private conference, I ho
have the goodness to proceed, for Sibb
and for mine. The history of this poor y has a deep and wild interest in it."

"You must know, then," proceeded teith, "that Allan continued to increas and activity till his fifteenth year, about
he assumed a total independence of ch
impatience of control, which much alar viving parent. He was absent in the whole days and nights, under pretence
though he did not always bring home
father was the more alarmed, because s
Children of the Mist, encouraged by th troubles of the state, had ventured back haunts, nor did he think it altogether s any attack upon them. The risk of wanderings, sustaining injury from the freebooters, was a perpetual source of ap

"I was myself upon a visit to the cast matter was brought to a crisis. Allan ha since daybreak in the woods, where I ha
him in vain; it was a dark stormy nigh
not return. His father expressed the un and spoke of detaching a party at the da
ing in quest of him; when, as we were supper-table, the door suddenly opened entered the room with a proud, firm, a air. His intractibility of temper, as wel settled state of his mind, had such an i
his father, that he suppressed all other t pleasure, excepting the observation that a fat buck, and had returned before sun supposed Allan, who had been on the night, had returned with empty hand
sure of that?' said Allan fiercely; 'here
will tell you another tale.'

"We now observed his hands were that there were spots of blood on his fac
the issue with impatience; when sudde
the corner of his plaid he rolled down o
human head, bloody and new severed, a same time, 'Lie thou where the head of lay before ye.' From the haggard featu ted red hair and beard, partly grizzled w father and others present recognised the tor of the Mist, a well-known leader am laws, redoubted for strength and feroc
been active in the murder of the unfortu ter, uncle to Allan, and had escaped by defence and extraordinary agility, when his companions were destroyed. We may be believed, struck with surprise, b fused to gratify our curiosity; and we tured that he must have overcome the o
desperate struggle, because we discovered sustained several wounds from the c measures were now taken to ensure hin vengeance of the freebooters; but neither
nor the positive commands of his father, locking of the gates of the castle and the apartment were precautions adequate Allan from seeking out the very persons was peculiarly obnoxious. He made h night from the window of the apartmen
ing at his father's vain care, produced on the head of one, and upon another tho
the Children of the Mist. At length ders as they were, became appalled by rate animosity and audacity with which out their recesses. As he never hesitat any odds, they concluded that he must b ed life, or fight under the guardianship of fluence. Neither gun, dirk, nor dourlach,* availed aught against him. They imputed remarkable circumstances under which he and at length five or six of the stoutest f the Highlanders would have fled at Allan's the blast of his horn meanwhile, however, the Children of the ed on their old trade, and the M'Aulays, s their kinsmen and allies, as much as any could. This provoked another expe inst the tribe, in which I had my share; we them effectually by besetting at once the enter passes of the country, and made t work as is usual in such occasions, bein laying right before us. In this terrible spe r, even the females and the helpless do not cape. One little maiden alone, who smiled n's drawn dirk, escaped his vengeance upon it entreaty. She was brought to the castle, bred up under the name of Annot Lyle, the utiful little fairy certainly that ever danced a in by moon-light. It was long ere Allan ure the presence of the child, until it occur s imagination, from her features perhaps, id not belong to the hated blood of his en t had become their captive in some of their s; a circumstance not in itself impossible, hich he believes as firmly as in holy writ. rticularly delighted by her skill in music, o exquisite, that she far exceeds the best per n this country in playing on the clairshach, It was discovered that this produced upon bled spirits of Allan, in his gloomiest moods, l effects, similar to those experienced by the monarch of old; and so engaging is the tem nnot Lyle, so fascinating the innocence and her disposition, that she is considered and the castle rather as the sister of the propri as a dependant upon his charity. Indeed, it sible for any one to see her without being terested by the ingenuity, liveliness, and s of her disposition."

care, my lord," said Anderson, smiling; danger in such violent commendations. Aulay, as your lordship describes him, would very safe rival."

! pooh!" said Lord Menteith, laughing, yet at the same time; "Allan is not accessible ssion of love, and for myself," said he, more "Annot's unknown birth is a sufficient rea ist serious designs, and her unprotected cludes every other."

spoken like yourself, my lord," said Ander but I trust you will proceed with your inter ry."

well-nigh finished," said Lord Menteith; "I t to add, that from the great strength and of Allan M'Aulay, from his energetic and llable disposition, and from an opinion gene rtained and encouraged by himself that he nmunion with supernatural beings and can ture events, the clan pay a much greater de ference to him than even to his brother, bold-hearted rattling Highlander, but with which can possibly rival the extraordinary of his younger brother."

a character," said Anderson, "cannot but deepest effect on the minds of a Highland e must secure Allan, my lord, at all events. ween his bravery and his second sight"—

!" said Lord Menteith, "that owl is awa-

ou talk of the second sight, or deuteroscopy," id the soldier; "I remember memorable unro telling me how Murdock Mackenzie, esant, a private gentleman in a company, and oldier, foretold the death of Donald Tough, er man, and certain other persons, as well rt, of the major himself at a certain onfall ge of Trailsund."

e often heard of this faculty," observed An but I have always thought those pretending either enthusiasts or impostors."

rlach—quiver; literally satchel—of arrows.

"I should be loath," said Lord Menteith, "to apply either character to my kinsman, Allan M'Aulay. He has shown on many occasions too much acuteness and sense, of which you this night had an instance, for the character of an enthusiast; and his high sense of honour, and manliness of disposition, free him from the charge of imposture."

"Your lordship, then," said Anderson, "is a believer in his supernatural attributes?"

"By no means," said the young nobleman; "I think that he persuades himself that the predictions which are, in reality, the result of judgment and reflection, are supernatural impressions on his mind, as fanatics conceive the workings of their own imagination to be divine inspiration—at least, if this will not serve you, Anderson, I have no better explanation to give; and it is time we were all asleep after the toilsome journey of the day."

CHAPTER VI.

Coming events cast their shadows before.
CAMPBELL.

At an early hour in the morning the guests of the castle sprung from their repose; and, after a moment's private conversation with his attendants, Lord Menteith addressed the soldier, who was seated in a corner burnishing his corslet with rot-stone and shamois-leather, while he hummed the old song in honour of the victorious Gustavus Adolphus:—

When cannons are roaring, and bullets are flying,
The lad that would have honour, boys, must never fear dying.

"Captain Dalgetty," said Lord Menteith, "the time is come that we must part, or become comrades in service."

"Not before breakfast, I hope?" said Captain Dalgetty.

"I should have thought," replied his lordship, "that your garrison was victualled for three days at least."

"I have still some stowage left for beef and bannocks," said the Captain; "and I never miss a favourable opportunity of renewing my supplies."

"But," said Lord Menteith, "no judicious commander allows either flags of truce or neutrals to remain in his camp longer than is prudent; and therefore we must know your mind exactly, according to which you shall either have a safe-conduct to depart in peace, or be welcome to remain with us."

"Truly," said the Captain, "that being the case, I will not attempt to protract the capitulation by a counterfeited parley, (a thing excellently practised by Sir James Ramsey at the siege of Hannau, in the year of God 1636,) but I will frankly own, that if I like your pay as well as your provant and your company, I care not how soon I take the oath to your colours."

"Our pay," said Lord Menteith, "must at present be small, since it is paid out of the common stock raised by the few amongst us who can command some funds. As major and adjutant, I dare not promise Captain Dalgetty more than half a dollar a-day."

"The devil take all halves and quarters!" said the Captain; "were it in my option, I could no more consent to the halving of that dollar, than the woman in the Judgment of Solomon to the dissevering of the child of her bowels."

"The parallel will scarce hold, Captain Dalgetty, for I think you would rather consent to the dividing of the dollar, than give it up entire to your competitor. However, in the way of arrears, I may promise you the other half-dollar at the end of the campaign."

"Ah! these arrearages!" said Captain Dalgetty, "that are always promised, and always go for nothing! Spain, Austria, and Sweden, all sing one song. Oh! long life to the Hogan-mogans! if they were no officers or soldiers, they were good paymasters.—And yet, my lord, if I could but be made certiorate that my natural hereditament of Drumthwacket had fallen into possession of any of these loons of Covenanters, who could be, in the event of our success, conveniently made a traitor of, I have so much value for that fertile and pleasant spot, that I would e'en take on with you for the campaign."

"I can resolve Captain Dalgetty's question," said Sibbald, Lord Menteith's second attendant; "for if his estate of Drumthwacket be, as I conceive, the long waste moor so called, that lies five miles south of Aberdeen, I can tell him it was lately purchased by Elias Strachan, as rank a rebel as ever swore the Covenant."

"The crop-eared hound!" said Captain Dalgetty, in a rage; "what the devil gave him the assurance to purchase the inheritance of a family of four hundred years standing? Cynthius aurem vellit, as we used to say at Mareschal-College; that is to say, I will pull him out of my father's house by the ears. And so, my Lord Menteith, I am yours, hand and sword, body and soul, till death do us part, or to the end of the next campaign, whichever event shall first come to pass."

"And I," said the young nobleman, "rivet the bargain by a month's pay in advance."

"That is more than necessary," said Dalgetty, pocketing the money however. "But now I must go down, look after my war-saddle and abuilziements, and see that Gustavus has his morning, and tell him we have taken new service."

"There goes your precious recruit," said Lord Menteith to Anderson, as the Captain left the room; "I fear we shall have little credit of him."

"He is a man of the times, however," said Anderson; "and without such we should hardly be able to carry on our enterprise."

"Let us go down," answered Lord Menteith, "and see how our muster is likely to thrive, for I hear a good deal of bustle in the castle."

When they entered the hall, the domestics keeping modestly in the back-ground, morning greetings passed between Lord Menteith, Angus M'Aulay, and the English guests, while Allan, occupying the same settle which he had filled the preceding evening, paid no attention whatever to any one.

Old Donald hastily rushed into the apartment. "A message from Vich Alister More;* he is coming up in the evening."

"With how many attendants?" said M'Aulay.

"Some five-and twenty or thirty," said Donald, "his ordinary retinue."

"Shake down plenty of straw in the great barn," said the Laird.

Another servant here stumbled hastily in, announcing the expected approach of Sir Hector M'Lean, "who is arriving with a large following."

"Put them in the malt-kiln," said M'Aulay; "and keep the breadth of the middenstead between them and the M'Donalds; they are but unfriends to each other."

Donald now re-entered, his visage considerably lengthened—"The teil's i' the folk," he said; "the haill Hielands are asteer, I think. Evan Dhu, of Lochiel, will be here in an hour, with Lord kens how many gillies."

"Into the great barn with them beside the M'Donalds," said the Laird.

More and more chiefs were announced, the least of whom would have accounted it derogatory to his dignity to stir without a retinue of six or seven persons. To every new annunciation, Angus M'Aulay answered by naming some place of accommodation, the stables, the loft, the cow-house, the sheds, every domestic office, were destined for the night to some hospitable purpose or other. At length the arrival of M'Dougal of Lorn, after all his means of accommodation were exhausted, reduced him to some perplexity. "What the devil is to be done, Donald?" said he; "the great barn would hold fifty more, if they would lie heads and thraws; but there would be drawn dirks amang them which should be uppermost, and so we should have bloody puddings before morning!"

"What needs all this?" said Allan, starting up, and coming forward with the stern abruptness of his usual manner; "are the Gael to-day of softer flesh or whiter blood than their fathers were? Knock the head out of a cask of usquebae; let that be their night-gear—their plaids their bed-clothes—the blue sky their canopy, and the heath [illegible] Come a [illegible] more, and they would [illegible] on the [illegible] for want of room."

"A [illegible] Allan, w[illegible] [illegible]

"Ye[illegible] [illegible] soon to-day."

"Ay, we [illegible] Allan; and [illegible] sockets, [illegible] the arms of Donald [illegible] known, the nature of [illegible] vent his [illegible] supported him until he came to himself [illegible] about to speak.

"For God's sake, Allan," said his bro[illegible] knew the [illegible] to make on many of the guests, "say noth[illegible] courage us."

"And I be who discourages [illegible]?" said A[illegible] every man face his w[illegible] as I shall face m[illegible] which [illegible] we sh[illegible] gallantly over [illegible]

"What song [illegible] what sight [illegible]?" cried several voices; for Allan's renown as a [illegible]

"You will know that [illegible] to your sorrow," [illegible] lan. "Speak to me no more. I [illegible] questions." He then pressed [illegible] rested his elbow upon his knee, and sunk i[illegible] reverie.

"Send for Annot Lyle, and the harp," s[illegible] in a whisper, to his servant; "and let the[illegible] men follow me who do not [illegible] and [illegible]"

All accompanied the hospitable landlord, [illegible] only Lord Menteith, who lingered in one of [illegible] embrasures formed by the window of the [illegible] not Lyle shortly after glided into the room, [illegible] served by Lord Menteith as [illegible] the [illegible] most fairy figure that ever trod the tur[illegible] [illegible]. Her stature, considerably less than [illegible] size of women, gave [illegible] extreme youth, insomuch that, though she [illegible] eighteen, she might have passed for four ye[illegible] [illegible]er. Her figure [illegible] a model of exquisite symmetry with the size [illegible]ness of her person, so that Titania herself [illegible] scarce have found a more fitting represent[illegible] hair was a dark shade of the colour usua[illegible] flaxen, whose [illegible] her fair complexion, and with the [illegible] expression of her features. When we add [illegible] charms, that Annot, in her [illegible] state, [illegible] gayest and happiest of maidens, the reader [illegible] low us to claim for her the interest of almo[illegible] looked on her. In fact, it was impossible [illegible] more universal favourite, and she often [illegible] the rude [illegible] of the castle [illegible] Allan [illegible] [illegible] sullen [illegible] to all others the [illegible] that filled her own mind.

Annot [illegible] as we have [illegible] blushed, when [illegible] turning [illegible] from his [illegible] wished her good morning.

"And good morning to you, my lord," re[illegible] extending her hand to her friend; "we ha[illegible] seen you of late at the castle, and now I fea[illegible] no peaceful purpose."

"At least, let me not interrupt your harm[illegible] not," said Lord Menteith, "though my ar[illegible] breed discord elsewhere. My cousin Allan [illegible] assistance of your voice and music."

* The patronymic of MacDonell of Glengarry.

† [illegible] i. e. crazed.

"My preserver," said Annot Lyle, "has a right to my poor exertions; and you, too, my lord,—you, too, are my preserver, and were the first to save a life that is worthless enough, unless it can benefit my protectors."

So saying, she sate down at a little distance upon the bench on which Allan M'Aulay was placed, and, tuning her clairshach, a small harp, about thirty inches in height, she accompanied it with her voice. The air was an ancient Gaelic melody, and the words, which were supposed to be very ancient, were in the same language; but we subjoin a translation of them, by Secundus Macpherson, Esq. of Glenforgen, which, although submitted to the fetters of English rhythm, we trust will be found nearly as genuine as the version of Ossian by his celebrated namesake.

1.

"Birds of omen dark and foul,
Night-crow, raven, bat, and owl,
Leave the sick man to his dream—
All night long he heard your scream—
Haste to cave and ruin'd tower,
Ivy tod, or dingled bower,
There to wink and mope, for hark!
In the mid air sings the lark.

2.

"Hie to moorish gills and rocks,
Prowling wolf and wily fox,—
Hie you fast, nor turn your view,
Though the lamb bleats to the ewe.
Couch your trains, and speed your flight,
Safety parts with parting night;
And on distant echo borne,
Comes the hunter's early horn.

3.

"The moon's wan crescent scarcely gleams,
Ghost-like she fades in morning beams;
Hie hence each peevish imp and fay,
That scare the pilgrim on his way:—
Quench, kelpy! quench, in bog and fen,
Thy torch that cheats benighted men;
Thy dance is o'er, thy reign is done,
For Benyieglo hath seen the sun.

4.

"Wild thoughts, that, sinful, dark, and deep,
O'erpower the passive mind in sleep,
Pass from the slumberer's soul away,
Like night-mists from the brow of day:
Foul hag, whose blasted visage grim
Smothers the pulse, unnerves the limb,
Spur thy dark palfrey, and begone!
Thou darest not face the godlike sun."

As the strain proceeded, Allan M'Aulay gradually gave signs of recovering his presence of mind, and attention to the objects around him. The deep-knit furrows of his brow relaxed and smoothed themselves; and the rest of his features, which had seemed contorted with internal agony, relapsed into a more natural state. When he raised his head and sat upright, his countenance, though still deeply melancholy, was divested of its wildness and ferocity; and in its composed state, although by no means handsome, the expression of his features was striking, manly, and even noble. His thick, brown eyebrows, which had hitherto been drawn close together, were now slightly separated, as in the natural state; and his gray eyes, which had rolled and flashed from under them with an unnatural and portentous gleam, now recovered a steady and determined expression.

"Thank God!" he said, after sitting silent for about a minute, until the very last sounds of the harp had ceased to vibrate, "my soul is no longer darkened—the mist hath passed from my spirit."

"You owe thanks, cousin Allan," said Lord Menteith, coming forward, "to Annot Lyle, as well as to Heaven, for this happy change in your melancholy mood."

"My noble cousin Menteith," said Allan, rising and greeting him very respectfully, as well as kindly, "has known my unhappy circumstances so long, that his goodness will require no excuse for my being thus late in bidding him welcome to the castle."

"We are too old acquaintances, Allan," said Lord Menteith, "and too good friends, to stand on the ceremonial of outward greeting; but half the Highlands will be here to-day, and you know, with our mountain gentlemen, ceremony must not be neglected. What will you give little Annot for making you fit company to meet Evan Dhu, and I know not how many bonnets and feathers?"

"What will he give me?" said Annot, smiling; "nothing less, I hope, than the best ribbon at the Fair of Doune."

"The Fair of Doune, Annot?" said Allan, sadly; "there will be bloody work before that day, and I may never see it; but you have well reminded me of what I have long intended to do."

Having said this, he left the room.

"Should he talk long in this manner," said Lord Menteith, "you must keep your harp in tune, my dear Annot."

"I hope not," said Annot, anxiously; "this fit has been a long one, and probably will not soon return. It is fearful to see a mind, naturally generous and affectionate, afflicted by this constitutional malady."

As she spoke in a low and confidential tone, Lord Menteith naturally drew close, and stooped forward, that he might the better catch the sense of what she said. When Allan suddenly re-entered the apartment, they as naturally drew back from each other with a manner expressive of consciousness, as if surprised in a conversation which they wished to keep secret from him. This did not escape Allan's observation; he stopt short at the door of the apartment; his brows were contracted, his eyes rolled; but it was only the paroxysm of a moment. He passed his broad sinewy hand across his brow, as if to obliterate these signs of emotion, and advanced towards Annot, holding in his hand a very small box made of oak-wood, curiously inlaid. "I take you to witness," he said, "cousin Menteith, that I give this box and its contents to Annot Lyle. It contains a few ornaments that belonged to my poor mother—of trifling value, you may guess, for the wife of a Highland laird has seldom a rich jewel-casket."

"But these ornaments," said Annot Lyle, gently and timidly refusing the box, "belong to the family—I cannot accept"——

"They belong to me alone, Annot," said Allan, interrupting her; "they were my mother's dying bequest. They are all I can call my own, except my plaid and my claymore. Take them, therefore—they are to me valueless trinkets—and keep them for my sake—should I never return from these wars."

So saying, he opened the case, and presented it to Annot. "If," said he, "they are of any value, dispose of them for your own support, when this house has been consumed with hostile fire, and can no longer afford you protection. But keep one ring in memory of Allan, who has done, to requite your kindness, if not all he wished, at least all he could."

Annot Lyle endeavoured in vain to restrain the gathering tears, when she said, "One ring, Allan, I will accept from you as a memorial of your goodness to a poor orphan, but do not press me to take more; for I cannot, and will not, accept a gift of such disproportioned value."

"Make your choice, then," said Allan; "your delicacy may be well founded; the others will assume a shape in which they may be more useful to you."

"Think not of it," said Annot, choosing from the contents of the casket a ring, apparently the most trifling in value which it contained; "keep them for your own, or your brother's bride.—But, good heavens!" she said, interrupting herself, and looking at the ring, "what is this that I have chosen?"

Allan hastened to look upon it, with eyes of gloomy apprehension; it bore, in enamel, a death's head above two crossed daggers. When Allan recognised the device, he uttered a sigh so deep, that she dropped the ring from her hand, which rolled upon the floor. Lord Menteith picked it up, and returned it to the terrified Annot.

"I take God to witness," said Allan, in a solemn tone, "that your hand, young lord, and not mine, has again delivered to her this ill-omened gift. It was the mourning ring worn by my mother in memorial of her murdered brother."

"I fear no omens," said Annot, smiling through her tears; "and nothing coming through the hands of my two patrons," so she was wont to call Lord

Menteith and Allan, "can bring bad luck to the poor orphan."

She put the ring on her finger, and, turning to her harp, sung, to a lively air, the following verses of one of the fashionable songs of the period, which had found its way, marked as it was with the quaint hyperbolical taste of King Charles' time, from some court masque to the wilds of Perthshire:—

> "Gaze not upon the stars, fond sage,
> In them no influence lies;
> To read the fate of youth or age,
> Look on my defier's eyes.
>
> "Yet, rash astrologer, refrain!
> Too deadly would be won
> The prescience of another's pain,
> To perceive by mine own."

"She is right, Allan," said Lord Menteith; "and his end of an old song is worth all we shall gain by our attempt to look into futurity."

"She is WRONG, my lord," said Allan, sternly, "though you, who treat with lightness the warnings I have given you, may not live to see the event of the omen. Laugh not so scornfully," he added, interrupting himself, "or rather laugh on as loud and as long as you will; your term of laughter will find a pause ere long."

"I care not for your visions, Allan," said Lord Menteith; "however short my span of life, the eye of no Highland seer can see its termination."

"For heaven's sake," said Annot Lyle, interrupting him, "you know his nature, and how little he can endure"——

"Fear me not," said Allan, interrupting her—"my mind is now constant and calm.—But for you, young lord," said he, turning to Lord Menteith, "my eye has sought you through fields of battle, where Highlanders and Lowlanders lay strewed as thick as ever the rooks sat on those ancient trees," pointing to a rookery which was seen from the window—"my eye sought you, but your corpse was not there—my eye sought you among a train of unresisting and disarmed captives, drawn up within the bounding walls of an ancient and rugged fortress,—flash after flash—platoon after platoon—the hostile shot fell amongst them, they dropped like the dry leaves in autumn, but you were not among their ranks; scaffolds were prepared—blocks were arranged, saw-dust was spread—the priest was ready with his book, the heads-man with his axe—but there, too, mine eye found you not."

"The gibbet, then, I suppose, must be my doom?" said Lord Menteith. "Yet I wish they had spared me the halter, were it but for the dignity of the peerage."

He spoke this scornfully, yet not without a sort of curiosity, and a wish to receive an answer; for the desire of prying into futurity frequently has some influence even on the minds of those who disavow all belief in the possibility of such projections.

"Your rank, my lord, will suffer no dishonour in your person, or by the manner of your death. Three times have I seen a Highlander plant his dirk in your bosom—one such will be your fate."

"I wish you would decide him to me," said Lord Menteith, "and I shall save him the trouble of his office: your prophecy, if his plaid be passible to sword or pistol."

"Your weapons," said Allan, "would avail you little: none I give you the information on you desire. Believe, or the vision has been ever rejected from me."

"So be it then," said Lord Menteith, "and let us resume the conversation which your augury has placed at. I shall discard the less nearly among plaids and dirks and yells, to-day."

"It may be so," said Allan; "and, it may be, you will so enact those moments, which to me are present only because of future evil. But I," he continued, "I pray of you, that this weapon—that is, such a weapon as this," touching the hilt of the dirk which he wore, "carries your fate."

"In the meanwhile," said Lord Menteith, "you, Allan, have frighted me the blood from the cheeks of Annot Lyle—let us leave this discourse, my friend, and go to see what we both understand—the progress of our military preparations."

They joined Angus M'Aulay and his En and, in the military discussions which took place, Allan showed a clearness of ju of judgment, and precision of thought, t sisted with the mysterial light in which h has been hitherto exhibited.

CHAPTER VII.

> When Allan her claymore indignantly drew,
> When her bonneted countrymen around her slai
> Come Rain or the comet's sec, and Mona the pro
> All planted and pointed in their Highland array—> Le

WHOEVER saw that morning the Castl varach, beheld a busy and a gallant sigl.

The various Chiefs, arriving with their tances, which, notwithstanding the a nun no more than their usual equipage and upon occasions of solemnity, saluted th castle and each other with overflowing with haughty and distant politeness, acc circumstances of friendship or hostility i clans had recently stood to each other. however small his comparative importa the full disposition to exact from the rest due to a separate and independent prince stronger and more powerful, divided a selves by recent contentions or ancient constrained in policy to use great deferen ings of their less powerful brethren, in o of need, to attach as many well-wishers to their own interest and standard. Thus of Chiefs resembled not a little those an the Empire, where the smallest Free possessed a castle perched upon a barre a few hundred acres around it, claimed t honours of a sovereign prince, and a seat his rank among the dignitaries of the Em

The followers of the different leader rately arranged and accommodated, a circumstance best permitted, each retain his henchman, who waited, close as the s his person, to execute whatever might b his patron.

The exterior of the castle afforded a si The Highlanders, from different island straths, eyed each other at a distance w emulation, inquisitive curiosity, or hos licence; but the most astounding part of t at least to a Lowland ear, was the rival of the bagpipers. These warlike minstr the highest opinion, each, of the superior tribe, joined to the most overweening id portance connected with his profession formed their various patrochs in front ea clan. At length, however, as the block-e the end of the season, when, in sportsma they are said to flock or crowd, attracte the sound of each other's triumphant c ole the pipers, swelling their plaids and t same triumphant manner in which the b their feathers, began to approach each such distance as might give to their breth of their skill. Walking within a short evening each other's looks in which se and defiance might be traced, they str and plied their screaming instruments, h own favourite tune with such a din, t iron musician had been buried within them, he must have risen from the dead to arms.

The Chieftains meanwhile had assem room save in the great hall of the castle, were the persons of the greatest consec Highlands, some of them attracted by royal cause, and many by aversion to th general domination which the Marqu since his rising to such influence in the st cised over his Highland neighbours. Th indeed, though possessed of considerable great power, had failings, which render popular among the Highland chiefs. T which he professed was of a morose is ambition appeared to be insatiable, and s complained of his want of beauty and [illegible] add to this, that although a Highlander, [illegible] only distinguished for valour before and [illegible] Gramach[illegible] [illegible] epithet, was the personal [illegible] before [illegible] ds, who [illegible] are known [illegible] of being a [illegible] [illegible]. He [illegible] McDonalds and the McLeans, two [illegible], who, [illegible] by ancient feuds, intense dislike to the Campbells, or, as lled, the Children of Diarmid.

[illegible] the assembled [illegible] he should open the business of [illegible] gth one of the most powerful of the [illegible] the diet by saying, "We have been [illegible] other, McAuley, to consult on weighty cerning the King's affairs, and those of nd we crave to know by whom they are ed to us?"

whose strength did not lie in oratory, [illegible] sh that Lord Menteith should open the he council. With great modesty, and at [illegible] with spirit, that young lord said, "he he was about to propose had come from of better known and more established Since, however, it lay with him to be he had to state to the Chiefs assembled, who wished to throw off the base yoke cism had endeavoured to wreath round had not a moment to lose. The Cove- said, "after having twice made war overeign, and having extorted from him t, reasonable or unreasonable, which t proper to demand—after their Chiefs aded with dignities and favours—after ely declared, with his majesty, after a t to the land of his nativity, was upon his glared, that he returned a contented king nted people,—after all this, and without text for a national grievance, the same pon doubts and suspicions, equally disho- the King, and groundless in themselves, strong army to assist his rebels in Eng- arrel with which Scotland had no more she has with the wars in Germany. It he said, "that the [illegible] able purpose was pursued, had blinded the now usurped the government of Scotland which they were about to incur. The army had dispatched to England under old Le- [illegible] wo former wars-[illegible]

[illegible] Dalgetty [illegible] explanation how many veteran officers, the German wars, were, to his certain in the army of the Earl of Leven. But [illegible] at which one [illegible] the other upon his [illegible] though with some difficulty, prevented [illegible]. Captain Dalgetty looked upon him scornful and [illegible] air, by which the [illegible] moved, and Lord Men- [illegible] his interruption.

[illegible] was most favourable for [illegible] Scotchmen to show, that the country had lately undergone arose [illegible] a few turbulent and sedi- [illegible] to the absurd fanaticism which, [illegible] hundred pulpits, had spread [illegible] the Lowlands of Scotland. He [illegible] Marquis of Huntly in the north, [illegible] to the Chiefs separately. That [illegible] loyal and powerful, was determined utmost energy in the common cause, and [illegible] Earl of Seaforth was prepared to join [illegible] ard. From the Earl of Airly, and the Angusshire, he had had communications ted; and there was no doubt that these, he Hays, Leiths, Burnets, and other loyal would be soon on horseback, would form a body far more than sufficient to overawe the northern Covenanters, who had already experienced their valour in the well known rout which was popularly termed the Trot of Turiff. South of Forth and Tay," he said, "the King had many friends, who, oppressed by enforced oaths, compulsatory levies, heavy taxes, [illegible] and unequally levied, by the tyranny of the Committee of Estates, and the inquisitorial insolence of the Presbyterian divines, waited but the [illegible] royal banner to take up arms. Douglas, [illegible] Roxburgh, Hume, all friendly to the royal cause, would counterbalance," he said, "the cove- nanting [illegible] in the south; and two gentlemen, of [illegible] now present, from the north of England, would answer for the zeal of Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Northumberland. Against so many gallant gentlemen the southern Covenanters could but arm raw levies; the Whigamores of the western shires, and the ploughmen and mechanics of the Low country. For the West Highlands, he knew no interest which the Covenanters possessed there, except that of one individual, as well known as he was odious. But was there a single man, who, on casting his eye round this hall, and recognising the power, the gallantry, and the dignity of the Chiefs assembled, could entertain a moment's doubt of their success against the utmost force which Gillespie Grumach could collect against them? He had only further to add, that considerable funds, both of money and ammunition, had been provided for the army"—(Here Dalgetty pricked up his ears)—"that officers of ability and experience in the foreign wars, one of whom was now present," (the Captain drew himself up, and looked round,) "had engaged to train such levies as might require to be disciplined;—and that a numerous body of auxiliary forces from Ireland, having been detached from the Earl of Antrim, from Ulster, had successfully accomplished their descent upon the main land, and, with the assistance of Clanranald's people, having taken and fortified the Castle of Mingarry, in spite of Argyle's attempts to intercept them, were in full march to this place of rendezvous. It only remained," he said, "that the noble Chiefs assembled, laying aside every lesser consideration, should unite, heart and hand, in the common cause; send the fiery cross through their clans, in order to collect their utmost force, and form their junction [illegible] to leave the enemy no time, either for preparation, or recovery from the panic which would spread at the first sound of their pibroch. He himself," he said, "though neither among [illegible] most powerful of the Scottish no- [illegible] he had to support the dignity of an an- [illegible] honourable house, the independence of an [illegible] and honourable nation, and to that cause he was [illegible] to devote both life and fortune. If [illegible] powerful were equally prompt, [illegible] trusted they would deserve the thanks of their King, and the gratitude of posterity."

[illegible] followed this speech of Lord Menteith, and testified the general acquiescence of all present in the sentiments which he had expressed; but when the sound had died away, the assembled [illegible] continued to gaze upon each other as if some[illegible] remained to be settled. After some whispers among themselves, an aged man, whom his grey hair rendered [illegible], although he was not of the highest order of Chiefs, replied to what had been said.

"Thane of Menteith," he said, "you have well spoken; nor is there one of us in whose bosom the same sentiments do not burn like fire. But it is not strength alone that wins the fight; it is the head of the commander, as well as the arm of the soldier, that brings victory. I ask of you who is to raise and sustain the banner under which we are invited to rise and muster ourselves? Will it be expected that we should risk our children, and the flower of our kinsmen, ere we know to whose guidance they are to be intrusted? This were leading those to slaughter, whom, by the laws of God and man, it is our duty to protect. Where is the royal commission, under which [illegible] are to be convocated in arms? Simple and [illegible] as we may be deemed, we know something of the established rules of war, as well as the laws of our country; nor will we arm our vassals, or break the general peace of Scotland, unless by the express commands of the King, and under a leader fit to command such men as are here assembled."

* Gramach—ill-favoured.

"Where would you find such a leader," said another Chief, starting up, "saving the representative of the Lord of the Isles, entitled by birth and hereditary descent to lead forth the array of every clan of the Highlands; and where is that dignity lodged, save in the house of Vich Alister More?"

"I acknowledge," said another Chief, eagerly interrupting the speaker, "the truth of what has been first said, but not the inference. If Vich Alister More desires to be held representative of the Lord of the Isles, let him first show his blood is redder than mine."

"That is soon tried," said Vich Alister More, laying his hand upon the basket-hilt of his claymore. Lord Menteith threw himself betwixt them, entreating and imploring each to remember that the enemies of Scotland, the liberty of their country, and the cause of their King, ought to be superior in their eyes to any personal disputes respecting descent, rank, and precedence. Several of the Highland Chiefs, who had no desire to admit the claims of either chieftain, interfered to the same purpose, and none with more emphasis than the celebrated Evan Dhu.

"I have come from my lakes," he said, "as a stream descends from the hills, not to turn again, but to accomplish my course. It is not by looking back to our own pretensions that we shall serve Scotland or King Charles. My voice shall be for that general whom the King shall name, who will doubtless possess those qualities which are necessary to command men like us. High-born he must be, or we shall lose our rank in obeying him—wise and skilful, or we shall endanger the safety of our people—bravest among the brave, or we shall peril our own honour—temperate, firm, and manly, to keep us united. Such is the man that must command us. Are you prepared, Thane of Menteith, to say where such a general is to be found?"

"There is but ONE," said Allan M'Aulay; "and here," he said, laying his hand upon the shoulder of Anderson, who stood behind Lord Menteith, "here he stands!"

The general surprise of the meeting was expressed by an impatient murmur; when Anderson, throwing back the cloak in which his face was muffled, and stepping forward, spoke thus:—"I did not long intend to be a silent spectator of this interesting scene, although my hasty friend has obliged me to disclose myself somewhat sooner than was my intention. Whether I deserve the honour reposed in me by this parchment will best appear from what I shall be able to do for the King's service. It is a commission, under the great seal, to James Graham, Earl of Montrose, to command those forces which are to be assembled for the service of his Majesty in this kingdom."

A loud shout of approbation burst from the assembly. There was, in fact, no other person to whom, in point of rank, these proud mountaineers would have been disposed to submit. His inveterate and hereditary hostility to the Marquis of Argyle insured his engaging in the war with sufficient energy, while his well-known military talents, and his tried valour, afforded every hope of his bringing it to a favourable conclusion.

CHAPTER VIII.

Our plot is a good plot as ever was laid; our friends true and constant: a good plot, good friends, and full of expectation: an excellent plot, very good friends. Henry IV. Part I.

No sooner had the general acclamation of joyful surprise subsided, than silence was eagerly demanded for reading the royal commission; and the bonnets, which hitherto each Chief had worn, probably because unwilling to be the first to uncover, were now at once vailed in honour of the royal warrant. It was couched in the most full and ample terms, authorizing the Earl of Montrose to assemble subjects in arms, for the putting down the pre bellion, which divers traitors and seditious had levied against the King, to the manifest ture, as it stated, of their allegiance, and to th of the pacification between the two kingd enjoined all subordinate authorities to be obed assisting to Montrose in his enterprise; gave power of making ordinances and procla punishing misdemeanours, pardoning criminals ing and displacing governors and command truly was as large and full a commission with which a prince could intrust a subject. as it was finished, a shout burst from the as Chiefs, in testimony of their ready submissio will of their sovereign. Not contented with g thanking them for a reception so favourabl trose hastened to address himself to individua most important Chiefs had already been k sonally known to him, but even to those of consequence he now introduced himself, and acquaintance he displayed with their peculiar nations, and the circumstances and history clans, he showed how long he must have stu character of the mountaineers, and prepared for such a situation as he now held.

While he was engaged in these acts of cour graceful manner, expressive features, and d deportment, made a singular contrast w coarseness and meanness of his dress. M possessed that sort of form and face, in wh beholder, at the first glance, sees nothing ex nary, but of which the interest becomes m pressive the longer we gaze upon them. His was very little above the middle size, but in pe was uncommonly well-built, and capable exerting great force, and enduring much fati fact, he enjoyed a constitution of iron, withou he could not have sustained the trials of his dinary campaigns, through all of which he s himself to the hardships of the meanest sold was perfect in all exercises, whether peaceful tial, and possessed, of course, that graceful deportment proper to those to whom habit dered all postures easy.

His long brown hair, according to the cu men of quality among the Royalists, was p the top of his head, and trained to hang c each side in curled locks, one of which, des two or three inches lower than the others, in Montrose's compliance with that fashion which it pleased Mr. Prynne, the puritan, to treatise, entitled, "The Unloveliness of Love The features which these tresses enclosed, that kind which derive their interest from t racter of the man, rather than from the regu their form. But a high nose, a full, decid opened, quick gray eye, and a sanguine com made amends for some coarseness and irregu the subordinate parts of the face; so that, alt Montrose might be termed rather a handsom a hard-featured man. But those who saw hi his soul looked through those eyes with all t gy and fire of genius—those who heard hi with the authority of talent, and the eloq nature, were impressed with an opinion eve external form, more enthusiastically favoura the portraits which still survive would entit ascribe to it. Such, at least, was the impre made upon the assembled Chiefs of the moun over whom, as upon all persons in their society, personal appearance has no small in

In the discussions which followed his disc himself, Montrose explained the various risk he had run in his present undertaking. His tempt had been to assemble a body of loyalis north of England, who, in obedience to the c the Marquis of Newcastle, he expected wou marched into Scotland; but the disinclinatio English to cross the Border, and the dela Earl of Antrim, who was to have landed in way Frith with his Irish army, prevented hi ting this design. Other plans having in like failed, he stated that he found himself under assuming a disguise to render his passage rough the Lowlands, in which he had been sisted by his kinsman of Menteith. By ms Allan M'Aulay had come to know him, not pretend to explain. Those who knew rophetic pretensions, smiled mysteriously; nself only replied, that "the Earl of Mon- d not be surprised if he was known to s, of whom he himself could retain no

e honour of a cavalier," said Captain Dal- ting at length an opportunity to thrust in his am proud and happy in having an opportu awing a sword under your lordship's com- nd I do forgive all grudge, or account, and my heart, to Mr. Allan M'Aulay, for having down to the lowest seat of the board yes- ettes, he hath this day spoken so like a man ll command of his senses, that I had resolv- secret purpose that he was no way entitled the privilege of insanity. But since I was ponei to a noble earl, my future commander f. I do, before you all, recognise the mistake ce, and heartily salute Allan as one he his bon-camerado."

made this speech, which was little under- ttended to, without putting off his military seized on Allan's hand, and began to shake nd me, which Allan, with a grip like a ce, returned with such force, as to drave ants of the gauntlet into the hand of the d Dalgetty might have construed this into a nt, had not his attention, as he stood blow- haking the pressed member, been suddenly Montrose himself.

this news," he said, "Captain Dalgetty—I ay Major Dalgetty, the Irish, who are to your military experience, are now within a es of us."

deer-stalkers," said Angus M'Aulay, "who me to bring in venison for this honourable ve heard of a band of strangers, speaking Saxon nor pure Gaelic, and with difficulty hemselves understood by the people of the who are marching this way in arms, under ng, it is said, of Alaster M'Donald, who is y called Young Colkitto."

must be our men," said Montrose; "we sten to send messengers forward, both to act and to relieve their wants."

ast," said Angus M'Aulay, "will be no easy for I am informed, that, excepting muskets, y little ammunition, they want every thing ers should have; and they are particularly in money, in shoes, and in raiment."

is at least no use in saying so," said Mon- n a loud a tone. "The puritan weavers of shall provide them plenty of broad-cloth, make a descent from the Highlands; and isters could formerly preach the old women ottish boroughs out of their webs of napery, tents to the fellows on Dunse Law,* I will er I have not a little interest both to make lly dames renew their patriotic gift, and eared knaves, their husbands, open their respecting arms," said Captain Dalgetty, lordship will permit an old cavalier to speak so that the one-third have muskets, my eapon would be the pike for the remainder, or resisting a charge of horse, or for breaking ry. A common smith will make a hundred is in a day; here is plenty of wood for shafts: l uphold, that, according to the best usages strong battalion of pikes, drawn up in the f the Lion of the North, the immortal Gus- ould beat the Macedonian phalanx, of which o read in the Mareschal-College, when I n the ancient town of Bon-accord; and will venture to predicate"—— aptain's lecture upon tactics was here sud- denly interrupted by Allan M'Aulay, who said, hastily,—"Room for an unexpected and unwelcome guest!"

At the same moment, the door of the hall opened, and a gray-haired man, of a very stately appearance, presented himself to the assembly. There was much dignity, and even authority, in his manner. His stature was above the common size, and his looks such as were used to command. He cast a severe, and almost stern glance upon the assembly of Chiefs. Those of the higher rank among them returned it with scornful indifference; but some of the western gentlemen of inferior power, looked as if they wished themselves elsewhere.

"To which of this assembly," said the stranger, "am I to address myself as leader? or have you not fixed upon the person who is to hold an office at least as perilous as it is honourable?"

"Address yourself to me, Sir Duncan Campbell," said Montrose, stepping forward.

"To you?" said Sir Duncan Campbell, with some scorn.

"Yes—to me," repeated Montrose, "to the Earl of Montrose, if you have forgot him."

"I should now, at least," said Sir Duncan Campbell, "have had some difficulty in recognising him in the disguise of a groom. And yet I might have guessed that no evil influence inferior to your lordship's, distinguished as one who troubles Israel, could have collected together this rash assembly of misguided persons."

"I will answer unto you," said Montrose, "in the manner of your own Puritans. I have not troubled Israel, but thou and thy father's house. But let us leave an altercation, which is of little consequence but to ourselves, and hear the tidings you have brought from your Chief of Argyle; for I must conclude that it is in his name that you have come to this meeting."

"It is in the name of the Marquis of Argyle," said Sir Duncan Campbell,—"in the name of the Scottish Convention of Estates, that I demand to know the meaning of this singular convocation. If it is designed to disturb the peace of the country, it were but acting like neighbours, and men of honour, to give us some intimation to stand upon our guard."

"It is a singular, and new state of affairs in Scotland," said Montrose, turning from Sir Duncan Campbell to the assembly, "when Scottish men of rank and family cannot meet in the house of a common friend without an inquisitorial visit and demand, on the part of our rulers, to know the subject of our conference. Methinks our ancestors were accustomed to hold Highland huntings, or other purposes of meeting, without asking the leave either of the great M'Callum More himself, or any of his emissaries or dependants."

"The times have been such in Scotland," answered one of the Western Chiefs, "and such they will again be, when the intruders on our ancient possessions are again reduced to be Lairds of Lochow instead of overspreading us like a band of devouring locusts."

"Am I to understand, then," said Sir Duncan, "that it is against my name alone that these preparations are directed? or are the race of Diarmid only to be sufferers in common with the whole of the peaceful and orderly inhabitants of Scotland?"

"I would ask," said a wild-looking Chief, starting hastily up, "one question of the Knight of Ardenvohr, ere he proceeds further in his daring catechism.—Has he brought more than one life to this castle, that he ventures to intrude among us for the purposes of insult?"

"Gentlemen," said Montrose, "let me implore your patience; a messenger who comes among us for the purpose of embassy, is entitled to freedom of speech and a safe-conduct. And since Sir Duncan Campbell is so pressing, I care not if I inform him, for his guidance, that he is in an assembly of the King's loyal subjects, convoked by me, in his Majesty's name and authority, and as empowered by his Majesty's royal commission."

"We are to have, then, I presume," said Sir Dun

* ...venanters encamped on Dunse Law, during the trou- ...

can Campbell, "a civil war in all its forms? I have been too long a soldier to view its approach with anxiety; but it would have been for my Lord of Montrose's honour, if, in this matter, he had consulted his own ambition less, and the peace of the country more."

"Those consulted their own ambition and self-interest, Sir Duncan," answered Montrose, "who brought the country to the pass in which it now stands, and rendered necessary the sharp remedies which we are now reluctantly about to use."

"And what rank among these self-seekers," said Sir Duncan Campbell, "shall we assign to a noble Earl, so violently attached to the Covenant, that he was the first, in 1639, to cross the Tyne, wading middle deep at the head of his regiment, to charge the royal forces? It was the same, I think, who imposed the Covenant upon the burgesses and colleges of Aberdeen, at the point of sword and pike."

"I understand your sneer, Sir Duncan," said Montrose, temperately; "and I can only add, that if sincere repentance can make amends for youthful error, and for yielding to the artful representation of ambitious hypocrites, I shall be pardoned for the crimes with which you taunt me. I will at least endeavour to deserve forgiveness, for I am here, with my sword in my hand, willing to spend the best blood of my body to make amends for my error; and mortal man can do no more."

"Well, my lord," said Sir Duncan, "I shall be sorry to carry back this language to the Marquis of Argyle. I had it in further charge from the Marquis, that, to prevent the bloody feuds which must necessarily follow a Highland war, his lordship will be contented if terms of truce could be arranged to the north of the Highland line, as there is ground enough in Scotland to fight upon, without neighbours destroying each other's families and inheritances."

"It is a peaceful proposal," said Montrose, smiling, "such as it should be, coming from one whose personal actions have always been more peaceful than his measures. Yet, if the terms of such a truce could be equally fixed, and if we can obtain security, for that, Sir Duncan, is indispensable, that your Marquis will observe those terms with strict fidelity, I, for my part, should be content to leave peace behind us, since we must needs carry war before us. But, Sir Duncan, you are too old and experienced a soldier for us to permit you to remain in our leaguer, and witness our proceedings; we shall therefore, when you have refreshed yourself, recommend your speedy return to Inverary, and we shall send with you a gentleman on our part to adjust the terms of the Highland armistice, in case the Marquis shall be found serious in proposing such a measure." Sir Duncan Campbell assented by a bow.

"My Lord of Menteith," continued Montrose, "will you have the goodness to attend Sir Duncan Campbell of Ardenvohr, while we determine who shall return with him to his Chief? M'Aulay will permit us to request that he be entertained with suitable hospitality."

"I will give orders for that," said Allan M'Aulay, rising and coming forward. "I love Sir Duncan Campbell; we have been joint sufferers in former days, and I do not forget it now."

"My Lord of Menteith," said Sir Duncan Campbell, "I am grieved to see you at your early age engaged in such desperate and rebellious courses."

"I am young," answered Menteith, "yet old enough to distinguish between right and wrong, between loyalty and rebellion; and the sooner a good course is begun, the longer and the better have I a chance of running it."

"And you too, my friend, Allan M'Aulay," said Sir Duncan, taking his hand, "must we also call each other enemies, that have been so often allied against a common foe?" Then turning round to the meeting, he said, "Farewell, gentlemen; there are so many of you to whom I wish well, that your rejection of all terms of mediation gives me deep affliction. May Heaven," he said, looking upwards, "judge between our motives, and those of the movers of this civil commotion!"

"Amen," said Montrose; "to that tribun submit us."

Sir Duncan Campbell left the hall, acc by Allan M'Aulay and Lord Menteith. "T a true bred Campbell," said Montrose, as t departed, "for they are ever fair and false."

"Pardon me, my lord," said Evan Dhu; tary enemy as I am to their name, I have e the Knight of Ardenvohr brave in war, h peace, and true in council."

"Of his own disposition," said Montrose, is undoubtedly; but he now acts as the mouth-piece of his Chief, the Marquis, the fal that ever drew breath. And, M'Aulay," he c in a whisper to his host, "lest he should m impression upon the inexperience of Mentei singular disposition of your brother, you h send music into their chamber, to prevent h ing them into any private conference."

"The devil a musician have I," answered "excepting the piper, who has nearly broke by an ambitious contention for superiority w of his own craft; but I can send Annot Ly harp." And he left the apartment to give o cordingly.

Meanwhile a warm discussion took pl should undertake the perilous task of retur Sir Duncan to Inverary. To the higher d accustomed to consider themselves upon an even with M'Callum More, this was an offi be proposed; unto others who could not same excuse, it was altogether unaccepta would have thought Inverary had been th of the Shadow of Death, the inferior chief such reluctance to approach it. After a con hesitation, the plain reason was at length sp namely, that whatever Highlander should u an office so distasteful to M'Callum More, be sure to treasure the offence in his reme and one day or other to make him bitterly re

In this dilemma, Montrose, who considere posal armistice as a mere stratagem on t Argyle, although he had not ventured bl ject it in presence of those whom it conc nearly, resolved to impose the danger an upon Captain Dalgetty, who had neither estate in the Highlands upon which the wra gyle could wreak itself.

"But I have a neck, though," said Dalgetty "and what if he chooses to avenge himself u I have known a case where an honourable dor has been hanged as a spy before now. did the Romans use ambassadors much mo fully at the siege of Capua, although I read only cut off their hands and noses, put out t and suffered them to depart in peace."

"By my honour, Captain Dalgetty," said "should the Marquis, contrary to the rule dare to practise any atrocity against you, yo pend upon my taking such signal vengeance Scotland shall ring of it."

"That will do but little for Dalgetty," ret Captain; "but corragio! as the Spaniard sa the Land of Promise full in view, the Moor Drumthwacket, mea paupera regna, as we said chal-College, I will not refuse your excellen mission, being conscious it becomes a cava nour to obey his commander's orders, to th of both and sword."

"Gallantly resolved," said Montrose; " will come apart with me, I will furnish you conditions to be laid before M'Callum M which we are willing to grant him a tru Highland dominions."

With these we need not trouble our read were of an evasive nature, calculated to me posal which Montrose considered to have b only for the purpose of gaining time. Wh put Captain Dalgetty in complete possession structions, and when that worthy, making tary obeisance, was near the door of his a Montrose made him a sign to return.

"I presume," said he, "I need not remi cer who has served under the great Gustav

e is required of a person sent with a flag of i mere discharge of his instructions, and that il will expect from him, on his return, some of the state of the enemy's affairs, as far as e under his observation. In short, Captain you must be un peu clair-voyant."
! your Excellency," said the Captain, twist-rd features into an inimitable expression of
and intelligence, "if they do not put my head
which I have known practised upon hosoldados who have been suspected to come
n errands as the present, your Excellency
on a preceese narration of whatever Dugald shall hear or see, were it even how many ine there are in M'Callum More's pibroch, or
y checks in the sett of his plaid and trews."
gh," answered Montrose; "farewell, Capetty: and as they say that a lady's mind is xpressed in her postscript, so I would have
that the most important part of your comes in what I have last said to you."
y once more grinned intelligence, and withctual his charger and himself, for the fa-nis approaching mission.
door of the stable,—for Gustavus always is first care,—he met Angus M'Aulay and Musgrave, who had been looking at his
d, after praising his points and carriage,
d in strongly dissuading the Captain from animal of such value with him upon his ry fatiguing journey.
painted in the most alarming colours the rather wild tracks, by which it would be for him to travel into Argyleshire, and the huts or bothies where he would be condemns the night, and where no forage could be or his horse, unless he could eat the stumps ther. In short, he pronounced it absolutely
, that, after undertaking such a pilgrimage,
l could be in any case for military service.
ishman strongly confirmed all that Angus and gave himself, body and soul, to the devil,
ght it was not an act little short of absolute carry a horse worth a farthing into such a l inhospitable desert. Captain Dalgetty for t looked steadily, first at one of the gentle-next at the other, and then asked them, as
e of indecision, what they would advise him
a Gustavus under such circumstances.
e hand of my father, my dear friend," an-['Aulay, "if you leave the beast in my keep-nay rely on his being fed and sorted accord-is worth and quality, and that, upon your urn, you will find him as sleek as an onion butter."
said Sir Miles Musgrave, "if this worthy hooses to part with his charger for a rea-um, I have some part of the silver candle-ll dancing the heys in my purse, which I ery willing to transfer to his."
ef, mine honourable friends," said Captain again eyeing them both with an air of conse
n, "I find it would not be altogether unac-
o either of you, to have some token to re-
he old soldier by, in case it shall please i More to hang him up at the gate of his
e. And doubtless it would be no small satis-
me, in such an event, that a noble and dier like Sir Miles Musgrave, or a worthy table chieftain like our excellent landlord,
t as my executor."
stened to protest that they had no such nsisted again upon the impassable nature ighland paths. Angus M'Aulay mumbled mber of hard Gaelic names, descriptive of alt passes, precipices, corries, and beals,
which he said the road lay to Inverary, when ld, who had now entered, sanctioned his account of these difficulties, by holding up
, and elevating his eyes, and shaking his very guttural which M'Aulay pronounced.
is did not move the inflexible captain.
orthy friends," said he, "Gustavus is not
e dangers of travelling, and the mountains of Bohemia; and (no disparagement to the beals and corries Mr. Angus is pleased to mention, and of which Sir Miles, who never saw them, confirms the horrors,) these mountains may compete with the vilest roads in Europe. In fact, my horse hath a most excellent and social quality; for although he cannot pledge in my cup, yet we share our loaf between us, and it will be hard if he suffers famine where cakes or bannocks are to be found. And, to cut this matter short, I beseech you, my good friends, to observe the state of Sir Duncan Campbell's palfrey, which stands in that stall before us, fat and fair; and, in return for your anxiety on my account, I give you my honest asseveration, that while we travel the same road, both that palfrey and his rider shall lack for food before either Gustavus or I."

Having said this, he filled a large measure with corn, and walked up with it to his charger, who, by his low whinnying neigh, his pricked ears, and his pawing, showed how close the alliance was betwixt him and his rider. Nor did he taste his corn until he had returned his master's caresses, by licking his hands and face. After this interchange of greeting, the steed began to his provender with an eager dispatch, which showed old military habits; and the master, after looking on the animal with great complacency for about five minutes, said,—"Much good may it do your honest heart, Gustavus;—now must I go and lay in provant myself for the campaign."

He then departed, having first saluted the Englishman and Angus M'Aulay, who remained looking at each other for some time in silence, and then burst out into a fit of laughter.

"That fellow," said Sir Miles Musgrave, "is formed to go through the world."

"I shall think so too," said M'Aulay, "if he can slip through M'Callum More's fingers as easily as he has done through ours."

"Do you think," said the Englishman, "that the Marquis will not respect, in Captain Dalgetty's person, the laws of civilized war?"

"No more than I would respect a Lowland proclamation," said Angus M'Aulay.—"But come along, it is time I were returning to my guests."

CHAPTER IX.

————In a rebellion,
When what's not meet, but what must be, was law,
Then were they chosen; in a better hour,
Let what is meet be said it must be meet,
And throw their power i' the dust.

Coriolanus.

In a small apartment, remote from the rest of the guests assembled at the castle, Sir Duncan Campbell was presented with every species of refreshment, and respectfully attended by Lord Menteith, and by Allan M'Aulay. His discourse with the latter turned upon a sort of hunting campaign, in which they had been engaged together against the Children of the Mist, with whom the Knight of Ardenvohr, as well as the M'Aulays, had a deadly and irreconcilable feud. Sir Duncan, however, speedily endeavoured to lead back the conversation to the subject of his present errand to the castle of Darnlinvarach.

"It grieved him to the very heart," he said, "to see that friends and neighbours, who should stand shoulder to shoulder, were likely to be engaged hand to hand in a cause which so little concerned them. What signifies it," he said, "to the Highland Chiefs, whether King or Parliament got uppermost? Were it not better to let them settle their own differences without interference, while the Chiefs, in the meantime, took the opportunity of establishing their own authority in a manner not to be called in question hereafter by either King or Parliament?" He reminded Allan M'Aulay that the measures taken in the last reign to settle the peace, as was alleged, of the Highlands, were in fact levelled at the patriarchal power of the Chieftains; and he mentioned the celebrated settlement of the Fife Undertakers, as they were called, in the Lewis, as part of a deliberate plan, formed to introduce strangers among the Celtic tribes, to destroy by degrees their ancient customs and mode of govern ment, and to despoil them of the inheritance of their fathers.* "And yet," he continued, addressing Allan, "it is for the purpose of giving despotic authority to the monarch by whom these designs have been pursued, that so many Highland Chiefs are upon the point of quarrelling with, and drawing the sword against, their neighbours, allies, and ancient confederates."

"It is to my brother," said Allan, "it is to the eldest son of my father's house, that the Knight of Ardenvoir must address these remonstrances. I am, indeed, the brother of Angus; but [illegible] I am [illegible] the first of his clansmen, and bound to show an example to the others by my [illegible] ready obedience to his command."

"[illegible]," said Lord Menteith, interposing, "[illegible] Sir Duncan Campbell [illegible]. It [illegible] to [illegible] Lowland [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] authority [illegible] [illegible] the natural government of the Prince against whom they have rebelled? As respecting the [illegible] of the Highlands [illegible] [illegible] Sir Duncan Campbell [illegible] pardon for my [illegible]; but it seems very clear to me, that the [illegible] effect produced [illegible] the [illegible] aggrandisement of one overgrown clan at the expense of every independent Chief in the Highlands."

"I will not reply to you, my lord," said Sir Duncan Campbell, "because I know your [illegible], and from whom they are borrowed; yet you will pardon me, saying, that [illegible] at the head of a rival branch of the House of Graham, I have both heard of and known an Earl of Menteith, who would have disdained to have been tutored in politics, or to have been commanded in war, by an Earl of Montrose."

"You will find it in vain, Sir Duncan," said Lord Menteith, haughtily, "to set my vanity in arms against my principles. The King gave my ancestors their title and rank; and these shall never prevent my acting in the royal cause, under any one who is better qualified than myself to be a commander-in-chief. Least of all, shall any miserable jealousy prevent me from placing my hand and sword under the guidance of the bravest, the most loyal, the most heroic spirit among our Scottish nobility."

"Pity," said Sir Duncan Campbell, "that you cannot add to his panegyric the further epithets of the most steady, and the most consistent. But I have no purpose of debating these points with you, my lord," waving his hand, as if to avoid further discussion; "the die is cast with you; allow me only to express my sorrow for the disastrous fate to which Angus M'Aulay's natural rashness, and your lordship's influence, are dragging my gallant friend Allan here, with his father's clan, and many a brave man besides."

"The die is cast for us all, Sir Duncan," replied Allan, looking gloomy, and arguing on his own hypochondriac feelings; "the iron hand of destiny branded our fate upon our forehead long ere we could form a wish, or raise a finger in our own behalf. Were this otherwise, by what means does the Seer ascertain the future from those shadowy presages which haunt his waking and his sleeping eye? Nought can be foreseen but that which is certain to happen."

Sir Duncan Campbell was about to reply, and the darkest and most contested point of metaphysics might have been brought into discussion betwixt two Highland disputants, when the door opened, and Annot Lyle, with her clarshach in her hand, entered the apartment. The freedom of a Highland maiden was in her step and in her eye; for, bred up in the closest intimacy with the Laird of M'Aulay and his brother, with Lord Menteith, and other young men [illegible] frequented Darnlinvarach, she possessed [illegible] tunity which a female, educated chiefly [illegible] own sex, would either have felt, or thought [illegible] to assume, on an occasion like the present.

Her dress partook of the antique, for new [illegible] seldom penetrated into the Highlands, nor [illegible] easily have found their way to a castle [illegible] chiefly by men, whose sole occupation wa[illegible] the chase. Yet Annot's garments were no[illegible] coming, but even rich. Her open jacket, w[illegible] collar, was composed of blue cloth, [illegible] and had silver clasps to fasten, wh[illegible] the wearer. Its sleeves, which were wide [illegible] lower than the elbow, and terminated in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] supporting the [illegible] with which sh[illegible] instrument. A small [illegible] was seated [illegible] [illegible] from Lord Menteith. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] directions [illegible] [illegible] Campbell [illegible] with [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of his debate with Allan M'Aulay.

"[illegible] in a whisper [illegible] so fascinating and so elegant, be a dome[illegible] [illegible] of your brother's establishment?"

"By no means," answered Allan, hastily [illegible] some hesitation; "she is [illegible] near [illegible] our family, and treated," he added, more [illegible] an adopted daughter of our father's house."

As he spoke thus, he arose from his seat, that air of courtesy which every Highland[illegible] sume when it suits him to practise it, he pre[illegible] Annot, and offered to her, at the same time, refreshments the table afforded, with an[illegible] which was probably designed to give Sir D[illegible] impression of her rank and consequence. If [illegible] Allan's purpose, however, it was unneces[illegible] Duncan kept his eyes fixed upon Annot wi[illegible] pression of much deeper interest than c[illegible] arisen from any impression that she was a[illegible] consequence. Annot even felt embarrassed [illegible] old knight's steady gaze; and it was not wit[illegible] siderable hesitation, that, tuning her instru[illegible] receiving an assenting look from Lord Me[illegible] Allan, she executed the following ballad, [illegible] friend, Mr Secundus M'Pherson, whose [illegible] had before to acknowledge, has thus [illegible] the English tongue:

THE ORPHAN MAID.

November's hail-cloud drifts away,
November's sun-beam wan
Looks coldly on the castle grey,
When forth comes Lady Anne.

The orphan by the oak was set,
Her arms, her feet, were bare;
The hail-drops had not melted yet
Amid her raven hair.

"And, Dame," she said, "by all the ties
That child and mother know,
Aid one who never knew these joys,
Relieve an orphan's woe."

The lady said, "An orphan's state
Is hard and sad to bear;
Yet worse the widow'd mother's fate,
Who mourns both lord and heir.

"Twelve times the rolling year has sped,
Since, when from vengeance wild
Of fierce Strathallan's Chief I fled, Forth's eddies whelm'd my child."

"Twelve times the year its course has bor[illegible]
The wandering maid replied,
"Since fishers on St. Bridget's morn
Drew nets on Campsie side.

* In the reign of James VI., an attempt of rather an extraordinary kind was made to civilize the extreme northern part of the Hebridean Archipelago. That monarch granted the property of the Island of Lewis, as if it had been an unknown and savage country, to a number of Lowland gentlemen, called undertakers, chiefly natives of the shire of Fife, that they might colonize and settle there. The enterprise was at first successful, but the natives of the island, MacLeods and MacKenzies, rose on the Lowland adventurers, and put most of them to the sword.

St. Bridget sent no scaly spoil ;—
An infant wellnigh dead,
hey saved, and rear'd in want and toil,
To beg from you her bread.*

hat orphan maid the lady kiss'd—
"My husband's looks you bear ;
[illegible] and [illegible] morn be bless'd!
You are his widow's heir."

hey've robed that maid, so poor and pale,
In silk and sandals rare ;
nd pearls, for drops of frozen hail,
Are glistening in her hair.

he song proceeded, Lord Menteith observed,
. sur[illegible] that it appeared to produce a p[illegible] upon the mind of Sir Duncan [illegible] he could possibly have anticipated
ge[illegible] He well knew that th [illegible] of that period possessed a much greater
both for tale and song than was found [illegible] Lowland neighbours; but even this, h hardly accounted for the embarrassment
h the old Knight withdrew his eyes from the
as if unwilling to suffer them to rest on [illegible] Still less was it to be ex
at features which expressed pride, stern
se, and the austere habit of authority, [illegible] so much agitated by so trivial a cir-
. As the Chief's brow became clouded, he is large shaggy grey eyebrows until they [illegible] his eyes, on the lids of which some-
a tear might be seen to glisten. He remain-nt fixed in the same posture for a minute ter the last note had ceased to vibrate. He d his head, and having looked at Annot purposing to speak to her, he as suddenly hat purpose, and was about to address Al-
the door opened, and the Lord of the Castle ppearance.

CHAPTER X.

their journey toward the gloomy day,
re the hills, and loftier grew the way ;
k, more gloomy, and more doubtful show'd
ston, which receiv'd them from the road.
[illegible], a Romance.

M'AULAY was charged with a message
seemed to find some difficulty in communi-
r it was not till after he had framed his eral different ways, and blundered them all,
cceeded in letting Sir Duncan Campbell
at the cavalier who was to accompany irers of pure Celtic antiquity, notwithstanding the

he above translation, may be desirous to see a liteom the original Gaelic, which we therefore sub-ve only to add, that the original is deposited with [illegible]

LITERAL TRANSLATION.

had drifted away upon the wings of the gale
The sun looked forth between the clouds, pale as [illegible] on the heath when
[illegible]
Lady of the Castle came forth to see her maidens [illegible] milk.*
n orphan [illegible] beneath the old oak tree of [illegible]
The withered leaves fell around her, and her heart
[illegible]
of the [illegible] taken for the feast [illegible] [illegible] were like the specks of [illegible] of the blackened and half-
k that blazes in the hall.
[illegible] said, "Give me comfort, Lady, I am an or-
And the Lady replied, "How can I give that [illegible] I am the widow of [illegible] lord, the mother child. When I fled in my fear from the [illegible] d's foe, our bark was overwhelmed in the tide and [illegible]. This was on St Bridget's morn, near the of Campsie. May ill luck light upon the day."
len answered, "It was on St Bridget's morn, and ars before this time, that the fishermen of Campsie nets neither grilse nor salmon, but an infant half th since lived in misery, and must die, unless she
." And the Lady answered, "Blessed be Saint er morn, for these are the dark eyes and the fal-my slain lord, and thine shall be the inheritance of
And she called for her waiting attendants, and
h clothe that maiden in silk, and in samite ; and hich they wove among her black tresses, were he frozen hail-drops.

* Milk-pails.

V

him was waiting in readiness, and that all was prepared for his return to Inverary. Sir Duncan Campbell rose up very indignantly ; the affront which this message implied immediately driving out of his recollection the sensibility which had been awakened by the music.

"I little expected this," he said, looking indignantly
at Angus M'Aulay. "I little thought that there was a Chief in the West Highlands, who, at the pleasure of a Saxon, would have bid the Knight of Ardenvohr leave his castle, when the sun was declining from the meridian, and ere the second cup had been fill'd. But farewell, sir, the food of a churl does not satisfy the appetite ; when I next revisit Darnlinvarach, it shall be with a naked sword in one hand, and a fire-brand
in the other."

"And if you so come," said Angus, "I pledge myself
to meet you fairly, though you brought five hundred Campbells at your back, and to afford you and them sufficient entertainment, that you shall not again complain of the hospitality of Darnlinvarach."

"Threaten not, men," said Sir Duncan, "live long.
Your turn for gasconading, Laird of M'Aulay, is too well known, that men of honour should regard your vaunts. To you, my lord, and to Allan, who have supplied the place of my churlish host, I leave my thanks. And to you, pretty mistress," he said, addressing Annot Lyle, "this little token, for having opened a fountain which hath been dry for many a year." So saying, he left the apartment, and commanded his attendants to be summoned. Angus M'Aulay, equally embarrassed and incensed at the charge of inhospitality, which was the greatest possible affront to a Highlander, did not follow Sir Duncan to the court-yard, where, mounting his palfrey, which was in readiness, followed by six mounted attendants,
and accompanied by the noble Captain Dalgetty, who had also awaited him, holding Gustavus ready for action, though he did not draw his girths and mount till Sir Duncan appeared, the whole cavalcade left the castle.

The journey was long and toilsome, but without any of the extreme privations which the Laird of M'Aulay had prophesied. In truth, Sir Duncan was very cautious to avoid those nearer and more secret paths, by means of which the county of Argyle was accessible from the westward; for his relation and chief, the Marquis, was used to boast, that he would not for a hundred thousand crowns any mortal should know the passes by which an armed force could penetrate into his country.

Sir Duncan Campbell, therefore, rather shunned
the Highlands, and falling into the Low-country,
made for the nearest seaport in the vicinity, where he had several half-decked galleys, or birlings, as they were called, at his command. In one of these they embarked, with Gustavus in company, who was so seasoned to adventure, that land and sea seemed as indifferent to him as to his master.

The wind being favourable, they pursued their way
rapidly with sails and oars ; and early the next morning it was announced to Captain Dalgetty, then in a small cabin beneath the half deck, that the galley was under the walls of Sir Duncan Campbell's castle.

Ardenvohr, accordingly, rose high above him, when he came upon the deck of the galley. It was a gloomy square tower, of considerable size and great height,
situated upon a headland projecting into the salt-water lake, or arm of the sea, which they had entered on the preceding evening. A wall, with flanking towers at each angle, surrounded the castle to landward ; but, towards the lake, it was built so near the brink of the precipice as only to leave room for a battery of seven guns, designed to protect the fortress from any insult from that side, although situated too high to be of any effectual use according to the modern system of warfare.

The eastern sun, rising behind the old tower flung its shadow far on the lake, darkening the deck of the galley, on which Captain Dalgetty now walked, waiting with some impatience the signal to land. Sir Duncan Campbell, as he was informed by his attendants, was already within the walls of the castle ; but no one encouraged the Captain's proposal of following him ashore, until, as they stated, they should receive the direct permission or order of the Knight of Ardenvohr.

In a short time afterwards the mandate arrived, while a boat, with a pejeer in the bow, bearing the Knight of Ardenvohr's cognisance silver upon his left arm, and playing with all his might the family march, entitled, "The Campbells are coming," approached to conduct the envoy of Montrose to the castle of Ardenvohr. The distance between the galley and the beach was so short as scarce to require the assistance of the eight sturdy rowers, in bonnets, short coats, and trews, whose efforts sent the boat to the little creek in which they usually landed, before one could have conceived that it had left the side of the billing. Two of the boatmen, in spite of Dalgetty's resistance, horsed the Captain on the back of a third Highlander, and, wading through the surf with him, landed him high and dry upon the beach beneath the castle-rock. In the face of the rock there appeared something like the entrance of a low-browed cavern, towards which the assistants were preparing to hurry our friend Dalgetty, when, shaking himself loose from them with some difficulty, he insisted upon seeing Gustavus safely landed before he proceeded one step further. The Highlanders could not comprehend what he meant, until one who had picked up a little English, or rather Lowland Scotch, exclaimed, "Hearts! it's a' about her horse, to usches haste." Further remonstrance on the part of Captain Dalgetty was interrupted by the appearance of Sir Duncan Campbell himself, from the mouth of the cavern which we have described, for the purpose of inviting Captain Dalgetty to accept of the hospitality of Ardenvohr, pledging his honour, at the same time, that Gustavus should be treated as became the hero from whom he derived his name, not to mention the important person to whom he now belonged. Notwithstanding this satisfactory guarantee, Captain Dalgetty would still have hesitated, such was his anxiety to witness the fate of his companion Gustavus, had not two Highlanders seized him by the arms, two more pushed him on behind, while a fifth exclaimed, "Hout awa wi' the daft Sassenach! does she no hear the Laird bidding her up to her ain castle, wi' her special voice, and isna that very mickle honour for the like o' her?"

Thus impelled, Captain Dalgetty could only for a short space keep a reverted eye towards the galley in which he had left the partner of his military toils. In a few minutes afterwards he found himself involved in the total darkness of a staircase, which, entering from the low-browed cavern we have mentioned, winded upwards through the entrails of the living rock.

"The cursed Highland salvages!" muttered the Captain, half aloud; "what is to become of me, if Gustavus, the namesake of the invincible Lion of the Protestant League, should be lamed among their untenty hands!"

"Have no fear of that," said the voice of Sir Duncan, who was nearer to him than he imagined; "my men are accustomed to handle horses, both in embarking and dressing them, and you will soon see Gustavus as safe as when you last dismounted from his back."

Captain Dalgetty knew the world too well to offer any further remonstrance, whatever uneasiness he might suppress within his own bosom. A step or two higher up the stair showed light and a door, and an iron-grated wicket led him out upon a gallery cut in the open face of the rock, extending a space of about six or eight yards, until he reached a second door, where the path re-entered the rock, and which was also defended by an iron portcullis. "An admirable traverse," observed the Captain; "and it commanded by a field-piece, or even a few muskets, quite sufficient to ensure the place against a storming party."

Sir Duncan Campbell made no answer at the time; but, the moment afterwards, when they had entered the second cavern, he struck with the stick which he had in his hand, first on the one side, and then on the other of the wicket, and the sullen ringing sound which replied to the blows, made Captain Dalgetty sensible that there was a gun placed on each side for the purpose of raking the gallery through which he had passed, although the embrasures, through which they might be fired on occasion, were masked outside with sods and loose stones. Having ascended the second staircase, they found themselves on an open platform and gallery, exposed to both musketry and wall guns, if, having forced the first, they had ventured further. The flight of steps, cut in the rock like the former, ascended over, led them finally into the battlement of the tower. This last stair also was long and steep, and, not to mention the fire which it could be directed on it from above, one or two resolute men with pikes and battle-axes, could have made good against hundreds; for the staircase would admit two persons abreast, and was not fenced by any sort of balustrade, or railing, from the edge of its abrupt precipice, on the foot of which the sea rolled with a voice of thunder. So that, in spite of all precautions used to secure this ancient fortress, a person of weak nerves, and a brain apt to become dizzy, might have found it something difficult to have achieved the entrance to the castle, supposing no resistance had been offered.

Captain Dalgetty, too old a soldier to feel such humours, had no sooner arrived in the court-yard than he protested to God the defences of Sir Duncan's castle reminded him more of the notable fortress of Spandau, situated in the March of Brandenburg, of any place whilk it had been his fortune to visit in the course of his travels. Nevertheless, he could not but considerably the mode of placing the guns on the battery we have noticed, observing, that "when the gunners were perched, like to scarts or sea-gulls, on the face of a rock, he had ever observed that they annoyed more by their noise than they dismayed by the weight or damage which they occasioned."

Sir Duncan, without replying, conducted the Captain into the tower; the defences of which were a strong portcullis and iron-clenched oaken door, the thickness of the wall being the space between them. He had not sooner arrived in a hall hung with tapestry, than Captain Dalgetty prosecuted his military criticism. The door indeed suspended by the sight of an excellent breakfast, of which he partook with great avidity; but even before he had secured this meal, than he made the tour of the apartment, examining the ground and walls of the Castle very carefully from each window in turn. He then returned to his chair, and throwing himself back into it at his length, stretched out one leg before him, and tapping his jack-boot with the riding-rod which he carried in his hand, after the manner of a gentleman who affects ease in the society of his equals, he delivered his unasked opinion as follows: "The house of yours, now, Sir Duncan, is a very pretty kind of a tenement, and yet it is hardly such as a cavaliero of honour would expect to do his credit by holding out for many days. But, Sir Duncan, if it pleases you to notice, your house is overcrowed, and slightly commanded, for ordinary men say, by yonder round hillock to the westward, whereon an enemy might stell such a battery of cannon as would make very glad to beat a parley within four-and-twenty hours, unless it pleased God extraordinarily to show mercy."

"There is no road," replied Sir Duncan, somewhat shortly, "by which cannon can be brought to Ardenvohr. The swamps and morasses around the house would scarce carry your horse and you, excepting by such paths as could be rendered impassable within a few hours."

"Sir Duncan," said the Captain, "it is very easy to suppose so; and yet we martial men, who have been in a sea-coast there is always one side, seeing that cannon and munition, which cannot be transported by land, may be right easily brought by sea near to the place where they are to put in action. Neither is a castle, however favourable its situation, to be accounted altogether invincible, as they say, impregnable; for I protest to you, Sir Duncan, that I have known twenty-five men, by dint of surprise and audacity of the attack, win, at the pike, as strong a hold as this of Ardenvohr, ord, captivate, or hold to the ransom, the being ten times their own number."

standing Sir Duncan Campbell's knowe world, and his power of concealing his notion, he appeared piqued and hurt at erions, which the Captain made with the nscious gravity, having merely selected the onversation as one upon which he thought vaide of shining, and, as they say, of laying law, without exactly recollecting that the t not be equally agreeable to his landlord. this matter short," said Sir Duncan, with sion of voice and countenance some what it is unnecessary for you to tell me, Capetty, that a castle may be stormed if it is astly defended, or surprised if it is not heedhof. I trust this poor house of mine will ind in any of these predicaments, should ain Dalgetty himself choose to beleaguer

l that, Sir Duncan," answered the persecommander, "I would premonish you as a trace out a sconce upon that round hill, d graffe, or ditch, whilk may be easily ac- d by compelling the labour of the boors in y; it being the custom of the valorous Gusphus to fight as much by the spade and by sword, pike, and musket. Also, I would to fortify the said sconce, not only by a graffe, but also by certain stackets, or "—(Here Sir Duncan, becoming impatient, partment, the Captain following him to the raising his voice as he retreated, until he out of hearing.)—" The whilk stackets, or should be artificially framed with re-enter- and loopholes, or crenelles, for musketry. shall arise that the foemen——The High-! the old Highland brute! They are as peacocks, and as obstinate as tups—and as missed an opportunity of making his retty an irregular fortification as an invaever broke their teeth upon.—But I see," ed, looking down from the window upon of the precipice, "they have got Gustavus e—Proper fellow! I would know that toss among a whole squadron. I must go to hey are to make of him."
o sooner reached, however, the court to the nd put himself in the act of descending the then two Highland sentinels, advancing aber axes, gave him to understand that service of danger.
o!" said the soldier, "and I have got no . I could not speak a syllable of their salrish, an it were to save me from the prohal."
e your surety, Captain Dalgetty," said Sir who had again approached him without his from whence;" and we will go together, w your favourite charger is accommodated."
ducted him accordingly down the staircase h, and from thence by a short turn behind k, which concealed the stables and other nging to the castle. Captain Dalgetty beible, at the same time, that the side of the he land was rendered totally inaccessible by artly natural and partly scarped with great abour, so as to be only passed by a drawtill, however, the Captain insisted, notwithhe triumphant air with which Sir Duncan t his defences, that a sconce should be erectnsnab, the round eminence to the east of in respect the house might be annoyed from burning bullets full of fire, shot out of cannding to the curious invention of Stephen ing of Poland, whereby that prince utterly great Muscovite city of Moscow. This incaptain Dalgetty owned, he had not yet but observed, "that it would give him delectation to witness the same put to the nst Ardenvohr, or any other castle of simih;" observing, "that so curious an experi- not but afford the greatest delight to all f the military art."

Sir Duncan Campbell diverted this conversation by carrying the soldier into his stables, and suffering him to arrange Gustavus according to his own will and pleasure. After this duty had been carefully performed, Captain Dalgetty proposed to return to the castle, observing, it was his intention to spend the time between this and dinner, which, he presumed, would come upon the parade about noon, in burnishing his armour, which having sustained some injury from the sea-air, might, he was afraid, seem discreditable in the eyes of M'Callum More. Yet, while they were returning to the castle, he failed not to warn Sir Duncan Campbell against the great injury he might sustain by any sudden onfall of an enemy, whereby his horses, cattle, and graivarage, might be cut off and consumed, to his great prejudice; wherefore he again strongly counselled him to construct a sconce upon the round hill called Drumsnab, and offered his own friendly services in laying out the same. To this disinterested advice Sir Duncan only replied by ushering his guest to his apartment, and informing him that the tolling of the castle bell would make him aware when dinner was ready.

CHAPTER XI.

Is this thy castle, Baldwin? Melancholy
Displays her sable banner from the donjon,
Darkening the foam of the whole surge beneath.
Were I a habitant, to see this gloom
Pollute the face of nature, and to hear
The ceaseless sound of wave, and seabird's scream,
I'd wish me in the hut that poorest peasant
E'er framed, to give him temporary shelter. Brown.

The gallant Ritt-master would willingly have employed his leisure in studying the system of Sir Duncan's castle, and verifying his own military ideas upon the nature of its defences. But a stout sentinel, who mounted guard with a Lochaber-axe at the door of his apartment, gave him to understand, by very significant signs, that he was in a sort of honourable captivity.

It is strange, thought the Ritt-master to himself, how well these salvages understand the rules and practique of war. Who would have pre-supposed their acquaintance with the maxim of the great and godlike Gustavus Adolphus, that a flag of truce should be half a messenger half a spy?- And, having finished burnishing his arms, he sate down patiently to compute how much half a dollar per diem would amount to at the end of a six months' campaign; and, when he had settled that problem, proceeded to the more abstruse calculations necessary for drawing up a brigade of two thousand men on the principle of extracting the square root.

From his musings, he was roused by the joyful sound of the dinner bell, on which the Highlander, lately his guard, became his gentleman-usher, and marshalled him to the hall, where a table with four covers bore ample proofs of Highland hospitality. Sir Duncan entered, conducting his lady, a tall, faded, melancholy female, dressed in deep mourning. They were followed by a Presbyterian clergyman, in his Geneva cloak, and wearing a black silk skull-cap, covering his short hair so closely, that it could scarce be seen at all, so that the unrestricted ears had an undue predominance in the general aspect. This ungraceful fashion was universal at the time, and partly led to the nicknames of roundheads, prick-eared curs, and so forth, which the insolence of the cavaliers liberally bestowed on their political enemies.

Sir Duncan presented his military guest to his lady, who received his technical salutation with a stiff and silent reverence, in which it could scarce be judged whether pride or melancholy had the greater share. The churchman, to whom he was next presented, eyed him with a glance of mingled dislike and curiosity.

The Captain, well accustomed to worse looks from more dangerous persons, cared very little either for those of the lady or the divine, but bent his whole soul upon assaulting a huge piece of beef, which smoked at the nether end of the table. But the onslaught, as he would have termed it, was delayed, until the conclusion of a very long grace, betwixt every section of which Dalgetty handled his knife and fork, as he might have done his musket or pike when going upon action, and as often resigned them unwillingly when the prolix chaplain commenced another clause of his benediction. Sir Duncan listened with decency, though he was supposed rather to have joined the Covenanters out of devotion to his chief, than real respect for the cause either of liberty or of Presbytery. His lady alone attended to the blessing, with symptoms of deep acquiescence.

The meal was performed almost in Carthusian silence; for it was none of Captain Dalgetty's habits to employ his mouth in talking, while it could be more profitably occupied. Sir Duncan was absolutely silent, and the lady and Churchman only occasionally exchanged a few words, spoken low, and indistinctly.

But, when the dishes were removed, and their place supplied by liquors of various sorts, Captain Dalgetty no longer kept himself, the same weighty reasons for silence, and began to try if that of the rest of the company. He commenced a new attack upon his landlord, upon the former ground.

"Touching that round mount-ley, or hill, or call it as you will, I would be proud to hold some conference with you, Sir Duncan, on the nature of the same to be thereon constructed; and whether the ascent thereto should be acute or obtuse angle whilk I have heard the great Veld-Mareschal Bannier hold a learned argument with General Tiefenbach during a still-stand of arms."

"Captain Dalgetty," answered Sir Duncan very dryly, "it is not our Highland usage to debate military points with strangers. This castle is like to hold out against a stronger enemy than any force which the unfortunate gentlemen we left at Darnlinvarach are able to bring against it."

A deep sigh from the lady accompanied the concession of her husband's speech, which seemed to remind her of some painful circumstance.

"He who gave," said the clergyman, addressing her in a solemn tone, "hath taken away. May you, honourable lady, be long enabled to say, Blessed be his name!"

To this exhortation, which seemed intended for her sole behoof, the lady answered by an inclination of her head, more humble than Captain Dalgetty had yet observed her make. Supposing he should now find her in a more conversible humour, he proceeded to accost her.

"It is indubitably very natural that your ladyship should be downcast at the mention of military preparations, whilk I have observed to spread perturbation among women of all nations, and almost all conditions. Nevertheless, Penthesilea, in ancient times, and also Joan of Arc, and others, were of a different kidney. And, as I have learned while I served the Spaniard, the Duke of Alva in former times had the leaguer-lasses who followed his camp marshalled into tertias, (whilk we call regiments,) and officered and commanded by those of their own feminine gender, and regulated by a commander-in-chief, called in German Hurewcibler, or, as we would say vernacularly, Captain of the Queans. True it is, they were persons not to be named as paralleled to your ladyship, being such quæ quæstum corporibus faciebant, as we said of Joan Drochels at Mareschal-College; the same whom the French term cortisannes, an I we in Scottish"—

"The lady will spare you the trouble of farther exposition, Captain Dalgetty," said his host, somewhat sternly; to which the clergyman added, "that such discourse better befitted a watch-tower guarded by profane soldiery than the board of an honourable person, and the presence of a lady of quality."

"Craving your pardon, Dominie, or Doctor, aut quorumque alio nomine gaudes, for I would have you to know I have studied polite letters," said the unabashed envoy, filling a great cup of wine, "I see no ground for your reproof, seeing I did not speak of those turpes personæ, as if their occupation or character was a proper subject of conversation for this lady's presence, but simply par avoidens, as illustrating the matter in hand, namely, their natural courage and audacity, much enhanced, doubtless, by the desperate circumstances of their condition."

"Captain Dalgetty," said Sir Duncan C "to break short this discourse, I must acquai that I have some business to dispatch to-order to enable me to ride with you to-mo wards Inverary; and therefore"—

"To ride with this person to-morrow!" ex his lady; "such cannot be your purpose, S can, unless you have forgotten that the mor sad anniversary, and dedicated to as sad a sol

"I had not forgotten," answered Sir D "how is it possible I can ever forget? but cessity of the times requires I should send th onward to Inverary, without loss of time."

"Yet, surely, not that you should accomp in person?" inquired the lady.

"It were better I did," said Sir Duncan can write to the Marquis, and follow on th quarter day.—Captain Dalgetty, I will dispatch for you, explaining to the Marquis of Arg character and commission, with which you w to prepare to travel to Inverary early to-morning."

"Sir Duncan Campbell," said Dalgetty, doubtless at your discretionary disposal in th ter; not the less, I pray you to remember, which will fall upon your own escutcheon, i in any way suffer me, being a commissionate truce, to be circumvented in this matter. clave, vi, vel proditorio; I do not say by your any wrong done to me, but even through al any due care on your part to prevent the san

"You are under the safeguard of my hono answered Sir Duncan Campbell, "and that than a sufficient security. And now," conti rising, "I must set the example of retiring."

Dalgetty saw himself under the necessity o ing the hint, though the hour was early; he skilful general, he availed himself of every delay which circumstances permitted. "Tr your honourable parole," said he, filling his drink to you, Sir Duncan, and to the contin your honourable house." A sigh from Sir was the only reply. "Also, madam," said th replenishing the quaigh with all possible "I drink to your honourable health, and f of all your virtuous desires- and, reverend forgetting to fit the action to the words,) " cup to the drowning of all unkindness bet and Captain Dalgetty—I should say Major respect the flagon contains but one cup mor to the health of all honourable cavaliers a soldados- and, the flask being empty, I a Sir Duncan, to attend your functionary or s my place of private repose."

He received a formal permission to retir assurance, that as the wine seemed to be to another measure of the same vintage shou him presently, in order to soothe the hou solitude.

No sooner had the Captain reached the a than this promise was fulfilled; and, in a s afterwards, the added comforts of a pasty o venison rendered him very tolerant both of ment and want of society. The same do sort of chamberlain, who placed this good his apartment, delivered to Dalgetty a pack and tied up with a silken thread, according custom of the time, addressed with many respect to the High and Mighty Prince, t Marquis of Argyle, Lord of Lorne, and so fo chamberlain at the same time apprized master, that he must take horse at an early Inverary, where the packet of Sir Duncan at once his introduction and his passport. getting that it was his object to collect inf as well as to act as an envoy, and desiro own sake, to ascertain Sir Duncan's re sending him onward without his personal at the Ritt-master inquired of the domestic, wi precaution that his experience suggested, w the reasons which detained Sir Duncan at the succeeding day. The man, who was

ude, replied, "that it was the habit of Sir and his lady, to observe as a day of solemn humiliation the anniversary on which their
had been taken by surprise, and their children number of four, destroyed cruelly by a band of nd freebooters, during Sir Duncan's absence expedition which the Marquis of Argyle had ken against the Macleans of the Isle of Mull."
ly," said the soldier, "your lord and lady have ause for fast and humiliation. Nevertheless, enture to pronounce that if he had taken the
of any experienced soldier, having skill in the s of fortifying places of advantage, he would lt a sconce on the small hill which is to
on the drawbridge. And this I can easily you, [illegible], tendance that the castle. What's your name, friend?"
nr, sir," replied the man.
e is to your health, honest Lorimer. I see holding that pasty to be the main body or of the place to be taken, and taking the
-horn for the sconce [illegible]
[illegible]
cannot stay to hear the rest of your demon-
; but the bell will presently ring. As worthy Meangowl, the Marquis's own chaplain, does worship, and only seven of our household out persons understand the Scottish tongue, it unbecoming in one of them to be absent, and greatly [illegible] me in the opinion of my lady.
are pipes and tobacco, sir, if you please to a whiff of smoke, and if you want any thing shall be forthcoming two hours hence, when are over." So saying, he left the apartment.
sooner was he gone, than the heavy toll of the ll summoned its inhabitants together; and swered by the shrill clamour of the females,
with the deeper tones of the men, as, talking
at the top of their throats, they hurried from
t quarters by a long but narrow gallery,
served as a communication to many rooms,
mong others, to that in which Captain Dal-as stationed. "There they go as if they were to the roll-call," thought the soldier to him-
they all attend the parade, I will look out,
mouthful of fresh air, and make mine own ob-
ns on the capabilities of this place."
dingly, when all was quiet, he opened his r-door and prepared to leave it, when he saw d with an axe advancing towards him from ant end of the gallery, half whistling, half g, a Gaelic tune. To have shown any want lence, would have been at once impolitic, and ming his military character; so the Captain,
the best face upon his situation he could,
d a Swedish retreat, in a tone still louder
e notes of his sentinel; and retreating pace [illegible] as if his only had been to breathe a little fresh air, he shut
r in the face of his guard, when the fellow roached within a few paces of him.
Very well, thought the Ritt-master to himself;
ds my parole by putting guards upon me, for,
sed to say at Mareschal-College, fides et fidu-relativa;* and if he does not trust my word,
see how I am bound to keep it, if any motive occur for my desiring to depart from it. Surely al obligation of the parole is relaxed, in as far ical force is substituted instead thereof.

Thus comforting himself in the metaphysical immunities which he deduced from the vigilance of his sentinel, Ritt-master Dalgetty retired to his apartment, where, amid the theoretical calculation of tactics, and the occasional more practical attacks on the flask and pasty, he consumed the evening until it was time to go to repose. He was summoned by Lorimer at break of day, who gave him to understand, that, when he had broken his fast, for which he produced ample materials, his guide and a horse were in attendance for his journey to Inverary. After complying with the hospitable hint of the chamberlain, the soldier proceeded to take horse. In passing through the apartments, he observed that domestics were busily employed in hanging the great hall with black cloth, a ceremony which, he said, he had seen practised when the immortal Gustavus Adolphus lay in state in the Castle of Wolgast, and which, therefore, he opined, was a testimonial of the strictest and deepest mourning.

When Dalgetty mounted his steed, he found himself attended, or perhaps guarded, by five or six Campbells, well armed, commanded by one who, from the target at his shoulder, and the short cock's feather in his bonnet, as well as from the state which he took upon himself, claimed the rank of a Dunniewassel, or clansman of superior rank; and indeed, from his dignity of deportment, could not stand in a more distant degree of relationship to Sir Duncan, than that of tenth or twelfth cousin at farthest. But it was impossible to extract positive information on this or any other subject, inasmuch as neither this commander, nor any of his party, spoke English. The Captain rode, and his military attendants walked; but such was their activity, and so numerous the impediments which the nature of the road presented to the equestrian mode of travelling, that far from being retarded by the slowness of their pace, his difficulty was rather in keeping up with his guides. He observed that they occasionally watched him with a sharp eye, as if they were jealous of some effort to escape; and once, as he lingered behind at crossing a brook, one of the gillies began to blow the match of his piece, giving him to understand that he would run some risk in case of an attempt to part company. Dalgetty did not augur much good from the close watch thus maintained upon his person; but there was no remedy, for an attempt to escape from his attendants in an impervious and unknown country, would have been little short of insanity. He therefore plodded patiently on through a waste and savage wilderness, treading paths which were only known to the shepherds and cattle-drivers, and passing with much more of discomfort than satisfaction many of those sublime combinations of mountainous scenery which now draw visiters from every corner of England, to feast their eyes upon Highland grandeur, and mortify their palates upon Highland fare.

At length they arrived on the southern verge of that noble lake upon which Inverary is situated; and a bugle, which the Dunniewassel winded till rock and greenwood rang, served as a signal to a well-manned galley, which, starting from a creek where it lay concealed, received the party on board, including Gustavus; which sagacious quadruped, an experienced traveller both by water and land, walked in and out of the boat with the discretion of a Christian.

Embarked on the bosom of Loch Fine, Captain Dalgetty might have admired one of the grandest scenes which nature affords. He might have noticed the rival rivers Aray and Shiray, which pay tribute to the lake, each issuing from its own dark and wooded retreat. He might have marked, on the soft and gentle slope that ascends from the shores, the noble old Gothic castle, with its varied outline, embattled walls, towers, and outer and inner courts, which, so far as the picturesque is concerned, presented an aspect much more striking than the present massive and uniform mansion. He might have admired those dark woods which for many a mile surrounded this strong and princely dwelling, and his eye might have dwelt on the picturesque peak of Duniquoich, starting abruptly from the lake, and raising its scathed brow into the mists of middle sky, while a solitary watch-tower, perched on its top like an eagle's nest, gave military men of the times agreed upon dependencies of

as they called them, with all the metaphysical argu
n of civilians or school divines
glish officer, to whom Sir James Turner was prisoner rout at Uttoxeter, demanded his parole of honour not ond the walls of Hull without liberty. "He brought essage himself. I told him I was ready to do so, pro removed his guards from me; for fides et fiducia sunt
and, if he took my word for my fidelity, he was to trust it, otherwise it was needless for him to seek it, ain for me to give it; and therefore I beseeched him give trust to my word, which I would not break, or guards, who I supposed would not deceive him. In ner I dealt with him, because I knew him to be a scho
urner's *Mem*oirs, p. [illegible] The English officer allowed gth of the reasoning, but that concise reasoner, Crom
m put an end to the dilemma: "Sir James Turner
e his parole, or be laid in irons"

dignity to the scene by awakening a sense of possible danger. All these, and every other accompaniment of this noble scene, Captain Dalgetty might have marked, if he had been so minded. But, to confess the truth, the gallant Captain, who had eaten nothing since daybreak, was chiefly interested by the smoke which ascended from the castle chimneys, and the expectations which these seemed to warrant of his encountering an abundant stock of provant, as he was wont to call supplies of this nature.

The boat soon approached the rugged pier, which abutted into the loch from the little town of Inverary, then a rude assemblage of huts, with a very few stone mansions interspersed, stretching upwards from the banks of Loch Fine to the principal gate of the castle, before which a scene presented itself that might easily have quelled a less stout heart, and turned a more delicate stomach, than those of Ritt-master Dugald Dalgetty, titular of Drumthwacket.

CHAPTER XII.

> For close designs and crooked counsels fit,
> Sagacious, bold, and turbulent of wit,
> Restless, unfix'd in principles and place,
> In power unpleased, impatient in disgrace.
> Absalom and Achitophel.

The village of Inverary, now a neat country town, then partook of the rudeness of the seventeenth century, in the miserable appearance of the houses, and the irregularity of the unpaved street. But a stronger and more terrible characteristic of the period appeared in the market-place, which was a space of irregular width, half way betwixt the harbour or pier, and the frowning castle-gate, which terminated with its gloomy archway, portcullis, and flankers, the upper end of the vista. Midway this space was erected a rude gibbet, on which hung five dead bodies, two of which from their dress seemed to have been Lowlanders, and the other three corpses were muffled in their Highland plaids. Two or three women sate under the gallows, who seemed to be mourning, and singing the coronach of the deceased in a low voice. But the spectacle was apparently of too ordinary occurrence to have much interest for the inhabitants at large, who, while they thronged to look at the military figure, the horse of an unusual size, and the burnished panoply of Captain Dalgetty, seemed to bestow no attention whatever on the piteous spectacle which their own market-place afforded.

The envoy of Montrose was not quite so indifferent; and, hearing a word or two of English escape from a Highlander of decent appearance, he immediately halted Gustavus and addressed him. "The Provost-Marshal has been busy here, my friend. May I crave of you what these delinquents have been justified for?"

He looked towards the gibbet as he spoke; and the Gael, comprehending his meaning rather by his action than his words, immediately replied, "Three gentlemen caterans. God sain them" (crossing himself)—"twa Sassenach bodies, that wadna do something that M'Callum More bade them;" and turning from Dalgetty with an air of indifference, away he walked, staying no further question.

Dalgetty shrugged his shoulders and proceeded, for Sir Duncan Campbell's tenth or twelfth cousin had already shown some signs of impatience.

At the gate of the castle another terrible spectacle of feudal power awaited him. Within a stockade, or palisade, which seemed lately to have been added to the defences of the gate, and which was protected by two pieces of light artillery, was a small enclosure, where stood a huge block, on which lay an axe. Both were smeared with recent blood, and a quantity of saw-dust strewed around, partly retained and partly obliterated the marks of a very late execution.

As Dalgetty looked on this new object of terror, his principal guide suddenly twitched him by the skirt of his jerkin, and having thus attracted his attention, winked and pointed with his finger to a pole fixed on the stockade, which supported a human head, being that, doubtless, of the late sufferer. There was a leer on the Highlander's face, as he pointed to this ghastly spectacle, which seemed to his fellow-traveller ominous of nothing good.

Dalgetty dismounted from his horse at the gatew and Gustavus was taken from him without his bei permitted to attend him to the stable, according to custom.

This gave the soldier a pang which the appara of death had not conveyed. "Poor Gustavus!" s he to himself, "if anything but good happens to t I had better have left him at Darnlinvarach th brought him here among these Highland salva who scarce know the head of a horse from his t But duty must part a man from his nearest and de est.

> 'When the cannons are roaring, lads, and the colours flying,
> The lads that seek honour must never fear dying;
> Then, stout cavaliers, let us toil our brave trade in,
> And fight for the Gospel and the bold King of Sweden.'"

Thus silencing his apprehensions with the but-end a military ballad, he followed his guide into a sort guard-room filled with armed Highlanders. It w intimated to him that he must remain here until h arrival was communicated to the Marquis. To ma this communication the more intelligible, the dough Captain gave to the Dunniewassel Sir Duncan Cam bell's packet, desiring, as well as he could, by sig that it should be delivered into the Marquis's ow hand. His guide nodded, and withdrew.

The Captain was left about half an hour in th place, to endure with indifference, or return wi scorn, the inquisitive, and, at the same time, t inimical glances of the armed Gael, to whom h exterior and equipage were as much subject of cu osity, as his person and country seemed matter dislike. All this he bore with military nonchalanc until, at the expiration of the above period, a pers dressed in black velvet, and wearing a gold chain li a modern magistrate of Edinburgh, but who was, fact, steward of the household to the Marquis Argyle, entered the apartment, and invited, with s lemn gravity, the Captain to follow him to his ma ter's presence.

The suite of apartments through which he passe were filled with attendants or visiters of various d scriptions, disposed, perhaps, with some ostentatio in order to impress the envoy of Montrose with idea of the superior power and magnificence belon ing to the rival house of Argyle. One anteroom wa filled with lacqueys, arrayed in brown and yellow, th colours of the family, who, ranged in double file, gaz in silence upon Captain Dalgetty as he passed betw their ranks. Another was occupied by Highland ge tlemen and chiefs of small branches, who were amu sing themselves with chess, backgammon, and othe games, which they scarce intermitted to gaze wit curiosity upon the stranger. A third was filled wit Lowland gentlemen and officers, who seemed also i attendance; and, lastly, the presence-chamber of th Marquis himself showed him attended by a lev which marked his high importance.

This apartment, the folding doors of which we opened for the reception of Captain Dalgetty, was long gallery, decorated with tapestry and family r traits, and having a vaulted ceiling of open woo work, the extreme projections of the beams bei richly carved and gilded. The gallery was lighted long lanceolated Gothic casements, divided by hea shafts, and filled with painted glass, where the su beams glimmered dimly through boars'-heads, a galleys, and batons, and swords, armorial bearin of the powerful house of Argyle, and emblems of t high hereditary offices of Justiciary of Scotland, a Master of the Royal Household, which they long e joyed. At the upper end of this magnificent gal stood the Marquis himself, the centre of a splen circle of Highland and Lowland gentlemen, all ric dressed, among whom were two or three of the cler called in, perhaps, to be witnesses of his lordshi zeal for the Covenant.

The Marquis himself was dressed in the fash of the period, which Vandyke has so often paint but his habit was sober and uniform in colour a rather rich than gay. His dark complexion, furrow

d downcast look, gave him the appear- frequently engaged in the consideration affairs and who has acquired, by long of gravity and mystery, which he can- even when there is nothing to be con- east with the aspects which had procured gname of ... name of Gillespie Grue- ... was less perceptible when he ward, which perhaps was one cause of ... that habit. In person, he was tall ... without that dignity of deportment ... which became his high rank. Some- was cold in his address, and sinister in ... he said and behaved with the f a man of sagacity. He was adored ... whose advancement he had greatly, ... he was in proportion disliked by iers of other septs, some of whom he tripped of their possessions, while others emselves in danger from his future, I all dread ... the height to which he was already noticed, that in displaying him- his councillors, his officers of the house- train of vassals, allies, and dependents, of Argyle probably wished to make an n the nervous system of Captain Dugald ut that doughty person had fought his epartment or another, through the great- Thirty Years' War in Germany, a pe- brave and successful soldier was a com- rinces. The King of Sweden, and, after even the haughty Princes of the Em- ind themselves fain, frequently to com- heir dignity, and silence, when they could he pecuniary claims of their soldiers, by em to unusual privileges and familiarity. ald Dalgetty had it to boast, that he had nces at feasts made for monarchs, and not a person to be abashed at even by hich surrounded M'Callum More. In- naturally by no means the most modest orld, but, on the contrary, had so good f himself, that into whatever company be thrown, he was always proportion- n his own conceit; so that he felt as in the most exalted society as among iary companions. In this high opinion nk, he was greatly fortified by his ideas y profession, which, in his phrase, made alier a camarado to an emperor.

oduced, therefore, into the Marquis's mber, he advanced to the upper end with ore confidence than grace, and would se up to Argyle's person before speak- the latter waved his hand, as a signal p short. Captain Dalgetty did so ac- d having made his military congee with ce, he thus accosted the Marquis: "Give orrow, my lord—or rather I should say, Beso a usted los manos, as the Spaniard you, sir, and what is your business?" Marquis, in a tone which was intended he offensive familiarity of the soldier.

fair interrogative, my lord," answered hich I shall forthwith answer as be- ier, and that peremptorie, as we used to chal-College."

or what he is, Neal," said the Marquis gentleman who stood near him.

e the honourable gentlemen the labour ion," continued the Captain. "I am etty, of Drumthwacket, that should be, ster in various services, and now Major ot what or whose regiment of Irishes; ne with a flag of truce from a high and l, James, Earl of Montrose, and other s now in arms for his Majesty. And so, ng Charles!"

know where you are, and the danger of us, sir," again demanded the Marquis, ply to me as if I were a child or a fool? Montrose is with the English malignants; and I suspect you are one of those Irish runagates, who are come into this country to burn and slay, as they did under Sir Phelim O'Neale."

"My lord," replied Captain Dalgetty, "I am no runagate, though a Major of Irishes, for which I might refer your lordship to the invincible Gustavus Adolphus the Lion of the North, to Banner, to Oxenstern, to the warlike Duke of Saxe Weimar, Tilly, Wallenstein, Piccolomini, and other great captains, both dead and living; and touching the noble Earl of Montrose, I pray your lordship to peruse these my full powers for treating with you in the name of that right honourable commander."

The Marquis looked slightingly at the signed and sealed paper which Captain Dalgetty handed to him, and throwing it with contempt upon a table, asked those around him what he deserved who came as the avowed envoy and agent of malignant traitors, in arms against the state?

"A high gallows and a short shrift," was the ready answer of one of the bystanders.

"I will crave of that honourable cavalier who hath last spoken," said Dalgetty, "to be less hasty in forming his conclusions, and also of your lordship to be cautelous in adopting the same, in respect such threats are to be held out only to base bisognos, and not to men of spirit and action, who are bound to peril themselves as freely in services of this nature, as upon sieges, battles, or onslaughts of any sort. And albeit I have not with me a trumpet or a white flag, in respect our army is not yet equipped with its full appointments, yet the honourable cavaliers and your lordship must concede unto me, that the sanctity of an envoy who cometh on matter of truce or parle, consisteth not in the fanfare of a trumpet, whilk is but a sound, or in the flap of a white flag, whilk is but an old rag in itself, but in the confidence reposed by the party sending, and the party sent, in the honour of those to whom the message is to be carried, and their full reliance that they will respect the jus gentium, as weel as the law of arms, in the person of the commissionate."

"You are not come hither to lecture us upon the law of arms, sir," said the Marquis, "which neither does nor can apply to rebels and insurgents; but to suffer the penalty of your insolence and folly for bringing a traitorous message to the Lord Justice General of Scotland, whose duty calls upon him to punish such an offence with death."

"Gentlemen," said the Captain, who began much to dislike the turn which his mission seemed about to take, "I pray you to remember, that the Earl of Montrose will hold you and your possessions liable for whatever injury my person, or my horse, shall sustain by these unseemly proceedings, and that he will be justified in executing retributive vengeance on your persons and possessions."

This menace was received with a scornful laugh, while one of the Campbells replied, "It is a far cry to Lochow;" a proverbial expression of the tribe, meaning that their ancient hereditary domains lay beyond the reach of an invading enemy. "But, gentlemen," further urged the unfortunate Captain, who was unwilling to be condemned, without at least the benefit of a full hearing, "although it is not for me to say how far it may be to Lochow, in respect I am a stranger to these parts, yet, what is more to the purpose, I trust you will admit that I have the guarantee of an honourable gentleman of your own name Sir Duncan Campbell of Ardenvohr, for my safety on this mission; and I pray you to observe, that in breaking the truce towards me, you will highly prejudicate his honour and fair fame."

This seemed to be new information to many of the gentlemen, for they spoke aside with each other, and the Marquis's face, notwithstanding his power of suppressing all external signs of his passions, showed impatience and vexation.

"Does Sir Duncan of Ardenvohr pledge his honour for this person's safety, my lord?" said one of the company, addressing the Marquis.

"I do not believe it," answered the Marquis; "but I have not yet had time to read his letter."

"We will pray your lordship to do so," said ano ther of the Campbells; "our name must not suffer discredit through the means of such a fellow as this."

"A dead fly," said a clergyman, "maketh the ointment of the apothecary to stink."

"Reverend sir," said Captain Dalgetty, "in respect of the use to be derived, I forgive you the unsavouriness of your comparison; and also remit to the gentleman in the red bonnet, the disparaging epithet of fellow which he has discourteously applied to me, who am no way to be distinguished by the same, unless in so far as I have been called fellow-soldier by the great Gustavus Adolphus, the Lion of the North, and other chosen commanders, both in Germany and the Low Countries. But, touching Sir Duncan Campbell's guarantee of my safety, I will gage my life upon his making my words good thereanent, when he comes hither to-morrow."

"If Sir Duncan be soon expected, my Lord," said one of the intercessors, "it would be a pity to anticipate matters with this poor man."

"Besides that," said another, "your lordship—I speak with reverence—should, at least, consult the Knight of Ardenvohr's letter, and learn the terms on which this Major Dalgetty, as he calls himself, has been sent hither by him."

They closed around the Marquis, and conversed together in a low tone, both in Gaelic and English. The patriarchal power of the Chiefs was very great, and that of the Marquis of Argyle, armed with all his grants of hereditary jurisdiction, was particularly absolute. But there interferes some check of one kind or other even in the most despotic government. That which mitigated the power of the Celtic Chiefs, was the necessity which they lay under of conciliating the kinsmen, who, under them, led out the lower orders to battle, and who formed a sort of council of the tribe in time of peace. The Marquis on this occasion thought himself under the necessity of attending to the remonstrances of this senate, or, more properly Comhaltai, of the name of Campbell, and, slipping out of the circle, gave orders for the prisoner to be removed to a place of security.

"Prisoner!" exclaimed Dalgetty, exerting himself with such force as wellnigh to shake off two Highlanders, who for some minutes past had waited the signal to seize him, and kept for that purpose close at his back. Indeed the soldier had so nearly attained his liberty, that the Marquis of Argyle changed colour, and stepped back two paces, laying, however, his hand on his sword, while several of his clan, with ready devotion, threw themselves betwixt him and the apprehended vengeance of the prisoner. But the Highland guards were too strong to be shaken off, and the unlucky Captain, after having had his offensive weapons taken from him, was dragged off and conducted through several gloomy passages to a small side-door grated with iron, within which was another of wood. These were opened by a grim old Highlander with a long white beard, and displayed a very steep and narrow flight of steps leading downward. The Captain's guards pushed him down two or three steps, then, unloosing his arms, left him to grope his way to the bottom as he could; a task which became difficult and even dangerous, when the two doors being successively locked left the prisoner in total darkness.

CHAPTER XIII.

> Whatever stranger visits here,
> We pity his sad case,
> Unless to worship he draw near
> The King of Kings—his Grace.
>
> BURNS'S Lines on a Visit to Inverary.

THE Captain finding himself deprived of light in the manner we have described, and placed in a very uncertain situation, proceeded to descend the narrow and broken stair with all the caution in his power, hoping that he might find at the bottom some place to repose himself. But with all his care he could not finally avoid making a false step, which brought him down the four or five last steps too hastily to preserve his equilibrium. At the bottom he stumbled over a bundle of something soft, which stirred and uttered a groan, so deranging the Captain's descent, floundered forward, and finally fell upon hi and knees on the floor of a damp and stor dungeon.

When Dalgetty had recovered, his first dem to know over whom he had stumbled.

"He was a man a month since," answered a and broken voice.

"And what is he now, then," said Dalgett he thinks it fitting to lie upon the lowest ste stairs, and clew up like a hurchin, that hon cavaliers, who chance to be in trouble, ma their noses over him?"

"What is he now?" replied the same voi is a wretched trunk, from which the boug one by one been lopped away, and which ca how soon it is torn up and hewed into billet furnace."

"Friend," said Dalgetty, "I am sorry for y patienza, as the Spaniard says. If you had l as quiet as a log, as you call yourself, I shou saved some excoriations on my hands and kn

"You are a soldier," replied his fellow-p "do you complain on account of a fall for boy would not bemoan himself?"

"A soldier?" said the Captain; "and how know, in this cursed dark cavern, that I am a s

"I heard your armour clash as you fell," the prisoner, "and now I see it glimmer. W have remained as long as I in this darkne eyes will distinguish the smallest eft that cr the floor."

"I had rather the devil picked them out Dalgetty; "if this be the case, I shall wis short turn of the rope, a soldier's prayer, an from a ladder. But what sort of provant h got here—what food, I mean, brother in affli

"Bread and water once a-day," replied the

"Prithee, friend, let me taste your loaf," sa getty; "I hope we shall play good comrade we dwell together in this abominable pit."

"The loaf and jar of water," answered th prisoner, "stand in the corner, two steps right hand. Take them, and welcome. With food I have well nigh done."

Dalgetty did not wait for a second invitati groping out the provisions, began to munc stale black oaten loaf with as much heartines have seen him play his part at better viands,

"This bread," he said, muttering, (with his full at the same time,) "is not very savoury theless, it is not much worse than that which at the famous leaguer at Werben, where the v Gustavus foiled all the efforts of the celebrat that terrible old hero, who had driven two ki of the field—namely, Ferdinand of Bohem Christian of Denmark. And anent this wate is none of the most sweet, I drink in the your speedy deliverance, comrade, not forgetti own, and devoutly wishing it were Rhenish humming Lubeck beer, at the least, were it honour of the pledge."

While Dalgetty ran on in this way, his te time with his tongue, and he speedily finis provisions which the benevolence or indiffe his companion in misfortune had abandone voracity. When this task was accomplis wrapped himself in his cloak, and seating hi a corner of the dungeon in which he could support on each side, (for he had always admirer of elbow-chairs, he remarked, even f youth upward,) he began to question his captive.

"Mine honest friend," said he, "you and comrades at bed and board, should be better a ed. I am Dugald Dalgetty of Drumthwacket forth, Major in a regiment of loyal Irishes, an Extraordinary of a High and Mighty Lord Earl of Montrose. Pray, what may your na

"It will avail you little to know," replied taciturn companion.

"Let me judge of that matter," answered the

"Well, then Ranald MacEagh is my nam is, Ranald Son of the Mist."

'Mist!" ejaculated Dalgetty. "Son of , say I. But, Ranald, since that is your me you in possession of the provost's
? what the devil brought you here, that rimes and my crimes," answered Ru-

y, the Keeper of Ardenvoihr?"
that honourable person," replied Dal-

ye where he now is?" replied Ranald.
his day at Ardenvoihr," answered the
he may feast to-morrow at Inverary;
purpose if he chance to fail, my chase
ce will be something precarious."
an know, on claims his intercession,
orst foe and his best friend," answered

uld desire to carry a less questionable swered Dalgetty. "Sir Duncan is not ay at reading riddles with."
axon," said the prisoner, "tell him I that, fifteen years since, stood on his gth and the pledges we had left there—er that found out the wolf's den on the royed his offspring—I am the leader of ch surprised Ardenvohr, yesterday was nd gave his four children to the sword."
honest friend," said Dalgetty, "if that commendation to Sir Duncan's favour,
mit my pleading thereupon, in respect
d that even the animal creation are nst those who intrommit with their off-
, much more any rational and Christian have had violence done upon their
But I pray you in courtesy to tell me, scribed the castle from the hillock called ilk I uphold to be the true point of at-were to be protected by a sconce."
ded the cliff by ladders of withies or d the prisoner, "drawn up by an acclansman, who had served six months
to enjoy that one night of unlimited
The owl whooped around us as we hung n and earth; the tide roared against rock, and dashed asunder our skiff, yet
t failed him. In the morning there was es, where there had been peace and joy

pretty camisade, I doubt not, Ranald
very sufficient onslaught, and not unharged. Nevertheless, I would have ise from that little hillock called Drum-
rs is a pretty irregular Scythian fashion
nald, much resembling that of Turks, ther Asiatic people. But the reason,
cause of this war—the lacrima causa,
! Deliver me that, Ranald."
een pushed at by the M'Aulays, and tribes," said Ranald, "till our possesunsafe for us"
said Dalgetty; "I have faint rememing heard of that matter. Did you not cheese into a man's mouth, when he stomach whereunto to transmit the eard, then," said Ranald, "the tale of n the haughty forester?"

me that I have," said Dalgetty, "and old date. It was a merry jest that, of bread into the dead man's mouth, but wild and salvage for civilized acceptation vastating the good victuals. I have seen
e, or a lagner, Ranald, a living soldier en the better, Ranald, for that crust of you threw away on a dead pow."
attacked by Sir Duncan," continued nd my brother was slain—his head was the battlements which we scaled—I e, and it is a vow I have never broken."
so," said Dalgetty; "and every tho-ldier will confess that revenge is a
; but in what manner this story will Duncan in your justification, unless it him to intercede with the Marquis to change the manner thereof from hanging, or simple suspension, to breaking your limbs on the roue or wheel, with the coulter of a plough, or otherwise putting you to death by torture, surpasses my comprehension. Were I you, Ranald, I would be for mis-keeping Sir Duncan, keeping my own secret, and departing quietly by suffocation, like your ancestors

before you."

"Yet hearken, stranger," said the Highlander,
"Sir Duncan of Ardenvohr had four children. Three died under our daks, but the fourth survives; and more would he give to dandle on his knee the fourth
child which remains, than to rack those old bones,
which care little for the utmost indulgence of his wrath. One word, if I list to speak it, could turn his day of humiliation and fasting into a day of thankfulness and rejoicing, and breaking of bread. O, I know it by my own heart! Dearer to me is the child Kenneth, who chaseth the butterfly on the banks of the Aven, than ten sons who are mouldering in earth,
or are preyed on by the fowls of the air."

"I presume, Ranald," continued Dalgetty, "that the three pretty fellows whom I saw yonder in the market-place, strung up by the head like rizzer'd had-docks, claimed some interest in you?"

There was a brief pause ere the Highlander replied,
in a tone of strong emotion,—"They were my sons,
stranger—they were my sons!—blood of my blood—
bone of my bone! fleet of foot—unerring in aim—unvanquished by foemen till the sons of Diarmid overcame them by numbers! Why do I wish to survive them? The old trunk will less feel the rending up of its roots, than it has felt the lopping off of its graceful boughs. But Kenneth must be trained to revenge—the young eagle must learn from the old how to stoop on his foes. I will purchase for his sake my life and my freedom, by discovering my secret to the Knight of Ardenvohr."

"You may attain your end more easily," said a third voice, mingling in the conference, "by entrust-ing it to me."

All Highlanders are superstitious. "The Enemy
of Mankind is among us!" said Ranald MacEagh, springing to his feet. His chains clattered as he rose,
while he drew himself as far as they permitted from
the quarter whence the voice appeared to proceed.
His fear in some degree communicated itself to Captain Dalgetty, who began to repeat, in a sort of polyglot gibberish, all the exorcisms he had ever heard of, without being able to remember more than a word or two of each.

"In nomine domini, as we said at Mareschal College—santissima madredi dios, as the Spaniard has it—alle guten geister loben den Herrn, saith the blessed Psalmist, in Dr. Luther's translation"——

"A truce with your exorcisms," said the voice they had heard before; "though I come strangely among you, I am mortal like yourselves, and my assistance may avail you in your present streight, if you are not too proud to be counselled."

While the stranger thus spoke, he withdrew the shade of a dark lantern, by whose feeble light Dal-getty could only discern that the speaker who had thus mysteriously united himself to their company,
and mixed in their conversation, was a tall man, dressed in a livery cloak of the Marquis. His first glance was to his feet, but he saw neither the cloven
foot which Scottish legends assign to the foul fiend,
nor the horse's hoof by which he is distinguished in Germany. His first inquiry was, how the stranger had come among them?

"For," said he, "the creak of these rusty bars
would have been heard had the door been made patent; and if you passed through the keyhole, truly, sir, put what face you will on it, you are not fit to be enrolled in a regiment of living men."

"I reserve my secret," answered the stranger, "until you shall merit the discovery by communicating to me some of yours. It may be that I shall be moved to let you out where I myself came in."

"It cannot be through the keyhole, then," said Captain Dalgetty, "for my corslet would stick in the passage, were it possible that my head-piece could get through. As for secrets, I have none of my own, and but few appertaining to others. But impart to us what secrets you desire to know; or, as Professor Snufflegreek used to say at the Mareschal-College, Aberdeen, speak that I may know thee."

"It is not with you I have first to do," replied the stranger, turning his back full on the wild and wasted features and large limbs of the Highlander, Ranald MacEagh, who was drawn up against the wall,—the eyes of whom seemed yet uncertain whether his guest was a living being.

"I have brought you something, my friend," said the stranger, in a more soothing tone, "to mend your fare; if you are to die to-morrow, it is no reason why you should not live to-night."

"None at all—no reason in the creation," replied the ready Captain Dalgetty, who forthwith began to unpack the contents of a small basket which the stranger had brought under his cloak, while the Highlander, either in suspicion or disdain, paid no attention to the good cheer.

"Here's to thee, my friend," said the Captain, who having already despatched a huge piece of roasted kid, was now taking a pull at the wine-flask. "What is thy name, my good friend?"

"Murdoch Campbell, sir," answered the servant, "a lackey of the Marquis of Argyle, and occasionally acting as under-warden."

"Then here is to thee once more, Murdoch," said Dalgetty, "drinking to you by your proper name for the better luck sake. This wine I take to be Calcavella. Well, honest Murdoch, I take it on me to say, thou deservest to be upper-warden, since thou showest thyself twenty times better acquainted with the way of victualling honest gentlemen that are under misfortune, than thy principal. Bread and water? out upon him! It was enough, Murdoch, to destroy the credit of the Marquis's dungeon. But I see you would converse with my friend, Ranald MacEagh here. Never mind my presence; I'll get me into this corner with the basket, and I will warrant my jaws make noise enough to prevent my ears from hearing you."

Notwithstanding this promise, however, the veteran listened with all the attention he could to gather their discourse, or, as he described it himself, "laid his ears back in his neck, like Gustavus, when he heard the key turn in the girnell-kist." He could, therefore, owing to the narrowness of the dungeon, easily overhear the following dialogue.

"Are you aware, Son of the Mist," said the Campbell, "that you will never leave this place excepting for the gibbet?"

"Those who are dearest to me," answered MacEagh, "have trode that path before me."

"Then you would do nothing," asked the visiter, "to shun following them?"

The prisoner writhed himself in his chains before returning an answer.

"I would do much," at length he said; "not for my own life, but for the sake of the pledge in the glen of Strath-Aven."

"And what would you do to turn away the bitterness of the hour?" again demanded Murdoch; "I care not for what cause ye mean to shun it."

"I would do what a man might do, and still call himself a man."

"Do ye call yourself a man," said the interrogator, "who have done the deeds of a wolf?"

"I do," answered the outlaw; "I am a man like my forefathers—while wrapt in the mantle of peace, we were lambs—it was rent from us, and ye now call us wolves. Give us the huts ye have burned, our children whom ye have murdered, our widows whom ye have starved,—collect from the gibbet and the pole the mangled carcasses and whitened skulls of our kinsmen—bid them live and bless us, and we will be your vassals and brothers—till then, let death, and blood, and mutual wrong, draw a dark veil of division between us."

"You will then do nothing for your liberty?" said the Campbell.

"Any thing—but call myself the friend of your tribe," answered MacEagh.

"We scorn the friendship of banditti and caterans," retorted Murdoch, "and would not stoop to it. What I demand to know from you, in ex for your liberty, is, where the daughter and he the Knight of Ardenvohr is now to be found?"

"That you may wed her to some beggarly k of your great master," said Ranald, "after the of the Children of Diarmid! Does not the v Glenorquhy, to this very hour, cry shame on lence offered to a helpless infant whom her k were conveying to the court of the Sovereign not her escort compelled to hide her beneath dron, round which they fought till not one re to tell the tale? and was not the girl brought fatal castle, and afterwards wedded to the bro M'Callum More, and all for the sake of he lands?"*

"And if the tale be true," said Murdoch, " a preferment beyond what the King of Scot have conferred on her. But this is far from t pose. The daughter of Sir Duncan of Arden of our own blood, not a stranger; and who good a right to know her fate as M'Callum M chief of her clan?"

"It is on his part, then, that you demand it the outlaw. The domestic of the Marquis as

"And you will practise no evil against the en?—I have done her wrong enough already."

"No evil, upon the word of a Christian m plied Murdoch.

"And my guerdon is to be life and liberty the Child of the Mist.

"Such is our paction," replied the Campbel

"Then know, that the child whom I save compassion at the spoiling of her father's t strength, was bred as an adopted daughte tribe, until we were worsted at the pass of B thil, by the fiend incarnate and mortal enem tribe, Allan M'Aulay of the Bloody hand, an horsemen of Lennox, under the heir of Ment

"Fell she into the power of Allan of the hand," said Murdoch, "and she a reputed dau thy tribe? Then her blood has gilded the dirk, hast said nothing to rescue thine own forfeit

"If my life rest on hers," answered the out is secure, for she still survives; but it has a secure reliance—the frail promise of a son of Di

"That promise shall not fail you," said the bell, "if you can assure me that she surviv where she is to be found."

"In the Castle of Darnlinvarach," said Ran Eagh, "under the name of Annot Lyle. I ha heard of her from my kinsmen, who have a proached their native woods, and it is not lo mine old eyes beheld her."

"You!" said Murdoch, in astonishment, chief among the Children of the Mist, and so near your mortal foe?"

"Son of Diarmid, I did more," replied the "I was in the hall of the castle, disguised as from the wild shores of Skianach. My purp to have plunged my dirk in the body of the with the Bloody hand, before whom our race t and to have taken thereafter what fate God send me. But I saw Annot Lyle, even when was on the hilt of my dagger. She touched h shach to a song of the Children of the Mis she had learned when her dwelling was amo The woods in which we had dwelt pleasantly their green leaves in the song, and our stre there with the sound of all their waters. forsook the dagger; the fountains of mine ey opened, and the hour of revenge passed awa now, Son of Diarmid, have I not paid the ra my head?"

"Ay," replied Murdoch, "if your tale be tr what proof can you assign for it?"

"Bear witness, heaven and earth," exclai outlaw, "he already looks how he may step word!"

* Such a story is told of the heiress of the clan of Cal was made prisoner in the manner described, and af wedded to Sir Duncan Campbell, from which union th bells of Cawdor have their descent.

* Way.

" replied Murdoch ; " every promise shall ou when I am assured you have told me But I must speak a few words with your is captivity.

I false, ever false and false," muttered the he threw himself on a seat on the floor on.

Captain Dalgetty, who had attended rd of this dialogue, was pursuing his own it in private. " What the people mean this ave to say to me ? I have no ch... so far as I know, or of any other person, a tale about. But let him come on ... some manoeuvring ere he seen the flank of ter."

as if he had stood pikeman front to death, he waited with caution, but without ... mmencement of the attack.

" a citizen of the world, Captain Dalgetty," eth Campbell, " and cannot be ignorant of tch proverb, gif-gaf,* which goes through and all services."

should know something of it," said Dal- except the Turks, there are few powers whom I have not served; and I have thought of taking a turn rather with Bethlen or with the Janizaries."

of your experience and unprejudiced ideas, understand me at once," said Murdoch. say, I mean that your freedom shall depend ue and upright answer to a few trifling respecting the gentlemen you have left; of preparation; the number of their men, e of their appointments; and as much nce to know about their plan of opera-

o satisfy your curiosity," said Dalgetty. out any further purpose ?"

n the world," replied Murdoch ; " what ould a poor devil like me take in their ?"

your interrogations, then," said the Cap- I will answer them peremptorie."

any Irish may be on their march to join hame the delinquent ?"

ly ten thousand," said Captain Dalgetty. ousand !" replied Murdoch peevishly ; " w scarce two thousand landed at Ardnamurchan."

ou know more about them than I do," an- tain Dalgetty, with great composure. " I hem mustered yet, or even under arms." w many men of the clans may be expect- dded Murdoch.

y as they can make," replied the Captain. answering from the purpose, sir," said speak plainly, will there be five thousand nd thereabouts," answered Dalgetty.

e playing with your life, sir, if you trifle pipe the catch ... ; " one whistle of mine, than ten minutes your head hangs on the peak candidly, Mr. Murdoch," replied the o you think it is a reasonable thing to ask secrets of our army, and I engaged to whole campaign ? If I tell you how ntrose, what becomes of my pay, arrears, of bounty ?"

ay," said Campbell " I will tell you ... ...ungeon ... at the ... gate, where stones many ... if you answer my questions will receive ... the service n More."

e service after ? good, ay ?" said Captain double yours, if you will return to Mon- t under his direction."

had seen you, sir, before taking on with Dalgetty, appearing to meditate. contrary, I can afford you more advantageous terms now," said the Campbell ; " always supposing that you are faithful."

" Faithful, that is, to you, and a traitor to Montrose," answered the Captain.

" Faithful to the cause of religion and good order," answered Murdoch, " which sanctifies any deception you may employ to serve it."

" And the Marquis of Argyle—should I incline to enter his service, is he a kind master ?" demanded Dalgetty.

" Never man kinder," quoth Campbell.

" And bountiful to his officers ?" pursued the Captain.

" The most open-handed in Scotland," replied Murdoch.

" True and faithful to his engagements ?" continued Dalgetty.

" As honourable a nobleman as breathes," said the clansman.

" I never heard so much good of him before," said Dalgetty ; " you must know the Marquis well—or rather you must be the Marquis himself ! Lord of Argyle," he added, throwing himself suddenly on the disguised nobleman, " I arrest you in the name of King Charles, as a traitor. If you venture to call for assistance, I will wrench round your neck."

The attack which Dalgetty made upon Argyle's person was so sudden and unexpected, that he easily prostrated him on the floor of the dungeon, and held him down with one hand, while his right, grasping the Marquis's throat, was ready to strangle him on the slightest attempt to call for assistance.

" Lord of Argyle," he said, " it is now my turn to lay down the terms of capitulation. If you list to show me the private way by which you entered the dungeon, you shall escape, on condition of being my locum tenens, as we said at the Mareschal-College, until your warder visits his prisoners. But if not, I will first strangle you—I learned the art from a Polonian heyduck, who had been a slave in the Ottoman seraglio—and then seek out a mode of retreat."

" Villain ! you would not murder me for my kindness," murmured Argyle.

" Not for your kindness, my lord," replied Dalgetty : " but first to teach your lordship the jus gentium towards cavaliers who come to you under safe-conduct; and secondly, to warn you of the danger of proposing dishonourable terms to any worthy soldado, in order to tempt him to become false to his standard during the term of his service."

" Spare my life," said Argyle, " and I will do as you require."

Dalgetty maintained his gripe upon the Marquis's throat, compressing it a little while he asked questions, and relaxing it so far as to give him the power of answering them.

" Where is the secret door into the dungeon ?" he demanded.

" Hold up the lantern to the corner on your right hand, you will discern the iron which covers the spring," replied the Marquis.

" So far so good. Where does the passage lead to ?"

" To my private apartment behind the tapestry," answered the prostrate nobleman.

" From thence how shall I reach the gateway ?"

" Through the grand gallery, the anteroom, the lackey's waiting-hall, the great guardroom"——

" All crowded with soldiers, factionaries, and attendants ! that will never do for me, my lord ;—have you no secret passage to the gate, as you have to your dungeons ? I have seen such in Germany."

" There is a passage through the chapel," said the Marquis, " opening from my apartment."

" And what is the pass-word at the gate ?"

" The sword of Levi," replied the Marquis ; " but if you will receive my pledge of honour, I will go with you, escort you through every guard, and set you at full liberty with a passport."

" I might trust you, my lord, were your throat not already black with the grasp of my fingers," as it is, beso los manos a usted, as the Spaniard says. Yet you may grant me a passport ; are there writing materials in your apartment ?"

" Surely ; and blank passports ready to be signed. I will attend you there," said the Marquis, " instantly."

* ...glish, ka me ka thee, i. e. mutually serving each

"It were too much honour for the like of me," said Dalgetty; "your [illegible] shall [illegible] of an [illegible] honest friend Ranald MacEagh [illegible] [illegible]. Honest Ranald [illegible] I [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] or [illegible] Ranald [illegible] he [illegible] your [illegible]."

"It [illegible] at [illegible] or struggle," said Ranald, "he dies by my hand."

"That is right, Ranald—[illegible]ry spirited:—A thorough-going friend that understands a hint is worth a million!"

Thus resigning the charge of the Marquis to his new confederate, Dalgetty pressed the spring, by which the secret door flew open, though so well were its hinges polished and oiled, that it made not the slightest noise in revolving. The opposite side of the door was secured by very strong bolts and bars, beside which hung one or two keys, designed apparently to undo fetterlocks. A narrow staircase ascended up through the thickness of the castle-wall, and led, as the Marquis had truly informed him, behind the tapestry of his private apartment. Such communications were frequent in old feudal castles, as they gave the lord of the fortress, like a second Dionysius, the means of hearing the conversation of his prisoners, or, if he pleased, of visiting them in disguise, an experiment which had terminated so inauspiciously on the present occasion for Gillespie Grumach. Having examined previously whether there was any one in the apartment, and finding the coast clear, the Captain entered, and hastily possessing himself of a blank passport, several of which lay on the table, and of writing materials, securing, at the same time, the Marquis's dagger, and a silk cord from the hangings, he again descended into the cavern, where, listening a moment at the door, he could hear the half-stifled voice of the Marquis making great proffers to MacEagh, on condition he would suffer him to give an alarm.

"Not for a forest of deer—not for a thousand head of cattle," answered the freebooter; "not for all the lands that ever called a son of Diarmid master, will I break the troth I have plighted to him of the iron-garment!"

"He of the iron-garment," said Dalgetty, entering, "is bounden unto you, MacEagh, and this noble lord shall be bounden also; but first he must fill up this passport with the names of Major Dugald Dalgetty and his guide, or he is like to have a passport to another world."

The Marquis subscribed, and wrote, by the light of the dark lantern, as the soldier prescribed to him.

"And now, Ranald," said Dalgetty, "strip thy upper garment—thy plaid I mean, Ranald, and in it will I muffle the M'Callum More, and make of him, for a time, a Child of the Mist;—Nay, I must bring it over your head, my lord, so as to secure us against your untimed clamour.—So, now he is sufficiently muffled;—hold down your hands, or, by Heaven, I will stab you to the heart with your own dagger!—nay, you shall be bound with nothing less than silk, as your quality deserves.—So, now he is secure till some one comes to relieve him. If he ordered us a late dinner, Ranald, he is like to be the sufferer;—at what hour, my good Ranald, did the jailer usually appear?"

"Never till the sun was beneath the western wave," said MacEagh.

"Then, my friend, we shall have three hours good," said the cautious Captain. "In the mean time, let us labour for your liberation."

To examine Ranald's chain was the next occupation. It was undone by means of one of the keys which hung behind the private door, probably deposited there, that the Marquis might, if he pleased, dismiss a prisoner, or remove him elsewhere without the necessity of summoning the warden. The outlaw stretched his benumbed arms, and boun[ded on] the floor of the dungeon in all the ecstasy of [illegible]dom.

"Take the livery coat of that noble person[age]," Captain Dalgetty; "put it on, and follow cl[ose on my] heels."

The outlaw obeyed. They ascended th[e] stair, having first secured the [illegible] [illegible] as they reached the apartment of the Ma[rquis].

CHAPTER XIV.

> Th[is] was the [illegible] stairs—but whithe[r]
> [illegible] [illegible]
> [illegible] [illegible],
> And [illegible] without [illegible]
>
> [illegible] of B[illegible]

"Look out for the private way through th[e] Ranald," said the Captain, "while I give a [illegible] to these [illegible]."

Thus speaking, he seized with one hand [the] of Argyle's most private papers, and with [the other] a purse of gold, both of which lay in a dra[wer of a] rich cabinet, which stood invitingly open. [Nor] did he neglect to possess himself of a sw[ord and] pistols, with powder-flask and balls, which [lay in] the apartment. "Intelligence and booty," [said the] veteran, as he pouched the spoils, "each ho[nest] cavalier should look to, the one on his gen[eral's be]half, and the other on his own. This swo[rd is an] Andrew Ferrara, and the pistols better th[an my] own. But a fair exchange is no robbery. [My own] are not to be endangered, and endangere[d,] tously, my Lord of Argyle.—But soft, soft[,] wise Man of the Mist whither art thou bou[nd?"]

It was indeed full time to stop MacEagh's [proceed]ings; for not finding the private passage re[adily, and] impatient, it would seem, of further dela[y, he had] caught down a sword and target, and was [about to] enter the great gallery, with the purpose, [it would seem,] of fighting his way through all opposition.

"Hold, while you live," whispered Dalge[tty, laying] hold on him. "We must lie perdue, if poss[ible. Let us] bar we this door, that it may be thought [illegible] More would be private—and now let me ma[ke a] connoissance for the private passage."

By looking behind the tapestry in vario[us places,] the Captain at length discovered a private [door, and] behind that a winding passage, terminated b[y another] door, which doubtless entered the chapel. [But what] was his disagreeable surprise to hear, on [the other] side of this second door, the sonorous voice [of a di]vine in the act of preaching.

"This made the villain," he said, "recom[mend it] to us as a private passage. I am strongly t[empted to] return and cut his throat."

He then opened very gently the door, w[hich led] into a latticed gallery used by the Marquis[,] the curtains of which were drawn, perhaps [for the] purpose of having it supposed that he was [present] in attendance upon divine worship, when, [in fact, he] was absent upon his secular affairs. The[re was no] other person in the seat; for the family of [the Mar]quis,—such was the high state maintained [in those] days,—sate during service in another galle[ry,] somewhat lower than that of the great ma[n himself.] This being the case, Captain Dalgetty ve[ntured to] ensconce himself in the gallery, of which he [first] secured the door.

Never (although the expression be a bold [one) was] a sermon listened to with more impatience[, or less] edification, on the part of one, at least, of [the audi]ence. The Captain heard sixteenthly—se[venteenth]ly—eighteenthly, and to conclude, with a s[ensation some]thing like protracted despair. But no man c[an]

* The precarious state of the feudal nobles introd[uced a great] deal of espionage into their castles. Sir Robert Car[ey mentions] his having put on the cloak of one of his own wa[rders, to ob]tain a confession from the mouth of Geordie Bourne, [a freebooter,] whom he caused presently to be hanged in return f[or his frank]ness of his communication. The fine old Border c[astle of Naw]worth contains a private stair from the apartment [of Lord] William Howard, by which he could visit the du[ngeon, as is] alleged in the preceding chapter to have been prac[tised by the] Marquis of Argyle.

-vice was called a lecture) for ever; and se was at length closed, the clergyman to make a profound bow towards the lat r, little suspecting whom he honoured by ice. To judge from the haste with which sed, the domestics of the Marquis were pleased with their late occupation than Captain Dalgetty; indeed, many of them landmen, had the excuse of not under- single word which the clergyman spoke, ey gave their attendance on his doctrine nal order of M'Callum More, and would had the preacher been a Turkish Imaum. ugh the congregation dispersed thus ra- vine remained behind in the chapel, and and down its Gothic recesses, seemed meditating on what he had just been de- preparing a fresh discourse for the next . Bold as he was Dalgetty hesitated on ght to do. Time, however, pressed, and ent increased the chance of the messenger vered by the warder visiting the dungeon ore his wont ... which had been made ... At length, Ranald, who watched all his motions, to and preserve his composure, Captain with a very composed air, descended the steps which led from the gallery into the chapel. A less ... endeavoured to pass the way ... in hopes to ... But the who foresaw the greatest danger of failing attempt, walked ... his walk in the midst of the chancel, and his cap, was about to pass him after a rence. But what was his surprise to view her the very same person with whom he n the castle of Ardenvohr! Yet he speed- d his composure; and ere the clergyman , was the first to address him. "I could d, "leave this mansion without bequeath- my very reverend sir, my humble thanks ily with which you have this evening fat observe, sir," said the clergyman, "that the chapel."

ed the honourable Marquis," said Dalget- , "to grace me with a seat in his own The divine bowed low at this intimation, hat such an honour was only vouchsafed of very high rank. "It has been my fate, Captain, "in the sort of wandering life led, to have heard different preachers religions—as for example, Lutheran, Reformed, Calvinistical, and so forth. have I listened to such a homily as a lecture, worthy sir," said the divine, e phrase of our church."

or homily," said Dalgetty, "it was, as Germans say, ganz fortrefflich; and I leave this place without testifying unto you rd emotions I have undergone during ng prelection; and how I am touched to hat I should yesterday, during the recee- seemed to infringe on the respect due to on as yourself."

ny worthy sir," said the clergyman, "we s world as in the Valley of the Shadow of knowing against whom we may chance r. In truth, it is no matter of marvel, if es jostle those, to whom, if known, we d all respect. Surely, sir, I would rather you for a profane malignant than for such erson as you prove, who reverences the er even in the meanest of his servants."

lways my custom to do so, learned sir," Dalgetty, "for in the service of the im- stavus—but I detain you from your medi- his desire to speak of the King of Sweden once overpowered by the necessity of his ices.

means, my worthy sir," said the clergy- hat was, I pray you, the order of that great Prince, whose memory is so dear to every Protestant bosom?"

"Sir, the drums beat to prayers morning and even- ing, as regularly as for parade; and if a soldier passed without saluting the chaplain, he had an hour's ride on the wooden mare for his pains. Sir, I wish you a very good evening. I am obliged to depart the castle under M'Callum More's passport."

"Stay one instant, sir," said the preacher; "is there nothing I can do to testify my respect for the pupil of the great Gustavus, and so admirable a judge of preaching?"

"Nothing, sir," said the Captain, "but to show me the nearest way to the gate—and if you would have the kindness," he added, with great effrontery, "to let a servant bring my horse with him—the dark gray gelding—call him Gustavus, and he will prick up his ears—for I know not where the castle-stables are situated, and my guide," he added, looking at Ranald, "speaks no English."

"I hasten to accommodate you," said the clergy- man; "your way lies through that cloistered passage."

"Now, Heaven's blessing upon your vanity!" said the Captain to himself. "I was afraid I would have had to march off without Gustavus."

In fact, so effectually did the chaplain exert himself in behalf of so excellent a judge of composition, that while Dalgetty was parleying with the sentinels at the drawbridge, showing his passport, and giving the watchword, a servant brought him his horse ready saddled for the journey. In another place, the Captain's sudden appearance at large after having been publicly sent to prison, might have excited sus- picion and inquiry; but the officers and domestics of the Marquis were accustomed to the mysterious policy of their master, and never supposed aught else than that he had been liberated and intrusted with some private commission by their master. In this belief, and having received the parole, they gave him free passage.

Dalgetty rode slowly through the town of Inverary, the outlaw attending upon him like a foot-page at his horse's shoulder. As they passed the gibbet, the old man looked on the bodies and wrung his hands. The look and gesture were momentary, but expressive of indescribable anguish. Instantly recovering himself, Ranald, in passing, whispered somewhat to one of the females, who, like Rizpah the daughter of Aiah, seemed engaged in watching and mourning the vic- tims of feudal injustice and cruelty. The woman started at his voice, but immediately collected herself, and returned for answer a slight inclination of the head.

Dalgetty continued his way out of the town, uncer- tain whether he should try to seize or hire a boat and cross the lake, or plunge into the woods, and there conceal himself from pursuit. In the former event he was liable to be instantly pursued by the galleys of the Marquis, which lay ready for sailing, their long yard-arms pointing to the wind, and what hope could he have in an ordinary Highland fishing-boat to escape from them! If he made the latter choice, his chance either of supporting or concealing himself in those waste and unknown wildernesses, was in the highest degree precarious. The town lay now behind him, yet what hand to turn to for safety he was un- able to determine, and began to be sensible, that in escaping from the dungeon at Inverary, desperate as the matter seemed, he had only accomplished the easiest part of a difficult task. If retaken, his fate was now certain; for the personal injury he had offered to a man so powerful and so vindictive, could be atoned for only by instant death. While he pon- dered these distressing reflections, and looked around with a countenance which plainly expressed indeci- sion, Ranald MacEagh suddenly asked him, "which way he intended to journey?"

"And that, honest comrade," answered Dalgetty, "is precisely the question which I cannot answer you. Truly I begin to hold the opinion, Ranald, that we had better have stuck by the brown loaf and water- pitcher until Sir Duncan arrived, who, for his own honour, must have made some fight for me."

"Saxon," answered MacEagh, "do not regret having exchanged the foul breath of yonder dungeon for the free air of heaven. Above all, repent not that you have served a Son of the Mist. Put yourself under my guidance, and I will warrant your safety with my head."

"Can you guide me safe through these mountains, and back to the army of Montrose?" said Dalgetty.

"I can," answered MacEagh; "there lives not a man to whom the mountain passes, the caverns, the glens, the thickets, and the corries are known, as they are to the Children of the Mist. While others crawl on the level ground, by the sides of lakes and streams, ours are the steep hollows of the inaccessible mountains, the birth-place of the desert springs. Not a'l the bloodhounds of Argyle can trace the fastnesses through which I can guide you."

"Say'st thou so, honest Ranald?" replied Dalgetty; "then have on with thee; for of a surety I shall never save the ship by my own pilotage."

The outlaw accordingly led the way into the wood, by which the castle is surrounded for several miles, walking with so much dispatch as kept Gustavus at a round trot, and taking such a number of cross cuts and turns, that Captain Dalgetty speedily lost all idea where he might be, and all knowledge of the points of the compass. At length, the path, which had gradually become more difficult, altogether ended among thickets and underwood. The roaring of a torrent was heard in the neighbourhood, the ground became in some places broken, in others boggy, and every where unfit for riding.

"What the foul fiend," said Dalgetty, "is to be done here? I must part with Gustavus, I fear."

"Take no care for your horse," said the outlaw; "he shall soon be restored to you."

As he spoke, he whistled in a low tone, and a lad, half dressed in tartan, half naked, having only his own shaggy hair, tied with a thong of leather, to protect his head and face from sun and weather, lean, and half-starved in aspect, his wild gray eyes appearing to fill up ten times the proportion usually allotted to them in the human face, crept out, as a wild beast might have done, from a thicket of brambles and briars.

"Give your horse to the gillie," said Ranald MacEagh; "your life depends upon it."

"Och! och!" exclaimed the despairing veteran; "Eheu! as we used to say at Mareschal-College, must I leave Gustavus in such grooming?"

"Are you frantic, to lose time thus?" said his guide; "do we stand on friend's ground, that you should part with your horse as if he were your brother? I tell you, you shall have him again; but if you never saw the animal, is not life better than the best colt ever mare foaled?"

"And that is true too, mine honest friend," sighed Dalgetty; "yet if you knew but the value of Gustavus, and the things we two have done and suffered together—See, he turns back to look at me!—Be kind to him, my good breechless friend, and I will requite you well." So saying, and with a sufficient effort to swallow his grief, he mounted from the lean and ragged spectacle in order to follow his guide.

To follow his guide was not a easy matter, and soon required more agility than Captain Dalgetty could muster. The youth first plunged after he had parted from his charger, naked head, with little assistance from a few overhanging branches, or projecting roots of trees, eight feet sheer down into the course of a torrent, up which the Son of the Mist led the way. Huge stones, over which they scrambled, beds of thorn and brambles, through which they had to drag themselves, recesses which were to be climbed on the one side with much labour and pain, for the purpose of an equally precarious descent upon the other; all these, and many such interruptions, were surmounted by the light-footed and half-naked mountaineer, with an ease and velocity which excited the surprise and envy of Captain Dalgetty, who, encumbered by his head-piece, corslet, and other armour, not to mention his ponderous jack-boots, found himself at length so much exhausted by fatigue, and the difficulties of the road, that he sate down upon a stone *in order to recover his br*eath, while he explained to Ranald MacEagh the difference betwixt expedi us and *impedi*tus, as these two militia s were invested at Mareschal-College. Al The self-conscience of the mountaineer was to hand on the saddle; warm, and, as at backwar direction of the wind. Dalgetty could spy for evening was closing fast, and they wer bottom of a dark ravine. But at length h distinctly hear at a distance the sullen toll of bell.

"That," said he, "must be the alarm—the clock, as the Germans call it."

"It strikes the hour of your death," answe nald, "unless you can accompany me a little For every toll of that bell a brave man has ya his soul."

"Truly, Ranald, my trusty friend," said D "I will not deny that the case may be soon n for I am so fortunate, (being, as I explained impeditus, for had I been expeditus, I mind destrian exercise the flourish of a life,) that I had better encounter myself in one of these and even be quiet there to abide what fortu shall send me. I entreat you, mine honest fri nald, to shift for yourself, and leave me to tay as the Lion of the North, the immortal G Adolphus, my never-to-be-forgotten master, you must surely have heard of, Ranald, tho may have heard of no one else,) said to Fra bert, Duke of Saxe Lauenburgh, when he w fatally wounded on the plains of Lutzen, despair altogether of my safety, Ranald, seeing been in as great pinches as this in Germany especially, I remember me, that at the fatal Nerlingen—after which I changed service"—

"If you would save your father's son's b help his child out of trouble, instead of wa upon the tales of Scamnachies," said Rana now grew impatient of the Captain's loquacit your feet could travel as fast as your tongue, yo yet lay your head on an unbloody pillow to

"Something there is like military skill i replied the Captain, "although wantonly a verently spoken to an officer of rank. But I good to pardon such freedoms on a march, in of the Saturnalian license indulged in such the troops of all nations. And now, resum office, friend Ranald, in respect I am well-bi or, to be more plain, I prae, se quar, as we use at Mareschal-College."

Comprehending his meaning rather from nous than his language, the Son of the Mis led the way, with an unerring precision that like instinct, through a variety of ground th difficult and broken that could well be in Dragging along his ponderous boots, encu with thick-pieces, gauntlets, corslet, and bac not to mention the buff jerkin which he wor all these arms, talking of his former exploi whole way, though Ranald paid not the slig to turn to him, Captain Dalgetty contrived t his guide a considerable space further, when t mouthed baying of a hound was heard comin the wind, as if opening on the scent of its pr

"Black hound!" said Ranald, "whose thro bodes good to a Child of the Mist, ill fortune who heard thee! Hast thou already found ou But thou art too late, swart hound of darkne the deer lies round the lord."

So saying, he whistled very softly, and v sword in a tone equally low from the top of up which they had for some time been asc Mounting their pace, they reached the top, wh moon, which had now risen bright and clear, to Dalgetty a party of ten or twelve Highland about as many women and children, by whom MacEagh was received with such transports as made his companion easily sensible that t whom he was surrounded, must of course be ren of the Mist. The place which they occup suited their name and habits. It was a beetlin round which winded a very narrow and broke path, commanded in various places by the ; which they held.

ke anxiously and hastily to the children and the men came one by one to shake Dalgetty, while the women, clamorous ade, pressed round to kiss even the hem [illegible].

ght their faith to you," said Ranald for requital of the good deed you have [illegible] this day."

said, Ranald," answered the soldier, d—tell them I love not this shaking of fuses ranks and degrees in military ser- to kissing of gauntlets, pauldrons, and member that the immortal Gustavus, rough the streets of Nuremberg, being ped by the populace, (being doubtless thy of it than a poor though honourable myself) did say unto them, in the way f you idolize me thus like a god, who you that the vengeance of Heaven will ve me to be a mortal?'—And so here, I ntend to make a stand against your fol- [illegible], as the Spaniard says! ty position—as pretty a position for a of men as I have seen in my service— [illegible] towards it by the road without [illegible] of cannon and musket. But then, rusty comrade, you have no cannon, I and I do not see that any of these f[illegible] [illegible] either. So with what artillery naking good the pass, before you come [illegible], truly, Ranald, it passeth my appre-

weapons and with the courage of our MacEagh; and made the Captain ob- [illegible] men of his party were armed with ows.

d arrows!" exclaimed Dalgetty; "ha! [illegible] we Robin Hood and Little John back s and arrows! why, the sight has not [illegible] war for a hundred years. Bows and why not weavers'-beams, as in the [illegible]? Ah! that Dugald Dalgetty, of Drum- [illegible] live to see men fight with bows and e immortal Gustavus would never have nor Wallenstein, nor Butler—nor old Ranald, a cat can have but its claws nd arrows are the word, e'en let us make Only, as I do not understand the scope [illegible] such old-fashioned artillery, you must at disposition you can out of your own taking the command, which I would [illegible] been to fight with any [illegible], is out of the question, when you t like [illegible] Numidians. I will, how- [illegible] part with my pistols in the approach- [illegible] respect my [illegible] [illegible] M[illegible] service and thanks to [illegible] [illegible] mountaineer who a bow; "D[illegible] Dalgetty may say of e learned at Marischal-College,

[illegible]

w"—

[illegible] Eagh a second time [illegible] silence [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] rate [illegible] M[illegible]

[illegible] Dalgetty [illegible]

[illegible] the women should transport it to iety.

[illegible]," said Dalgetty, "such is [illegible] foreign service; in respect I re- [illegible] regiment of Finland [illegible] repri- [illegible] the kettle-drums taken from them by d Gustavus because they had [illegible] [illegible] to march without their corslets, and to leave them with the baggage. Neither did they strike kettle-drums again at the head of that famous regiment until they behaved themselves so notably at the field of Leipsic; a lesson which is not to be forgotten, any more than that exclamation of the immortal Gustavus, 'Now shall I know if my officers love me, by their putting on their armour; since, if my officers are slain, who shall lead my soldiers unto victory?' Nevertheless, friend Ranald, this is without prejudice to my being rid of these somewhat heavy boots, providing I can obtain any other secondary [illegible]; for I presume not to say that my bare soles are fortified so as to endure the flints and thorns, as seems to be the case with your followers."

To rid the Captain of his cumbrous greaves, and case his feet in a pair of brogues made out of deer-skin, which a Highlander stripped off for his accommodation, was the work of a minute, and Dalgetty found himself much lightened by the exchange. He was in the act of recommending to Ranald Mac-Eagh, to send two or three of his followers a little lower to reconnoitre the pass, and at the same time, somewhat to extend his front, placing two detached archers at each flank by way of posts of observation, when the near cry of the hound apprised them that the pursuers were at the bottom of the pass. All was then dead silence; for, loquacious as he was on other occasions, Captain Dalgetty knew well the necessity of an ambush keeping itself under cover.

The moon gleamed on the broken path-way, and on the projecting cliffs of rock round which it winded, its light intercepted here and there by the branches of bushes and dwarf-trees, which, finding nourishment in the crevices of the rocks, in some places overshadowed the brow and ledge of the precipice. Below, a thick copse-wood lay in deep and dark shadow, somewhat resembling the billows of a half seen ocean. From the bosom of that darkness, and close to the bottom of the precipice, the hound was heard at intervals baying fearfully, sounds which were redoubled by the echoes of the woods and rocks around. At intervals, these sunk into deep silence, interrupted only by the plashing noise of a small runnel of water, which partly fell from the rock, partly found a more silent passage to the bottom along its projecting surface. Voices of men were also heard in stifled converse below; it seemed as if the pursuers had not discovered the narrow path which led to the top of the rock, or that, having discovered it, the peril of the ascent, joined to the imperfect light, and the uncertainty whether it might not be defended, made them hesitate to attempt it.

At length a shadowy figure was seen, which raised itself up from the abyss of darkness below, and, emerging into the pale moonlight, began cautiously and slowly to ascend the rocky path. The outline was so distinctly marked, that Captain Dalgetty could discover not only the person of a Highlander, but the long gun which he carried in his hand and the plume of feathers which decorated his bonnet. "Tausend teufel! that I should say so, and so live to be near my latter end!" ejaculated the Captain, but under his breath, "what will become of us, now they have brought musketry to encounter our archers!"

But just as the pursuer had attained a projecting [illegible] almost half way up the ascent, and [illegible] [illegible] for those who were still at the [illegible] an arrow whistled from the [illegible] of the Mist, and transfixed [illegible] that, without a single ef- [illegible] his balance, and fell [illegible] from the cliff on which he stood, into the [illegible]. The crash of the boughs which received him, and the heavy sound of his fall from [illegible] to [illegible] was followed by a cry of horror [illegible] from his followers. The Children of the Mist, encouraged in proportion to the alarm this first success had caused among the pursuers, echoed back the clamour with a loud and shrill yell of exultation, and, showing themselves on the [illegible] of the precipice, with wild cries and [illegible] [illegible] endeavoured to impress on the [illegible] sense of one of their courage, their [illegible] their state of defence. Even Captain Dalgetty's w[illegible]

[illegible] could not prevent his rising up, and [illegible] Ranald, more loud than pre[illegible] [illegible] as the Spaniard [illegible]! [illegible] never recover! In my poor apprehension [illegible] advance [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] Montrose [illegible]

[illegible] strongest [illegible] his own man [illegible] by which the Captain [illegible] military profession [illegible] [illegible] forth which [illegible] more and more [illegible] "And now advance [illegible] stand of pikes [illegible] and two-handed swords. Stand fast, [illegible] will break! [illegible] Ranald [illegible] commanded to retreat, have some [illegible] hanging on the branches of the [illegible] as if they were lined with shot. But I forgot [illegible] have no match-locks nor [illegible] bows and arrows! bows and arrows! ha! ha! ha!"

Here the Captain sunk back in an exhausted condition, altogether unable to resist the sense of the [illegible] which, as a modern man at arms, he connected with the idea of these ancient weapons of war. It was a long time ere he recovered his [illegible] and [illegible] the meantime, we must [illegible] Daughters of the Mist; [illegible] were [illegible] and smooth in outward [illegible]

CHAPTER XV.

[illegible]

We must now [illegible] with whatever [illegible] Captain Dalgetty [illegible] to recover of his wounds [illegible] [illegible] of Montrose, which [illegible] important page [illegible] history. By the assistance of the chieftains [illegible] we have [illegible] more especially by the junction of the Murrays, Stewarts, and other clans of Athole, which were peculiarly zealous in the royal cause, he soon assembled an army of two or three thousand Highlanders, to whom he successfully united the Irish under Colkitto. This last leader, who, to the great embarrassment of Milton's commentators, is commemorated in one of that great [illegible] was properly named [illegible] by birth a Scottish [illegible] Earl of Antrim, to whom [illegible] and assistance [illegible] [illegible] of his weapons, and [illegible] [illegible] danger. [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] the state of [illegible] [illegible] those mentioned under Montrose [illegible] strangely [illegible] period, the Lowlanders [illegible] war as [illegible] better disciplined [illegible] order of battle somewhat [illegible] phalanx. Their [illegible] armed with [illegible] [illegible] arms of [illegible] arrayed [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible] of fight was [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] That would have made Quarles [illegible]

[illegible] says Bishop Newton [illegible] the Covenant [illegible] and quotes [illegible] that of Gillespie, [illegible] of the Covenant, and those of Colkitto and [illegible] belonging to one person,) one of its bitterest en[illegible]

n aside in his army, and exchanged for fire-

A circumstance which necessarily accompa- his change, as well as the establishment of ng armies, whereby war became a trade, was roduction of a laborious and complicated sys- discipline, combining a variety of words of and with corresponding operations and ma- es, the neglect of any one of which was sure w the whole into confusion. War, therefore, ctised among most nations of Europe, had as- much more than formerly the character of a ion or mystery, to which previous practice and ence were indispensable requisites. Such was tural consequence of standing armies, when most every where, and particularly in the long n wars, superseded what may be called the discipline of the feudal militia.

Scottish Lowland militia, therefore, laboured a double disadvantage when opposed to High- s. They were divested of the spear, a weapon , in the hands of their ancestors, had so often d the impetuous assaults of the mountaineer; ey were subjected to a new and complicated s of discipline, well adapted, perhaps, to the us- lar troops, who could be rendered completely rs of it, but tending only to confuse the ranks zen soldiers, by whom it was rarely practised, perfectly understood. So much has been done own time in bringing back tactics to their first ples, and in getting rid of the pedantry of war, t is easy for us to estimate the disadvantages which a half-trained militia laboured, who taught to consider success as depending upon exercising with precision a system of tactics, they probably only so far comprehended as to out when they were wrong, but without the of getting right again. Neither can it be de- hat, in the material points of military habits arlike spirit, the Lowlanders of the seventeenth y had sunk far beneath their Highland coun- .

n the earliest period down to the union of the s, the whole kingdom of Scotland, Lowlands as Highlands had been in the constant scene of war, and domestic; and there was probably scarce its hardy inhabitants, between the age of six- d sixty, who was not as willing in point of by was literally bound in law, to assume arms first call of his liege lord, or of a royal procla- . The law remained the same in sixteen hun- d forty-five as a hundred years before, but the those subjected to it had been bred up under fferent feelings. They had sat in quiet under ine and under their fig-tree, and a call to battle d a change of life as new as it was disagreea- uch of them, also, who lived near unto the nds, were in continual and disadvantageous t with the restless inhabitants of those moun- by whom their cattle were driven off, their gs plundered, and their persons insulted; and d acquired over them that sort of superiority from a constant system of aggression. The nders, who lay more remote, and out of reach e depredations, were influenced by the exag- l reports circulated concerning the Highland- om, as totally differing in laws, language, and they were induced to regard as a nation of s, equally void of fear and of humanity. These s prepossessions, joined to the less warlike of the Lowlanders, and their imperfect know- f the new and complicated system of discipline ich they had exchanged their natural mode of g, placed them at great disadvantage when d to the Highlander in the field of battle. The taineers, on the contrary, with the arms and s of their fathers, possessed also their simple atural system of tactics, and bore down with llest confidence upon an enemy, to whom any they had been taught of discipline was, like armour upon David, a hinderance rather than , "because they had not proved it."

ms with such disadvantages on the one side, ch advantages on the other, to counterbalance erence of superior numbers and the presence of artillery and cavalry, that Montrose encountered the army of Lord Elcho upon the field of Tippermuir. The Presbyterian clergy had not been wanting in their efforts to rouse the spirit of their followers; and one of them, who harangued the troops on the very day of battle, hesitated not to say, that if ever God spoke by his mouth, he promised them, in His name, that day, a great and assured victory. The cavalry and artillery were also reckoned sure warrants of success, as the novelty of their attack had upon former occasions been very discouraging to the Highlanders. The place of meeting was an open heath, and the ground afforded little advantage to either party, except that it allowed the horse of the Covenanters to act with effect.

A battle, upon which so much depended, was never more easily decided. The Lowland cavalry made a slow of charging: but, when they were thrown into disorder by the fire of musketry, or deterred by a disaffection to the service said to have prevailed among the gentlemen, they made no impression on the Highlanders whatever, and recoiled in disorder from ranks which had neither bayonets nor pikes to protect them. Montrose saw, and instantly availed himself of this advantage. He ordered his whole army to charge, which they performed with the wild and desperate valour peculiar to mountaineers. One officer of the Covenanters alone, trained in the Italian wars, made a desperate defence upon the right wing. In every other point their line was penetrated at the first onset; and this advantage once obtained, the Lowlanders were utterly unable to contend at close quarters with their more agile and athletic enemies. Many were slain on the field, and such a number in the pursuit, that above one third of the Covenanters were reported to have fallen; in which number, however, must be computed a great many fat burgesses who broke their wind in the flight, and thus died without stroke of sword.*

The victors obtained possession of Perth, and obtained considerable sums of money, as well as ample supplies of arms and ammunition. But those advantages were to be balanced against an almost insurmountable inconvenience that uniformly attended a Highland army. The clans could be in no respect induced to consider themselves as regular soldiers, or to act as such. Even so late as the year 1745-6, when the Chevalier Charles Edward, by way of making an example, caused a soldier to be shot for desertion, the Highlanders, who composed his army, were affected as much by indignation as by fear. They could not conceive any principle of justice upon which a man's life could be taken, for merely going home when it did not suit him to remain longer with the army. Such had been the uniform practice of their fathers. When a battle was over, the campaign was, in their opinion, ended; if it was lost, they sought safety in their mountains if won, they returned there to secure their booty. At other times they had their cattle to look after, and their harvests to sow or reap, without which their families would have perished for want. In either case, there was an end of their services for the time; and though they were easily enough recalled by the prospect of fresh adventures and more plunder, yet the opportunity of success was, in the meantime, lost, and could not afterwards be recovered. Thus circumstances serves to show, even if history had not made us acquainted with the same fact, that the Highlanders had never been accustomed to make war with the view of permanent conquest, but only with the hope of deriving temporary advantage, or deciding some immediate quarrel. It also explains the reason why Montrose, with all his splendid successes, never obtained any secure or permanent footing in the Lowlands, and why even those Lowland noblemen and gentlemen, who were inclined to the royal cause, showed diffidence and reluctance to join an army of a character so desultory and irregular, as might lead them at all times to apprehend that the Highlanders, securing themselves by a retreat to their mountains, would leave whatever Lowlanders might have joined them to the mercy of an offended and predominant enemy. The same consideration will also serve to account for the sudden marches which Montrose was obliged to undertake, in order to recruit his army in the mountains, and for the rapid changes of fortune, by which we often find him obliged to retreat from before those enemies over whom he had recently been victorious. If there should be any who read these tales for any further purpose than that of immediate amusement, they will find these remarks not unworthy of their recollection.

* We choose to quote our authority for a fact so singular—"A great many burgesses were killed—twenty five householders in St. Andrews—many were burden in the flight, and died without stroke."—See BALLAD's Letters, vol. II. page 93.

It was owing to such causes, the slackness of the Lowland loyalists, and the temporary desertion of his Highland followers, that Montrose found himself, even after the decisive victory of Tippermuir, in no condition to face the second army with which Argyle advanced upon him from the westward. In this emergency, supplying by velocity the want of strength, he moved suddenly from Perth to Dundee, and being refused admission into that town, fell northward upon Aberdeen, where he expected to be joined by the Gordons and other loyalists. But the zeal of these gentlemen was, for the time, effectually bridled by a large body of Covenanters, commanded by the Lord Burleigh, and supposed to amount to three thousand men. These Montrose boldly attacked with half their number. The battle was fought under the walls of the city, and the resolute valour of Montrose's followers was again successful against every disadvantage.

But it was the fate of this great commander always to gain the glory, but seldom to reap the fruits of victory. He had scarcely time to repose his small army in Aberdeen, ere he found, on the one hand, that the Gordons were likely to be deterred from joining him, by the reasons we have mentioned, with some others peculiar to their chief, the Marquis of Huntly; on the other hand, Argyle, whose forces had been augmented by those of several Lowland noblemen, advanced towards Montrose at the head of an army much larger than he had yet had to cope with. These troops moved, indeed, with slowness, corresponding to the cautious character of their commander; but even that caution rendered Argyle's approach formidable, since his very advance implied, that he was at the head of an army irresistibly superior.

There remained one mode of retreat open to Montrose, and he adopted it. He threw himself into the Highlands, where he could set pursuit at defiance, and where he was sure, in every glen, to recover those recruits who had left his standard to deposit their booty in their native fastnesses. It was thus that the singular character of the army which Montrose commanded, while, on the one hand, it rendered his victory in some degree migratory, enabled him, on the other, under the most disadvantageous circumstances, to secure his retreat, recruit his forces, and render himself more formidable than ever to the enemy before whom he had lately been unable to make a stand.

On the present occasion he threw himself into Badenoch, and rapidly traversing that district, as well as the neighbouring country of Athole, he alarmed the Covenanters by successive attacks upon various unexpected points, and spread such general dismay, that repeated orders were dispatched by the Parliament to Argyle, their commander, to engage, and disperse Montrose at all rates.

These commands from his superiors neither suited the haughty spirit, nor the temporizing and cautious policy, of the nobleman to whom they were addressed. He paid, accordingly, no regard to them, but limited his efforts to intrigues among Montrose's few Lowland followers, many of whom had become disgusted with the prospect of a Highland campaign, which exposed their persons to intolerable fatigue, and left their estates at the Covenanters' mercy. Accordingly, several of them left Montrose's camp at this period. He was joined, however, by a body of forces of more congenial spirit, and far better adapted to the situation in which he found himself. This reinforcement consisted of a large body of Highlanders, whom Colkitto, dispatched for that purpose, had levied in Argyleshire. Among the more distinguished wa of Moidart, called the Captain of Clan Ranal the Stewarts of Appin, the Clan Gregor, th M'Nab, and other tribes of inferior distinctio these means, Montrose's army was so formida creased, that Argyle cared no longer to remain command of that opposed to him, but retu Edinburgh, and there threw up his commissior pretence that his army was not supplied wi forcements and provisions in the manner in they ought to have been. From thence the returned to Inverary, there, in full security, to his feudal vassals, and patriarchal followers, repose himself in safety on the faith of the C verb already quoted—"It is a far cry to Loch

CHAPTER XVI.

Such mountains steep, such craggy hills,
His army on one side enclose:
The other side, great grisely gulfs
Did fence with fenny mire and moss.

Which when the Earl understood,
He council craved of captains all,
Who bade set forth with mournful mood,
And take such fortune as would fall.

Flodden Field, an Ancient

Montrose had now a splendid career in hi provided he could obtain the consent of his but desultory troops, and their independent chi The Lowlands lay open before him without a adequate to check his career; for Argyle's fo had left the Covenanters' host when their threw up his commission, and many other tired of the war, had taken the same opportu disband themselves. By descending Stra therefore, one of the most convenient passes fr Highlands, Montrose had only to present him the Lowlands, in order to rouse the slumberin of chivalry and of loyalty which animated the men to the north of the Forth. The posses these districts, with or without a victory, wou him the command of a wealthy and fertile par kingdom, and would enable him, by regular place his army on a more permanent footing netrate as far as the capital, perhaps from th the Border, where he deemed it possible to coo cate with the yet unsubdued forces of King C

Such was the plan of operations by wh truest glory was to be acquired, and the m portant success insured for the royal cause. ingly it did not escape the ambitious and darin of him whose services had already acquired h title of the Great Marquis. But other motiv ated many of his followers, and perhaps w without their secret and unacknowledged in upon his own feelings.

The Western Chiefs in Montrose's army, to a man, regarded the Marquis of Argyle as t direct and proper object of hostilities. Almo them had felt his power; almost all, in withc their fencible men from their own glens, left t milies and property exposed to his vengean without exception, were desirous of diminish sovereignty; and most of them lay so near h tories, that they might reasonably hope to be by a share of his spoil. To these Chiefs the sion of Inverary and its castle was an event i more important and desirable than the ca Edinburgh. The latter event could only affo clansmen a little transitory pay or plunder; ner insured to the Chiefs themselves indem the past, and security for the future. Besid personal reasons, the leaders, who favoured t nion, plausibly urged, that though, at his first into the Lowlands, Montrose might be sup the enemy, yet every day's march he made fi hills must diminish his own forces, and exp to the accumulated superiority of any arm the Covenanters could collect from the Low vies and garrisons. On the other hand, by c Argyle effectually, he would not only permit sent western friends to bring out that propo their forces which they must otherwise leave on of their families; but further, he would

is standard several tribes already friendly
se, but who were prevented from joining r of M'Callum More.
rguments, as we have already hinted,
ething responsive in Montrose's own bo-
uite consonant with the general heroism acter. The houses of Argyle and Montrose
n former times, repeatedly opposed to each ar and in politics, and the superior advan-
red by the former, had made them the sub-
y and dislike to the neighbouring family,
cious of equal desert, had not been so arded. This was not all. The existing ese rival families had stood in the most position to each other since the commence-
e present troubles.
e, conscious of the superiority of his ta-
of having rendered great service to the
rs at the beginning of the war, had ex-
n that party the supereminence of council
and, which they judged it safer to intrust
re limited faculties, and more extensive his rival Argyle. They having awarded nce, was an injury which Montrose never
; Covenanters; and he was still less likely is pardon to Argyle, to whom he had been
He was therefore stimulated by every hatred which could animate a fiery temper age, to seek for revenge upon the enemy of
and person; and it is probable that these otives operated not a little upon his mind,
found the principal part of his followers
d rather to undertake an expedition against ries of Argyle, than to take the far more ep of descending at once into the Low-

ever temptation Montrose found to carry his attack upon Argyleshire, he could not himself to renounce the splendid achieve-descent upon the Lowlands. He held one council with the principal Chiefs,
, perhaps, his own secret inclination as heirs. He laid before them the extreme f marching even a Highland army from rd into Argyleshire, through passes scarcely for shepherds and deer-stalkers, and over with which even the clans lying nearest not pretend to be thoroughly acquainted.
culties were greatly enhanced by the sea-
year, which was now advancing towards
when the mountain-passes, in themselves
, might be expected to be rendered utterly by snow-storms. These objections neiied nor silenced the Chiefs, who insisted ancient mode of making war, by driving which, according to the Gaelic phrase,
the grass of their enemy." The council ssed late at night, and without coming to
on, excepting that the Chiefs, who sup-opinion that Argyle should be invaded,
o seek out among their followers those who most capable of undertaking the office of n the expedition.
e had retired to the cabin which served tent, and stretched himself upon a bed of ie only place of repose which it afforded.
rted sleep in vain, for the visions of ambiled those of Morpheus. In one moment
d himself displaying the royal banner from ucred Castle of Edinburgh, detaching asa monarch whose crown depended upon
, and receiving in requital all the advan-preferments which could be heaped upon a king delighteth to honour. At another ream, splendid as it was, faded before the gratified vengeance, and personal triumph sonal enemy. To surprise Argyle in his l of Inverary—to crush in him at once the s own house and the chief support of the ans—to show the Covenanters the differen the preferred Argyle and the postponed was a picture too flattering to feudal ven-
be easily relinquished.

While he lay thus busied with contradictory thoughts and feelings, the soldier who stood sentinel upon his quarters announced to the Marquis that two persons desired to speak with his Excellency.

"Their names?" answered Montrose, "and the cause of their urgency at such a late hour."

On these points, the sentinel, who was one of Colkitto's Irishmen, could afford his General little information; so that Montrose, who at such a period durst refuse access to no one, lest he might have been neglecting some important intelligence, gave directions, as a necessary precaution, to put the guard under arms, and then prepared to receive his untimely visitors. His groom of the chambers had scarce lighted a pair of torches, and Montrose himself had scarce risen from his couch, when two men entered, one wearing a Lowland dress, of shamoy leather worn almost to tatters; the other a tall upright old Highlander, of a complexion which might be termed iron-gray, wasted and worn by frost and tempest.

"What may be your commands with me, my friends?" said the Marquis, his hand almost unconsciously seeking the hilt of one of his pistols; for the period, as well as the time of night, warranted suspicions which the good mien of his visiters was not by any means calculated to remove.

"I pray leave to congratulate you," said the Lowlander, "my most noble General, and right honourable lord, upon the great battles which you have achieved since I had the fortune to be detached from you. It was a pretty affair that tulzie at Tippermuir; nevertheless, if I might be permitted to counsel"——

"Before doing so," said the Marquis, "will you be pleased to let me know who is so kind as to favour me with his opinion?"

"Truly, my lord," replied the man, "I should have hoped that was unnecessary, seeing it is not so long since I took on in your service, under promise of a commission as Major, with half a dollar of daily pay and half a dollar of arrears; and I am to trust your lordship has not forgotten my pay as well as my person?"

"My good friend, Major Dalgetty," said Montrose, who by this time perfectly recollected his man, "you must consider what important things have happened to put my friends' faces out of my memory, besides this imperfect light; but all conditions shall be kept.—And what news from Argyleshire, my good Major? We have long given you up for lost, and I was now preparing to take the most signal vengeance upon the old fox who infringed the law of arms in your person."

"Truly, my noble lord," said Dalgetty, "I have no desire that my return should put any stop to so proper and becoming an intention; verily it is in no shape in the Earl of Argyle's favour or mercy that I now stand before you, and I shall be no intercessor for him. But my escape is, under Heaven, and the excellent dexterity which, as an old and accomplished cavalier, I displayed in effecting the same,—I say, under these, it is owing to the assistance of this old Highlander, whom I venture to recommend to your lordship's special favour, as the instrument of saving your lordship's to command, Dugald Dalgetty of Drumthwacket."

"A thankworthy service," said the Marquis, gravely, "which shall certainly be requited in the manner it deserves."

"Kneel down, Ranald," said Major Dalgetty, (as we must now call him,) "kneel down, and kiss his Excellency's hand."

The prescribed form of acknowledgment not being according to the custom of Ranald's country, he contented himself with folding his arms on his bosom, and making a low inclination of his head.

"This poor man, my lord," said Major Dalgetty, continuing his speech with a dignified air of protection towards Ranald MacEagh, "has strained all his slender means to defend my person from mine enemies, although having no better weapons of a missive sort than bows and arrows, whilk your lordship will hardly believe."

"You will see a great many such weapons in my camp," said Montrose, "and we find them serviceable."*

"Serviceable, my lord!" said Dalgetty; "I trust your lordship will permit me to be surprised—bows and arrows!—I trust you will forgive my recommending the substitution of muskets, the first convenient opportunity. But besides defending me, this honest Highlander also was at the pains of curing me, in respect that I had got a touch of the wars in my retreat, which merits my best requital in this special introduction of him to your lordship's notice and protection."

"What is your name, my friend?" said Montrose, turning to the Highlander.

"It may not be spoken," answered the mountaineer.

"That is to say," interpreted Major Dalgetty, "he desires to have his name concealed, in respect he hath in former days taken a castle, slain certain children, and done other things, whilk, as your good lordship knows, are often practised in war time, but excite no benevolence towards the perpetrator in the friends of those who sustain injury. I have known, in my military experience, many brave cavaliers put to death by the boors, simply for having used military license upon the country."

"I understand," said Montrose: "This person is at feud with some of our followers. Let him retire to the court of guard, and we will think of the best mode of protecting him."

"You hear, Ranald," said Major Dalgetty, with an air of superiority, "his Excellency wishes to hold privy council with me, you must go to the court of guard.—He does not know where that is, poor fellow!—he is a young soldier for so old a man; I will put him under the charge of a sentinel, and return to your lordship incontinent." He did so, and returned accordingly.

Montrose's first inquiry respected the embassy to Inverary; and he listened with attention to Dalgetty's reply, notwithstanding the prolixity of the Major's narrative. It required an effort from the Marquis to maintain his attention; but no one better knew, that where information is to be derived from the report of such agents as Dalgetty, it can only be obtained by suffering them to tell their story in their own way. Accordingly the Marquis's patience was at length rewarded. Among other spoils which the Captain thought himself at liberty to take, was a packet of Argyle's private papers. These he consigned to the hands of his General; a humour of accounting, however, which went no further, for I do not understand that he made any mention of the purse of gold which he had appropriated at the same time that he made seizure of the papers aforesaid. Snatching a torch from the wall, Montrose was in an instant deeply engaged in the perusal of these documents, in which it is probable he found something to animate his personal resentment against his rival Argyle.

"Does he not fear me?" said he; "then he shall feel me. Will he fire my castle of Murdoch?—Inverary shall raise the first smoke.—O for a guide through the skirts of Strath-Fillan!"

Whatever might be Dalgetty's personal conceit, he understood his business sufficiently to guess at Montrose's meaning. He instantly interrupted his own prolix narration of the skirmish which had taken place, and the wound he had received in his retreat, and began to speak to the point which he saw interested his General.

"If," said he, "your Excellency wishes to make an infall into Argyleshire, this poor man, Ranald, of whom I told you, together with his children and companions, know every pass into that land, both leading from the east and from the north."

"Indeed!" said Montrose; "what reason have you to believe their knowledge so extensive?"

"So please your Excellency," answered Dalgetty, "during the weeks that I remained with them for cure of my wound, they were repeatedly obliged to shift their quarters, in respect of Argyle's attempts to repossess himself of the per officer who was honoured with your E: confidence; so that I had occasion to singular dexterity and knowledge of the country with which they alternately achi retreat and their advance; and when, a was able to repair to your Excellency's sta honest simple creature, Ranald MacEagh, by paths which my steed Gustavus (which ship may remember) trode with perfect saf I said to myself, that where guides, spies, pioneers, were required in a Highland ca that western country, more expert person and his attendants could not possibly be d

"And can you answer for this man's fidel Montrose; "what is his name and conditi

"He is an outlaw and robber by profess thing also of a homicide or murderer," answ getty; "and by name, called Ranald M whilk signifies, Ranald, the Son of the Mi

"I should remember something of that n Montrose, pausing; "Did not these Child Mist perpetrate some act of cruelty upon t lays?"

Major Dalgetty mentioned the circumsta murder of the forester, and Montrose's acti ry at once recalled all the circumstances of

"It is most unlucky," said Montrose, " pitable quarrel between these men and the Allan has borne himself bravely in those possesses, by the wild mystery of his beha language, so much influence over the min countrymen, that the consequences of disobl might be serious. At the same time, these so capable of rendering useful service, and you say, Major Dalgetty, perfectly trust-wo

"I will pledge my pay and arrears, my arms, my head and neck, upon their fidel the Major; "and your Excellency knows, t dado could say no more for his own father.

"True," said Montrose; "but as this is of particular moment, I would willingly h grounds of so positive an assurance."

"Concisely then, my lord," said the Ma only did they disdain to profit by a handson which Argyle did me the honour to place poor head of mine, and not only did they abs pillaging my personal property, whilk w amount that would have tempted regular s any service of Europe; and not only did th me my horse, whilk your excellency knows value, but I could not prevail on them to a stiver, doit, or maravedi, for the trouble and of my sick bed. They actually refused n money when freely offered,—a tale seldom t in a Christian land."

"I admit," said Montrose, after a momen tion, "that their conduct towards you is dence of their fidelity; but how to secure as breaking out of this feud?" He paused, suddenly added, "I had forgot I had supp you, Major, have been travelling by moonlig

He called to his attendants to fetch a stou and some refreshments. Major Dalgetty, the appetite of a convalescent returned from quarters, needed not any pressing to partake was set before him, but proceeded to desp food with such alacrity, that the Marquis, cup of wine, and drinking to his health, c help remarking, that course as the provisio camp were, he was afraid Major Dalgetty h much worse during his excursion into Argyl

"Your Excellency may take your corpo upon that," said the worthy Major, speaking mouth full; "for Argyle's bread and water ar and mouldy in my recollection, and though their best, yet the viands that the children of procured for me, poor helpless creatures as th were so unrefreshful to my body, that when in my armour, whilk I was fain to leave be for expedition's sake, I rattled therein like velled kernel in a nut that hath been kept second Hallowe'en."

* In fact, for the admirers of archery it may be stated, not only that many of the Highlanders in Montrose's army used these antique missiles, but even in England the bow and quiver, once the glory of the bold yeomen of that land, were occasionally used during the great civil wars.

'ou must take the due means to repair these
s, Major Dalgetty."
n truth," answered the soldier, "I shall hardly le to compress that, unless my arrears are to be anged for present pay; for I protest to your Exncy, that the three-stone weight which I have
w to stuffy raised upon the regular accountings
e States of Holland."
n that case," said the Marquis, "you are only ed to good marching order. As for the pay, let us have victory—victory, Major, and your wishes, ll our wishes, shall be amply gratified. Mean-le sip yourself to another cup of wine."
To your Excellency's health," said the Major, fill-cup to the brim, to show the zeal with which he
k the toast, "and victory over all our enemies, particularly over Argyle! I hope to twitch ano-handful from his beard myself—I have had one y at it already."
ery true," answered Montrose; "but to return to men of the Mist. You understand, Dalgetty, their presence here, and the purpose for which [illegible] between you and me?"
ligated, as Montrose had anticipated, with this
of his General's confidence, the Major laid his upon his nose, and nodded intelligence.
How many may there be of Ranald's followers?"
nued the Marquis.
They are reduced, as far as I know, to some eight n men," answered Major Dalgetty, "and a few men and children."
Where are they now?" demanded Montrose.
In a valley at three miles' distance," answered soldier, "awaiting your Excellency's command;
'ged it not fit to bring them to your leaguer with-your Excellency's orders."
You judged very well," said Montrose; "it would roper that they remain where they are, or seek more distant place of refuge. I will send them
y though it is a scarce article with me at nt."
t is quite unnecessary," said Major Dalgetty;
r Excellency has only to hint that the M'Aulays ong in that direction, and my friends of the will instantly make volte-face, and go to the about."
'hat were coarse courtesy," said the Marquis,
ter send them a few dollars to purchase them
cattle for the support of the women and child-

'hey know how to come by their cattle at a far er rate," said the Major; "but let it be as your lency wills."
at Ranald MacEagh," said Montrose, "select
r two of his followers, men whom he can trust,
who are capable of keeping their own secret and
these, with their chief for scout-master-general, serve for our guides. Let them be at my tent orrow at daybreak, and see, if possible, that they
r guess my purpose, nor hold any communica-with each other in private. This old man, has he hildren?"
hey have been killed or hanged," answered the r, "to the number of a round dozen, as I be-
-but he hath left one grand-child, a smart and il youth, whom I have noted to be never with-pebble in his plaid nook, to fling at whatsoever
come in his way; being a symbol, that, like
l, who was accustomed to sling smooth stones
from the brook, he may afterwards prove an turous warrior."
hat boy, Major Dalgetty," said the Marquis, ll have to attend upon my own person. I pre-
he will have sense enough to keep his name
"
our Excellency need not fear that," answered
tty; "these Highland imps, from the moment hip the shell"——
'all," interrupted Montrose, "that boy shall be for the fidelity of his parent, and if he prove
l, the child's preferment shall be his reward.—
ow, Major Dalgetty, I will license your depar-or the night; to-morrow you will introduce lacEagh, under any name or character he may please to assume. I presume his profession has rendered him sufficiently expert in all sort of disguises; for we may admit John of Moidart into our schemes, who has sense, practicability, and intelligence, and will probably allow this man for a time to be disguised as one of his followers. For you, Major, my groom of the chambers will be your quarter-master for this evening."

Major Dalgetty took his leave with a joyful heart, greatly elated with the reception he had met with, and much pleased with the personal manners of his new General, which, as he explained at great length to Ranald MacEagh, reminded him in many respects of the demeanour of the immortal Gustavus Adolphus, the Lion of the North, and Bulwark of the Protestant Faith.

CHAPTER XVII.

> The march begins in military state,
> And nations on his eyes suspended wait;
> Stern famine guards the solitary coast,
> And winter barricades the realm of frost.
> He comes,—nor want, nor cold, his course delay.
> Vision of Hector Wynes.

By break of day Montrose received in his cabin old MacEagh, and questioned him long and particularly as to the means of approaching the country of Argyle. He made a note of his answers, which he compared with those of two of his followers, whom he introduced as the most prudent and experienced. He found them to correspond in all respects; but, still unsatisfied where precaution was so necessary, the Marquis compared the information he had received with that he was able to collect from the Chiefs who lay most near to the destined scene of invasion, and being in all respects satisfied of its accuracy, he resolved to proceed in full reliance upon it.

In one point Montrose changed his mind. Having judged it unfit to take the boy Kenneth into his own service, lest, in case of his birth being discovered, it should be resented as an offence by the numerous clans who entertained a feudal enmity to this devoted family, he requested the Major to take him in attendance upon himself; and as he accompanied this request with a handsome douceur, under pretence of clothing and equipping the lad, this change was agreeable to all parties.

It was about breakfast-time, when Major Dalgetty, being dismissed by Montrose, went in quest of his old acquaintances, Lord Monteith and the M'Aulays, to whom he longed to communicate his own adventures, as well as to learn from them the particulars of the campaign. It may be imagined he was received with great glee by men to whom the late uniformity of their military life had rendered any change of society an interesting novelty. Allan M'Aulay alone seemed to recoil from the former acquaintance, although, when challenged by his brother, he could render no other reason than a reluctance to be familiar with one who had been so lately in the company of Argyle, and other enemies. Major Dalgetty was a little alarmed by this sort of instinctive consciousness which Allan seemed to entertain respecting the society he had been lately keeping; he was soon satisfied, however, that the perceptions of the seer in this particular were not infallible.

As Ranald MacEagh was to be placed under Major Dalgetty's protection and superintendence, it was necessary he should present him to those persons with whom he was most likely to associate. The dress of the old man had, in the mean time, been changed from the tartan of his clan to a sort of clothing peculiar to the men of the distant Isles, resembling a waistcoat with sleeves, and a petticoat, all made in one piece. This dress was laced from top to bottom in front, and bore some resemblance to that called Polonaise, still worn by children in Scotland of the lower rank. The tartan hose and bonnet completed the dress, which old men of the last century remembered well to have seen worn by the distant Islesmen who came to the Earl of Mar's standard in the year 1715.

Major Dalgetty, keeping his eye on Allan as he poke, introduced Ranald MacEagh under the fictitious name of Ranald MacGillihuron in Benbecula, who had escaped with him out of Argyle's prison. He recommended him as a person skilful in the arts of the harper and the seanachie, and by no means contemptible in the quality of a second-sighted person or seer. While making this exposition, Major Dalgetty stammered and hesitated in a way so unlike the usual glib forwardness of his manner, that he could not have failed to have given suspicion to Allan M'Aulay, had not that person's whole attention been engaged in steadily perusing the features of the person thus introduced to him. This steady gaze so much embarrassed Ranald MacEagh, that his hand was beginning to sink down towards his dagger, in expectation of a hostile assault, when Allan, suddenly crossing the floor of the hut, extended his hand to him in the way of friendly greeting. They sat down side by side, and conversed in a low mysterious tone of voice. Menteith and Angus M'Aulay were not surprised at this, for there prevailed among the Highlanders who pretended to the second-sight, a sort of freemasonry, which generally induced them, upon meeting, to hold communication with each other on the nature and extent of their visionary experiences.

"Does the sight come gloomy upon your spirits?" said Allan to his new acquaintance.

"As dark as the shadow upon the moon," replied Ranald, "when she is darkened in her midcourse in heaven, and prophets foretel of evil times."

"Come hither," said Allan, "come more this way, I would converse with you apart; for men say that in your distant islands the sight is poured forth with more clearness and power than upon us, who dwell near the Sassenach."

While they were plunged into their mystic conference, the two English cavaliers entered the cabin in the highest possible spirits, and announced to Angus M'Aulay that orders had been issued that all should hold themselves in readiness for an immediate march to the westward. Having delivered themselves of their news with much glee, they paid their compliments to their old acquaintance Major Dalgetty, whom they instantly recognised, and inquired after the health of his charger, Gustavus.

"I humbly thank you, gentlemen," answered the soldier, "Gustavus is well, though, like his master, somewhat barer on the ribs than when you offered to relieve me of him at Darnlinvarach; and let me assure you, that before you have made one or two of those marches which you seem to contemplate with so much satisfaction in prospect, you will leave, my good knights, some of your English beef, and probably an English horse or two, behind you."

Both exclaimed that they cared very little what they found or what they left, provided the scene changed from dogging up and down Angus and Aberdeenshire, in pursuit of an enemy who would neither fight nor run away.

"If such be the case," said Angus M'Aulay, "I must give orders to my followers, and make provision too for the safe conveyance of Annot Lyle; for an advance into M'Callum More's country will be a further and fouler road than these pinks of Cumbrian knighthood are aware of." So saying, he left the cabin.

"Annot Lyle!" repeated Dalgetty, "is she following the campaign?"

"Surely," replied Sir Giles Musgrave, his eye glancing slightly from Lord Menteith to Allan M'Aulay; "we could neither march nor fight, advance nor retreat, without the influence of the Princess of Harps."

"The Princess of Broadswords and Targets, I say," answered his companion; "for the Lady of Montrose herself could not be more courteously waited upon; she has four Highland maidens, and as many bare legged gillies, to wait upon her orders."

"And what would you have, gentlemen?" said Allan, turning suddenly from the Highlander with whom he was in conversation; "would you yourselves have left an innocent female, the companion of your infancy, to die by violence, or perish by famine? There is not, by this time, a roof upon the habitation of my fathers—our crops have been destroyed, and our cattle have been driven—a gentlemen, have to bless God, that, coming milder and more civilized country, you expose your own lives in this remorseless war, with pretension that your enemies will visit with vengeance the defenceless pledges you may leave behind you."

The Englishmen cordially agreed that they were superiority in this respect; and the company dispersing, went each to his several charge of patron.

Allan lingered a moment behind, still questioning the reluctant Ranald MacEagh upon a point of his supposed visions, by which he was greatly puzzled. "Repeatedly," he said, "have I had the sight of God, who seemed to plunge his weapon into the heart of Menteith,—of that young nobleman in the plaid cloak, who has just now left the hut, without effort, though I have gazed till my eyes almost fixed in the sockets, can I discover the features of this Highlander, or even conjecture who he is, although his person and air seem familiar to me."

"Have you reversed your own plaid," said he, "according to the rule of the experienced Seers in such case?"

"I have," answered Allan, speaking low and shuddering as if with internal agony.

"And in what guise did the phantom then appear to you?" said Ranald.

* Wraith.—A species of apparition, similar to what the Germans call a Double Ganger, was believed in by the Celts, and is still considered as an emblem of misfortune. Mr. Kirke, (See Note to Rob Roy, page 90,) the minister of Aberfoil, who will no doubt be able to tell us more of the matter should he ever come back from Fairy land, gives the following:—

"Some men of that exalted sight, either by art or nature, have told me they have seen at these meetings a double of the shape of some man in two places, that is, a superior and a subterranean inhabitant perfectly resembling one another in all points, whom he, notwithstanding, could easily distinguish one from another by some secret tokens and characters, and so go speak to the man his neighbour and familiar, by the apparition or resemblance of him. They assert every element and different state of being have animals resembling those of another element, as there be fishes at sea resembling Monks of late order in all their hoods and dresses, the Roman invention of good and bad Demons and Guardian angels particularly assigned, is called by them another mistake, springing only from this original. They call the man a Co-Walker, every way like the man, as a twin brother and companion haunting him as his shadow, as is that which is known among men resembling the original both before the originall is dead, and was also often seen of others at sea hours, by which the people knew that the person of the house was to visit them within a few days. This copy, echo or picture, goes at last to his own herd. It accompanies the person so long and frequently for ends best known to himself, whether to guard him from the secret assaults of some of his own folks or only as an sportfull art to counterfeit their actions." Kirke's Secret Commonwealth, p. 3

The two following apparitions, resembling the vision of Allan M'Aulay in the text, occur in Theophilus Insulanus Mr. Fraser's Treatise on the Second Sight. Relation XVIII.)

"Barbara Macpherson relict of the deceased Mr. John MacLeod, late minister of St. Kilda, informed me that she had not a particular kind of second sight, which always a forerunner of their approaching end. Some months before any sickness they are haunted with an apparition of themselves in all respects as to their person, features, clothing. This image, seemingly animated, walks about the field in broad daylight, and if they are employed in sowing, harrowing, seed sowing, or any other occupation, at the same time mimicked by this ghostly visitant, the former added further, that having visited a sick person of their intimate friends, she had the curiosity to enquire of him, some time he had seen any resemblance of himself as above, he answered in the affirmative, and told her, that to his utmost trial, as he was going out of his house of a morning, with straw rope garters instead of those he formerly used, having gone to the fields, his other self appeared in statu quo. The conclusion was, the sick man died of that ailment. I no longer question of the truth of this one remarkable passage.

"Margaret MacLeod, an honest woman, acquainted me, informed me, that when she was a young woman in the island of Grishernish, a dairy maid, who daily used to herd the cows in a park close to the house, observed, at different times, a woman resembling herself in shape and attire, walking sometimes at no great distance from her, and being surprised at the first time to make further trial, she put the back part of her upper garment foremost, and upon the phantom was dressed in the same manner, which made her uneasy, believing it portended some misfortune to herself. In a short time thereafter she fell sick with a fever, which brought her to her end, and during her sickness and on her deathbed, declared the second time several."

plaid also reversed," answered Allan, in and convulsive tone.
assured," said Ranald, "that your own
ne other, will do the deed of which you
ed the shadow."
y anxious soul a hundred times surmis-Allan. "But it is impossible! Were I to ad in the eternal book of fate, I would possible—we are bound by the ties of a hundred ties more intimate—we have y side in battle, and our swords have the blood of the same enemies—it is im-ouble—arm him!"
WILL do so," answered Ranald, "as cer-
the cause be hid in the darkness of u say," he continued, suppressing his
s with difficulty, "that side by side you
l your prey like bloodhounds—have you oodhounds turn their fangs against each
ht over the body of a throttled deer!"
e!" said M'Aulay, starting up, "these rebodings of fate, but the temptation of rit from the bottomless pit!" So say-out of the cabin.
st it!" said the Son of the Mist, looking
h an air of exultation; "the hailed ar-side! Spirits of the slaughtered, rejoice!
ur murderers' swords be dyed in each
"
ceeding morning all was prepared, and vanced by rapid marches up the river
ired his desultory forces into the roman-nd the lake of the same name, which ead of that river. The inhabitants were not indeed the vassals of Argyle, but of d kindred house of Glenorchy, which e name of Breadalbane. Being taken they were totally unprepared for resist-re compelled to be passive witnesses of which took place among their flocks Advancing in this manner to the vale of t, and laying waste the country around se reached the most difficult point of his

rn army, even with the assistance of the road which now leads up by Tyndrum
f Loch Awe, the passage of these exten-
would seem a task of some difficulty.
riod, and for long afterwards, there was rth waatsoever; and to add to the diffi-ountains were already covered with
as a sublime scene to look up to them.
t masses, one upon another, the front
ing whiteness, while those which arose caught a rosy tint from the setting of a sun. Ben Cruachan, superior in magnificence the very citadel of the Genius of ose high above the others, showing his nd scathed peak to the distance of many vers of Montrose were men not to be e sublime, yet terrible prospect before of them were of that ancient race of who not only willingly made their snow, but considered it as effeminate

a snowball for a pillow. Plunder and eyond the frozen mountains which they they did not permit themselves to be e difficulty of traversing them. Mon-allow their spirits time to subside. He pes to play in the van the ancient pibroch iggil nam bo," &c. (that is, We come
-drift to drive the prey;) the shrilling hich had often struck the vales of the terror.* The troops advanced with the ty of mountaineers, and were soon in-dangerous pass, through which Ranald
r guide, going before them with a select k out the way.
of man at no time appears more conn when it is placed in contrast with mily march of the M'Farlanes, a warlike and who inhabited the western banks of Loch-Loe on Waverley, page 85.

scenes of natural terror and dignity. The victorious army of Montrose, whose exploits had struck terror into all Scotland, when ascending up this terrific pass, seemed a contemptible handful of stragglers, in the act of being devoured by the jaws of the mountain, which appeared ready to close upon them. Even Montrose half repented the boldness of his attempt, as he looked down from the summit of the first eminence which he attained, upon the scattered condition of his small army. The difficulty of getting forward was so great, that considerable gaps began to occur in the line of march, and the distance between the van, centre, and rear, was each moment increased in a degree equally incommodious and dangerous. It was with great apprehension that Montrose looked upon every point of advantage which the hill afforded, in dread it might be found occupied by an enemy prepared for defence; and he often afterwards was heard to express his conviction, that had the passes of Strath-Fillan been defended by two hundred resolute men, not only would his progress have been effectually stopped, but his army must have been in danger of being totally cut off. Security, however, the bane of many a strong country, and many a fortress, betrayed, on this occasion, the district of Argyle to his enemies. The invaders had only to contend with the natural difficulties of the path, and with the snow, which, fortunately, had not fallen in any great quantity. The army no sooner reached the summit of the ridge of hills dividing Argyleshire from the district of Breadalbane, than they rushed down upon the devoted vales beneath them with a fury sufficiently expressive of the motives which had dictated a movement so difficult and hazardous.

Montrose divided his army into three bodies, in order to produce a wider and more extensive terror, one of which was commanded by the Captain of Clan Ranald, one intrusted to the leading of Colkitto, and the third remained under his own direction. He was thus enabled to penetrate the country of Argyle at three different points. Resistance there was none. The flight of the shepherds from the hills had first announced in the peopled districts this formidable irruption, and wherever the clansmen were summoned out, they were killed, disarmed, and dispersed, by an enemy who had anticipated their motions. Major Dalgetty, who had been sent forward against Inverary with the few horse of the army that were fit for service, managed his matters so well, that he had very nearly surprised Argyle, as he expressed it, inter pocula; and it was only a rapid flight by water which saved that chief from death or captivity. But the punishment which Argyle himself escaped fell heavily upon his country and clan, and the ravages committed by Montrose on that devoted land, although too consistent with the genius of the country and times, have been repeatedly and justly quoted as a blot on his actions and character.

Argyle in the meantime had fled to Edinburgh, to lay his complaints before the Convention of Estates. To meet the exigence of the moment, a considerable army was raised under General Baillie, a Presbyterian officer of skill and fidelity, with whom was joined in command the celebrated Sir John Urrie, a soldier of fortune like Dalgetty, who had already changed sides twice during the Civil War, and was destined to turn his coat a third time before it was ended. Argyle also, burning with indignation, proceeded to levy his own numerous forces, in order to avenge himself of his feudal enemy. He established his head-quarters at Dumbarton, where he was soon joined by a considerable force, consisting chiefly of his own clansmen and dependants. Being there joined by Baillie and Urrie, with a very considerable army of regular forces, he prepared to march into Argyleshire, and chastise the invader of his paternal territories.

But Montrose, while these two formidable armies were forming a junction, had been recalled from that ravaged country by the approach of a third, collected in the north under the Earl of Seaforth, who, after some hesitation, having embraced the side of the Covenanters, had now, with the assistance of the veteran garrison of Inverness, formed a considerable army with which he threatened Montrose from Invernesshire. Enclosed in a wasted and unfriendly country, and menaced on each side by advancing enemies of superior force, it might have been supposed that Montrose's destruction was certain. But these were precisely the circumstances under which the active and enterprising genius of the Great Marquis was calculated to excite the wonder and admiration of his friends, the astonishment and terror of his enemies. As if by magic, he collected his scattered forces from the wasteful occupation in which they had been engaged; and scarce were they again united, ere Argyle and his associate generals were informed, that the royalists, having suddenly disappeared from Argyleshire, had retreated northwards among the dusky and impenetrable mountains of Lochaber.

The sagacity of the generals opposed to Montrose, immediately conjectured, that it was the purpose of their active antagonist to fight with, and, if possible, to destroy Seaforth, ere they could come to his assistance. This occasioned a corresponding change in their operations. Leaving this chieftain to make the best defence he could, Urrie and Baillie again separated their forces from those of Argyle; and, having chiefly horse and Lowland troops under their command, they kept the southern side of the Grampian ridge, moving along eastward into the county of Angus, resolving from thence to proceed into Aberdeenshire, in order to intercept Montrose, if he should attempt to escape in that direction.

Argyle, with his own levies and other troops, undertook to follow Montrose's march; so that, in case he should come to action either with Seaforth, or with Baillie and Urrie, he might be placed between two fires by this third army, which, at a secure distance, was to hang upon his rear.

For this purpose, Argyle once more moved towards Inverary, having an opportunity, at every step, to deplore the severities which the hostile clans had exercised on his dependants and country. Whatever noble qualities the Highlanders possessed, and they had many, clemency in treating a hostile country was not of the number; but even the ravages of hostile troops combined to swell the number of Argyle's followers. It is still a Highland proverb, He whose house is burnt must become a soldier; and hundreds of the inhabitants of these unfortunate valleys had now no means of maintenance, save by exercising upon others the severities they had themselves sustained, and no future prospect of happiness, excepting in the gratification of revenge. His bands were, therefore, augmented by the very circumstances which had desolated his country, and Argyle soon found himself at the head of three thousand determined men, distinguished for activity and courage, and commanded by gentlemen of his own name, who yielded to none in those qualities. Under himself, he conferred the principal command upon Sir Duncan Campbell of Ardenvohr, and another Sir Duncan Campbell of Auchenbreck,* an experienced and veteran soldier, whom he had recalled from the wars of Ireland for this purpose. The cold spirit of Argyle himself, however, clogged the military councils of his more intrepid assistants; and it was resolved, notwithstanding their increased force, to observe the same plan of operations, and to follow Montrose cautiously, in whatever direction he should march, avoiding an engagement until an opportunity should occur of falling upon his rear, while he should be engaged with another enemy in front.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Piobracht tro Domal dhu, Piobracht an Domul,
Piobrachd nans Sheattach
Feachd an Inneilochy.

The war tune of Donald the Black,
The war-tune of Black Donald,
The pipes and the banner
Are up in the rendezvous of Iverlochy.

THE military road connecting the chain of forts, as it is called, and running in the general line of the present Caledonian canal, has now completely opened the great glen, or chasm, extending almost across the whole island, once doubtless filled by the sea, and still affording basins for that long line of lakes, by means of which modern art has united the German and Atlantic Oceans. The paths or tracks by which the natives traversed this extensive valley, were, in 1645-6, in the same situation as when they awaked the strain of an Irish engineer officer, who had been employed in converting them into practicable military roads, and whose eulogium begins, and, for aught I know, ends, as follows:

"Had you seen but these roads before they were made,
You would have held up your hands and bless'd General Wade."

But, bad as the ordinary paths were, Montrose avoided them, and led his army, like a herd of wild deer, from mountain to mountain, and from forest to forest, where his enemies could learn nothing of his motions, while he acquired the most perfect knowledge respecting theirs from the friendly clans of Cameron and M'Donnell, whose mountainous districts he now traversed. Strict orders had been given that Argyle's advance should be watched, and that all intelligence respecting his motions should be communicated instantly to the General himself.

It was a moonlight night, and Montrose, worn out by the fatigues of the day, was laid down to sleep in a miserable shieling. He had only slumbered two hours, when some one touched his shoulder. He looked up, and, by the stately form and deep voice, easily recognised the Chief of the Camerons.

"I have news for you," said that leader, "which is worth while to arise and listen to."

"M'Ilduy† can bring no other," said Montrose, addressing the Chief by his patronymic title—"are they good or bad?"

"As you may take them," said the Chieftain.

"Are they certain?" demanded Montrose.

"Yes," answered M'Ilduy, "or another messenger should have brought them. Know that, tired with the task imposed upon me of accompanying that unhappy Dalgetty and his handful of horse, who detained me for hours on the march at the pace of a crippled badger, I made a stretch of four miles with six of my people in the direction of Inverlochy, and there met with Ian of Glenroy, who had been out for intelligence. Argyle is moving upon Inverlochy with three thousand chosen men, commanded by the flower of the sons of Diarmid.—These are my news—they are certain—it is for you to construe their purport."

"Their purport must be good," answered Montrose, readily and cheerfully; "the voice of M'Ilduy is ever pleasant in the ears of Montrose, and most pleasant when it speaks of some brave enterprise at hand—What are our musters?"

He then called for light, and easily ascertained that a great part of his followers having, as usual, dispersed to secure their booty, he had not with him above twelve or fourteen hundred men.

"Not much above a third," said Montrose, pausing, "of Argyle's force, and Highlanders opposed to Highlanders. With the blessing of God upon the royal cause, I would not hesitate were the odds but one to two."

"Then do not hesitate," said Cameron; "for when your trumpets shall sound to attack M'Callum More, not a man of the Camerons will remain deaf to the summons. Glengarry, Keppoch—I myself—would destroy, with fire and sword, the wretch who should remain behind under any pretence whatsoever. To-morrow, or the next day, shall be a day of battle to all who bear the name of M'Donnell or Cameron, whatever be the event."

"It is gallantly said, my noble friend," said Montrose, grasping his hand, "and I were worse than a coward did I not do justice to such followers, by entertaining the most undoubtable hopes of success. We will turn back on this M'Callum More, who follows us like a raven to devour the relics of our army, should we meet braver men who may be able to break its strength! Let the Chiefs and leaders be called together as quickly as possible; and you, who have—

* This last character is historical.

† Mhuich'Ceanel Dhu, the descendant of Black Donald first news of this joyful event, –for

–you, M'Ilduy, shall bring it to a joy-ding us the best and nearest road
y." illingly do," said M'Ilduy; "if I have
s by which to retreat through the se-
h far more readiness will I teach you against your foe."
the new prevailed, and the leaders startled from the rude couches on ought temporary repose.
ent," said Major Dalgetty, when
on a handful of rugged heather roots,
from a bed as hard as a stable-broom ill; but undoubtedly, having but one experience in his army, his Excels may be vindicated in putting him repaired to the council, where, notpedantry, Montrose seemed always with considerable attention; partly por really possessed military knowl-

ience, and often made suggestions
d of advantage, and partly because neral from the necessity of deferring union of the Highland Chiefs, and itional ground for departing it when ble to his own. On the present oc-joyfully acquiesced in the proposal
k and confronting Argyle, which he valiant resolution of the great Gus-ed against the Duke of Bavaria, and psby the plunder of that fertile coun-enanced from the northward by the n Wallenstein had assembled in Bo-

Glengarry, Keppoch, and Lochiel, ral in courage and military fame to lands, lay within the neighbourhood
ination, despatched the fiery cross seals, to summon every one who could
the King's Lieutenant and to join of their respective Chiefs as they s Inverlochy. As the order was emit was speedily and willingly obeyed,
ove of war, their zeal for the royal revived the King in the light of a clansmen had deserted, as well as ed cares to their own patriarch, drew army not only all in the neighbour-able to bear arms, but some who, in ht have been esteemed past the use of the next day's march, which, being
through the mountains of Lochaber,
l by the enemy, his forces were aug-
fds of men issuing from each glen,
nselves under the banners of their
's. This was a circumstance highly e rest of the army, who, by the time
the enemy, found their strength in-ably more than one-fourth, as had
by the valiant leader of the Camerons.
ose executed this counter-march, Ar-
head of his gallant army, advanced side of Loch-Eil, and reached the nich combines that lake with Loch-ent Castle of Inverlochy, once, as gal fortress, and still, although dis-
of some strength and consideration,
nt head-quarters, and there was Ar-gyle's army to encamp around him in the Lochy joins Loch-Eil. Several nded, loaded with provisions, so that

"I cannot rejoice in the prospect, my lord," sa Auchenbreck, "that James Grahame will be crush with little assistance of ours. He has built a hea account in Argyleshire against him, and I long reckon with him drop of blood for drop of blood.
love not the payment of such debts by third hands.

"You are too scrupulous," said Argyle; "what si
nifies it by whose hands the blood of the Grahames spilt? It is time that of the sons of Diarmid shou cease to flow. What say you, Ardenvohr?"

"I say, my lord," replied Sir Duncan, "that I thi Auchenbreck will be gratified, and will himself ha
a personal opportunity of settling accounts with Mo trose for his depredations. Reports have reached outposts that the Camerons are assembling their f strength on the skirts of Ben-Nevis; this must be soon the advance of Montrose, and not to cover l retreat."

"It must be some scheme of harassing and dep
dation," said Argyle, "devised by the inveterate m lignity of M'Ilduy, which he terms loyalty. They c intend no more than an attack on our outposts,
some annoyance to to-morrow's march."

"I have sent out scouts," said Sir Duncan, "
every direction, to procure intelligence; and we mu soon hear whether they really do assemble any for upon what point, or with what purpose."

It was later ere any tidings were received; but wh
the moon had arisen, a considerable bustle in t
camp, and a noise immediately after heard in the c
tle, announced the arrival of important intelligen
Of the scouts first dispersed by Ardenvohr, so had returned without being able to collect any thi
save uncertain rumours concerning movements
the country of the Camerons. It seemed as if skirts of Ben-Nevis were sending forth those accountable and portentous sounds with which th
sometimes announce the near approach of a stor
Others, whose zeal carried them further upon th
mission, were entrapped and slain, or made pris
ers, by the inhabitants of the fastnesses into wh they endeavoured to penetrate. At length, on rapid advance of Montrose's army, his advan
guard and the outposts of Argyle became aware
each other's presence, and after exchanging a f
musket-shots and arrows, fell back to their resp
tive main bodies, to convey intelligence and rece orders.

Sir Duncan Campbell, and Auchenbreck, instan
threw themselves on horseback, in order to visit
state of the outposts; and Argyle maintained
character of commander-in-chief with reputati
by making a respectable arrangement of his for in the plain, as it was evident that they might n
expect a night alarm, or an attack in the morning farthest. Montrose had kept his forces so caution within the defiles of the mountain, that no eff
which Auchenbreck or Ardenvohr thought it prud
to attempt, could ascertain his probable strena
They were aware, however, that, at the utmost co
putation, it must be inferior to their own, and th returned to Argyle to inform him of the amount their observations; but that nobleman refused to lieve that Montrose could be in presence himself.
said, "It was a madness of which even James G hame, in his height of presumptuous frenzy, was capable; and he doubted not that their march v
only impeded by their ancient enemies, Glenco, K
poch, and Glengarry; and perhaps M'Gourigh, v
his M'Phersons, might have assembled a force, wh
he knew must be greatly inferior in numbers w
own, a. . whom, therefore, he doubted not to dis
by force, or by terms of capitulation."

the second of February, 1645-6. The clansmen of Argyle were arranged in two lines, not far from the angle between the river and the lake, and made an appearance equally resolute and formidable. Auchenbreck would willingly have commenced the battle by an attack on the outposts of the enemy, but Argyle, with more cautious policy, preferred receiving to making the onset. Signals were soon heard, that they would not long wait for it in vain. The Campbells could distinguish, in the gorge of the mountains, the war-tunes of various clans as they advanced to the onset. That of the Camerons, which bears the ominous words, addressed to the wolves and ravens, "Come to me, and I will give you flesh," was loudly screeched from their native glens. In the language of the Highland bards, the war voice of Glengarry was not silent; and the gathering tunes of other tribes could be plainly distinguished, as they successively came up to the extremity of the passes from which they were to descend into the plain.

"You see," said Argyle to his kinsmen, "it is as I said, we have only to deal with our neighbours; James Grahame has not ventured to show us his banner."

At this moment there resounded from the gorge of the pass a lively flourish of trumpets, in that note with which it was the ancient Scottish fashion to salute the royal standard.

"You may hear, my lord, from yonder signal," said Sir Duncan Campbell, "that he who pretends to be the King's Lieutenant, must be in person among these men."

"And has probably horse with him," said Auchenbreck, "which I could not have anticipated. But shall we look pale for that, my lord, when we have foes to fight and wrongs to revenge?"

Argyle was silent, and looked upon his arm, which hung in a sash, owing to a fall which he had sustained in a preceding march.

"It is true," interrupted Ardenvohr, eagerly, "my Lord of Argyle you are disabled from using either sword or pistol; you must retire on board the galleys—your life is precious to us as a head—your hand cannot be useful to us as a soldier."

"No," said Argyle, pride contending with irresolution, "it shall never be said that I fled before Montrose; if I cannot fight, I will at least die in the midst of my children."

Several other principal Chiefs of the Campbells, with one voice, conjured and obtested their Chieftain to leave them for that day to the leading of Ardenvohr and Auchenbreck, and to behold the conflict from a distance and in safety.—We dare not stigmatize Argyle with poltroonery; for, though his life was marked by no action of bravery, yet he behaved with so much composure and dignity in the final and closing scene, that his conduct upon the present and similar occasions, should be rather imputed to indecision than to want of courage. But when the small still voice within a man's own breast, which tells him that his life is of consequence to himself, is seconded by that of numbers around him, who assure him that it is of equal advantage to the public, history affords many examples of men more habitually daring than Argyle, who have consulted self-preservation when the temptations to it were so powerfully increased.

"See him on board, if you will, Sir Duncan," said Auchenbreck to his kinsman; "it must be my duty to prevent this spirit from spreading farther among us."

So saying he threw himself among the ranks, entreating, commanding, and conjuring the soldiers, to remember their ancient fame and their present superiority; the wrongs they had to revenge, if successful, and the fate they had to dread, if vanquished; and imparting to every bosom a portion of the fire which glowed in his own. Slowly, meanwhile, and apparently with reluctance, Argyle suffered himself to be forced by his officious kinsmen to the verge of the lake, and was transported on board of a galley, from the deck of which he surveyed with more safety than credit the scene which ensued.

Sir Duncan Campbell of Ardenvohr, notwithstanding the urgency of the occasion, stood with his eyes riveted on the boat which bore his Chieftain from the field of battle. There were feelings in his bosom which could not be expressed; for the character of a Chief was that of a father, and the heart of a clansman durst not dwell upon his failings with critical severity as upon those of other men. Argyle, too, harsh and severe to others, was generous and liberal among his kinsmen, and the noble heart of Ardenvohr was wrung with bitter anguish, when he reflected to what interpretation his present conduct might subject him.

"It is better it should be so," said he to himself, devouring his own emotion; "but —of his line of a hundred sires, I know not one who would have retired while the banner of Diarmid waved in the wind, in the face of its most inveterate foes!"

A loud shout now compelled him to turn, and to hasten with all dispatch to his post, which was on the right flank of Argyle's little army.

The retreat of Argyle had not passed unobserved by his watchful enemy, who, occupying the superior ground, could mark every circumstance which passed below. The movement of three or four horsemen to the rear showed that those who retreated were men of rank.

"They are going," said Dalgetty, "to put their horses out of danger, like prudent cavaliers. Yonder goes Sir Duncan Campbell, riding a brown bay gelding, which I had marked for my own second charger."

"You are wrong, Major," said Montrose, with a bitter smile, "they are saving their precious Chief.—Give the signal for assault instantly—send the word through the ranks.—Gentlemen, noble Chiefs, Glengarry, Keppoch, M'Vourigh, upon them instantly!—Rode to M'Ilduy, Major Dalgetty, and tell him to charge as he loves Lochaber—return and bring our handful of horse to my standard. They shall be placed with the Irish as a reserve."

CHAPTER XIX.

As meets a rock a thousand waves, so Inisfail met Lochlin.
OSSIAN.

THE trumpets and bagpipes, those clamorous harbingers of blood and death, at once united in the signal for onset, which was replied to by the cry of more than two thousand warriors, and the echoes of the mountain glens behind them. Divided into three bodies, or columns, the Highland followers of Montrose poured from the defiles which had hitherto concealed them from their enemies, and rushed with the utmost determination upon the Campbells, who waited their charge with the greatest firmness. Behind these charging columns marched in line the Irish, under Colkitto, intended to form the reserve. With them was the royal standard, and Montrose himself; and on the flanks were about fifty horse, under Dalgetty, which by wonderful exertions had been kept in some sort fit for service.

The right column of Royalists was led by Glengarry, the left by Lochiel, and the centre by the Earl of Menteith, who preferred fighting on foot in a Highland dress to remaining with the cavalry.

The Highlanders poured on with the proverbial fury of their country, firing their guns, and discharging their arrows, at a little distance from the enemy, who received the assault with the most determined gallantry. Better provided with musketry than their enemies, stationary also, and therefore taking their more decisive aim, the fire of Argyle's followers was more destructive than that which they sustained. The royal clans, perceiving this, rushed to close quarters, and succeeded on two points in throwing their enemies into disorder. With regular troops this must have achieved a victory; but here Highlanders were opposed to Highlanders, and the nature of the weapons, as well as the agility of those who wielded them, was equal on both sides.

Their strife was accordingly desperate; and the clash of the swords and axes, as they encountered each other, or rung upon the targets, was mingled with the short, wild, animating shrieks with which Highlanders accompany the battle, the dance, or indeed ertion of any kind. Many of the foes op-re personally acquainted, and sought to mselves with each other from motives of

r a more generous emulation of valour.
arty would retreat an inch while the place
who fell (and they fell fast on both sides)
dly supplied by others, who thronged to the nger. A steam, like that which arises from cauldron, rose into the thin, cold, frosty
ve red above the combatants.
I the fight on the right and the centre, with late consequence, except mutual wounds

right of the Campbells, the Knight of Ar-btained some advantage, through his num-und by strength of numbers. He had moved bliquely the extreme flank of his line at the e Royalists were about to close, so that nned a fire at once on front and in flank, te the utmost efforts of their leader, were no some confusion. At this instant, Sir Campbell gave the word to charge, and pertedly made the attack at the very moeemed about to receive it. Such a chance stances is always discouraging, and often
t the disorder was remedied by the advance
sh reserve, whose heavy and sustained fire
the Knight of Ardenvohr to forego his e, and content himself with repulsing the
The Marquis of Montrose, in the mean-ailing himself of some scattered birch trees,
s of the smoke produced by the close fire of musketry, which concealed the operation,
on Dalgetty to follow him with the horse,
ling round so as to gain the right flank and rear of the enemy, he commanded his six to sound the charge. The clang of the umpets, and the noise of the galloping of produced an effect upon Argyle's right wing
other sounds could have impressed them
ie mountaineers of that period had a super-
read of the war-horse, like that entertained
ruvians, and had many strange ideas rese manner in which that animal was trainnbat. When, therefore, they found their xpectedly broken, and that the objects of test terror were suddenly in the midst of panic, in spite of Sir Duncan's attempts became universal. Indeed, the figure of lgetty alone, sheathed in impenetrable ar-making his horse caracole and bound, so weight to every blow which he struck,
re been a novelty in itself sufficient to ter-
who had never seen any thing more nearly
g such a cavalier, than a shelty waddling Highlander far larger than itself. The reyalists returned to the charge; the Irish,
heir ranks, maintained a fire equally close rective. There was no sustaining the fight rgyle's followers began to break and fly, most
the lake, the remainder in different direc-
ne defeat of the right wing, of itself decirendered irreparable by the death of Auch-
who fell while endeavoring to restore order.
ight of Ardenvohr, with two or three hun-
all gentlemen of descent and distinguished
- for the Campbells are supposed to have good men in their ranks than any of the clans, - endeavoured, with unavailing ho-rover the tumultuary retreat of the common
r resolution only proved fatal to themselves.
re charged again and again by fresh adver-
d forced to separate from each other, until their aim seemed only to be to purchase an le death by resisting to the very last.
quarter, Sir Duncan," called out Major
when he discovered his late host, with one thers, defending himself against several ers; and, to enforce his offer, he rode up to his sword uplifted. Sir Duncan's reply ischarge of a reserved pistol, which took on the person of the rider, but on that of t horse, which, shot through the heart, fell er him. Ranald MacEagh, who was one of those who had been pressing Sir Duncan hard, took the opportunity to cut him down with his broadsword, as he turned from him in the act of firing the pistol.

Allan M'Aulay came up at this moment. They were, excepting Ranald, followers of his brother who were engaged on that part of the field. "Villains!" he said, "which of you has dared to do this, when it was my positive order that the Knight of Ardenvohr should be taken alive!"

Half-a-dozen of busy hands, which were emulously employed in plundering the fallen knight, whose arms and accoutrements were of a magnificence befitting his quality, instantly forbore the occupation, and half the number of voices exculpated themselves, by laying the blame on the Skyeman, as they called Ranald MacEagh.

"Dog of an Islander!" said Allan, forgetting, in his wrath, their prophetic brotherhood, "follow the chase, and harm him no farther, unless you mean to die by my hand." They were at this moment left almost alone; for Allan's threats had forced his own clan from the spot, and all around had pressed onwards toward the lake, carrying before them noise, terror, and confusion, and leaving behind only the dead and dying. The moment was tempting to MacEagh's vengeful spirit. - "That I should die by your hand, red as it is with the blood of my kindred, said he, answering the threat of Allan in a tone as menacing as his own, "is not more likely than that you should fall by mine." With that, he struck at M'Aulay with such unexpected readiness, that he had scarce time to intercept the blow with his target.

"Villain!" said Allan, in astonishment, "what means this?"

"I am Ranald of the Mist!" answered the Islesman, repeating the blow; and with that word, they engaged in close and furious conflict. It seemed to be decreed, that in Allan M'Aulay had arisen the avenger of his mother's wrongs upon this wild tribe, as was proved by the issue of the present, as well as of former combats. After exchanging a few blows, Ranald MacEagh was prostrated by a deep wound on the skull; and M'Aulay, setting his foot on him, was about to pass the broadsword through his body, when the point of the weapon was struck up by a third party, who suddenly interposed. This was no other than Major Dalgetty, who, stunned by the fall, and encumbered by the dead body of his horse, had now recovered his legs and his understanding. "Hold up your sword," said he to M'Aulay, "and prejudice this person no farther, in respect that he is here in my safe-conduct, and in his excellency's service; and in regard that no honourable cavalier is at liberty, by the law martial, to avenge his own private injuries, flagrante bello, multo majus flagrante pace."

"Fool!" said Allan, "stand aside, and dare not to come between the tiger and his prey!"

But, far from quitting his point, Dalgetty stept across the fallen body of MacEagh, and gave Allan to understand, that if he called himself a tiger, he was likely, at present, to find a lion in his path. There required no more than the gesture and tone of defiance to turn the whole rage of the military Seer against the person who was opposing the course of his vengeance, and blows were instantly exchanged without further ceremony.

The strife betwixt Allan and MacEagh had been unnoticed by the stragglers around, for the person of the latter was known to few of Montrose's followers; but the scuffle betwixt Dalgetty and him, both so well known, attracted instant attention; and fortunately, among others, that of Montrose himself, who had come for the purpose of gathering together his small body of horse, and following the pursuit down Loch-Eil. Aware of the fatal consequences of dissension in his little army, he pushed his horse up to the spot, and seeing MacEagh on the ground, and Dalgetty in the attitude of protecting him against M'Aulay, his quick apprehension instantly caught the cause of quarrel, and as instantly devised means to stop it. "For shame," he said, "gentlemen cavaliers, brawling together in so glorious a field of vic tory!—Are you mad? Or are you intoxicated with the glory which you have both this day gained?"

"It is not my fault, so please your Excellency," said Dalgetty, "I have been known a bonus socius, a bon camarado in all the services of Europe; but he that touches a man under my safeguard" —

"And he," said Allan, speaking at the same time, "who dares to bar the course of my just vengeance" —

"For shame, gentlemen!" again repeated Montrose; "I have other business for you both, business of deeper importance than any private quarrel, which you may easily find a more fitting time to settle. For you, Major Dalgetty, kneel down."

"Kneel!" said Dalgetty; "I have not learned to obey that word of command, saving when it is given from the pulpit. In the Swedish discipline, the front rank do indeed kneel, but only when the regiment is drawn up six files deep."

"Nevertheless," repeated Montrose, "kneel down, in the name of King Charles and of his representative."

When Dalgetty reluctantly obeyed, Montrose struck him lightly on the neck with the flat of his sword, saying, —"In reward of the gallant service of this day, and in the name and authority of our Sovereign, King Charles, I dub thee knight; be brave, loyal, and fortunate. And now, Sir Dugald Dalgetty, to your duty. Collect what horsemen you can, and pursue such of the enemy as are flying down the side of the lake. Do not disperse your force, nor venture too far; but take heed to prevent their rallying, which very little exertion may do. Mount, then, Sir Dugald, and do your duty."

"But what shall I mount?" said the new made chevalier. "Poor Gustavus sleeps in the bed of honour, like his immortal namesake! and I am made a knight, a rider,* as the High Dutch have it, just when I have not a horse left to ride upon."

"That shall not be said," answered Montrose, dismounting; "I make you a present of my own, which has been thought a good one; only, I pray you, resume the duty you discharge so well."

With many acknowledgments, Sir Dugald mounted the steed so liberally bestowed upon him; and only beseeching his Excellency to remember that MacEagh was under his safe-conduct, immediately began to execute the orders assigned to him with great zeal and alacrity.

"And you, Allan M'Aulay," said Montrose, addressing the Highlander, who, leaning his sword-point on the ground, had regarded the ceremony of his antagonist's knighthood with a sneer of sullen scorn—"you, who are superior to the ordinary motives by the paltry motives of plunder and pay, and personal distinction—you, whose deep knowledge renders you so valuable a counsellor—is it you whom I find striving with a man like Dalgetty, for the privilege of trampling the remains of life out of so contemptible an enemy as he is there? Come, my friend, I have other work for you. This victory, skilfully improved, shall win Seaforth to our party. It is not disloyalty, but despair of the good cause, that has induced him to take arms against us. These arms, in this moment of better augury, he may be brought to unite with ours. I shall send my gallant friend, Colonel Hay, to him, from this very field of battle, but he must be united in commission with a Highland gentleman of rank, befitting that of Seaforth, and of talents and of influence such as may make an impression upon him. You are not only in every respect the fittest for this most important mission, but, having no immediate command, your presence may be more easily spared than that of a Chief whose following is in the field. You know every pass and glen in the Highlands, as well as the manners and customs of every tribe. Go therefore to Hay, on the right wing, he has instructions, and expects you. You will find him with Glenmorrison's men; be his guide, his interpreter, and his colleague."

Allan M'Aulay bent on the Marquis a dark and penetrating glance, as if to ascertain whether this sudden mission was not contrived for some and unexplained purpose. But Montrose, skilful in concealing his own, was an equal in concealing his own. He considered it as a last consequence in this moment of enthusiasm exalted passion, to remove Allan from the scene a few days, that he might provide, as his honourable guard, for the safety of those who had acted as guides, when he trusted the Seer's quarrel with Dalgetty might be easily made up. Allan, at parting, was recommended to the Marquis the care of Sir Duncan Campbell, whom Montrose instantly ordered to be conveyed to a place of safety. [illegible] the same precaution for MacEagh, committing the charge, however, to a party of the Irish, with directions that he should be taken care of, but that no Highlander of any clan, should have access to him.

The Marquis then mounted a led horse, which had been one of his attendants, and rode on to the scene of his victory, which was more decisive than even his ardent hopes had anticipated. Of Argyle's gallant army of three thousand men, fully half fell in the battle, or in the flight. They had been chiefly driven back upon that part of the plain where the river forms an angle with the lake, so that there was no free opening either for retreat or escape. Several hundreds were forced into the lake and drowned. Of the survivors, about one half escaped by swimming the river, or by an early flight along the bank of the lake. The remainder threw themselves into the old Castle of Inverlochy; but being without either provisions or hopes of relief, they were obliged to surrender, on condition of being suffered to return to their homes in peace. Arms, ammunition, standards, and baggage, all became the prey of the conquerors.

This was the greatest disaster that ever befell the race of Diarmid, as the Campbells were called in the Highlands; it being generally remarked that they were as fortunate in the issue of their undertakings as they were sagacious in planning, and courageous in executing them. Of the number slain, nearly a hundred were Dunniewassels, or gentlemen claiming descent from known and respected houses. And in the opinion of many of the clan, even this heavy loss was exceeded by the disgrace arising from the pusillanimous conduct of their Chief, whose galley was the first vessel which the day was lost, and sailed down the lake with all the speed to which sails and oars could impel her.

CHAPTER XX.

Faint the din of battle bray'd,
Distant down the hollow wind;
War and terror fled before,
Wounds and death remain'd behind.—PERCY

MONTROSE'S splendid success over his powerful rival was not attained without some loss, though amounting to the tenth of what he inflicted. The obstinate valour of the Campbells cost the life of many brave men of the opposite party; and those were wounded, the Chief of whom was the young Earl of Menteith, who had commanded the centre. He was but slightly touched, however made rather a graceful than a terrible appearance when he presented to his general the standard of Argyle, which he had taken from the standard-bearer with his own hand, and slain him in single combat. Montrose dearly loved his noble kinsman, in whom there was conspicuous a flash of the generous romantic, disinterested chivalry of the old heroic times, entirely different from the sordid, calculating, selfish character, which the practice of entertaining mercenary troops had introduced into most parts of Europe, and of which degeneracy Scotland, which furnished soldiers of fortune for the service of almost every nation, had been contaminated with a more than usual share. Montrose, whose native spirit was congenial, although experience had taught him to avail himself of the motives of others, used with Menteith neither the language of praise nor of promise, but clasped him to his bosom as he exclaimed, "My gallant kinsman!" And by this burst of [illegible]

* In German, as in Latin, the original meaning of the word Ritter corresponding to Eques, is merely a horseman

s was Menteith thrilled with a warmer
ght, than if his praises had been recorded
f the action sent directly to the throne of s.

," he said, "my lord, now seems to re-
ch I can render any assistance; permit
after a duty of humanity—the Knight of s I am told, is our prisoner, and severely

l he deserves to be so," said Sir Dugald to came up to them at that moment with addition of acquired importance, "since ood horse at the time that I was offering ible quarter, which, I must needs say,
ore like an ignorant Highland caterar,
s sense enough to erect a sconce for the f his old barley-house of a castle, than
of worth and quality."

to condole with you then," said Lord
upon the loss of the brave Gustavus!"

, my lord," answered the soldier, with a Dieu et mon espée, as we said at al-College of Montrose. Better so than l like a cat or's pervish stone thrown at arth, which was like to be his fate at this saign lasted longer. But it has pleased ey" (making an inclination to Montrose)
his place by the gift of a noble steed,
e taken the freedom to name "Loyalty's memory of this celebrated occasion."

said the Marquis, "you'll find Loyalty's ce you call him so, practised in all the field,—but I grieve to put him to use, that in Scotland, loyalty is more frequently ith a halter than with a horse."

your Excellency is pleased to be facetious,
eward is as perfect as Gustavus in all his
d of a far finer figure. Marry! his social s cultivated, in respect he has kept full
r company."

ining his Eye," "now the General I hope,"
enteith. "For shame, Sir Dugald!"

l," answered the Knight gravely, "I am
mean any thing so utterly misbecoming.
verate is, that his Excellency, having the urse with his horse during his exercise
with his soldiers when training them,
d break either to every feat of war which practise and accordingly that this noble mirably managed. But as it is the inter-vate life that formeth the social cha-
to not apprehend that of the single soldier
polished by the conversation of the corrgeant, or that of Loyalty's Reward to uch dulcified, or ameliorated, by the so-Excellency's grooms, who bestow more icks, and thumps, than kindness or ca-
the animals entrusted to their charge;
my a generous quadruped, rendered as it thropic, manifests during the rest of his r desire to kick and bite his master, than honour him."

like an oracle," said Montrose. "Were ciency for the education of horses to be the Mareschal-College of Aberdeen, Sir
getty alone should fill the chair."

, being an ass," said Menteith, aside to
. "there would be some distant relation professor and the students."

, with your Excellency's permission," said de Knight, "I am going to pay my last remains of my old companion in arms."

the purpose of going through the ceremoment?" said the Marquis, who did not far Sir Dugald's enthusiasm might lead
sider, our brave fellows themselves will hasty burial."

xcellency will pardon me," said Dalgetty;
se is less romantic. I go to divide poor legacy with the fowls of heaven, leaving them, and reserving to myself his hide;
oken of affectionate remembrance, I pur-
n into a cassock and trowsers, after the ion, to be worn under my armour, in respect my nether garments are at present shamefully the worse of the wear. Alas! poor Gustavus, why didst thou not live at least one hour more, to have borne the honoured weight of knighthood upon thy loins!"

He was now turning away, when the Marquis called after him, "As you are not likely to be author participated in this act of kindness, Sir Dugald, to your old friend and companion, I trust," said the Marquis, "you will first assist me, and our principal friends, to discuss some of Argyle's good cheer, of which we have found abundance in the Castle."

"Most willingly, please your Excellency," said Sir Dugald; "as meat and mass never hinder work. Nor, indeed, am I afraid that the wolves or eagles will begin an onslaught on Gustavus to-night, in regard there is so much better cheer lying all around. But," added he, "as I am to meet two honourable knights of England, with others of the knightly degree in your lordship's army, I pray it may be explained to them, that now, and in future, I claim precedence over them all, in respect of my rank as a Baronet, dubbed in a field of stricken battle."

"The devil confound him!" said Montrose, speaking aside; "he has contrived to set the kiln on fire as fast as I put it out.—This is a point, Sir Dugald," said he, gravely addressing him, "which I shall reserve for his Majesty's express consideration; in my camp, all must be upon equality, like the Knights of the Round Table; and take their places as soldiers should, upon the principle of—first come, first served."

"Then I shall take care," said Menteith, apart to the Marquis, "that Don Dugald is not first in place to-day.—Sir Dugald," added he, raising his voice, "as you say your wardrobe is out of repair, had you not better go to the enemy's baggage yonder, over which there is a guard placed? I saw them take out an excellent buff suit, embroidered in front in silk and silver."

"Voto a Dios! as the Spaniard says," exclaimed the Major, "and some beggarly gilly may get it while I stand prating here!"

The prospect of booty having at once driven out of his head both Gustavus and the provant, he set spurs to Loyalty's Reward, and rode off through the field of battle.

"There goes the hound," said Menteith, "breaking the face, and trampling on the body, of many a better man than himself; and as eager on his sordid spoil as a vulture that stoops upon carrion. Yet this man the world calls a soldier—and you, my lord, select him as worthy of the honours of chivalry, if such there can at this day be termed. You have made the collar of knighthood the decoration of a mere blood-hound."

"What could I do?" said Montrose. "I had no half-picked bones to give him, and bribed in some manner he must be,—I cannot follow the chace alone. Besides, the dog has good qualities."

"If nature has given him such," said Menteith "habit has converted them into feelings of intense selfishness. He may be punctilious concerning his reputation, and brave in the execution of his duty, but it is only because without these qualities he cannot rise in the service;—nay, his very benevolence is selfish; he may defend his companion while he can keep his feet, but the instant he is down, Sir Dugald will be as ready to ease him of his purse, as he is to convert the skin of Gustavus into a buff jerkin."

"And yet, if all this were true, cousin," answered Montrose, "there is something convenient in commanding a soldier, upon whose motives and springs of action you can calculate to a mathematical certainty. A fine spirit like yours, my cousin, alive to a thousand sensations to which this man's is as impervious as his corslet,—it is for such that thy friend must feel, while he gives his advice." Then, suddenly changing his tone, he asked Menteith when he had seen Annot Lyle.

The young Earl coloured deeply, and answered, "Not since last evening,—excepting," he added, with hesitation, "for one moment, about half an hour before the battle began."

"My dear Menteith," said Montrose, very kindly

"were you one of the gay cavaliers of Whitehall, who are, in their way, as great self-seekers as our friend Dalgetty, should I need to plague you with inquiring into such an amourette as this? it would be an intrigue only to be laughed at. But this is the land of enchantment, where nets strong as steel are wrought out of ladies' tresses, and you are exactly the destined knight to be so fettered. This poor girl is exquisitely beautiful, and has talents formed to captivate your romantic temper. You cannot think of injuring her—you cannot think of marrying her!"

"My lord," replied Menteith, "you have repeatedly urged this jest, for so I trust it is meant, somewhat beyond bounds. Annot Lyle is of unknown birth,—a captive,—the daughter, probably, of some obscure outlaw; a dependant on the hospitality of the M'Aulays."

"Do not be angry, Menteith," said the Marquis, interrupting him; "you love the classics, though not educated at Mareschal-College; and you may remember how many gallant hearts captive beauty has subdued:—

> Movit Agacen, Telamone natum,
> Forma captivæ dominam Tecmessæ.

In a word, I am seriously anxious about this—I should not have time, perhaps," he added very gravely, "to trouble you with my lectures on the subject, were your feelings, and those of Annot, alone interested; but you have a dangerous rival in Allan M'Aulay; and there is no knowing to what extent he may carry his resentment. It is my duty to tell you that the King's service may be much prejudiced by dissensions betwixt you."

"My lord," said Menteith, "I know what you mean is kind and friendly; I hope you will be satisfied when I assure you, that Allan M'Aulay and I have discussed this circumstance; and that I have explained to him, that as it is utterly remote from my character to entertain dishonourable views concerning this unprotected female; so, on the other hand, the obscurity of her birth prevents my thinking of her upon other terms. I will not dissemble from your lordship, what I have not disguised from M'Aulay,—that if Annot Lyle were born a lady, she should share my name and rank; as matters stand, it is impossible. This explanation, I trust, will satisfy your lordship, as it has satisfied a less reasonable person."

Montrose shrugged his shoulders. "And, like true champions in romance," he said, "you have agreed, that you are both to worship the same mistress, as idolaters do the same image, and that neither shall extend his pretensions farther?"

"I did not go so far, my lord," answered Menteith,—"I only said in the present circumstances,—and there is no prospect of their being changed,—I could, in duty to myself and family, stand in no relation to Annot Lyle, but as that of friend or brother—But your lordship must excuse me; I have," said he, looking at his arm, round which he had tied his handkerchief, "a slight hurt to attend to."

"A wound?" said Montrose, anxiously; "let me see it.—Alas!" he said, "I should have heard nothing of this had I not ventured to tent and sound another more secret and more rankling one. Menteith, I am sorry for you—I too have known—But what avails it to awake sorrows which have long slumbered!"

So saying, he shook hands with his noble kinsman, and walked into the castle.

Annot Lyle, as was not unusual for females in the Highlands, was possessed of a slight degree of medical and even surgical skill. It may readily be believed, that the profession of surgery, or medicine, as a separate art, was unknown; and the few rude rules which they observed were intrusted to women, or to the aged, whom constant casualties afforded too much opportunity of acquiring experience. The care and attention, accordingly, of Annot Lyle, her attendants, and others acting under her direction, had made her services extremely useful during this wild campaign. And most readily had these services been rendered to friend and foe, wherever they could be most useful. She was now in an apartment of the castle, anxiously superintending the preparation of vulnerary herbs, to be applied to the wounded; receiving reports from different females respecting those under their separate charge, and distributing what means she had for their relief, when Allan M'Aulay suddenly entered the apartment. She started, for she had heard that he had left the camp upon distant mission; and, however accustomed she was to the gloom of his countenance, it seemed at present to have even a darker shade than usual. He stood before her perfectly silent, and she felt the necessity of being the first to speak.

"I thought," she said, with some effort, "you had already set out."

"My companion awaits me," said Allan; "I go instantly."

Yet still he stood before her, and held her by the arm, with a pressure which, though insufficient to give her pain, made her sensible of his great personal strength, his hand closing on her like the gripe of a manacle.

"Shall I take the harp?" she said, in a timid voice; "is—is the shadow falling upon you?"

Instead of replying, he led her to the window of the apartment, which commanded a view of the field of the slain, with all its horrors. It was thick spread with dead and wounded, and the spoilers were busy rearing the clothes from the victims of war and feudal ambition, with as much indifference as if they had not been of the same species, and themselves exposed, perhaps to-morrow, to the same fate.

"Does the sight please you?" said M'Aulay.

"It is hideous!" said Annot, covering her eyes with her hands; "how can you bid me look upon it?"

"You must be inured to it," said he, "if you remain with this destined host—you will soon have to search such a field for my brother's corpse—for Menteith's—for mine—but that will be a more indifferent task—You do not love me!"

"This is the first time you have taxed me with unkindness," said Annot weeping. "You are my brother—my preserver—my protector—and can I then but love you?—But your hour of darkness is approaching, let me fetch my harp"——

"Remain," said Allan, still holding her fast; "be my visions from heaven or hell, or from the middle sphere of disembodied spirits—or be they, as the Saxons hold, but the delusions of an overheated fancy, they do not now influence me; I speak the language of the natural, of the visible world.—You love not me, Annot—you love Menteith—by him you are beloved again, and Allan is no more to you than one of the corpses which encumber yonder heath."

It cannot be supposed that this strange speech conveyed any new information to her who was thus addressed. No woman ever lived who could not, in the same circumstances, have discerned long since the state of her lover's mind. But by thus suddenly tearing off the veil, thin as it was, Allan prepared her to expect consequences violent in proportion to the enthusiasm of his character. She made an effort to repel the charge he had stated.

"You forget," she said, "your own worth and nobleness when you insult so very helpless a being, and one whom fate has thrown so totally into your power. You know who and what I am, and how impossible it is that Menteith or you can use language of affection to me, beyond that of friendship. You know from what unhappy race I have too probably derived my existence."

"I will not believe it," said Allan, impetuously; "never flowed crystal drop from a polluted spring."

"Yet the very doubt," pleaded Annot, "should make you forbear to use this language to me."

"I know," said M'Aulay, "it places a bar between us—but I know also that it divides you not so inseparably from Menteith.—Hear me, my beloved Annot!—leave this scene of terrors and danger—go with me to Kintail—I will place you in the house of the noble Lady of Seaforth—or you shall be removed in safety to Icolmkill, where some women yet devote themselves to the worship of God, after the custom of our ancestors."

"You consider not what you ask of me," replied Annot; "to undertake such a journey under your sole guardianship, were to show me less scrupulous than maiden ought. I will remain here, Allan—here un

tion of the noble Montrose; and when next approach the Lowlands, I will con-oper means to relieve you of one, who ws not how, become an object of dislike

l as if uncertain whether to give way to th her distress, or to anger at her resist-

he said, "you know too well how little apply to my feelings towards you—but rself of your power and you rejoice in , as removing a spy upon your inter-Menteith. But beware both of you," he tern tone; "for when was it ever heard rv was offered to Allan M'Aulay, for cted not tenfold vengeance?"

he pressed her arm forcibly, pulled the his brows, and strode out of the apart-

CHAPTER XXI.

After you're gone,
spunted with my heart, and search'd rr'd it so—Alas! I found it love.
rom lust, for could I but have lived
ee of you, I had had my end.—PHILASTER.

E had now to contemplate the terrible llan M'Aulay's declaration of love and made to open around her. It seemed tottering on the very brink of destruc-s at once deprived of every refuge, and of sistance. She had long been conscious d Menteith dearer than a brother; in-ould it be otherwise, considering their cy,—the personal merits of the young his assiduous attentions,—and his in-ority in gentleness of disposition, and ners, over the race of rude warriors with ed? But her affection was of that quiet, ative character, which sought rather n are in the happiness of the beloved formed more presumptuous or daring tle Gaelic song, in which she expressed has been translated by the ingenious and rew M'Donald; and we willingly tran-es:—

o I, like me, in life's low vale,
thee how blest, that but I'd share;
ee I'd fly wherever gale
waft, or bounding galley bear.
ed by severe decree,
fferent must our fortunes prove;
ne be joy—enough for me
op and pray for him I love.

gs this foolish heart must feel,
hope shall be for ever flown,
n murmur shall reveal
lfish murmurs ever own.
I through life's weary years,
pale drooping mourner move,
can think, my secret tears
wound the heart of him I love.

s declaration of Allan had destroyed the n which she had formed, of nursing in nsive tenderness, without seeking any l. Long before this, she had dreaded ch as gratitude, and a sense that he soft-s her a temper so haughty and so vio-ermit her to do; but now she regarded nalloyed terror, which a perfect know-disposition, and of his preceding history, orized her to entertain. Whatever was ects the nobleness of his disposition, he en known to resist the wilfulness of pas-lked in the horse, and in the country of ke a tamed lion, whom no one dared to st they should awaken his natural vehe-sion. So many years had elapsed since ienced contradiction, or even expostula-bably nothing but the strong good sense, l points, his mysticism excepted, formed f his character, prevented his proving an nd terror to the whole neighbourhood. ad no time to dwell upon her fears, being y the entrance of Sir Dugald Dalgetty.

It may be well supposed, that the scenes in which this person had passed his former life, had not much qualified him to shine in female society. He himself felt a sort of consciousness that the language of the barrack, guard-room, and parade, was not proper to entertain ladies. The only peaceful part of his life had been spent at Mareschal-College, Aberdeen; and he had forgot the little he had learned there, except the arts of darning his own hose, and dispatching his commons with unusual celerity, both which had since been kept in good exercise by the necessity of frequent practice. Still it was from an imperfect recollection of what he had acquired during this pacific period, that he drew his sources of conversation when in company with women; in other words, his language became pedantic when it ceased to be military.

"Mistress Annot Lyle," said he, upon the present occasion, "I am just now like the half-pike, or spontoon of Achilles, one end of which could wound, and the other cure—a property belonging neither to Spanish pike, brown-bill, partizan, halberd, Lochaber-axe, or indeed any other modern staff-weapon whatever."

This compliment he repeated twice; but as Annot scarce heard him the first time, and did not comprehend him the second, he was obliged to explain.

"I mean," he said, "Mistress Annot Lyle, that having been the means of an honourable knight receiving a severe wound in this day's conflict—he having pistolled, somewhat against the law of arms, my horse, which was named after the immortal king of Sweden—I am desirous of procuring him such solacement as you, madam, can supply, you being like the heathen god Esculapius," (meaning possibly Apollo,) "skilful not only in song and in music, but in the more noble art of chirurgery—opiferque per orbem dicor."

"If you would have the goodness to explain," said Annot, too sick at heart to be amused by Sir Dugald's airs of pedantic gallantry.

"That, madam," replied the Knight, "may not be so easy, as I am out of the habit of construing—but we shall try. Dicor, supply ego—I am called.—Opifer? opifer?—I remember signifer and furcifer—but I believe opifer stands in this place for M. D. that is, Doctor of Physic."

"This is a busy day with us all," said Annot; "will you say at once what you want with me?"

"Merely," replied Sir Dugald, "that you will visit my brother knight, and let your maiden bring some medicaments for his wound, which threatens to be what the learned call a damnum fatale."

Annot Lyle never lingered in the cause of humanity. She informed herself hastily of the nature of the injury, and interesting herself for the dignified old Chief whom she had seen at Darnlinvarach, and whose presence had so much struck her, she hastened to lose the sense of her own sorrow for a time, in the attempt to be useful to another.

Sir Dugald with great form ushered Annot Lyle to the chamber of her patient, in which, to her surprise, she found Lord Menteith. She could not help blushing deeply at the meeting, but, to hide her confusion, proceeded instantly to examine the wound of the Knight of Ardenvohr, and easily satisfied herself that it was beyond her skill to cure it. As for Sir Dugald, he returned to a large out-house, on the floor of which, among other wounded men, was deposited the person of Ranald of the Mist.

"Mine old friend," said the Knight, "as I told you before, I would willingly do any thing to please you, in return for the wound you have received while under my safe-conduct. I have, therefore, according to your earnest request, sent Mrs. Annot Lyle to attend upon the wound of the Knight of Ardenvohr, though wherein her doing so should benefit you, I cannot imagine.—I think you once spoke of some blood relationship between them; but a soldado, in command and charge like me, has other things to trouble his head with than Highland genealogies."

And indeed, to do the worthy Major justice, he never inquired after, listened to, or recollected the business of other people, unless it either related to the art military, or was somehow or other connected with his own interest, in either of which cases his memory was very tenacious.

"And now, my good friend of the Mist," said he, "can you tell me what has become of your hopeful grandson, as I have not seen him since he assisted me to disarm after the action, a negligence which deserveth the strapado?"

"He is not far from hence," said the wounded outlaw—"lift not your hand upon him, for he is man enough to pay a yard of leathern scourge with a foot of tempered steel."

"A most improper vaunt," said Sir Dugald; "but I owe you some favours, Ranald, and therefore shall let it pass."

"And if you think you owe me any thing," said the outlaw, "it is in your power to requite me by granting me a boon."

"Friend Ranald," answered Dalgetty, "I have read of these boons in silly story-books, whereby simple knights were drawn into engagements to their great prejudice; wherefore, Ranald, the more prudent knights of this day never promise any thing until they know that they may keep their word anent the premises, without any displeasure or incommodement to themselves. It may be, you would have me engage the female chirurgeon to visit your wound; though you ought to consider, Ranald, that the uncleanness of the place where you are deposited may somewhat soil the gayety of her garments, concerning the preservation of which, you may have observed, women are apt to be inordinately solicitous. I lost the favour of the lady of the Grand Pensionary of Amsterdam, by touching with the sole of my boot the train of her black velvet gown, which I mistook for a foot-cloth, it being half the room distant from her person."

"It is not to bring Annot Lyle hither," answered MacEagh, "but to transport me into the room where she is in attendance upon the Knight of Ardenvohr. Somewhat I have to say of the last consequence to them both."

"It is something out of the order of due precedence," said Dalgetty, "to carry a wounded outlaw into the presence of a knight; knighthood having been of yore, and being, in some respects, still, the highest military grade, independent always of commissioned officers, who rank according to their patents; nevertheless, as your boon, as you call it, is so slight, I shall not deny compliance with the same." So saying, he ordered three files of men to transport MacEagh on their shoulders to Sir Duncan Campbell's apartment, and he himself hastened before to announce the cause of his being brought thither. But such was the activity of the soldiers employed, that they followed him close at the heels, and, entering with their ghastly burden, laid MacEagh on the floor of the apartment. His features, naturally wild, were now distorted by pain; his hands and scanty garments stained with his own blood, and those of others, which no kind hand had wiped away, although the wound in his side had been secured by a bandage.

"Are you," he said, raising his head painfully towards the couch where lay stretched his late antagonist, "he whom men call the Knight of Ardenvohr?"

"The same," answered Sir Duncan. "what would you with one whose hours are now numbered?"

"My hours are reduced to minutes," said the outlaw; "the more grace, if I bestow them in the service of one, whose hand has ever been against me, as mine has been raised higher against him."

"Thine higher against me!—Crushed worm!" said the Knight, looking down on his miserable adversary.

"Yes," answered the outlaw, in a firm voice, "my arm hath been highest. In the deadly contest betwixt us, the wounds I have dealt have been deepest, though thine have neither been idle nor unfelt.—I am Ranald MacEagh—I am Ranald of the Mist—the night that I gave thy castle to the winds in one huge blaze of fire, is now matched with the day in which you have fallen under the sword of my fathers.—Remember the injuries thou hast done our tribe—never were such inflicted, save by one, beside thee. He, th fated and secure against our vengeance—a s will show."

"My Lord Menteith," said Sir Duncan himself out of his bed, "this is a proclaime at once the enemy of King and Parliamen and man—one of the outlawed banditti of t alike the enemy of your house, of the M'Au of mine. I trust you will not suffer moment are perhaps my last, to be embittered by h rous triumph."

"He shall have the treatment he mer Menteith; "let him be instantly removed."

Sir Dugald here interposed, and spoke of services as a guide, and his own pledge for h but the high harsh tones of the outlaw dro voice.

"No," said he, "be rack and gibbet the me wither between heaven and earth, and hawks and eagles of Ben-Nevis; and so haughty Knight, and this triumphant Tha learn the secret I alone can impart: a secr would make Ardenvohr's heart leap with joy in the death agony, and which the Earl of would purchase at the price of his broad es Come hith'r, Annot Lyle," he said, raising with unexpected strength; "fear not the sig to whom thou hast clung in infancy. Tell th men, who disdain thee as the issue of min race, that thou art no blood of ours, no da the race of the Mist, but born in halls as lo cradled on couch as soft, as ever soothed th their proudest paramours."

"In the name of God," said Menteith, with emotion, "if you know aught of the bu lady, do thy conscience the justice to disbur the secret before departing from this world!

"And bless my enemies with my dying said MacEagh, looking at him malignantly are the maxims your priests preach—but towards whom, do you practise them? Let first the worth of my secret ere I part What would you give, Knight of Ardenvohr that your superstitious fasts have been that there still remains a descendant of you —I pause for an answer—without it, I spea word more."

"I could," said Sir Duncan, his voice between the emotions of doubt, hatred, an —"I could—but that I know thy race ar Great Enemy, liars and murderers from t ning—but could it be true that to blot m almost forgive thee the injuries thou hast d

"Hear it!" said Ranald; "he hath wage for a son of Diarmid—And you, gentle T report of the camp says, that you would purc life and lands the tidings that Annot Ly daughter of proscription, but of a race nob estimation as your own—Well—It is for no you—The time has been that I would have ed this secret against liberty; I am now b for what is dearer than liberty or life—Ann the youngest, the sole surviving child of t of Ardenvohr, who alone was saved when halls besides was given to blood and ashes.

"Can this man speak truth?" said An scarce knowing what she said—"or is t strange delusion!"

"Maiden," replied Ranald, "hadst th longer with us, thou wouldst have better know how to distinguish the accents of t that Saxon lord, and to the Knight of Ard will yield such proofs of what I have spoke credulity shall stand convinced. Meantim draw—I loved thine infancy, I hate not th no eye hates the rose in its blossom, t groweth upon a thorn, and for thee only d thing regret what is soon to follow. Bu would avenge him of his foe must not re the guiltless be engaged in the ruin."

"He advises well, Annot," said Lord "in God's name retire! if—if there be augh your meeting with Sir Duncan must be mo red for both your sakes."

'I will not part from my father, if I have found r?" said Annot—"I will not part from him under umstances so terrible."

And a father you shall ever find in me," murred Sir Duncan.

Then," said Menteith, "I will have MacEagh reved into an adjacent apartment, and will collect evidence of his tale myself. Sir Dugald Dalgetty l give me his attendance and assistance."

With pleasure, my lord," answered Sir Dugald. I will be your confessor, or assessor—either or h. No one can be so fit, for I had heard the ole story a month ago at Inverary castle—but laughts like that of Ardenvohr confuse each other ny memory, which is besides occupied with mat- of more importance."

pon hearing this frank declaration, which was de as they left the apartment with the wounded n, Lord Menteith darted upon Dalgetty a look of reme anger and disdain, to which the self-concert the worthy commander rendered him totally insible.

CHAPTER XXII.

I am as free as nature first made man,
Ere the base laws of servitude began,
When wild in woods the noble savage ran.
Conquest of Granada.

The Earl of Menteith, as he had undertaken, so proceeded to investigate more closely the story d by Ranald of the Mist, which was corroborated the examination of his two followers, who had isted in the capacity of guides. These declarations carefully compared with such circumstances conaing the destruction of his castle and family as Duncan Campbell was able to supply; and it may supposed he had forgotten nothing relating to an at of such terrific importance. It was of the last sequence to prove that this was no invention of outlaw's, for the purpose of passing an impostor he child and heiress of Ardenvohr.

erhaps Menteith, so much interested in believing tale, was not altogether the fittest person to be usted with the investigation of its truth; but the minations of the Children of the Mist were simple, urate, and in all respects consistent with each er. A personal mark was referred to, which was own to have been borne by the infant child of Sir ncan, and which appeared upon the left shoulder Annot Lyle. It was also well remembered, that en the miserable relics of the other children had n collected, those of the infant had no where been nd. Other circumstances of evidence, which it is ecessary to quote, brought the fullest conviction only to Menteith, but to the unprejudiced mind Montrose, that in Annot Lyle, an humble depen-t, distinguished only by beauty and talent, they re in future to respect the heiress of Ardenvohr.

While Menteith hastened to communicate the result these inquiries to the persons most interested, the law demanded to speak with his grand-child, whom usually called his son. "He would be found," he id, "in the outer apartment, in which he himself d been originally deposited."

Accordingly, the young savage, after a close search, s found lurking in a corner, coiled up among some ten straw, and brought to his grandsire.

Kenneth," said the old outlaw, "hear the last rds of the sire of thy father. A Saxon soldier, and an of the Red-hand, left this camp within these hours, to travel to the country of Caberfae. Purhim as the bloodhound pursues the hurt deer—ss the lake—climb the mountain—thread the forest rry not until you join them;" and then the countnance of the lad darkened as his grandfather spoke, d he laid his hand upon a knife which stuck in the ge of leather that confined his scanty plaid. No!" said the old man; "it is not by thy hand he n fall. They will ask the news from the camp—y to them that Annot Lyle of the Harp is discovered be the daughter of Duncan of Ardenvohr; that the ine of Menteith is to wed her before the priest; d that you are sent to bid guests to the bridal. Tarry not their answer, but vanish like the lightning when the black cloud swallows it.—And now depart, beloved son of my best beloved! I shall never more see thy face, nor hear the light sound of thy foot step—yet tarry an instant and hear my last charge. Remember the fate of our race, and quit not the ancient manners of the Children of the Mist. We are now a struggling handful, driven from every vale by the sword of every clan, who rule in the possessions where their forefathers hewed the wood and drew the water for ours. But in the thicket of the wilderness, and in the mist of the mountain, Kenneth, son of Eracht, keep thou unsoiled the freedom which I leave thee as a birthright. Barter it not neither for the rich garment, nor for the stone-roof, nor for the covered board, nor for the couch of down—on the rock or in the valley, in abundance or in famine—in the leafy summer, and in the days of the iron winter—Son of the Mist! be free as thy forefathers. Own no lord—receive no law—take no hire—give no stipend—build no hut—enclose no pasture—sow no grain;—let the deer of the mountain be thy flocks and herds—if these fail thee, prey upon the goods of our oppressors—of the Saxons, and of such Gael as are Saxons in their souls, valuing herds and flocks more than honour and freedom. Well for us that they do so—it affords the broader scope for our revenge. Remember those who have done kindness to our race, and pay their services with thy blood, should the hour require it. If a MacIan shall come to thee with the head of the king's son in his hand, shelter him, though the avenging army of the father were behind him; for in Glencoe and Ardnamurchan, we have dwelt in peace in the years that have gone by. The sons of Diarmid—the race of Darnlinvarach—the riders of Menteith—my curse on thy head, Child of the Mist if thou spare one of those names, when the time shall offer for cutting them off! and it will come anon, for their own swords shall devour each other, and those who are scattered shall fly to the Mist, and perish by its Children. Once more, begone—shake the dust from thy feet against the habitations of men, whether banded together for peace or for war. Farewell, beloved! and mayest thou die like thy forefathers, ere infirmity, disease, or age, shall break thy spirit—Begone!—begone!—live free—requite kindness—avenge the injuries of thy race!"

The young savage stooped, and kissed the brow of his dying parent, but accustomed from infancy to suppress every exterior sign of emotion, he parted without tear or adieu, and was soon far beyond the limits of Montrose's camp.

Sir Dugald Dalgetty, who was present during the latter part of this scene, was very little edified by the conduct of MacEagh upon the occasion. "I cannot think, my friend Ranald," said he, "that you are in the best possible road for a dying man. Storms, onslaughts, massacres, the burning of suburbs, are indeed a soldier's daily work, and are justified by the necessity of the case, seeing that they are done in the course of duty; for burning of suburbs, in particular, it may be said that they are traitors, and cut-throats to all fortified towns. Hence it is plain, that a soldier is a profession peculiarly favoured by Heaven, seeing that we may hope for salvation, although we daily commit actions of so great violence. But then, Ranald, in all the services of Europe, it is the custom of the dying soldier not to vaunt him of such doings, or to recommend them to his fellows; but, on the contrary, to express contrition for the same, and to repeat, or have repeated to him, some comfortable prayer; which, if you please, I will intercede with his Excellency's chaplain to prefer on your account. It is otherwise no point of my duty to put you in mind of those things; only it may be for the case of your conscience to depart more like a Christian, and less like a Turk, than you seem to be in a fair way of doing."

The only answer of the dying man—(for as such Ranald MacEagh might now be considered)—was a request to be raised to such a position that he might obtain a view from the window of the castle. The deep frost mist, which had long settled upon the top of the mountains, was now rolling down each rugged glen and gully, where the craggy ridges showed their black and irregular outline, like desert islands rising above the ocean of vapour. "Spirit of the Mist!" said Ranald MacEagh, "called by our race our father, and our preserver—receive into thy tabernacle of clouds, when this pang is over, him whom in life thou hast so often sheltered." So saying, he sunk back into the arms of those who upheld him, spoke no farther word, but turned his face to the wall for a short space.

"I believe," said Dalgetty, "my friend Ranald will be found in his heart to be little better than a heathen." And he renewed his proposal to procure him the assistance of Dr. Wisheart, Montrose's military chaplain; "a man," said Sir Dugald, "very clever in his exercise, and who will do execution on your sins in less time than I could smoke a pipe of tobacco."

"Saxon," said the dying man, "speak to me no more of thy priest—I die contented. Hadst thou ever an enemy against whom weapons were of no avail—whom the ball missed, and against whom the arrow shivered, and whose bare skin was as impenetrable to sword and dirk as thy steel garment?—Heardst thou ever of such a foe?"

"Very frequently, when I served in Germany," replied Sir Dugald. "There was such a fellow at Ingolstadt; he was proof both against lead and steel. The soldiers killed him with the buts of their muskets."

"This impassible foe," said Ranald, without regarding the Major's interruption, "who has the blood dearest to me upon his hands—to this man I have now bequeathed agony of mind, jealousy, despair, and sudden death,—or a life more miserable than death itself. Such shall be the lot of Allan of the Red-hand, when he learns that Annot weds Menteith; and I ask no more than the certainty that it is so, to sweeten my own bloody end by his hand."

"If that be the case," said the Major, "there's no more to be said; but I shall take care as few people see you as possible, for I cannot think your mode of departure can be at all creditable or exemplary to a Christian army." So saying, he left the apartment, and the son of the Mist soon after breathed his last.

Menteith, in the meanwhile, leaving the new-found relations to their mutual feelings of mingled emotion, was eagerly discussing with Montrose the consequences of this discovery. "I should now see," said the Marquis, "even had I not before observed it, that your interest in this discovery, my dear Menteith, has no small reference to your own happiness. You love this new-found lady,—your affection is returned. In point of birth, no exceptions can be made; in every other respect, her advantages are equal to those which you yourself possess—think, however, a moment. Sir Duncan is a fanatic—Presbyterian, at least—in arms against the King; he is only with us in the quality of a prisoner, and we are, I fear, but at the commencement of a long civil war. Is this a time, think you, Mentieth, for you to make proposals for his heiress? Or what chance is there that he will now listen to it?"

Passion, an ingenious, as well as an eloquent advocate, supplied the young nobleman with a thousand answers to these objections. He reminded Montrose that the Knight of Ardenvohr was neither a bigot in politics nor religion. He urged his own known and proved zeal for the royal cause, and hinted that its influence might be extended and strengthened by his wedding the heiress of Ardenvohr. He pleaded the dangerous state of Sir Duncan's wound, the risk which must be run by suffering the young lady to be carried into the country of the Campbells, where, in case of her father's death, or continued indisposition, she must necessarily be placed under the guardianship of Argyle, an event fatal to his (Menteith's) hopes, unless he could stoop to purchase his favour by abandoning the King's party.

Montrose allowed the force of these arguments, and owned, although the matter was attended with difficulty, yet it seemed consistent with the King's service that it should be concluded as speedily as possible.

"I could wish [illegible]

one way or another, and that this fair l removed from our camp before the return c land Achilles, Allan M'Aulay.—I fear son in that quarter, Menteith—and I believe best that Sir Duncan be dismissed on his that you accompany him and his daug escort. The journey can be made chief so will not greatly incommode his wounc own, my friend, will be an honourable ex absence of some time from my camp."

"Never!" said Menteith. "Were I t very hope that has so lately dawned upo will I leave your Excellency's camp wh standard is displayed. I should deser trifling scratch should gangrene and c sword-arm, were I capable of holding it for absence at this crisis of the King's af

"On this, then, you are determined?" trose.

"As fixed as Ben-Nevis," said the y man.

"You must, then," said Montrose, " in seeking an explanation with the Knig vohr. If this prove favourable, I will with the elder M'Aulay, and we will devi employ his brother at a distance from th he shall be reconciled to his present disa Would to God some vision would descer imagination fair enough to obliterate t Annot Lyle! That perhaps you think Menteith?—Well, each to his service; y Cupid, and I to that of Mars."

They parted, and in pursuance of the ranged, Menteith, early on the ensuir sought a private interview with the woun of Ardenvohr, and communicated to him the hand of his daughter. Of their mu ment Sir Duncan was aware, but he was for so early a declaration on the part He said, at first, that he had already, dulged too much in feelings of personal a time when his clan had sustained so and humiliation, and that he was unw fore, farther to consider the advancemen house at a period so calamitous. On the suit of the noble lover, he requested a f deliberate and consult with his daugh question so highly important.

The result of this interview and deli favourable to Menteith. Sir Duncan C came fully sensible that the happiness found daughter depended upon a union wi and unless such were now formed, he s gyle would throw a thousand obstacles of a match in every respect acceptable Menteith's private character was so ex such was the rank and consideration du tune and family, that they outbalanced, can's opinion, the difference in their politi Nor could he have resolved, perhaps, h opinion of the match been less favourabl an opportunity of indulging the new-fo his hopes. There was, besides, a feel which dictated his determination. To Heiress of Ardenvohr, to the world as o been educated a poor dependant and mu family of Darnlinvarach, had something i humiliating. To introduce her as the bet or wedded wife, of the Earl of Menteit attachment formed during her obscurity, rant to the world that she had at all worthy of the rank to which she was ele

It was under the influence of these co that Sir Duncan Campbell announced his consent that they should be married i of the Castle, by Montrose's chaplain, vately as possible. But when Montrose s up from Inverlochy, for which orders w in the course of a very few days, it was the young Countess should depart with h his Castle, and remain there until the cir of the nation permitted Menteith to honour from his present military employ ıt permit the maidenly scruples of his daugh- elay its execution; and it was therefore that the bridal should take place the next being the second after the battle.

CHAPTER XXIII.

maid—my blue-eyed maid, he bore away,
to the toils of many a bloody day.—Iliad.

ı necessary for many reasons, that Angus so long the kind protector of Annot Lyle, ı made acquainted with the change in the of his late protegée; and Montrose, as he rtaken, communicated to him these remark- ts. With the careless and cheerful indiffer- is character, he expressed much more joy ıder at Annot's good fortune: had no doubt she would merit it, and as she had always d in loyal principles, would convey the tate of her grim fanatical father to some llow who loved the king. "I should have ion that my brother Allan should try his added he, "notwithstanding that Sir Dun- pbell was the only man who ever charged arach with inhospitality. Annot Lyle could harm Allan out of the sullens, and who hether matrimony might not make him an of this world?"

ıe hastened to interrupt the progress of his ding, by informing him that the lady was ooed and won, and, with her father's ap- , was almost immediately to be wedded to an, the Earl of Menteith; and that in testi- the high respect due to M'Aulay, so long protector, he was now to request his pre- the ceremony. M'Aulay looked very grave limation, and drew up his person with the who thought that he had been neglected.

nceived," he said, "that his uniform kind of the young lady, while so many years roof, required something more upon such on than a bare compliment of ceremony. ," he thought, "without arrogance, have to have been consulted. He wished his of Menteith well, no man could wish him t he must say he thought he had been has- matter. Allan's sentiments towards the y had been pretty well understood, and he, could not see why the superior pretensions had upon her gratitude should have been without at least undergoing some previous n."

ıe seeing too well where all this pointed, M'Aulay to be reasonable, and to consider ability there was that the Knight of Arden- d be brought to confer the hand of his sole on Allan, whose undeniable excellent qual- mingled with others, by which they were d in a manner that made all tremble who d him.

rd," said Angus M'Aulay, "my brother Al- a God made us all, faults as well as merits; he best and bravest man of your army, be who he may, and therefore ill deserved that ess should have been so little consulted by llancy—by his own near kinsman—and by son who owes all to him and to his family."

ıe in vain endeavoured to place the subject nt view; this was the point in which An- termined to regard it, and he was a man ibre of understanding, who is incapable of rinced when he has once adopted a preju- ıtrose now assumed a higher tone, and call- ngus to take care how he nourished any which might be prejudicial to his Majesty's He pointed out to him, that he was pecu- ous that Allan's efforts should not be in- in the course of his present mission; "a he said, "highly honourable for himself, to prove most advantageous to the King's e expected his brother would hold no com- n with him upon other subjects, nor stir up of dissension, which might divert his mind ıtter of such importance."

Angus answered somewhat sulkily, that "he was no make-bate, or stirrer up of quarrels; he would rather be a peace-maker. His brother knew as well as most men how to resent his own quarrels—as for Allan's mode of receiving information, it was generally believed he had other sources than those of ordinary couriers. He should not be surprised if they saw him sooner than they expected."

A promise that he would not interfere, was the farthest to which Montrose could bring this man, thoroughly good-tempered as he was on all occasions, save when his pride, interest, or prejudices, were interfered with. And at this point the Marquis was fain to leave the matter for the present.

A more willing guest at the bridal ceremony, certainly a more willing attendant at the marriage feast, was to be expected in Sir Dugald Dalgetty, whom Montrose resolved to invite, as having been a confidant to the circumstances which preceded it. But even Sir Dugald hesitated, looked on the elbows of his doublet, and the knees of his leather breeches, and mumbled out a sort of reluctant acquiescence in the invitation, providing he should find it possible, after consulting with the noble bridegroom. Montrose was somewhat surprised, but scorning to testify displeasure, he left Sir Dugald to pursue his own course.

This carried him instantly to the chamber of the bridegroom, who, amidst the scanty wardrobe which his camp-equipage afforded, was seeking for such articles as might appear to the best advantage upon the approaching occasion. Sir Dugald entered, and paid his compliments, with a very grave face, upon his approaching happiness, which, he said, "he was very sorry he was prevented from witnessing."

"In plain truth," said he, "I should but disgrace the ceremony, seeing that I lack a bridal garment. Rents, and open seams, and tatters at elbows in the apparel of the assistants, might presage a similar solution of continuity in your matrimonial happiness—and to say truth, my lord, you yourself must partly have the blame of this disappointment, in respect you sent me upon a fool's errand to get a buff-coat out of the booty taken by the Camerons, whereas you might as well have sent me to fetch a pound of fresh butter out of a black dog's throat. I had no answer, my lord, but brandished dirks and broadswords, and a sort of growling and jabbering in what they call their language. For my part, I believe these Highlanders to be no better than absolute pagans, and have been much scandalized by the manner in which my acquaintance, Ranald MacEagh, was pleased to beat his final march, a little while since."

In Menteith's state of mind, disposed to be pleased with every thing, and every body, the grave complaint of Sir Dugald furnished additional amusement. He requested his acceptance of a very handsome buff-dress which was lying on the floor. "I had intended it," he said, "for my own bridal-garment, as being the least formidable of my warlike equipments, and I have here no peaceful dress."

Sir Dugald made the necessary apologies—would not by any means deprive—and so forth, until it happily occurred to him that it was much more according to military rule that the Earl should be married in his back and breast-pieces, which dress he had seen the bridegroom wear at the union of Prince Leo of Wittlesbach with the youngest daughter of old George Frederick, of Saxony, under the auspices of the gallant Gustavus Adolphus, the Lion of the North, and so forth. The good-natured young Earl laughed, and acquiesced; and thus having secured at least one merry face at his bridal, he put on a light and ornamented cuirass, concealed partly by a velvet coat, and partly by a broad blue silk scarf, which he wore over his shoulder, agreeably to his rank, and the fashion of the times.

Every thing was now arranged; and it had been settled, that, according to the custom of the country, the bride and bridegroom should not again meet until they were before the altar. The hour had already struck that summoned the bridegroom thither, and he only waited in a small anteroom adjacent to the chapel, for the Marquis, who condescended to act as bride's-man upon the occasion. Business relating to the army having suddenly required the Marquis's instant attention, Menteith waited his return, it may be supposed, in some impatience; and when he heard the door of the apartment open, he said, laughing, You are late upon parade."

"You will find I am too early," said Allan M'Aulay, who burst into the apartment. "Draw, Menteith, and defend yourself like a man, or die like a dog!"

"You are mad, Allan!" answered Menteith, astonished alike at his sudden appearance, and at the unutterable fury of his demeanour. His cheeks were livid—his eyes started from their sockets—his lips were covered with foam, and his gestures were those of a demoniac.

"You lie, traitor!" was his frantic reply—"you lie in that, as you lie in all you have said to me. Your life is a lie!"

"Did I not speak my thoughts when I called you mad," said Menteith, indignantly, "your own life were a brief one. In what do you charge me with deceiving you?"

"You told me," answered M'Aulay, "that you would not marry Annot Lyle!--False traitor!—she now waits you at the altar."

"It is you who speak false," retorted Menteith. "I told you the obscurity of her birth was the only bar to our union--that is now removed; and whom do you think yourself, that I should yield up my pretensions in your favour?"

"Draw then," said M'Aulay; "we understand each other."

"Not now," said Menteith, "and not here. Allan, you know me well—wait till to-morrow, and you shall have fighting enough."

"This hour—this instant—or never," answered M'Aulay. "Your triumph shall not go farther than the hour which is stricken. Menteith, I entreat you by our relationship—by our joint conflicts and labours —draw your sword, and defend your life!" As he spoke, he seized the Earl's hand, and wrung it with such frantic earnestness, that his grasp forced the blood to start under the nails. Menteith threw him off with violence, exclaiming, "Begone, madman!"

"Then, be the vision accomplished!" said Allan; and, drawing his dirk, struck with his whole gigantic force at the Earl's bosom. The temper of the corslet threw the point of the weapon upwards, but a deep wound took place between the neck and shoulder; and the force of the blow prostrated the bridegroom on the floor. Montrose entered at one side of the anteroom. The bridal company, alarmed at the noise, were in equal apprehension and surprise; but ere Montrose could almost see what had happened, Allan M'Aulay had rushed past him, and descended the castle stairs like lightning. "Guards, shut the gate!" exclaimed Montrose—"Seize him—kill him, if he resists!—He shall die, if he were my brother!"

But Allan prostrated, with a second blow of his dagger, a sentinel who was upon duty—traversed the camp like a mountain-deer, though pursued by all who caught the alarm—threw himself into the river, and, swimming to the opposite side, was soon lost among the woods. In the course of the same evening, his brother Angus and his followers left Montrose's camp, and, taking the road homeward, never again rejoined him.

Of Allan himself it is said, that, in a wonderfully short space after the deed was committed, he burst into a room in the Castle of Inverary, where Argyle was sitting in council, and flung on the table his bloody dirk.

"Is it the blood of James Grahame?" said Argyle, a ghastly expression of hope mixing with the terror which the sudden apparition naturally excited.

"It is the blood of his minion," answered M'Aulay—"It is the blood which I was predestined to shed, though I would rather have spilt my own."

Having thus spoken, he turned and left the castle, and from that moment nothing certain is known of his fate. As the boy Kenneth, with three of the Children of the Mist, were seen soon afterwards to cross Lochfine, it is supposed they dogged his course, and that he perished by their hand in some obscure wilderness. Another opinion maintains, that Allan M'Aulay went abroad and died a monk of t thusian order. But nothing beyond bare pres could ever be brought in support of either op

His vengeance was much less complete probably fancied; for Menteith, though so wounded as to remain long in a dangerou was, by having adopted Major Dalgetty's f recommendation of a cuirass as a bridal g happily secured from the worst consequence blow. But his services were lost to Montro it was thought best that he should be convey his intended countess, now truly a mournin and should accompany his wounded father-i the castle of Sir Duncan at Ardenvohr. I followed them to the water's edge, remindir teith of the necessity of erecting a sconce or snab to cover his lady's newly acquired inher

They performed their voyage in safety, a teith was in a few weeks so well in health, united to Annot in the castle of her father.

The Highlanders were somewhat puzzled t cile Menteith's recovery with the visions of cond sight, and the more experienced seers w pleased with him for not having died. B thought the credit of the vision sufficiently by the wound inflicted by the hand, and weapon, foretold; and all were of opinion, incident of the ring, with the death's head to the death of the bride's father, who did vive her marriage many months. The inc held, that all this was idle dreaming, and lan's supposed vision was but a consequenc private suggestions of his own passion, wh ving long seen in Menteith a rival more belo himself, struggled with his better nature, pressed upon him, as it were involuntarily, of killing his competitor.

Menteith did not recover sufficiently to jo trose during his brief and glorious career; a that heroic general disbanded his army an from Scotland, Menteith resolved to adopt t privacy, which he led till the Restoratio that happy event, he occupied a situation in befitting his rank, lived long, happy alike i regard and in domestic affection, and died a old age.

Our dramatis personæ have been so limit excepting Montrose, whose exploits and fat theme of history, we have only to mention gald Dalgetty. This gentleman continued, most rigorous punctuality, to discharge his d to receive his pay, until he was made prisone others, upon the field of Philiphaugh. He w demned to share the fate of his fellow-offic that occasion, who were doomed to death n denunciations from the pulpit, than the s either of civil or military tribunal; their blo considered as a sort of sin-offering to take a guilt of the land, and the fate imposed t Canaanites, under a special dispensation, b piously and cruelly applied to them.

Several Lowland officers, in the service of venanters, interceded for Dalgetty on this c representing him as a person whose skill w useful in their army, and who would be re duced to change his service. But on this po found Sir Dugald unexpectedly obstinate. engaged with the King for a certain term, that was expired, his principles would not pe shadow of changing. The Covenanters, a derstood no such nice distinction, and he w utmost danger of falling a martyr, not to thi political principle, but merely to his own str of a military enlistment. Fortunately, hi discovered, by computation, that there rema a fortnight to elapse of the engagement he h ed, and to which, though certain it was ne renewed, no power on earth could make hi With some difficulty they procured a repriev short space, after which they found him willing to come under any engagements th to dictate. He entered the service of the Ea cordingly, and wrought himself forward to h in Gilbert Ker's corps, commonly called th ıment of Horse. Of his farther history we :hing, until we find him in possession of his :state of Drumthwacket, which he acquired, e sword, but by a pacific intermarriage with Strachan, a matron somewhat stricken in widow of the Aberdeenshire Covenanter.

Sir Dugald is supposed to have survived the Revolution, as traditions of no very distant date represent him as cruizing about in that country, very old, very deaf, and very full of interminable stories about the immortal Gustavus Adolphus, the Lion of the North, and the bulwark of the Protestant Faith.

END OF A LEGEND OF MONTROSE.

---

s! THE TALES OF MY LANDLORD are now osed, and it was my purpose to have adbee in the vein of Jedediah Cleishbotham; Horam the son of Asmar, and all other imary-tellers, Jedediah has melted into thin air. eishbotham bore the same resemblance to he at whose voice he rose doth to the sage ; and yet, so fond are we of the fictions of fancy, that I part with him, and all his imacalities, with idle reluctance. I am aware feeling in which the reader will little symbut he cannot be more sensible than I am, cient varieties have now been exhibited of tish character, to exhaust one individual's f observation, and that to persist would be useless and tedious. I have the vanity to suppose, that the popularity of these Novels has shown my countrymen, and their peculiarities, in lights which were new to the Southern reader; and that many, hitherto indifferent upon the subject, have been induced to read Scottish history, from the allusions to it in these works of fiction.

I retire from the field, conscious that there remains behind not only a large harvest, but labourers capable of gathering it in. More than one writer has of late displayed talents of this description; and if the present author, himself a phantom, may be permitted to distinguish a brother, or perhaps a sister shadow, he would mention, in particular, the author of the very lively work, entitled, "Marriage."

END OF TALES OF MY LANDLORD.

IVANHOE;

A ROMANCE.

Now fitted the halter, now traversed the cart,
And often took leave,—but seem'd loath to depart!*
PRIOR.

* The motto alludes to the Author returning to the stage repeatedly after having taken leave.

INTRODUCTION TO IVANHOE.

thor of the Waverley Novels had hitherto proceeded ated course of popularity, and might, in his peculiar literature, have been termed L'Enfant Gâté of sucwas plain, however, that frequent publication must r out the public favour, unless some mode could be give an appearance of novelty to subsequent producttish manners, Scottish dialect, and Scottish charace, being those with which the author was most intid familiarly acquainted, were the groundwork upon had hitherto relied for giving effect to his narrative. wever, obvious, that this kind of interest must in the on a degree of sameness and repetition, if exclusively , and that the reader was likely at length to adopt ge of Edwin, in Parnell's Tale :—

———" 'Reverse the spell,' he cries
'And let it fairly now suffice,
The gambol has been shown.' "

can be more dangerous for the fame of a professor of ts, than to permit (if he can possibly prevent it) the of a mannerist to be attached to him, or that he should d capable of success only in a particular and limited e public are, in general, very ready to adopt the ophe who has pleased them in one peculiar mode of on, is, by means of that very talent, rendered incapaturing upon other subjects. The effect of this disinon the part of the public, towards the artificers of sures, when they attempt to enlarge their means of may be seen in the censures usually passed by vulgar upon actors or artists who venture to change the chatheir efforts, that, in so doing, they may enlarge the heir art.

some justice in this opinion, as there always is in attain general currency. It may often happen on the t an actor, by possessing in a pre-eminent degree the qualities necessary to give effect to comedy, may be of the right to aspire to tragic excellence; and in r literary composition, an artist or poet may be masvely of modes of thought, and powers of expression, fine him to a single course of subjects. But much ently the same capacity which carries a man to popue department will obtain for him success in another, ust be more particularly the case in literary compon either in acting or painting, because the adventurer artment is not impeded in his exertions by any peculeatures, or conformation of person, proper for partis, or, by any peculiar mechanical habits of using the ited to a particular class of subjects.

this reasoning be correct or otherwise, the present , that, in confining himself to subjects purely Scotas not only likely to weary out the indulgence of his it also greatly to limit his own power of affording sure. In a highly polished country, where so much onthly employed in catering for public amusement, a , such as he had himself had the happiness to light e untasted spring of the desert;—

" Men bless their stars and call it luxury."

men and horses, cattle, camels, and dromedaries, lled the spring into mud, it becomes loathsome to at first drank of it with rapture; and he who had the iscovering it, if he would preserve his reputation with must display his talent by a fresh discovery of untains.

uthor, who finds himself limited to a particular class s, endeavours to sustain his reputation by striving to elty of attraction to themes of the same character ve been formerly successful under his management, manifest reasons why, after a certain point, he is likely the mine be not wrought out, the strength and capa miner become necessarily exhausted. If he closely e narratives which he has before rendered successful, med to "wonder that they please no more." If he o take a different view of the same class of subjects, y discovers that what is obvious, graceful, and natuen exhausted; and, in order to obtain the indispensaof novelty, he is forced upon caricature, and, to avoid , must become extravagant.

, perhaps, necessary to enumerate so many reasons uthor of the Scottish Novels, as they were then exclued, should be desirous to make an experiment on a rely English. It was his purpose, at the same time, endered the experiment as complete as possible, by e intended work before the public as the effort of a late for their favour, in order that no degree of prejuher favourable or the reverse, might attach to it, as a ction of the Author of Waverley; but this intention vards departed from, for reasons to be hereafter menod of the narrative adopted was the reign of Richard y as abounding with characters whose very names o attract general attention, but as affording a striking etwixt the Saxons, by whom the soil was cultivated, rmans, who still reigned in it as conquerors, reluctant to mix with the vanquished, or acknowledge themselves of the same stock. The idea of this contrast was taken from the ingenious and unfortunate Logan's tragedy of Runnamede, in which, about the same period of history, the author had seen the Saxon and Norman barons opposed to each other on different sides of the stage. He does not recollect that there was any attempt to contrast the two races in their habits and sentiments; and indeed it was obvious, that history was violated by introducing the Saxons still existing as a high-minded and martial race of nobles.

They did, however, survive as a people, and some of the ancient Saxon families possessed wealth and power, although they were exceptions to the humble condition of the race in general. It seemed to the author, that the existence of the two races in the same country, the vanquished distinguished by their plain, homely, blunt manners, and the free spirit, infused by their ancient institutions and laws; the victors, by the high spirit of military fame, personal adventure, and whatever could distinguish them as the Flower of Chivalry, might, intermixed with other characters belonging to the same time and country, interest the reader by the contrast, if the author should not fail on his part.

Scotland, however, had been of late used so exclusively as the scene of what is called Historical Romance, that the preliminary letter of Mr. Laurence Templeton became in some measure necessary. To this, as to an Introduction, the reader is referred, as expressing the author's purpose and opinions in undertaking this species of composition, under the necessary reservation, that he is far from thinking he has attained the point at which he aimed.

It is scarcely necessary to add, that there was no idea or wish to pass off the supposed Mr. Templeton as a real person. But a kind of continuation of the Tales of my Landlord had been recently attempted by a stranger, and it was supposed this Dedicatory Epistle might pass for some imitation of the same kind, and thus putting inquirers upon a false scent, induce them to believe they had before them the work of some new candidate for their favour.

After a considerable part of the work had been finished and printed, the Publishers, who pretended to discern in it a germ of popularity, remonstrated strenuously against its appearing as an absolutely anonymous production, and contended that it should have the advantage of being announced as by the Author of Waverley. The author did not make any obstinate opposition, for he began to be of opinion with Dr. Wheeler, in Miss Edgeworth's excellent tale of "Manœuvring," that "Trick upon Trick" might be too much for the patience of an indulgent public, and might be reasonably considered as trifling with their favour.

The book, therefore, appeared as an avowed continuation of the Waverley Novels; and it would be ungrateful not to acknowledge, that it met with the same favourable reception as its predecessors.

Such annotations as may be useful to assist the reader in comprehending the characters of the Jew, the Templar, the Captain of the mercenaries, or Free Companions, as they were called, and others proper to the period, are added, but with a sparing hand, since sufficient information on these subjects is to be found in general history.

An incident in the tale, which had the good fortune to find favour in the eyes of many readers, is more directly borrowed from the stores of old romance. I mean the meeting of the King with Friar Tuck at the cell of that buxom hermit. The general tone of the story belongs to all ranks and all countries, which emulate each other in describing the rambles of a disguised sovereign, who, going in search of information or amusement, into the lower ranks of life, meets with adventures diverting to the reader or hearer, from the contrast betwixt the monarch's outward appearance, and his real character. The Eastern tale-teller has for his theme the disguised expeditions of Haroun Alraschid with his faithful attendants, Mesrour and Giafar, through the midnight streets of Bagdad; and Scottish tradition dwells upon the similar exploits of James V., distinguished during such excursions by the travelling name of the Goodman of Ballengeigh, as the Commander of the Faithful, when he desired to be incognito, was known by that of Il Bondocani. The French minstrels are not silent on so popular a theme. There must have been a Norman original of the Scottish metrical romance of Rauf Colziar, in which Charlemagne is introduced as the unknown guest of a charcoal man.* It seems to have been the original of other poems of the kind.

In merry England there is no end of popular ballads on this theme. The poem of John the Reeve, or Steward, mentioned by Bishop Percy, in the Reliques of English Poetry,† is said to have turned on such an incident; and we have besides, the King and the Tanner of Tamworth, the King and the Miller of Mansfield, and others on the same topic. But the peculiar tale of this nature to which the author of Ivanhoe has to acknowledge an obligation, is more ancient by two centuries than any of these last mentioned.

* This very curious poem, long a desideratum in Scottish literature, and given up as irrecoverably lost, was lately brought to light by the researches of Dr. Irvine of the Advocates' Library, and has been reprinted by Mr. David Laing, Edinburgh.

† Vol. ii. p. 167.

It was first communicated to the public in that curious record of ancient literature, which has been accumulated by the combined exertions of Sir Egerton Brydges and Mr. Hazlewood, in the periodical work entitled the British Bibliographer. From thence it has been transferred by the Reverend Charles Henry Hartshorne, M. A., editor of a very curious volume, entitled, "Ancient Metrical Tales, printed chiefly from original sources, 1829." Mr. Hartshorne gives no other authority for the present fragment, except the article in the Bibliographer, where it is entitled the Kyng and the Hermite. A short abstract of its contents will show its similarity to the meeting of King Richard and Friar Tuck.

King Edward (we are not told which among the monarchs of that name, but, from his temper and habits, we may suppose Edward IV.) sets forth with his court to a gallant hunting-match in Sherwood Forest, in which, as is not unusual for princes in romance, he falls in with a deer of extraordinary size and swiftness, and pursues it closely, till he has outstripped his whole retinue, tired out hounds and horse and finds himself alone under the gloom of an extensive forest, upon which night is descending. Under the apprehensions natural to a situation so uncomfortable, the king recollects that he has heard how poor men, when apprehensive of a bad night's lodging, pray to Saint Julian, who, in the Romish calendar, stands Quarter-Master-General to all forlorn travellers that render him due homage. Edward puts up his orisons accordingly, and by the guidance, doubtless, of the good Saint, reaches a small path, conducting him to a chapel in the forest, having a hermit's cell in its close vicinity. The King hears the reverend man, with a companion of his solitude, telling his beads within, and meekly requests of him quarters for the night. "I have no accommodation for such a lord as ye be," said the Hermit. "I live here in the wilderness upon roots and rinds, and may not receive into my dwelling even the poorest wretch that lives, unless it were to save his life." The King inquires the way to the next town, and, understanding it is by a road which he cannot find without difficulty, even if he had daylight to befriend him, he declares, that with or without the Hermit's consent, he is determined to be his guest that night. He is admitted accordingly, not without a hint from the Recluse, that were he himself out of his priestly weeds, he would care little for his threats of using violence, and that he gives way to him not out of intimidation, but simply to avoid scandal.

The King is admitted into the cell—two bundles of straw are shaken down for his accommodation, and he comforts himself that he is now under shelter, and that

"A night will soon be gone."

Other wants, however, arise. The guest becomes clamorous for supper, observing,

"For certainly, as I you say,
I ne had never so sorry a day,
That I ne had a merry night."

But this indication of his taste for good cheer, joined to the annunciation of his being a follower of the Court, who had lost himself at the great hunting-match, cannot induce the niggard Hermit to produce better fare than bread and cheese, for which his guest showed little appetite; and "thin drink," which was even less acceptable. At length the King presses his host on a point to which he had more than once alluded, without obtaining a satisfactory reply:

Then said the King, 'by Godys grace
Thou wert in a merry place,
To shoot should thou lere:
When the foresters go to rest,
Sometyme thou might have of the best
All of the wild deer;
I wold hold it for no scathe,
Though thou hadst bow and arrows baith
Althoff thou best a Frere.'"

The Hermit, in return, expresses his apprehension that his guest means to drag him into some confession of offence against the forest laws, which, being betrayed to the King, might cost him his life. Edward answers by fresh assurances of secrecy, and again urges on him the necessity of procuring some venison. The Hermit replies, by once more insisting on the duties incumbent upon him as a churchman, and continues to affirm himself free from all such breaches of order:—

"Many day I have here been,
And flesh meat I eat never,
But milk of the kye:
Warm thee well, and go to sleep,
And I will lap thee with my cope,
Softly to lye."

It would seem that the manuscript is here imperfect, for we do not find the reasons which finally induce the curtal Friar to amend the King's cheer. But acknowledging his guest to be such a "good fellow" as has seldom graced his board, the holy man at length produces the best his cell affords. Two candles are placed on a table, white bread and baked pasties are displayed by the light, besides choice of venison, both salt and fresh, from which they select collops. "I might have eaten my bread dry," said the King, "had I not pressed thee on the score of archery, but now have I dined like a prince—if we had but drink enow."

This too is afforded by the hospitable anchorite, who dispatches an assistant to fetch a pot of four gallons from a secret corner near his bed, and the whole three set in to serious drinking. This amusement is superintended by the Friar, according to the recurrence of certain fustian words, to be repeated by every compotator in turn before he drank—a species of High Jinks, as it were, by which they regulated their potations, as toasts were given in latter times. The one toper says fusty bandias, to which the other is obliged to reply, strike pantne

the Friar passes many jests on the King's want of memor sometimes forgets the words of action. The night is sp this jolly pastime. Before his departure in the mornin King invites his reverend host to Court, promises, at le requite his hospitality, and expresses himself much p with his entertainment. The jolly Hermit at length ag venture thither, and to inquire for Jack Fletcher, which name assumed by the King. After the Hermit has sho ward some feats of archery, the joyous pair separate King rides home, and rejoins his retinue. As the rom imperfect, we are not acquainted how the discovery place; but it is probably much in the same manner as i narratives turning on the same subject, where the host, hensive of death for having trespassed on the respect du Sovereign, while incognito, is agreeably surprised by re honours and reward.

In Mr. Hartshorne's collection, there is a romance same foundation, called King Edward and the She which, considered as illustrating manners, is still more than the King and the Hermit; but it is foreign to the purpose. The reader has here the original legend from the incident in the romance is derived; and the identify irregular Eremite with the Friar Tuck of Robin Hood's was an obvious expedient.

The name of Ivanhoe was suggested by an old rhym novelists have had occasion at some time or other to wi Falstaff, that they knew where a commodity of good was to be had. On such an occasion the author cha call to memory a rhyme recording three names of the forfeited by the ancestor of the celebrated Hampden, fo ing the Black Prince a blow with his racket, when the relled at tennis;—

"Tring, Wing, and Ivanhoe,
For striking of a blow,
Hampden did forego,
And glad he could escape so."

The word suited the author's purpose in two material rea for, first, it had an ancient English sound; and, secondly veyed no indication whatever of the nature of the st presumes to hold this last quality to be of no small imp What is called a taking title, serves the direct interest bookseller or publisher, who by this means sometimes edition while it is yet passing the press. But if the aut mits an over degree of attention to be drawn to his wo has appeared, he places himself in the embarrassing c of having excited a degree of expectation which, if h unable to satisfy, is an error fatal to his literary rep Besides, when we meet such a title as the Gunpowder any other connected with general history, each reader he has seen the book, has formed to himself some p idea of the sort of manner in which the story is to be co and the nature of the amusement which he is to derive In this he is probably disappointed, and in that case naturally disposed to visit upon the author or the work pleasant feelings thus excited. In such a case the lit venturer is censured, not for having missed the mark he himself aimed, but for not having shot off his sh direction he never thought of.

On the footing of unreserved communication which thor has established with the reader, he may here trifling circumstance, that a roll of Norman warriors, o in the Auchinleck Manuscript, gave him the formidab of Front-de-Bœuf.

Ivanhoe was highly successful upon its appearance, be said to have procured for its author the freedom of th since he has ever since been permitted to exercise his p fictitious composition in England, as well as Scotland.

The character of the fair Jewess found so much f the eyes of some fair readers, that the writer was cen cause, when arranging the fates of the characters of th he had not assigned the hand of Wilfred to Rebecc than the less interesting Rowena. But, not to ment the prejudices of the age rendered such an union al possible, the author may, in passing, observe, that he character of a highly virtuous and lofty stamp, is rather than exalted by an attempt to reward virtue w poral prosperity. Such is not the recompense whic dence has deemed worthy of suffering merit, and it is a d and fatal doctrine to teach young persons, the most readers of romance, that rectitude of conduct and of are either naturally allied with, or adequately rewarde gratification of our passions, or attainment of our wi a word, if a virtuous and self-denied character is d with temporal wealth, greatness, rank, or the indul such a rashly formed or ill assorted passion as that of for Ivanhoe, the reader will be apt to say, verily, Virtue its reward. But a glance on the great picture of life w that the duties of self-denial, and the sacrifice of p principle, are seldom thus remunerated; and that the consciousness of their high-minded discharge of duty, on their own reflections a more adequate recompen form of that peace which the world cannot give or tak

ABBOTSFORD,
1st September, 1830.

* Like the Hermit, the Shepherd makes havock amongst the ki but by means of a sling, not of a bow; like the Hermit, too, peculiar phrases of compotation, the sign and countersign bein dion and Berafriend. One can scarce conceive what humo cestors found in this species of gibberish; but

"I warrant it proved an excuse for the glass."

DEDICATORY EPISTLE

TO

THE REV. DR. DRYASDUST, F. A. S.

Residing in the Castle-Gate, York.

MUCH ESTEEMED AND DEAR SIR,

It is scarcely necessary to mention the various and concurring reasons which induce me to place your name at the head of the following work. Yet the chief of these reasons may perhaps be refuted by the imperfections of the performance. Could I have hoped to render it worthy of your patronage, the public would at once have seen the propriety of inscribing a work designed to illustrate the domestic antiquities of England, and particularly of our Saxon forefathers, to the learned author of the Essays upon the Horn of King Ulphus, and on the Lands bestowed by him upon the patrimony of St. Peter. I am conscious, however, that the slight, unsatisfactory, and trivial manner in which the result of my antiquarian researches has been recorded in the following pages, takes the work from under that class which bears the proud motto, Detur digniori. On the contrary, I fear I shall incur the censure of presumption in placing the venerable name of Dr. Jonas Dryasdust at the head of a publication, which the more grave antiquary will perhaps class with the idle novels and romances of the day. I am anxious to vindicate myself from such a charge; for although I might trust to your friendship for an apology in your eyes, yet I would not willingly stand convicted in those of the public of so grave a crime, as my fears lead me to anticipate my being charged with.

I must therefore remind you, that when we first talked over the project of that class of productions, in one of which the private and family affairs of your learned northern friend, Mr. Oldbuck of Monkbarns, were so unjustifiably exposed to the public, some discussion occurred between us concerning the cause of the popularity these works have attained in this idle age, which, whatever other merit they possess, must be admitted to be hastily written, and in violation of every rule assigned to the epopeia. It seemed then to be your opinion, that the charm lay entirely in the art with which the unknown author had availed himself, like a second M'Pherson, of the antiquarian stores, which lay scattered around him, supplying his own indolence or poverty of invention, by the incidents which had actually taken place in his country at no distant period, by introducing real characters, and scarcely suppressing real names. It was not above sixty or seventy years, you observed, since the whole north of Scotland was under a state of government nearly as simple and as patriarchal as those of our good allies the Mohawks and Iroquois. Admitting that the author cannot himself be supposed to have witnessed those times, he must have lived, you observed, among persons who had acted and suffered in them; and even within these thirty years, such an infinite change has taken place in the manners of Scotland, that men look back upon the habits of society proper to their immediate ancestors, as we do on those of the reign of Queen Anne, or even the period of the Revolution. Having thus materials of every kind lying strewed around him, there was little, you observed, to embarrass the author, but the difficulty of choice. It was no wonder, therefore, that, having begun to work a mine so plentiful, he should have derived from his works fully more credit and profit than the facility of his labours merited.

Admitting (as I could not deny) the general truth of these conclusions, I cannot but think it strange that no attempt has been made to excite an interest for the traditions and manners of Old England, similar to that which has been obtained in behalf of those of our poorer and less celebrated neighbours. The Kendal green, though its date is more ancient, ought surely to be as dear to our feelings, as the variegated tartans of the north. The name of Robin Hood, if duly conjured with, should raise a spirit as soon as that of Rob Roy; and the patriots of England deserve no less their renown in our modern circles, than the Bruces and Wallaces of Caledonia. If the scenery of the south be less romantic and sublime than that of the northern mountains, it must be allowed to possess in the same proportion superior softness and beauty: and upon the whole, we feel ourselves entitled to exclaim with the patriotic Syrian—"Are not Pharphar and Abana, rivers of Damascus, better than all the rivers of Israel?"

Your objections to such an attempt, my dear Doctor, were, you will remember, two-fold. You insisted upon the advantages which the Scotsman possessed, from the very recent existence of that state of society in which his scene was to be laid.—Many now alive, you remarked, well remembered persons who had not only seen the celebrated Roy M'Gregor, but had feasted, and even fought with him. All those minute circumstances belonging to private life and domestic character, all that gives verisimilitude to a narrative, and individuality to the persons introduced, is still known and remembered in Scotland; whereas in England, civilization has been so long complete, that our ideas of our ancestors are only to be gleaned from musty records and chronicles, the authors of which seem perversely to have conspired to suppress in their narratives all interesting details, in order to find room for flowers of monkish eloquence, or trite reflections upon morals. To match an English and a Scottish author in the rival task of embodying and reviving the traditions of their respective countries, would be, you alleged, in the highest degree unequal and unjust. The Scottish magician, you said, was, like Lucan's witch, at liberty to walk over the recent field of battle, and to select for the subject of resuscitation by his sorceries, a body whose limbs had recently quivered with existence, and whose throat had but just uttered the last note of agony. Such a subject even the powerful Erictho was compelled to select, as alone capable of being reanimated even by her potent magic—

——gelidas leto scrutata medullas,
Pulmonis rigidi stantes sine vulnere fibras
Invenit, et vocem defuncto in corpore quærit.

The English author, on the other hand, without supposing him less of a conjuror than the Northern Warlock, can, you observed, only have the liberty of selecting his subject amidst the dust of antiquity, where nothing was to be found but dry, sapless, mouldering, and disjointed bones, such as those which filled the valley of Jehoshaphat. You expressed, besides, your apprehension, that the unpatriotic prejudices of my countrymen would not allow fair play to such a work as that of which I endeavoured to demonstrate the probable success. And this, you said, was not entirely owing to the more general prejudice in favour of that which is foreign, but that it rested partly upon improbabilities, arising out of the circumstances in which the English reader is placed. If you describe to him a set of wild manners, and a state of primitive society existing in the Highlands of Scotland, he is much disposed to acquiesce in the truth of what is asserted. And reason good. If he be of the ordinary class of readers, he has either never seen those remote districts at all, or he has wandered through those desolate regions in the course of a summer tour, eating bad dinners, sleeping on truckle beds, stalking from desolation to desolation, and fully prepared to believe the strangest things that could be told him of a people wild and extravagant enough to be attached to scenery so extraordinary. But the same worthy person, when placed in his own snug parlour, and surrounded by all the comforts of an Englishman's fireside, is not half so much disposed to believe that his own ancestors led a very different life from himself; that the shattered tower, which now forms a vista from his window, once held a baron who would have hung him up at his own door without any form of trial; that the hinds, by whom his little pet-farm is managed, a few centuries ago would have been his slaves; and that the complete influence of feudal tyranny once extended over the neighbouring village, where the attorney is now a man of more importance than the lord of the manor.

While I own the force of these objections, I must confess, at the same time, that they do not appear to me to be altogether insurmountable. The scantiness of materials is indeed a formidable difficulty; but no one knows better than Dr. Dryasdust, that to those deeply read in antiquity, hints concerning the private life of our ancestors lie scattered through the pages of our various historians, bearing, indeed, a slender proportion to the other matters of which they treat, but still, when collected together, sufficient to throw considerable light upon the vie privée of our forefathers; indeed, I am convinced, that however I myself may fail in the ensuing attempt, yet with more labour in collecting, or more skill in using, the materials within his reach, illustrated as they have been by the labours of Dr Henry, of the late Mr. Strutt, and, above all, of Mr. Sharon Turner, an abler hand would have been successful; and therefore I protest beforehand, against any argument which may be founded on the failure of the present experiment.

On the other hand, I have already said, that if any thing like a true picture of old English manners could be drawn, I would trust to the good-nature and good sense of my countrymen for insuring its favourable reception.

Having thus replied, to the best of my power, to the first class of your objections, or at least having shown my resolution to overleap the barriers which your prudence has raised, I will be brief in noticing that which is more peculiar to myself. It seemed to be your opinion, that the very office of an antiquary, employed in grave, and, as the vulgar will sometimes allege, in toilsome and minute research, must be considered as incapacitating him from successfully compounding a tale of this sort.—But permit me to say, my dear Doctor, that this objection is rather formal than substantial. It is true, that such slight compositions might not suit the severer genius of our friend Mr. Oldbuck. Yet Horace Walpole wrote a goblin tale which has thrilled through many a bosom; and George Ellis could transfer all the playful fascination of a humour, as delightful as it was uncommon, into his Abridgement of the Ancient Metrical Romances. So that, however I may have occasion to rue my present audacity, I have at least the most respectable precedents in my favour.

Still the severer antiquary may think, that, by thus intermingling fiction with truth, I am polluting the well of history with modern inventions, and impressing upon the rising generation false ideas of the age which I describe. I cannot but in some sense admit the force of this reasoning, which I yet hope to traverse by the following considerations.

It is true, that I neither can, nor do pretend, to the observation of complete accuracy, even in matters of outward costume, much less in the more important points of language and manners.—But the same motive which prevents my writing the dialogue of the piece in Anglo-Saxon or in Norman-French, and which prohibits my sending forth to the public this essay printed with the types of Caxton or Wynken de Worde, prevents my attempting to confine myself within the limits of the period in which my story is laid. It is necessary, for exciting interest of any kind, that the subject assumed should be, as it were, translated into the manners, as well as the language of the age we live in.—No fascination has ever been attached to Oriental literature, equal to that produced by Mr. Galland's first translation of the Arabian Tales; in which, retaining on the one hand the splendour of Eastern costume, and on the other the wildness of Eastern fiction, he mixed these with just so much ordinary feeling and expression, as rendered them interesting and intelligible, while he abridged the long-winded narratives, curtailed the monotonous reflections, and rejected the endless repetitions of the Arabian original. The tales, therefore, though less purely Oriental than in their first concoction, were eminently better fitted for the European market, and obtained an unrivalled degree of public favour, which they certainly would never have gained had not the manners and style been in some degree familiarized to the feelings and habits of the western reader.

In point of justice, therefore, to the multitudes who will, I trust, devour this book with avidity, I have so far explained our ancient manners in modern language, and so far detailed the characters and sentiments of my persons, that the modern reader will not find himself, I should hope, much trammelled by the repulsive dryness of mere antiquity. In this, I respectfully contend, I have in no respect exceeded the fair license due to the author of a fictitious composition. The late ingenious Mr. Strutt, in his romance of Queen-Hoo-Hall,* acted upon another principle; and in distinguishing between what was ancient and modern, forgot, as it appears to me, that extensive neutral ground, the large proportion, that is, of manners and sentiments which are common to us and to our ancestors, having been handed down unaltered from them to us, or which, arising out of the principles of our common nature, must have existed alike in either state of society. In this manner, a man of talent, and of great antiquarian erudition, limited the popularity of his work, by excluding from it every thing which was not sufficiently obsolete to be altogether forgotten and unintelligible.

The license which I would here vindicate, is so necessary to the execution of my plan, that I will crave your patience while I illustrate my argument a little further.

He who first opens Chaucer, or any other ancient poet, is so much struck with the obsolete spelling, multiplied consonants, and antiquated appearance of the language, that he is apt to lay the work down in despair, as encrusted too deep with the rust of antiquity, to permit his judging of its merits or tasting its beauties. But if some intelligent and accomplished friend points out to him, that the difficulties by which he is startled are more in appearance than reality, if, by reading aloud to him, or by reducing the ordinary words to the modern orthography, he satisfies his proselyte that only about one tenth part of the words employed are in fact obsolete, the novice may be easily persuaded to approach the "well of English undefiled," with the certainty that a slender degree of patience will enable him to enjoy both the humour and the pathos with which old Geoffrey delighted the age of Cressy and of Poictiers.

To pursue this a little further. If our neophyte, strong in the new-born love of antiquity, were to undertake to imitate what he had learnt to admire, it must be allowed he would act very injudiciously, if he were to select from the Glossary the obsolete words which it contains, and employ those exclusively of all phrases and vocables retained in modern days. This was the error of the unfortunate Chatterton. In order to give his language the appearance of antiquity, he rejected every word that was modern, and produced a dialect entirely different from any that had ever been spoken in Great Britain. He who would imitate an ancient language with success, must attend rather to its grammatical character, turn of expression, and mode of arrangement, than labour to collect extraordinary and antiquated terms, which, as I have already averred, do not in ancient authors approach the number of words still in use, though perhaps somewhat altered in sense and spelling, in the proportion of one to ten.

What I have applied to language, is still more justly applicable to sentiments and manners. The passions, the sources from which these must spring in all their modifications, are generally the same in all ranks and conditions, all countries and ages; and it follows, as a matter of course, that the opinions, habits of thinking, and actions, however influenced by the peculiar state of society, must still, upon the whole, bear a strong resemblance to each other. Our ancestors were not more distinct from us, surely, than Jews are from Christians; they had "eyes, hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions;" were "fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, warmed and cooled by the winter and summer," as ourselves. The tenor, therefore, their affections and feelings, must have borne the same proportion to our own.

It follows, therefore, that of the materials which an has to use in a romance, or fictitious composition, m have ventured to attempt, he will find that a great proj both of language and manners, is as proper to the pres as to those in which he has laid his time of action. Th dom of choice which this allows him, is therefore greater, and the difficulty of his task much more dim than at first appears. To take an illustration from a su the antiquarian details may be said to represent the p features of a landscape under delineation of the pencil feudal tower must arise in due majesty; the figures wh introduces must have the costume and character of the the piece must represent the peculiar features of the which he has chosen for his subject, with all its appr elevation of rock, or precipitate de-cent of cataract. H ral colouring, too, must be copied from Nature: The sk be clouded or serene, according to the climate, and the tints must be those which prevail in a natural landsca far the painter is bound down by the rules of his art, t cise imitation of the features of Nature; but it is not n that he should descend to copy all her more minute feat represent with absolute exactness the very herbs, flowe trees, with which the spot is decorated. These, as we the more minute points of light and shadow, are at proper to scenery in general, natural to each situation, a ject to the artist's disposal, as his taste or pleasure may

It is true, that this license is confined in either case legitimate bounds. The painter must introduce no ob inconsistent with the climate or country of his landsca must not plant cypress trees upon loch-Merrin, or Scot among the ruins of Persepolis; and the author lies unde responding restraint. However far he may venture in full detail of passions and feelings, than is to be foun ancient compositions which he imitates, he must n nothing inconsistent with the manners of the age; his l squires, grooms, and yeomen, may be more fully drawn the hard, dry delineations of an ancient illuminated ma but the character and costume of the age must remai late; they must be the same figures, drawn by a better or, to speak more modestly, executed in an age when t ciples of art were better understood. His language mu exclusively obsolete and unintelligible; but he should a possible, no word or turn of phraseology betraying a directly modern. It is one thing to make use of the l and sentiments which are common to ourselves and ou there, and it is another to invest them with the sentime dialect exclusively proper to their descendants.

Thus, my dear friend, I have found the most difficul my task; and, to speak frankly, I hardly expect to sati less partial judgment, and more extensive knowledge subjects, since I have hardly been able to please my ow

I am conscious that I shall be found still more fault tone of keeping and costume, by those who may be d rigidly to examine my Tale, with reference to the ma the exact period in which my actors flourished: It may I have introduced little which can positively be termed m but, on the other hand, it is extremely probable that I m confused the manners of two or three centuries, and int during the reign of Richard the First, circumstances a ated to a period either considerably earlier, or a good d than that era. It is my comfort, that errors of this k escape the general class of readers, and that I may shar ill-deserved applause of those architects, who, in their Gothic, do not hesitate to introduce, without rule or ornaments proper to different styles and to different pa the art. Those whose extensive researches have giv the means of judging my backslidings with more seve probably be lenient in proportion to their knowledge difficulty of my task. My honest and neglected friend phus, has furnished me with many a valuable hint; l light afforded by the Monk of Croyden, and Geoffrey sauff, is dimmed by such a conglomeration of unintend unintelligible matter, that we gladly fly for relief to the ful pages of the gallant Froissart, although he flouris period so much more remote from the date of my hist therefore, my dear friend, you have generosity enough t the presumptuous attempt, to frame for myself a minst pet, partly out of the pearls of pure antiquity, and pa the Bristol stones and paste, with which I have endeav imitate them, I am convinced your opinion of the dif the task will reconcile you to the imperfect manner of cution.

Of my materials I have but little to say: They may b found in the singular Anglo-Norman MS., which Sir Wardour preserves with such jealous care in the thir of his oaken cabinet, scarcely allowing any one to l and being himself not able to read one syllable of its c I should never have got his consent, on my visit to Sco read in those precious pages for so many hours, had I mised to designate it by some emphatic mode of pri The Wardour Manuscript; giving it, thereb dividuality as important as the Bannatyne MS., the Au MS., and any other monument of the patience of a scrivener. I have sent, for your private consideration the contents of this curious piece, which I shall per join, with your approbation, to the third volume of my case the printer's devil should continue impatient when the whole of my narrative has been imposed.

Adieu, my dear friend; I have said enough to expla to vindicate, the attempt which I have made, and v spite of your doubts, and my own incapacity, I am sti to believe has not been altogether made in vain.

* The author had revised this posthumous work of Mr. Strutt. See General Preface to the Waverley Novels, p. xi.

are now well recovered from your spring fit of the
ld be happy if the advice of your learned physician
mmend a tour to these parts. Several curiosities ely dug up near the wall, as well as at the ancient ibtancum. Talking of the latter, I suppose you ce heard the news, that a sulky churlish boor has
e ancient statue, or rather bas-relief, popularly of Redesdale. It seems Robin's fame attracted re than was consistent with the growth of the a moor worth a shilling an acre. Reverend as urself, be revengeful for once, and pray with me
e visited with such a fit of the stone, as if he had ents of poor Robin in that region of his viscera ease holds its seat. Tell this not in Gath, lest the
that they have at length found a parallel instance eighbours, to that barbarous deed which demo-
's Oven. But there is no end to lamentation.
ke ourselves to such subjects. My respectful com-nd Miss Dryasdust; I endeavoured to match the eable to her commission, during my late journey
nd hope she has received them safe, and found tory. I send this by the blind carrier, so that probe some time upon its journey.* The last news

nation proved but too true, as my learned correspondent
my letter until a twelvemonth after it was written. I rcumstance, that a gentleman attached to the cause of new holds the principal control of the post-office, may er, by some mitigation of the present enormous rates, which I hear from Edinburgh is, that the gentleman who fills the situation of Secretary to the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland,† is the best amateur draftsman in that kingdom, and that much is expected from his skill and zeal in delineating those specimens of national antiquity, which are either mouldering under the slow touch of time, or swept away by modern taste, with the same besom of destruction which John Knox used at the Reformation. Once more adieu; vale tandem, nec immemor mei. Believe me to be,

Reverend, and very dear Sir,
Your most faithful humble Servant,
LAURENCE TEMPLETON

TOPPINGWOLD, near Egremont, Cumberland, Nov. 17, 1817.

some favour might not be shown to the correspondents of the principal Literary and Antiquarian Societies. I understand, indeed, that this experiment was once tried, but that the mail-coach having broke down under the weight of packages addressed to members of the Society of Antiquaries, it was relinquished as a hazardous experiment. Surely, however, it would be possible to build these vehicles in a form more substantial, stronger in the perch, and broader in the wheels, so as to support the weight of Antiquarian learning; when, if they should be found to travel more slowly, they would be not the less agreeable to quiet travellers like myself.—L. T.

† Mr. Skene of Rubislaw is here intimated, to whose taste and skill the author is indebted for a series of etchings, exhibiting the various localities alluded to in these novels.

IVANHOE.

CHAPTER I.

s commanned these, while to their lowly dome,
full-fed swine return'd with evening home;
spell'd, reluctant, to the several sties,
h din obstreperous, and ungrateful cries.
POPE's Odyssey.

it pleasant district of merry England which ed by the river Don, there extended in ancient large forest, covering the greater part of the hills and valleys which lie between Sheffield pleasant town of Doncaster. The remains xtensive wood are still to be seen at the noble Wentworth, of Warncliffe Park, and around am. Here haunted of yore the fabulous Dra-Vantley; here were fought many of the most te battles during the Civil Wars of the Roses;
e also flourished in ancient times those bands
nt outlaws, whose deeds have been rendered lar in English song.

being our chief scene, the date of our story
o a period towards the end of the reign of I., when his return from his long captivity come an event rather wished than hoped for by pairing subjects, who were in the mean time
d to every species of subordinate oppression.
les, whose power had become exorbitant dur-reign of Stephen, and whom the prudence of the Second had scarce reduced into some
f subjection to the crown, had now resumed
cient license in its utmost extent; despising
le interference of the English Council of State,
g their castles, increasing the number of their
nts, reducing all around them to a state of
e, and striving by every means in their power, themselves each at the head of such forces as
nable him to make a figure in the national con-
which appeared to be impending.

ituation of the inferior gentry, or Franklins, as re called, who by the law and spirit of the constitution, were entitled to hold themselves
dent of feudal tyranny, became now unusually
ns. If, as was most generally the case, they themselves under the protection of any of the
gs in their vicinity, accepted of feudal offices
ousehold, or bound themselves, by mutual trealliance and protection, to support him in his es, they might indeed purchase temporary
but it must be with the sacrifice of that inde-
e which was so dear to every English bosom,
the certain hazard of being involved as a party
ever rash expedition the ambition of their pro-might lead him to undertake. On the other uch and so multiplied were the means of vexa-
d oppression possessed by the great Barons,
y never wanted the pretext, and seldom the harass and pursue, even to the very edge of tion, any of their less powerful neighbours, tempted to separate themselves from their
y, and to trust for their protection, during the
of the times, to their own inoffensive conduct,
the laws of the land.

cumstance which greatly tended to enhance nny of the nobility, and the sufferings of the classes, arose from the consequences of the st by Duke William of Normandy. Four ions had not sufficed to blend the hostile blood Normans and Anglo-Saxons, or to unite, by n language and mutual interests, two hostile
ne of which still felt the elation of triumph,
he other groaned under all the consequences
it. The power had been completely placed in the hands of the Norman nobility, by the event of the battle of Hastings, and it had been used, as our histories assure us, with no moderate hand. The whole race of Saxon princes and nobles had been extirpated or disinherited, with few or no exceptions; nor were the numbers great who possessed land in the country of their fathers, even as proprietors of the second, or of yet inferior classes. The royal policy had long been to weaken, by every means, legal or illegal, the strength of a part of the population which was justly considered as nourishing the most inveterate antipathy to their victor. All the monarchs of the Norman race had shown the most marked predilection for their Norman subjects; the laws of the chase, and many others, equally unknown to the milder and more free spirit of the Saxon constitution, had been fixed upon the necks of the subjugated inhabitants, to add weight, as it were, to the feudal chains with which they were loaded. At court, and in the castles of the great nobles, where the pomp and state of a court was emulated, Norman-French was the only language employed; in courts of law, the pleadings and judgments were delivered in the same tongue. In short, French was the language of honour, of chivalry, and even of justice, while the far more manly and expressive Anglo-Saxon was abandoned to the use of rustics and hinds, who knew no other. Still, however, the necessary intercourse between the lords of the soil, and those oppressed inferior beings by whom that soil was cultivated, occasioned the gradual formation of a dialect, compounded betwixt the French and the Anglo-Saxon, in which they could render themselves mutually intelligible to each other; and from this necessity arose by degrees the structure of our present English language, in which the speech of the victors and the vanquished have been so happily blended together; and which has since been so richly improved by importations from the classical languages, and from those spoken by the southern nations of Europe.

This state of things I have thought it necessary to premise for the information of the general reader, who might be apt to forget, that, although no great historical events, such as war or insurrection, mark the existence of the Anglo-Saxons as a separate people subsequent to the reign of William the Second: yet the great national distinctions betwixt them and their conquerors, the recollection of what they had formerly been, and to what they were now reduced, continued, down to the reign of Edward the Third, to keep open the wounds which the Conquest had inflicted, and to maintain a line of separation betwixt the descendants of the victor Normans and the vanquished Saxons.

The sun was setting upon one of the rich grassy glades of that forest, which we have mentioned in the beginning of the chapter. Hundreds of broad-headed, short-stemmed, white-branched oaks, which had witnessed perhaps the stately march of the Roman soldiery, flung their gnarled arms over a thick carpet of the most delicious green sward; in some places they were interminglod with beeches, hollies, and copsewood of various descriptions, so closely as totally to intercept the level beams of the sinking sun; in others they receded from each other, forming those long sweeping vistas, in the intricacy of which the eye delights to lose itself, while imagination considers them as the paths to yet wilder scenes of silvan solitude. Here the red rays of the sun shot a broken and discoloured light, that partially hung upon the shattered boughs and mossy trunks of the trees, and there they illuminated in brilliant patches the portions of turf to which they made their way. A considerable open space, in the midst of this glade, seemed formerly to have been dedicated to the rites of Druidical superstition; for, on the summit of a hillock, so regular as to seem artificial, there still remained part of a circle of rough unhewn stones, of large dimensions. Seven stood upright; the rest had been dislodged from their places, probably by the zeal of some convert to Christianity, and lay, some prostrate near their former site, and others on the side of the hill. One large stone only had found its way to the bottom, and in stopping the course of a small brook, which glided smoothly round the foot of the eminence, gave, by its opposition, a feeble voice of murmur to the placid and elsewhere silent streamlet.

The human figures which completed this landscape, were in number two, partaking, in their dress, and appearance, of that wild and rustic character, which belonged to the woodlands of the West Riding of Yorkshire at that early period. The eldest of these men had a stern, savage, and wild aspect. His garment was of the simplest form imaginable, being a close jacket with sleeves, composed of the tanned skin of some animal, on which the hair had been originally left, but which had been worn off in so many places, that it would have been difficult to distinguish, from the patches that remained, to what creature the fur had belonged. This primeval vestment reached from the throat to the knees, and served at once all the usual purposes of body-clothing; there was no wider opening at the collar, than was necessary to admit the passage of the head, from which it may be inferred, that it was put on by slipping it over the head and shoulders, in the manner of a modern shirt, or ancient hauberk. Sandals, bound with thongs made of boars' hide, protected the feet, and a roll of thin leather was twined artificially round the legs, and, ascending above the calf, left the knees bare, like those of a Scottish Highlander. To make the jacket sit yet more close to the body, it was gathered at the middle by a broad leathern belt, secured by a brass buckle; to one side of which was attached a sort of scrip, and to the other a ram's horn, accoutred with a mouthpiece, for the purpose of blowing. In the same belt was stuck one of those long, broad, sharp-pointed, and two-edged knives, with a buck's-horn handle, which were fabricated in the neighbourhood, and bore even at this early period the name of a Sheffield whittle. The man had no covering upon his head, which was only defended by his own thick hair, matted and twisted together, and scorched by the influence of the sun into a rusty dark-red colour, forming a contrast with the overgrown beard upon his cheeks, which was rather of a yellow or amber hue. One part of his dress only remains, but it is too remarkable to be suppressed; it was a brass ring, resembling a dog's collar, but without any opening, and soldered fast round his neck, so loose as to form no impediment to his breathing, yet so tight as to be incapable of being removed, excepting by the use of the file. On this singular gorget was engraved, in Saxon letters, an inscription of the following purport:—"Gurth, the son of Beowulph, is the born thrall of Cedric of Rotherwood."

Beside the swineherd, for such was Gurth's occupation, was seated, upon one of the fallen Druidical monuments, a person about ten years younger in appearance, and whose dress, though resembling his companion's in form, was of better materials, and of a more fantastic description. His jacket had been stained of a bright purple hue, upon which there had been some attempt to paint grotesque ornaments in different colours. To the jacket he added a short cloak, which scarcely reached half way down his thigh; it was of crimson cloth, though a good deal soiled, lined with bright yellow; and as he could transfer it from one shoulder to the other, or at his pleasure draw it all around him, its width, contrasted with its want of longitude, formed a fantastic piece of drapery. He had thin silver bracelets upon his arms, and on his neck a collar of the same metal, bearing the inscription, "Wamba, the son of Witless, is the thrall of Cedric of Rotherwood." This person-

age had the same sort of sandals with his c
but instead of the roll of leather thong, hi cased in a sort of gaiters, of which one w
the other yellow. He was provided also w having around it more than one bell, abo
of those attached to hawks, which jing turned his head to one side or other; and dom remained a minute in the same po
sound might be considered as incessant
the edge of this cap was a stiff bandeau cut at the top into open work, resembling while a prolonged bag arose from within down on one shoulder like an old fashioned or a jelly-bag, or the head-gear of a mode
It was to this part of the cap that the attached; which circumstance, as well as
of his head-dress, and his own half-crazed, ning expression of countenance, sufficient
him out as belonging to the race of domes
or jesters, maintained in the houses of th
to help away the tedium of those linger
which they were obliged to spend within d bore, like his companion, a scrip, attach belt, but had neither horn nor knife, being considered as belonging to a class whos seemed dangerous to intrust with edged-
place of these he was equipped with a swor resembling that with which Harlequin op wonders upon the modern stage.

The outward appearance of these two m scarce a stronger contrast than their loo meanour. That of the serf, or bondsman and sullen; his aspect was bent on the gr
an air of deep dejection, which might b construed into apathy, had not the fi
occasionally sparkled in his red eye manif
there slumbered, under the appearance of pondency, a sense of oppression, and a disp resistance. The looks of Wamba, on the ot indicated, as usual with his class, a sort curiosity, and fidgetty impatience of any repose, together with the utmost self-s respecting his own situation, and the a which he made. The dialogue which th tained between them was carried on in Angl
which, as we said before, was universally s
the inferior classes, excepting the Norman and the immediate personal dependants of feudal nobles. But to give their conversatio original would convey but little informatio modern reader, for whose benefit we beg to following translation:

"The curse of St. Withold upon thes porkers!" said the swineherd, after blowing obstreperously, to collect together the scatt
of swine, which, answering his call w
equally melodious, made, however, no ha
move themselves from the luxurious banquet mast and acorns on which they had fatte
forsake the marshy banks of the rivul
several of them, half plunged in mud, lay su
their ease, altogether regardless of the voic keeper. "The curse of St. Withold upon t upon me!" said Gurth; "if the two-legged not up some of them ere nightfall, I am no Here, Fangs! Fangs!" he ejaculated at t his voice to a ragged wolfish-looking dog,
lurcher, half mastiff, half greyhound, w
limping about as if for the purpose of seco
master in collecting the refractory grun
which, in fact, from misapprehension of th
herd's signals, ignorance of his duty, or m pense, only drove them hither and thit increased the evil which he seemed to remedy. "A devil draw the teeth of hi
Gurth, "and the mother of mischief conf
Ranger of the forest, that cuts the foreclaw
dogs, and makes them unfit for their trade!*

*A most sensible grievance of those aggrieved thus Forest Laws. These oppressive enactments were t of the Norman Conquest, for the Saxon laws of the mild and humane; while those of William, and attached to the exercise and its rights, were to the tyrannical. The formation of the New Forest beca
to his passion for hunting, where he reduced man

help me an thou beest a man; take a turn the back o' the hill to gain the wind on them; hen thou'st got the weather-gage, thou mayst hem before thee as gently as so many innocent

aly," said Wamba, without stirring from the 'I have consulted my legs upon this matter, ey are altogether of opinion, that to carry my rments through these sloughs, would be an unfriendship to my sovereign person and royal robe; wherefore, Gurth, I advise thee to call off , and leave the herd to their destiny, which, r they meet with bands of travelling soldiers, utlaws, or of wandering pilgrims, can be little an to be converted into Normans before morn- thy no small ease and comfort."

e swine turned Normans to my comfort!" Gurth; "expound that to me, Wamba, for ain is too dull, and my mind too vexed to read

hy, how call you those grunting brutes running n their four legs?" demanded Wamba.

vine, fool, swine," said the herd, "every fool that."

nd swine is good Saxon," said the Jester; ow call you the sow when she is flayed, and , and quartered, and hung up by the heels, like or?"

rk," answered the swineherd.

m very glad every fool knows that too," said n, "and pork, I think, is good Norman h; and so when the brute lives, and is in the of a Saxon slave, she goes by her Saxon ; but becomes a Norman, and is called pork, she is carried to the Castle-hall to feast among obles; what dost thou think of this, friend , ha?"

is but too true doctrine, friend Wamba, how- got into thy fool's pate."

y, I can tell you more," said Wamba, in the one; "there is old Alderman Ox continues to s Saxon epithet while he is under the charge s and bondsmen such as thou, but becomes fiery French gallant, when he arrives before rshipful jaws that are destined to consume Mynheer Calf, too, becomes Monsieur de n the like manner; he is Saxon when he s tendance, and takes a Norman name when mes matter of enjoyment."

St. Dunstan," answered Gurth, "thou speak- sad truths; little is left to us but the air we and that appears to have been reserved with hesitation, solely for the purpose of enabling endure the tasks they lay upon our shoulders. est and the fattest is for their board; the love- for their couch; the best and bravest supply oreign masters with soldiers, and whiten lands with their bones, leaving few here who ther will or the power to protect the unfortunate God's blessing on our Master Cedric, he one the work of a man in standing in the gap; ginald Front-de-Bœuf is coming down to this in person, and we shall soon see how edric's trouble will avail him.—Here, here," he led again, raising his voice, "So ho! so ho!

to the condition of that one commemorated by my Mr. William Stewart Rose,

"Amongst the ruins of the church
The midnight raven found a perch,
A melancholy place;
The ruthless Conqueror cast down,
Wo worth the deed, that little town,
To lengthen out his chase."

isabling dogs which might be necessary for keeping nd herds, from running at the deer, was called lawing, in general use. The Charter of the Forest, designed to ose evils, declares that inquisition, or view, for lawing all be made every third year, and shall be then done by w and testimony of lawful men, not otherwise; and ose dogs shall be then found unlawed, shall give three for mercy; and for the future, no man's ox shall be r lawing. Such lawing also shall be done by the assize ly used, and which is, that three claws shall be cut off the ball off the right foot. See on this subject the al Essay on the Magna Charta of King John, (a most volume,) by Richard Thompson.

Z

well done, Fangs! thou hast them all before thee now and bring'st them on bravely, lad."

"Gurth," said the Jester, "I know thou thinkest me a fool, or thou wouldst not be so rash in putting thy head into my mouth. One word to Reginald Front-de-Bœuf, or Philip de Malvoisin, that thou hast spoken treason against the Norman,—and thou art but a castaway swineherd,—thou wouldst waver on one of these trees as a terror to all evil speakers against dignities."

"Dog, thou wouldst not betray me," said Gurth, "after having led me on to speak so much at disadvantage?"

"Betray thee!" answered the Jester; "no, that were the trick of a wise man; a fool cannot half so well help himself—but soft, whom have we here?" he said, listening to the trampling of several horses which became then audible.

"Never mind whom," answered Gurth, who had now got his herd before him, and, with the aid of Fangs, was driving them down one of the long dim vistas which we have endeavoured to describe.

"Nay, but I must see the riders," answered Wamba; "perhaps they are come from Fairy-land with a message from King Oberon."

"A murrain take thee!" rejoined the swineherd; "wilt thou talk of such things, while a terrible storm of thunder and lightning is raging within a few miles of us? Hark, how the thunder rumbles! and for summer rain, I never saw such broad downright flat drops fall out of the clouds; the oaks, too, notwithstanding the calm weather, sob and creak with their great boughs as if announcing a tempest. Thou canst play the rational if thou wilt; credit me for once, and let us home ere the storm begins to rage, for the night will be fearful."

Wamba seemed to feel the force of this appeal, and accompanied his companion, who began his journey after catching up a long quarter-staff which lay upon the grass beside him. This second Eumæus strode hastily down the forest glade, driving before him, with the assistance of Fangs, the whole herd of his inharmonious charge.

CHAPTER II.

A Monk there was, a fayre for the maistrie,
An outrider that loved venerie;
A manly man, to be an Abbot able,
Full many a daintie horse had he in stable:
And when he rode, men might his bridle hear
Gingeling in a whistling wind as clere,
And eke as loud, as doth the chapell bell,
There as this lord was keeper of the cell.

CHAUCER.

Notwithstanding the occasional exhortation and chiding of his companion, the noise of the horsemen's feet continuing to approach, Wamba could not be prevented from lingering occasionally on the road, upon every pretence which occurred; now catching from the hazel a cluster of half-ripe nuts, and now turning his head to leer after a cottage maiden who crossed their path. The horsemen, therefore, soon overtook them on the road.

Their numbers amounted to ten men, of whom the two who rode foremost seemed to be persons of considerable importance, and the others their attendants. It was not difficult to ascertain the condition and character of one of these personages. He was obviously an ecclesiastic of high rank; his dress was that of a Cistercian Monk, but composed of materials much finer than those which the rule of that order admitted. His mantle and hood were of the best Flanders cloth, and fell in ample, and not ungraceful folds, around a handsome, though somewhat corpulent person. His countenance bore as little the marks of self-denial, as his habit indicated contempt of worldly splendour. His features might have been called good, had there not lurked under the pent-house of his eye, that sly epicurean twinkle which indicates the cautious voluptuary. In other respects his profession and situation had taught him a ready command over his countenance, which he could contract at pleasure into solemnity, although its natural expression was that of good-humoured social indul gence. In defiance of conventual rules, and the edicts of popes and councils, the sleeves of this dignitary were lined and turned up with rich furs, his mantle secured at the throat with a golden clasp, and the whole dress proper to his order as much refined upon and ornamented, as that of a quaker beauty of the present day, who, while she retains the garb and costume of her sect, continues to give to its simplicity, by the choice of materials and the mode of disposing them, a certain air of coquettish attraction, savouring but too much of the vanities of the world.

This worthy churchman rode upon a well-fed ambling mule, whose furniture was highly decorated, and whose bridle, according to the fashion of the day, was ornamented with silver bells. In his seat he had nothing of the awkwardness of the convent, but displayed the easy and habitual grace of a well-trained horseman. Indeed, it seemed that so humble a conveyance as a mule, in however good case, and however well broken to a pleasant and accommodating amble, was only used by the gallant monk for travelling on the road. A lay brother, one of those who followed in the train, had, for his use on other occasions, one of the most handsome Spanish jennets ever bred in Andalusia, which merchants used at that time to import, with great trouble and risk, for the use of persons of wealth and distinction. The saddle and housings of this superb palfrey were covered by a long foot-cloth, which reached nearly to the ground, and on which were richly embroidered, mitres, crosses, and other ecclesiastical emblems. Another lay brother led a sumpter mule, loaded probably with his superior's baggage; and two monks of his own order, of inferior station, rode together in the rear, laughing and conversing with each other, without taking much notice of the other members of the cavalcade.

The companion of the church dignitary was a man past forty, thin, strong, tall, and muscular; an athletic figure, which long fatigue and constant exercise seemed to have left none of the softer part of the human form, having reduced the whole to brawn, bones, and sinews, which had sustained a thousand toils, and were ready to dare a thousand more. His head was covered with a scarlet cap, faced with fur,—of that kind which the French call mortier, from its resemblance to the shape of an inverted mortar. His countenance was therefore fully displayed, and its expression was calculated to impress a degree of awe, if not of fear, upon strangers. High features, naturally strong and powerfully expressive, had been burnt almost into Negro blackness by constant exposure to the tropical sun, and might, in their ordinary state, be said to slumber after the storm of passion had passed away; but the projection of the veins of the forehead, the readiness with which the upper lip and its thick black moustaches quivered upon the slightest emotion, plainly intimated that the tempest might be again and easily awakened. His keen, piercing, dark eyes, told in every glance a history of difficulties subdued, and dangers dared, and seemed to challenge opposition to his wishes, for the pleasure of sweeping it from his road by a determined exertion of courage and of will; a deep scar on his brow gave additional sternness to his countenance, and a sinister expression to one of his eyes, which had been slightly injured on the same occasion, and of which the vision, though perfect, was in a slight and partial degree distorted.

The upper dress of this personage resembled that of his companion in shape, being a long monastic mantle; but the colour, being scarlet, showed that he did not belong to any of the four regular orders of monks. On the right shoulder of the mantle there was cut, in white cloth, a cross of a peculiar form. This upper robe concealed what at first view seemed rather inconsistent with its form, a shirt, namely, of linked mail, with sleeves and gloves of the same, curiously plaited and interwoven, as flexible to the body as those which are now wrought in the stocking-loom, out of less obdurate materials. The fore-part of his thighs, where the folds of his mantle permitted them to be seen, were also covered with linked mail; the knees and feet were defended by splints, or thin plates of steel, ingeniously jointed upon each other; and mail

hose, reaching from the ankle to the knee, e protected the legs, and completed the rider's armour. In his girdle he wore a long an edged dagger, which was the only offensiv
about his person.

He rode, not a mule, like his compani
strong hackney for the road, to save his ga
horse, which a squire led behind, fully acc
battle, with a chamfron or plaited head-p his head, having a short spike projecting front. On one side of the saddle hung a sh axe, richly inlaid with Damascene carvin
other the rider's plumed head-piece and hoo
with a long two-handed sword, used by th of the period. A second squire held aloft hi lance, from the extremity of which flutter banderole, or streamer, bearing a cross of form with that embroidered upon his cloak.
carried his small triangular shield, broad e
the top to protect the breast, and from thence ing to a point. It was covered with a sca which prevented the device from being seen

These two squires were followed by two at whose dark visages, white turbans, and th
form of their garments, showed them to be some distant Eastern country.* The who ance of this warrior and his retinue was wil
landish; the dress of his squires was gorg
his Eastern attendants wore silver collars r
throats, and bracelets of the same metal u swarthy legs and arms, of which the for naked from the elbow, and the latter from m ankle. Silk and embroidery distinguished th es, and marked the wealth and importanc
master; forming, at the same time, a strikin
with the martial simplicity of his own atti
were armed with crooked sabres, having th baldric inlaid with gold, and matched with daggers of yet more costly workmanship.
them bore at his saddle-bow a bundle of da
velins, about four feet in length, having sh heads, a weapon much in use among the
and of which the memory is yet preserv
martial exercise called El Jerrid, still pract Eastern countries.

The steeds of these attendants were in ap
as foreign as their riders. They were of Sa gin, and consequently of Arabian descent;
fine slender limbs, small fetlocks, thin m
easy springy motion, formed a marked con
the large-jointed heavy horses, of which the cultivated in Flanders and in Normandy, f
ing the men-at-arms of the period in all th
of plate and mail; and which, placed by t
those Eastern coursers, might have passed sonification of substance and of shadow.

* The severe accuracy of some critics has objected plexion of the slaves of Brian de Bois-Guilbert, as b out of costume and propriety. I remember the sam being made to a set of sable functionaries, whom my Lewis introduced as the guards and mischief-doing the wicked Baron, in his Castle Spectre. Mat treat
tion with great contempt, and averred in reply, th
the slaves black, in order to obtain a striking effect c
and that, could he have derived a similar advantage f
his heroine blue, blue she should have been.

I do not pretend to plead the immunities of my ord
as this; but neither will I allow that the author o
antique romance is obliged to confine himself to th
tion of those manners only which can be proved to lutely existed in the times he is depicting, so that himself to such as are plausible and natural, and con
vious anachronism. In this point of view, what c natural, than that the Templars, who, we know, co
the luxuries of the Asiatic warriors with whom t
should use the service of the enslaved Africans, wh
of war transferred to new masters? I am sure, if th precise proofs of their having done so, there is noth
other hand, that can entitle us positively to conclu never did. Besides, there is an instance in romance
John of Rampayne, an excellent juggler and minst took to effect the escape of one Audulf de Bracy, by himself in disguise at the court of the king, where h fined. For this purpose, "he stained his hair and body entirely as black as jet, so that nothing was wh teeth," and succeeded in imposing himself on the Ethiopian minstrel. He effected, by stratagem, the the prisoner. Negroes, therefore, must have been England in the dark ages.*

* Dissertation on Romance and Minstrelsy, prefix son's Ancient Metrical Romances, p. clxxxvii.

igular appearance of this cavalcade not only the curiosity of Wamba, but excited even is less volatile companion. The monk he knew to be the Prior of Jorvaulx Abbey, wn for many miles around as a lover of the the banquet, and, if fame did him not wrong, worldly pleasures still more inconsistent monastic vows loos were the rules of the times respecting ict of the clergy, who were secular or regular. Prior Aymer maintained a fair character to bourhood of his abbey. His free and jovial and the readiness with which he granted n from all ordinary delinquencies, rendered ourite among the nobility and principal gen ral of which he was allied by birth, being nguished Norman family. The ladies, in ; were not disposed to scan too nicely the f a man who was a professed admirer of and who possessed many means of dispell omui which was too apt to intrude upon the bowers of an ancient feudal castle. The ngled in the sports of the field with more eagerness, and was allowed to possess the ed hawks and the fleetest greyhounds in the ding; circumstances which strongly recom him to the youthful gentry. With the old, he ther part to play, which, when needful, he tain with great decorum. His knowledge s, however superficial, was sufficient to pon their ignorance respect for his supposed , and the gravity of his deportment and lan ith the high tone which he exerted in setting authority of the Church and of the priest pressed them no less with an opinion of his

Even the common people, the severest the conduct of their betters, had commise th the follies of Prior Aymer. He was ge d charity, as it is well known, covereth a of sins, in another sense than that in which to do so in scripture. The revenues of the y, of which a large part was at his dispo they gave him the means of supplying his considerable expenses, afforded also those which he bestowed among the peasantry, which he frequently relieved the distresses press d. If Prior Aymer rode hard in the remained long at the banquet,—if Prior as seen at the early peep of dawn, to enter rn of the abbey, as he strided home from dezvous which had occupied the hours of men only shrugged up their shoulders, and l themselves to his irregularities by recollect ne same were practised by many of his breth had no redeeming qualities whatsoever to them. Prior Aymer, therefore, and his cha ere well known to our Saxon serfs, who ir rude obeisance, and received his "benedi fitz," in return.

singular appearance of his companion and dants, arrested their attention and excited der, and they could scarcely attend to the Jorvaulx' question, when he demanded if v of any place of harbourage in the vicinity ; were they surprised at the half monastic, tary appearance of the worthy stranger, e uncouth dress and arms of his Eastern s. It is probable, too, that the language in a benediction was conferred, and the inter sked, sounded ungracious, though not pro ntelligible, in the ears of the Saxon peasants. d you, my children," said the Prior, rusing and using the lingua Franca, or mixed lan which the Norman and Saxon races con th each other, "if there be in this neigh any good man, who, for the love of God, tion to Mother Church, will give two wea ervants, with their train, a night's hospi refreshment ?"

spoke with a tone of conscious importance, med a strong contrast to the modest terms thought it proper to employ.

of the humblest servants of Mother Church !" Wamba to himself, but, fool as he was, taking care not to make his observation audible; "I should like to see her seneschals, her chief butlers, and her other principal domestics!"

After this internal commentary on the Prior's speech, he raised his eyes, and replied to the question which had been put.

"If the reverend fathers," he said, "loved good cheer and soft lodging, few miles of riding would carry them to the Priory of Brunxworth, where their quality could not but secure them the most honourable reception; or if they preferred spending a contemplative evening, they might turn down yonder wood glade, which would bring them to the hermitage of Copmanhurst, where a pious anchoret would make them sharers for the night of the shelter of his roof and the benefit of his prayers."

The Prior shook his head at both proposals.

"Mine honest friend," said he, "in the ringing of thy bells had not dizzied thine understanding, thou mightest know Clericus clericum non decimat; that is to say, we clergy brethren do not exhaust each other's piety, but rather require that of the laity, giving them thus an opportunity to serve God in honouring and relieving his appointed servants."

"It is true," replied Wamba, "that I, being but an ass, am, nevertheless, honoured to bear the relics as well as your reverence's mule; notwithstanding, I did conceive that the charity of Mother Church and her servants might be said, with other charity, to begin at home."

"A truce to thine insolence, fellow," said the armed rider, breaking in on his prattle with a high and stern voice, "and tell us, if thou canst, the road to—— How call'd you your Franklin, Prior Aymer ?"

"Cedric," answered the Prior; "Cedric the Saxon. —Tell me, good fellow, are we near his dwelling, and can you show us the road ?"

"The road will be uneasy to find," answered Gurth, who broke silence for the first time, "and the family of Cedric retire early to rest."

"Tush, tell not me, fellow!" said the military rider; "'tis easy for them to arise and supply the wants of travellers such as we are, who will not stoop to beg the hospitality which we have a right to command."

"I know not," said Gurth, sullenly, "if I should show the way to my master's house, to those who demand as a right, the shelter which most are fain to ask as a favour."

"Do you dispute with me, slave!" said the soldier; and, setting spurs to his horse, he caused him make a demivolte across the path, raising at the same time the riding rod which he held in his hand, with a purpose of chastising what he considered as the insolence of the peasant.

Gurth darted at him a savage and revengeful scowl, and with a fierce, yet hesitating motion, laid his hand on the haft of his knife; but the interference of Prior Aymer, who pushed his mule betwixt his companion and the swineherd, prevented the meditated violence.

"Nay, by St. Mary, brother Brian, you must not think you are now in Palestine, predominating over heathen Turks and infidel Saracens; we islanders love not blows, save those of holy Church, who chasteneth whom she loveth. Tell me, good fellow," said he to Wamba, and seconded his speech by a small piece of silver coin, "the way to Cedric the Saxon's; you cannot be ignorant of it, and it is your duty to direct the wanderer, even when his character is less sanctified than ours."

"In truth, venerable father," answered the Jester, "the Saracen head of your right reverend companion has frightened out of mine the way home. I am not sure I shall get there to-night myself."

"Tush," said the Abbot, "thou canst tell us if thou wilt. This reverend brother has been all his life engaged in fighting among the Saracens for the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre; he is of the order of Knights Templars, whom you may have heard of; he is half a monk, half a soldier."

"If he is but half a monk," said the Jester, "he should not be wholly unreasonable with those whom he meets upon the road, even if they should be in no hurry to answer questions that no way concern them.

"I forgive thy wit," replied the Abbot, "on condition thou wilt show me the way to Cedric's mansion."

"Well, then," answered Wamba, "your reverences must hold on this path till you come to a sunken cross, of which scarce a cubit's length remains above ground; then take the path to the left, for there are four which meet at Sunken Cross, and I trust your reverences will obtain shelter before the storm comes on."

The Abbot thanked his sage adviser; and the cavalcade, setting spurs to their horses, rode on as men who wished to reach their inn before the bursting of a night-storm. As their horses' hoofs died away, Gurth said to his companion, "If they follow thy wise direction, the reverend fathers will hardly reach Rotherwood this night."

"No," said the Jester, grinning, "but they may reach Sheffield if they have good luck, and that is as fit a place for them. I am not so bad a woodsman as to show the dog where the deer lies, if I have no mind he should chase him."

"Thou art right," said Gurth; "it were ill that Aymer saw the Lady Rowena; and it were worse, it may be, for Cedric to quarrel, as is most likely he would, with this military monk. But, like good servants, let us hear and see, and say nothing."

We return to the riders, who had soon left the bondsmen far behind them, and who maintained the following conversation in the Norman-French language, usually employed by the superior classes, with the exception of the few who were still inclined to boast their Saxon descent.

"What mean these fellows by their capricious insolence?" said the Templar to the Cistercian, "and why did you prevent me from chastising it?"

"Marry, brother Brian," replied the Prior, "touching the one of them, it were hard for me to render a reason for a fool speaking according to his folly; and the other churl is of that savage, fierce, intractable race, some of whom, as I have often told you, are still to be found among the descendants of the conquered Saxons, and whose supreme pleasure it is to testify, by all means in their power, their aversion to their conquerors."

"I would soon have beat him into courtesy," observed Brian; "I am accustomed to deal with such spirits: Our Turkish captives are as fierce and intractable as Odin himself could have been; yet two months in my household, under the management of my master of the slaves, has made them humble, submissive, serviceable, and observant of your will. Marry, sir, you must beware of the poison and the dagger; for they use either with free will when you give them the slightest opportunity."

"Ay, but," answered Prior Aymer, "every land has its own manners and fashions; and, besides that beating this fellow could procure us no information respecting the road to Cedric's house, it would have been sure to have established a quarrel betwixt you and him had we found our way thither. Remember what I told you; this wealthy Franklin is proud, fierce, jealous, and irritable; a withstander of the nobility, and even of his neighbours, Reginald Front-de-Bœuf and Philip Malvoisin, who are no babes to strive with. He stands up so sternly for the privileges of his race, and is so proud of his uninterrupted descent from Hereward, a renowned champion of the Heptarchy, that he is universally called Cedric the Saxon; and makes a boast of his belonging to a people from whom many others endeavour to hide their descent, lest they should encounter a share of the vae victis, or severities imposed upon the vanquished."

"Prior Aymer," said the Templar, "you are a man of gallantry, learned in the study of beauty, and as expert as a troubadour in all matters concerning the arrets of love; but I shall expect much beauty in this celebrated Rowena, to counterbalance the self-denial and forbearance which I must exert, if I am to court the favour of such a seditious churl as you have described her father Cedric."

"Cedric is not her father," replied the Prior, "and is but of remote relation; she is descended from higher blood than even he pretends to, and is but distantly connected with him by birth. Her guardian, how-ever, he is, self-constituted as I believe; but is as dear to him as if she were his own c her beauty you shall soon be judge; and if
of her complexion, and the majestic, yet so son of a mild blue eye, do not chase from scory the black-tressed girls of Palestine, houris of old Mahound's paradise, I am an i
no true son of the church."

"Should your boasted beauty," said the
"be weighed in the balance and found wan
know our wager?"

"My gold collar," answered the Prior,
ten butts of Chian wine;—they are mine a
as if they were already in the convent vau
the key of old Dennis the cellarer."

"And I am myself to be judge," said the
"and I am only to be convicted on my own
sion, that I have seen no maiden so beau
Pentecost was a twelvemonth. Ran it n
Prior, your collar is in danger; I will wear
gorget in the lists of Ashby-de-la-Zouche."

"Win it fairly," said the Prior, "and wea
will; I will trust your giving true respo word as knight and as churchman. Ye take a hint, and train your tongue to a l
courtesy than your habits of predominating
infidel captives and Eastern bondsmen have ac
you. Cedric the Saxon, if offended,—and was slack in taking offence,—is a man wh
respect to your knighthood, my high office
sanctity of either, would clear his house o
send us to lodge with the larks, though the midnight. And be careful how you look on whom he cherishes with the most jealous ca
take the least alarm in that quarter we are
is said he banished his only son
family for lifting his eyes in the way of af
who may be worshipped, it would seem,
at a distance, but is not to be approached w
thoughts than such as we bring to the shr Blessed Virgin."

"Well, you have said enough," answered
plar; "I will for a night put on the needful and deport me as meekly as a maiden; but fear of his expelling us by violence, myself an with Hamet and Abdalla, will warrant yo that disgrace. Doubt not that we shall enough to make good our quarters."

"We must not let it come so far," ans Prior; "but here is the clown's sunken cro
night is so dark that we can hardly see wh roads we are to follow. He bid us turn I th left."

"To the right," said Brian, "to the best remembrance."

"To the left, certainly, the left; I rem pointing with his wooden sword."

"Ay, but he held his sword in his left han pointed across his body with it," said the Te

Each maintained his opinion with sufficie nacy, as is usual in all such cases; the a
were appealed to, but they had not been ne
to hear Wamba's directions. At length Bria
ed, what had at first escaped him in the twilig is some one either asleep or lying dead at this cross—Hugo, stir him with the butt-e lance."

This was no sooner done than the figure claiming in good French, "Whosoever tho discourteous in you to disturb my thoughts."

"We did but wish to ask you," said the P
road to Rotherwood, the abode of Cedric th

"I myself am bound thither," replied the
"and if I had a horse, I would be your gu
way is somewhat intricate, though perf
known to me."

"Thou shalt have both thanks and re friend," said the Prior, "if thou wilt bring dric's in safety."

And he caused one of his attendants to m own led horse, and give that upon which he erto ridden to the stranger, who was to se guide.

Their conductor pursued an opposite road which Wamba had recommended, for the purpose of misleading them. The path soon led deeper into the woodland, and crossed more than one brook, the approach to which was rendered perilous by the marshes through which it flowed; but the stranger seemed to know, as if by instinct, the soundest ground and the safest points of passage; and by dint of caution and attention, brought the party safely into a wider avenue than any they had yet seen; and, pointing to a large low irregular building at the upper extremity, he said to the Prior, "Yonder is Rotherwood, the dwelling of Cedric the Saxon."

This was a joyful intimation to Aymer, whose nerves were none of the strongest, and who had suffered such agitation and alarm in the course of passing through the dangerous bogs, that he had not yet had the curiosity to ask his guide a single question. Finding himself now at his ease and near shelter, his curiosity began to awake, and he demanded of the guide who and what he was.

"A Palmer, just returned from the Holy Land," was the answer.

"You had better have tarried there to fight for the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre," said the Templar.

"True, Reverend Sir Knight," answered the Palmer, to whom the appearance of the Templar seemed perfectly familiar; "but when those who are under oath to recover the holy city, are found travelling at such a distance from the scene of their duties, can you wonder that a peaceful peasant like me should decline the task which they have abandoned?"

The Templar would have made an angry reply, but was interrupted by the Prior, who again expressed his astonishment, that their guide, after such long absence, should be so perfectly acquainted with the passes of the forest.

"I was born a native of these parts," answered their guide, and as he made the reply they stood before the mansion of Cedric;—a low irregular building, containing several court-yards, or enclosures, extending over a considerable space of ground, and which, though its size argued the inhabitant to be a person of wealth, differed entirely from the tall, turretted, and castellated buildings in which the Norman nobility resided, and which had become the universal style of architecture throughout England.

Rotherwood was not, however, without defences; no habitation, in that disturbed period, could have been so, without the risk of being plundered and burnt before the next morning. A deep fosse, or ditch, was drawn round the whole building, and filled with water from a neighbouring stream. A double stockade, or palisade, composed of pointed beams, which the adjacent forest supplied, defended the outer and inner bank of the trench. There was an entrance from the west through the outer stockade, which communicated by a drawbridge, with a similar opening in the interior defences. Some precautions had been taken to place those entrances under the protection of projecting angles, by which they might be flanked in case of need by archers or slingers.

Before this entrance the Templar wound his horn loudly; for the rain, which had long threatened, began now to descend with great violence.

CHAPTER III.

Then (sad relief!) from the bleak coast that hears
The German Ocean roar, deep-blooming, strong,
And yellow-haired, the blue-eyed Saxon came.
THOMSON'S Liberty.

In a hall, the height of which was greatly disproportioned to its extreme length and width, a long oaken table formed of planks rough-hewn from the forest, and which had scarcely received any polish, stood ready prepared for the evening meal of Cedric the Saxon. The roof, composed of beams and rafters, had nothing to divide the apartment from the sky excepting the planking and thatch; there was a huge fireplace at either end of the hall, but as the chimneys were constructed in a very clumsy manner, at least as much of the smoke found its way into the apartment as escaped by the proper vent. The constant vapour which this occasioned, had polished the rafters and beams of the low-browed hall, by encrusting them with a black varnish of soot. On the sides of the apartment hung implements of war and of the chase, and there were at each corner folding doors, which gave access to other parts of the extensive building.

The other appointments of the mansion partook of the rude simplicity of the Saxon period, which Cedric piqued himself upon maintaining. The floor was composed of earth mixed with lime, trodden into a hard substance, such as is often employed in flooring our modern barns. For about one quarter of the length of the apartment, the floor was raised by a step, and this space, which was called the dais, was occupied only by the principal members of the family, and visitors of distinction. For this purpose, a table richly covered with scarlet cloth was placed transversely across the platform, from the middle of which ran the longer and lower board, at which the domestics and inferior persons fed, down towards the bottom of the hall. The whole resembled the form of the letter T, or some of those ancient dinner tables, which, arranged on the same principles, may be still seen in the antique Colleges of Oxford or Cambridge. Massive chairs and settles of carved oak were placed upon the dais, and over these seats and the more elevated table was fastened a canopy of cloth, which served in some degree to protect the dignitaries who occupied that distinguished station from the weather, and especially from the rain, which in some places found its way through the ill-constructed roof.

The walls of this upper end of the hall, as far as the dais extended, were covered with hangings or curtains, and upon the floor there was a carpet, both of which were adorned with some attempts at tapestry, or embroidery, executed with brilliant or rather gaudy colouring. Over the lower range of table, the roof, as we have noticed, had no covering; the rough plastered walls were left bare, and the rude earthen floor was uncarpeted; the board was uncovered by a cloth, and rude massive benches supplied the place of chairs.

In the centre of the upper table, were placed two chairs more elevated than the rest, for the master and mistress of the family, who presided over the scene of hospitality, and from doing so derived their Saxon title of honour, which signifies "the Dividers of Bread."

To each of these chairs was added a footstool, curiously carved and inlaid with ivory, which mark of distinction was peculiar to them. One of these seats was at present occupied by Cedric the Saxon, who, though but in rank a thane, or, as the Normans called him, a Franklin, felt, at the delay of his evening meal, an irritable impatience, which might have become an alderman, whether of ancient or of modern times.

It appeared, indeed, from the countenance of this proprietor, that he was of a frank, but hasty and choleric temper. He was not above the middle stature, but broad-shouldered, long-armed, and powerfully made, like one accustomed to endure the fatigue of war or of the chase; his face was broad, with large blue eyes, open and frank features, fine teeth, and a well formed head, altogether expressive of that sort of good-humour which often lodges with a sudden and hasty temper. Pride and jealousy there was in his eye, for his life had been spent in asserting rights which were constantly liable to invasion; and the prompt, fiery, and resolute disposition of the man, had been kept constantly upon the alert by the circumstances of his situation. His long yellow hair was equally divided on the top of his head and upon his brow, and combed down on each side to the length of his shoulders; it had but little tendency to gray, although Cedric was approaching to his sixtieth year.

His dress was a tunic of forest green, furred at the throat and cuffs with what was called minever; a kind of fur inferior in quality to ermine, and formed, it is believed, of the skin of the gray squirrel. This doublet hung unbuttoned over a close dress of scarlet which sate tight to his body; he had breeches of the same, but they did not reach below the lower part of the thigh, leaving the knee exposed. His feet had sandals of the same fashion with the peasants, but of finer materials, and secured in the front with golden clasps. He had bracelets of gold upon his arms, and a broad collar of the same precious metal around his neck. About his waist he wore a richly studded belt, in which was stuck a short straight two-edged sword, with a sharp point, so disposed as to hang almost perpendicularly by his side. Behind his seat was hung a scarlet cloth cloak lined with fur, and a cap of the same materials richly embroidered, which completed the dress of the opulent landholder when he chose to go forth. A short boar-spear, with a broad and bright steel head, also reclined against the back of his chair, which served him, when he walked abroad, for the purposes of a staff or of a weapon, as chance might require.

Several domestics, whose dress held various proportions betwixt the richness of their master's, and the coarse and simple attire of Gurth the swine-herd, watched the looks and waited the commands of the Saxon dignitary. Two or three servants of a superior order stood behind their master upon the dais; the rest occupied the lower part of the hall. Other attendants there were of a different description; two or three large and shaggy greyhounds, such as were then employed in hunting the stag and wolf; as many slow-hounds of a large bony breed, with thick necks, large heads, and long ears; and one or two of the smaller dogs, now called terriers, which waited with impatience the arrival of the supper; but, with the sagacious knowledge of physiognomy peculiar to their race, forbore to intrude upon the moody silence of their master, apprehensive probably of a small white truncheon which lay by Cedric's trencher, for the purpose of repelling the advances of his four-legged dependants. One grisly old wolf-dog alone, with the liberty of an indulged favourite, had planted himself close by the chair of state, and occasionally ventured to solicit notice by putting his large hairy head upon his master's knee, or pushing his nose into his hand. Even he was repelled by the stern command, "Down, Balder, down! I am not in the humour for foolery."

In fact, Cedric, as we have observed, was in no very placid state of mind. The Lady Rowena, who had been absent to attend an evening mass at a distant church, had but just returned, and was changing her garments, which had been wetted by the storm. There were as yet no tidings of Gurth and his charge, which should long since have been driven home from the forest; and such was the insecurity of the period, as to render it probable that the delay might be explained by some depredation of the outlaws, with whom the adjacent forest abounded, or by the violence of some neighbouring baron, whose consciousness of strength made him equally negligent of the laws of property. The matter was of consequence, for great part of the domestic wealth of the Saxon proprietors consisted in numerous herds of swine, especially in forest-land, where those animals easily found their food.

Besides these subjects of anxiety, the Saxon thane was impatient for the presence of his favourite clown Wamba, whose jests, such as they were, served as a sort of seasoning to his evening meal, and to the deep draughts of ale and wine with which he was in the habit of accompanying it. Add to all this, Cedric had fasted since noon, and his usual supper hour was long past, a cause of irritation common to country squires, both in ancient and modern times. His displeasure was expressed in broken sentences, partly muttered to himself, partly addressed to the domestics who stood around; and particularly to his cup-bearer, who offered him from time to time, as a sedative, a silver goblet filled with wine—"Why tarries the Lady Rowena?"

"She is but changing her head-gear," replied a female attendant, with as much confidence as the favourite lady's-maid usually answers the master of a modern family; "you would not wish her to sit down to the banquet in her hood and kirtle? and no lady within the shire can be quicker in arraying herself than my mistress."

This undeniable argument produced a sort of acquiescent umph! on the part of the Saxon, with the addition, "I wish her devotion may choose fair weather for the next visit to St. John's Kirk;—but what, in the name of ten devils," continued he, turning to the cup-bearer, and raising his voice, as if happy to have found a channel into which he might divert his indignation without fear or control—"what, in the name of ten devils keeps Gurth so long a-field? I suppose we shall have an evil account of the herd; he was wont to be a faithful and cautious drudge, and I had destined him for something better; perchance I might even have made him one of my warders.*"

Oswald the cup-bearer modestly suggested, "that it was scarce an hour since the tolling of the curfew;" an ill-chosen apology, since it turned upon a topic so harsh to Saxon ears.

"The foul fiend," exclaimed Cedric, "take the curfew bell, and the tyrannical bastard by whom it was devised, and the heartless slave who names it with a Saxon tongue to a Saxon ear! The curfew!" he added, pausing, "ay, the curfew; which compels true men to extinguish their lights, that thieves and robbers may work their deeds in darkness!—Ay, the curfew;—Reginald Front-de-Bœuf and Philip de Malvoisin know the use of the curfew as well as William the Bastard himself, or e'er a Norman adventurer that fought at Hastings. I shall hear, I guess, that my property has been swept off to save from starving the hungry banditti, whom they cannot support but by theft and robbery. My faithful slave is murdered, and my goods are taken for a prey—and Wamba—where is Wamba? Said not some one he had gone forth with Gurth?"

Oswald replied in the affirmative.

"Ay? why this is better and better! he is carried off too, the Saxon fool, to serve the Norman lord. Fools are we all indeed, that serve them, and fitter subjects for their scorn and laughter, than if we were born with but half our wits. But I will be avenged," he added, starting from his chair in impatience at the supposed injury, and catching hold of his boar-spear; "I will go with my complaint to the great council; I have friends, I have followers—man to man will I appeal the Norman to the lists; let him come in his plate and his mail, and all that can render cowardice bold; I have sent such a javelin as this through a stronger fence than three of their war shields!—Haply they think me old; but they shall find, alone and childless as I am, the blood of Hereward is in the veins of Cedric.—Ah, Wilfred, Wilfred!" he exclaimed in a lower tone, "couldst thou have ruled thine unreasonable passion, thy father had not been left in his age like the solitary oak, that throws out its shattered and unprotected branches against the full sweep of the tempest!" The reflection seemed to conjure into sadness his irritated feelings. Replacing his javelin, he resumed his seat, bent his looks downward, and appeared to be absorbed in melancholy reflection.

From his musing, Cedric was suddenly awakened by the blast of a horn, which was replied to by the clamorous yells and barking of all the dogs in the hall, and some twenty or thirty which were quartered in other parts of the building. It cost some exercise of the white truncheon, well seconded by the exertions of the domestics, to silence this canine clamour.

"To the gate, knaves!" said the Saxon, hastily, as soon as the tumult was so much appeased that the dependants could hear his voice. "See what tidings that horn tells us of—to announce, I ween, some hership† and robbery which has been done upon my lands."

Returning in less than three minutes, a warder announced, "that the Prior Aymer of Jorvaulx, and the good knight Brian de Bois-Guilbert, commander of the valiant and venerable order of Knights Templars, with a small retinue, requested hospitality and lodging

* The original has Cnichts, by which the Saxons seem to have designated a class of military attendants, sometimes free, sometimes bondsmen, but always ranking above an ordinary domestic, whether in the royal household or in those of the aldermen and thanes. But the term cnicht, now spelt knight, having been received into the English language as equivalent to the Norman word chevalier, I have avoided using it in its more ancient sense, to prevent confusion. L. T.

† Pillage.

, being on their way to a tournament
to be held not far from Ashby-de-la-
e second day from the present."
he Prior Aymer! Brian de Bois-Guil ered Cedric; "Normans both;—but Nor-on, the hospitality of Rotherwood must ched; they are welcome, since they
to halt—more welcome would they have idden further on their way. But it were murmur for a night's lodging and a
in the quality of guests, at least, even st suppress their insolence. Go, Hun-dd e, to a sort of major-domo who stood with a white wand; "take six of the nd introduce the strangers to the guests'
ok after their horses and mules, and see .k nothing. Let them have change of they require it, and fire, and water to ne and ale; and bid the cooks add what an to our evening meal; and let it be ard when those strangers are ready to
to them, Hundebert, that Cedric would hem welcome, but he is under a vow
more than three steps from the dais of his eet any one who shares not the blood of . Begone! see them carefully tended; let n their pride, the Saxon churl has shown verty and his avarice."
domo departed with several attendants,
master's commands. "The Prior Ay-
d Cedric, looking to Oswald, "the bro-take not, of Giles de Mauleverer, now ham?"
de a respectful sign of assent. "His
the seat, and usurps the patrimony, of the race of Ulfgar of Middleham; but lord doth not the same? This Prior free and jovial priest, who loves the
the bugle-horn better than bell and
; let him come, he shall be welcome.
e the Templar?"
Bois-Guilbert."
bert?" said Cedric, still in the musing,
one, which the habit of living among ad accustomed him to employ, and ded a man who talks to himself rather e around him—"Bois-Guilbert? that n spread wide both for good and evil.
s valiant as the bravest of his order;
ith their usual vices, pride, arrogance,
voluptuousness; a hard-hearted man,
either fear of earth, nor awe of heaven.
w warriors who have returned from ell; it is but for one night; he shall be
—Oswald, broach the oldest wine-cask;
t mead, the mightiest ale, the richest
st sparkling cider, the most odoriferous
on the board; fill the largest horns—
d Abbots love good wines and good ntha. let the Lady Rowena know we night expect her in the hall, unless such l pleasure."
l be her especial pleasure," answered
great readiness, "for she is ever desirous est news from Palestine."
d at the forward damsel a glance of ent; but Rowena, and whatever be-we[illegible] and secure from his [illegible] Silence, maiden; thy tongue
[illegible] Say my message to thy misier do her pleasure. Here at least, the Alfred still reigns a princess." Elgirtment
" repeated the Saxon; "Palestine!
s are turned to the tales which dissoor hypocritical pilgrims, bring from l! I too might ask—I too might in-night listen with a beating heart to the wily strollers devise to cheat us
ty—but no—The son who has dis-rinks used by the Saxons, as we are informed Morat was made of [illegible] flavoured with the s; Pigment was a sweet and rich liquor, comghly spiced and sweetened also with honey;
need no explanation. L. T.

obeyed me is no longer mine; nor will I concern myself more for his fate than for that of the most worthless among the millions that ever shaped the cross on their shoulder, rushed into excess and blood-guiltiness, and called it an accomplishment of the will of God."

He knit his brows, and fixed his eyes for an instant on the ground; as he raised them, the folding doors at the bottom of the hall were cast wide, and, preceded by the major-domo with his wand, and four domestics bearing blazing torches, the guests of the evening entered the apartment.

CHAPTER IV.

With sheep and shaggy goats the porkers bled,
And the proud steer was on the marble spread;
With fire prepared, they deal the morsels round,
Wine rosy bright the brimming goblets crown'd.
. . . .
Disposed apart, Ulysses shares the treat;
A trivet table and ignobler seat,
The Prince assigns——

Odyssey, Book 21.

The Prior Aymer had taken the opportunity afforded him, of changing his riding robe for one of yet more costly materials, over which he wore a cope curiously embroidered. Besides the massive golden signet ring, which marked his ecclesiastical dignity, his fingers, though contrary to the canon, were loaded with precious gems; his sandals were of the finest leather which was imported from Spain; his beard trimmed to as small dimensions as his order would possibly permit, and his shaven crown concealed by a scarlet cap richly embroidered.

The appearance of the Knight Templar was also changed; and, though less studiously bedecked with ornament, his dress was as rich, and his appearance far more commanding, than that of his companion. He had exchanged his shirt of mail for an under tunic of dark purple silk, garnished with furs, over which flowed his long robe of spotless white, in ample folds. The eight-pointed cross of his order was cut on the shoulder of his mantle in black velvet. The high cap no longer invested his brows, which were only shaded by short and thick curled hair of a raven blackness, corresponding to his unusually swart complexion. Nothing could be more gracefully majestic than his step and manner, had they not been marked by a predominant air of haughtiness, easily acquired by the exercise of unresisted authority.

These two dignified persons were followed by their respective attendants, and at a more humble distance by their guide, whose figure had nothing more remarkable than it derived from the usual weeds of a pilgrim. A cloak or mantle, of coarse black serge enveloped his whole body. It was in shape something like the cloak of a modern hussar, having similar flaps for covering the arms, and was called a Sclaveyn, or Sclavonian. Coarse sandals, bound with thongs, on his bare feet; a broad and shadowy hat, with cockle-shells stitched on its brim, and a long staff shod with iron, to the upper end of which was attached a branch of palm, completed the palmer's attire. He followed modestly the last of the train which entered the hall, and, observing that the lower table scarce afforded room sufficient for the domestics of Cedric and the retinue of his guests, he withdrew to a settle placed beside and almost under one of the large chimneys, and seemed to employ himself in drying his garments, until the retreat of some one should make room at the board, or the hospitality of the steward should supply him with refreshments in the place he had chosen apart.

Cedric rose to receive his guests with an air of dignified hospitality, and, descending from the dais, or elevated part of his hall, made three steps towards them, and then awaited their approach.

"I grieve," he said, "reverend Prior, that my vow binds me to advance no farther upon this floor of my fathers, even to receive such guests as you, and this valiant Knight of the Holy Temple. But my steward has expounded to you the cause of my seeming discourtesy. Let me also pray, that you will excuse my speaking to you in my native language, and that you will reply in the same if your knowledge of it permits; if not, I sufficiently understand Norman to follow your meaning."

"Vows," said the Abbot, "must be unloosed, worthy Franklin, or permit me rather to say, worthy Thane, though the title is antiquated. Vows are the knots which tie us to Heaven—they are the cords which bind the sacrifice to the horns of the altar,—and are therefore,—as I said before,—to be unloosened and discharged, unless our holy Mother Church shall pronounce the contrary. And respecting language, I willingly hold communication in that spoken by my respected grandmother, Hilda of Middleham, who died in odour of sanctity, little short, if we may presume to say so, of her glorious namesake, the blessed Saint Hilda of Whitby, God be gracious to her soul!"

When the Prior had ceased what he meant as a conciliatory harangue, his companion said briefly and emphatically, "I speak ever French, the language of King Richard and his nobles; but I understand English sufficiently to communicate with the natives of the country."

Cedric darted at the speaker one of those hasty and impatient glances, which comparisons between the two rival nations seldom failed to call forth; but, recollecting the duties of hospitality, he suppressed further show of resentment, and, motioning with his hand, caused his guests to assume two seats a little lower than his own, but placed close beside him, and gave a signal that the evening meal should be placed upon the board.

While the attendants hastened to obey Cedric's commands, his eye distinguished Gurth the swineherd, who, with his companion Wamba, had just entered the hall. "Send these loitering knaves up hither," said the Saxon, impatiently. And when the culprits came before the dais, "How comes it, villains! that you have loitered abroad so late as this? Hast thou brought home thy charge, sirrah Gurth, or hast thou left them to robbers and marauders?"

"The herd is safe, so please ye," said Gurth.

"But it does not please me, thou knave," said Cedric, "that I should be made to suppose otherwise for two hours, and sit here devising vengeance against my neighbours for wrongs they have not done me. I tell thee, shackles and the prison-house shall punish the next offence of this kind."

Gurth, knowing his master's irritable temper, attempted no exculpation; but the Jester, who could presume upon Cedric's tolerance, by virtue of his privileges as a fool, replied for them both; "In troth, uncle Cedric, you are neither wise nor reasonable to-night."

"How, sir?" said his master; "you shall to the porter's lodge, and taste of the discipline there, if you give your foolery such license."

"First let your wisdom tell me," said Wamba, "is it just and reasonable to punish one person for the fault of another?"

"Certainly not, fool," answered Cedric.

"Then why should you shackle poor Gurth, uncle, for the fault of his dog Fangs? for I dare be sworn we lost not a minute by the way, when we had got our herd together, which Fangs did not manage until we heard the vesper-bell."

"Then hang up Fangs," said Cedric, turning hastily towards the swineherd, "if the fault is his, and get thee another dog."

"Under favour, uncle," said the Jester, "that were still somewhat on the bow-hand of fair justice; for it was no fault of Fangs that he was lame and could not gather the herd, but the fault of those that struck off two of his fore-claws, an operation for which, if the poor fellow had been consulted, he would scarce have given his voice."

"And who dared to lame an animal which belonged to my bondsman?" said the Saxon, kindling in wrath.

"Marry, that did old Hubert," said Wamba, "Sir Philip de Malvoisin's keeper of the chase. He caught Fangs strolling in the forest, and said he chased the deer contrary to his master's right, as warden of the walk."

"The foul fiend take Malvoisin," an Saxon, "and his keeper both! I will teach the wood was disforested in terms of the rest Charter. But enough of this. Go to,
to thy place—and thou, Gurth, get thee an
and should the keeper dare to touch it, I w
archery; the curse of a coward on my head
not off the forefinger of his right hand!
draw bowstring no more. I crave your p worthy guests. I am beset here with n mate in your circles, Sir Knight. But Holy I your home is before you; feast, and l
make amends for hard fare."

The feast, however, which was spread board, needed no apologies from the Lord o sion. Swine's flesh, dressed in several peared on the lower part of the board, as a fowls, deer, goats, and hares, and variou
fish, together with huge loaves and cake
and sundry confections made of fruits a
The smaller sorts of wild-fowl, of which abundance, were not served up in platters, b
in upon small wooden spits or broaches, a
by the pages and domestics who bore the guest in succession, who cut from them suc
as he pleased. Beside each person of rank
a goblet of silver; the lower board was dated with large drinking horns.

When the repast was about to commenc jor-domo, or steward, suddenly raising his aloud, "Forbear! Place for the Lady Ro side-door at the upper end of the hall now hind the banquet table, and Rowena, fo
four female attendants, entered the apartme
though surprised, and perhaps not altogeth bly so, at his ward appearing in public on sion, hastened to meet her, and to conduc respectful ceremony, to the elevated seat a right hand, appropriated to the lady of the All stood up to receive her; and, replyin
courtesy by a mute gesture of salutation, gracefully forward to assume her place at Ere she had time to do so, the Templar w
the Prior, "I shall wear no collar of gold the tournament. The Chian wine is your

"Said I not so?" answered the Prior; "
your raptures, the Franklin observes you."

Unheeding this remonstrance, and accus
to act upon the immediate impulse of his o
Brian de Bois-Guilbert kept his eyes rive
Saxon beauty, more striking perhaps to hi tion, because differing widely from those of ern Sultanas.

Formed in the best proportions of her se
was tall in stature, yet not so much so a observation on account of superior height.
plexion was exquisitely fair, but the noble
head and features prevented the insipi sometimes attaches to fair beauties. He eye, which sate enshrined beneath a gracef
of brown, sufficiently marked to give expre forehead, seemed capable to kindle as we
to command as well as to beseech. If mil
the more natural expression of such a cou features, it was plain, that in the present in exercise of habitual superiority, and the r
general homage, had given to the Saxon la character, which mingled with and qualifi stowed by nature. Her profuse hair, of a twixt brown and flaxen, was arranged in and graceful manner in numerous ringle which art had probably aided nature. T were braided with gems, and being wo
length, intimated the noble birth and free-tion of the maiden. A golden chain, to attached a small reliquary of the same m round her neck. She wore bracelets on which were bare. Her dress was an unde kirtle of pale sea-green silk, over which h
loose robe, which reached to the ground, h wide sleeves, which came down, however below the elbow. This robe was crimson, factured out of the very finest wool. A v interwoven with gold, was attached to the

, which could be, at the wearer's pleasure, either
n over the face and bosom after the Spanish ion, or disposed as a sort of drapery round the ulders.

hen Rowena perceived the Knight Templar's hent on her with an ardour, that, compared with lark caverns under which they moved, gave them
ffect of lighted charcoal, she grew with dignity
ed around her face, as an intimation that the mined freedom of his glance was disagreeable.
ric saw the motion and its cause. "Sir Templar,"
he, "the cheeks of our Saxon maidens have seen little of the sun to enable them to bear the fixed ge of a censure."

If I have offended," replied Sir Brian, "I crave
pardon - that is, I crave the Lady Rowena's on—for my humility will carry me no lower."

The Lady Rowena," said the Prior, "has punished ll, in chastising the boldness of my friend. Let ope she will be less cruel to the splendid train
h are to meet at the tournament."

Our going thither," said Cedric, is uncertain. "I not those vanities, which were unknown to my rs when England was free."

Let us hope, nevertheless," said the Prior, "our pany may determine you to travel thitherward;
the roads are so unsafe, the escort of Sir Brian ois-Gulbert is not to be despised."

Sir Prior," answered the Saxon, "who resoever I travelled in this land, I have hitherto found my-
with the assistance of my good sword and faith-followers, in no respect needful of other aid. At ent, if we indeed journey to Ashby-de-la-Zouche,
do so with my noble neighbour and countryman,
elstane of Coningsburgh, and with such a train
would set outlaws and feudal enemies at defiance.
frank to you, Sir Prior, in this cup of wine, which se your taste will approve, and I thank you for courtesy. Should you be so rigid in adhering to astic rule," he added, "as to prefer your acid pre-tion of milk, I hope you will not strain courtesy me reason."

Nay," said the Prior, laughing, "it is only in our y that we confine ourselves to the lac dulce or the veidum either. Conversing with the world, we the world's fashion, and therefore I answer your ge in this honest wine, and leave the weaker
r, to my lay-brother."

And I," said the Templar, filling his goblet, nk wassail to the fair Rowena; for since her esake introduced the word into England, has r been one more worthy of such a tribute. By faith, I could pardon the unhappy Vortigern, had self the cause that we now witness, for making wreck of his honour and his kingdom."

I will spare your courtesy, Sir Knight," said
ena with dignity, and without unveiling herself;
rather I will tax it so far as to require of you the t news from Palestine, a theme more agreeable ur English ears, than the compliments which French breeding teaches."

I have little of importance to say, lady," answered Brian de Bois-Gulbert, "excepting the confirmed gs of a truce with Saladin."

e was interrupted by Wamba, who had taken his propriated seat upon a chair, the back of which was orated with two ass's ears, and which was placed at two steps behind that of his master, who, from e to time, supplied him with victuals from his own icher; a favour, however, which the Jester shared the favourite dogs, of whom, as we have already ced there were several in attendance. Here sat mba, with a small table before him, his cheeks
ed up against the bar of the chair, his cheeks ted up so as to make his jaws resemble a pair of crackers, and his eyes half-shut, yet watching alertness every opportunity to exercise his nted foolery.

These truces with the infidels," he exclaimed,
bout caring how suddenly he interrupted the stately nplar, "make an old man of me!"

Go to, knave, how so?" said Cedric, his features
pared to receive favourably the expected jest.

Because," answered Wamba, "I remember three of them in my day, each of which was to endure for the course of fifty years; so that, by computation, I must be at least a hundred and fifty years old."

"I will warrant you against dying of old age, however," said the Templar, who now recognised his friend of the forest; "I will assure you from all deaths but a violent one, if you give such directions to wayfarers, as you did this night to the Prior and me."

"How, sirrah?" said Cedric, "misdirect travellers?
We must have you whipt; you are at least as much rogue as fool."

"I pray thee, uncle," answered the Jester, "let my folly for once protect my roguery. I did but make a mistake between my right hand and my left; and he might have pardoned a greater, who took a fool for his counsellor and guide."

Conversation was here interrupted by the entrance of the porter's page, who announced that there was a stranger at the gate, imploring admittance and hospitality.

"Admit him," said Cedric, "be he who or what he may;—a night like that which roars without, compels even wild animals to herd with tame, and to seek the protection of man, their mortal foe, rather than perish by the elements. Let his wants be ministered to with all care; look to it, Oswald."

And the steward left the banquetting hall to see the commands of his patron obeyed.

CHAPTER V.

Hath not a Jew eyes? Hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? Fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases,
healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same
winter and summer, as a Christian is?

Merchant of Venice.

Oswald, returning, whispered into the ear of his master, "It is a Jew, who calls himself Isaac of York; is it fit I should marshal him into the hall?"

"Let Gurth do thine office, Oswald," said Wamba with his usual effrontery; "the swineherd will be a fit usher to the Jew."

"St. Mary," said the Abbot, crossing himself, "an unbelieving Jew, and admitted into this presence!"

"A dog Jew," echoed the Templar, "to approach
a defender of the Holy Sepulchre?"

"By my faith," said Wamba, "it would seem the Templars love the Jews' inheritance better than they do their company."

"Peace, my worthy guests," said Cedric; "my hospitality must not be bounded by your dislikes. If Heaven bore with the whole nation of stiff-necked unbelievers for more years than a layman can number, we may endure the presence of one Jew for a few hours. But I constrain no man to converse or to feed with him. Let him have a board and a morsel apart,—unless," he said smiling, "these turban'd strangers will admit his society."

"Sir Franklin," answered the Templar, "my Sara-cen slaves are true Moslems, and scorn as much as any Christian to hold intercourse with a Jew."

"Now, in faith," said Wamba, "I cannot see that the worshippers of Mahound and Termagaunt have so greatly the advantage over the people once chosen of Heaven."

"He shall sit with thee, Wamba," said Cedric;
"the fool and the knave will be well met."

"The fool," answered Wamba, raising the relics of a gammon of bacon, "will take care to erect a bulwark against the knave."

"Hush," said Cedric, "for here he comes."

Introduced with little ceremony, and advancing with fear and hesitation, and many a bow of deep humility, a tall thin old man, who, however, had lost
by the habit of stooping much of his actual height, approached the lower end of the board. His features keen and regular, with an aquiline nose, and piercing black eyes; his high and wrinkled forehead, and long gray hair and beard, would have been considered as handsome, had they not been the marks of a physiognomy peculiar to a race, which, during those dark ages, was alike detested by the credulous and prejudiced vulgar, and persecuted by the greedy and

cious nobility, and who, perhaps, owing to that very hatred and persecution, had adopted a national character, in which there was much, to say the least, mean and unamiable.

The Jew's dress, which appeared to have suffered considerably from the storm, was a plain russet cloak of many folds, covering a dark purple tunic. He had large boots lined with fur, and a belt around his waist, which sustained a small knife, together with a case for writing materials, but no weapon. He wore a high square yellow cap of a peculiar fashion, assigned to his nation to distinguish them from Christians, and which he doffed with great humility at the door of the hall.

The reception of this person in the hall of Cedric the Saxon, was such as might have satisfied the most prejudiced enemy of the tribes of Israel. Cedric himself coldly nodded in answer to the Jew's repeated salutations, and signed to him to take place at the lower end of the table, where, however, no one offered to make room for him. On the contrary, as he passed along the file, casting a timid supplicating glance, and turning towards each of those who occupied the lower end of the board, the Saxon domestics squared their shoulders, and continued to devour their supper with great perseverance, paying not the least attention to the wants of the new guest. The attendants of the Abbot crossed themselves, with looks of pious horror, and the very heathen Saracens, as Isaac drew near them, curled up their whiskers with indignation, and laid their hands on their poniards, as if ready to rid themselves by the most desperate means from the apprehended contamination of his nearer approach.

Probably the same motives which induced Cedric to open his hall to this son of a rejected people, would have made him insist on his attendants receiving Isaac with more courtesy. But the Abbot had, at this moment, engaged him in a most interesting discussion on the breed and character of his favourite hounds, which he would not have interrupted for matters of much greater importance than that of a Jew going to bed supperless. While Isaac thus stood an outcast in the present society, like his people among the nations, looking in vain for welcome or resting-place, the pilgrim who sat by the chimney took compassion upon him, and resigned his seat, saying briefly, "Old man, my garments are dried, my hunger is appeased, thou art both wet and fasting." So saying, he gathered together, and brought to a flame, the decaying brands which lay scattered on the ample hearth; took from the larger board a mess of pottage and seethed kid, placed it upon the small table at which he had himself supped, and, without waiting the Jew's thanks, went to the other side of the hall;—whether from unwillingness to hold more close communication with the object of his benevolence, or from a wish to draw near to the upper end of the table, seemed uncertain.

Had there been painters in those days capable to execute such a subject, the Jew, as he bent his withered form and expanded his chilled and trembling hands over the fire, would have formed no bad emblematical personification of the Winter season. Having dispelled the cold, he turned eagerly to the smoking mess which was placed before him, and ate with a haste and an apparent relish, that seemed to betoken long abstinence from food.

Meanwhile the Abbot and Cedric continued their discourse upon hunting; the Lady Rowena seemed engaged in conversation with one of her attendant females; and the haughty Templar, whose eye wandered from the Jew to the Saxon beauty, revolved in his mind thoughts which appeared deeply to interest him.

"I marvel, worthy Cedric," said the Abbot, as their discourse proceeded, "that, great as your predilection is for your own manly language, you do not receive the Norman-French into your favour, so far at least as the mystery of wood-craft and hunting is concerned. Surely no tongue is so rich in the various phrases which the field sports demand, or furnishes means to the experienced woodman so well to express his jovial art."

"Good Father Aymer," said the Saxon, known to you, I care not for those over-se ments without which I can well enough t pleasure in the woods. I can wind my horn I call not the blast either a recheate or a mort cheer my dogs on the prey, and I can flay an the animal when it is brought down, witho the new-fangled jargon of curee, arbor, nomb all the babble of the fabulous Sir Tristrem."*

"The French," said the Templar, raising h with the presumptuous and authoritative ton he used upon all occasions, "is not only the language of the chase, but that of love an which ladies should be won and enemies def

"Pledge me in a cup of wine, Sir Templa Cedric, "and fill another to the Abbot, whil back some thirty years to tell you another t Cedric the Saxon then was, his plain Engl needed no garnish from French troubadours, was told in the ear of beauty; and the field of allerton, upon the day of the Holy Standar tell whether the Saxon war-cry was not hear within the ranks of the Scottish host as the cri-de-guerre of the boldest Norman baron. To the m of the brave who fought there.—Pledge m guests." He drank deep, and went on with inc warmth. "Ay, that was a day of cleaving of when a hundred banners were bent forward o heads of the valiant, and blood flowed rou water, and death was held better than flig Saxon bard had called it a feast of the sw gathering of the eagles to the prey—the clashing upon shield and helmet, the shouting of batt joyful than the clamour of a bridal. But ou are no more," he said; "our deeds are lost i of another race—our language—our very na hastening to decay, and none mourns for it sa solitary old man.—Cup-bearer! knave, fill the To the strong in arms, Sir Templar, be the or language what it will, who now bear them Palestine among the champions of the Cross

"It becomes not one wearing this badge swer," said Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert; " whom, besides the sworn Champions of th Sepulchre, can the palm be assigned amo champions of the Cross?"

"To the Knights Hospitallers," said the "I have a brother of their order."

"I impeach not their fame," said the Te "nevertheless"——

"I think, friend Cedric," said Wamba, inte "that had Richard of the Lion's Heart bee enough to have taken a fool's advice, he migh staid at home with his merry Englishmen, a the recovery of Jerusalem to those same K who had most to do with the loss of it."

"Were there, then, none in the English said the Lady Rowena, "whose names are wo be mentioned with the Knights of the Temple, St. John?"

"Forgive me, lady," replied De Bois-Guilber English monarch did, indeed, bring to Palestine of gallant warriors, second only to those breasts have been the unceasing bulwark blessed land."

"Second to NONE," said the Pilgrim, wh stood near enough to hear, and had listened conversation with marked impatience. All towards the spot from whence this unexpecte veration was heard. "I say," repeated the P in a firm and strong voice, "that the Engl valry were second to NONE who ever drew sw defence of the Holy Land. I say besides, for it, that King Richard himself, and five of his K

* There was no language which the Normans more f separated from that of common life than the terms of th The objects of their pursuit, whether bird or animal, c their name each year, and there were a hundred conv terms, to be ignorant of which was to be without one distinguishing marks of a gentleman. The reader may Dame Juliana Berners' book on the subject. The origi science was imputed to the celebrated Sir Tristrem, fam his tragic intrigue with the beautiful Ysolte. As the N reserved the amusement of hunting strictly to themsel terms of this formal jargon were all taken from the language.

urnament after the taking of St. John-de-challengers against all comers. I say that,
ay, each knight ran three courses, and cast mind three antagonists. I add, that seven of ailants were Knights of the Temple — and de Bois-Guilbert well knows the truth of ll you."
possible for language to describe the bitter rage which rendered yet darker the swarthy ace of the Templar. In the extremity of tment and confusion, his quivering fingers wards the handle of his sword, and perhaps drew, from the consciousness that no act of
could be safely executed in that place and Cedric, whose feelings were all of a right ad simple kind, and were seldom occupied by a one object at once, omitted, in the joyous which he heard of the glory of his country-
remark the angry confusion of his guest;
give thee this golden bracelet, Pilgrim," he ldst thou tell me the names of those knights
ld so gallantly the renown of merry Eng-

will I do blithely," replied the Pilgrim, "and guerdon; my oath, for a time, prohibits me hing gold."
wear the bracelet for you, if you will, friend
said Wamba.
irst in honour as in arms, in renown as in aid the Pilgrim, "was the brave Richard, England."
give him," said Cedric; "I forgive him his rom the tyrant Duke William."
Earl of Leicester was the second," continued
m; Sir Thomas Multon of Gilsland was the xon descent, he at least," said Cedric, with

.
oulk Doilly the fourth," proceeded the Pil-

t also, at least by the mother's side," condric, who listened with the utmost eager-forgot, in part at least, his hatred to the
in the common triumph of the King of
and his islanders. "And who was the demanded.
fth was Edward Turnham."
e Saxon, by the soul of Hengist!" shouted
And the sixth?" he continued with eager-ow name you the sixth?"
ixth," said the Palmer, after a pause, in seemed to recollect himself, "was a young less renown and lower rank, assumed onourable company, less to aid their enter-
to make up their number — his name dwells memory."
almer," said Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert
"this assumed forgetfulness, after so much remembered, comes too late to serve your
I will myself tell the name of the knight
ose lance fortune and my horse's fault occa-
falling — it was the Knight of Ivanhoe;
ere one of the six that, for his years, had wn in arms. Yet this will I say, and loudly
e he in England, and durst repeat, in this urnament, the challenge of St John-de-mounted and armed as I now am, would very advantage of weapons, and abide the challenge would be soon answered," replied

r, "were your antagonist near you. As the disturb not the peaceful hall with vaunts of f a conflict, which you well know cannot
. If Ivanhoe ever returns from Palestine, I surety that he meets you."
[illegible] security!" said the Knight Templar;
t do you proffer as a pledge?"
eliquary," said the Palmer, taking a small
from his bosom, and crossing himself, ng a portion of the true cross, brought from stery of Mount Carmel."
r of Jorvaulx crossed himself and repeated oster, in which all devoutly joined, excepting the Mahomedans, and the Templar; the latter of whom, without vailing his bonnet, or testifying any reverence for the alleged sanctity of the relic, took from his neck a gold chain, which he flung on the board, saying "Let Prior Aymer hold my pledge and that of this nameless vagrant, in token that when the Knight of Ivanhoe comes within the four seas of Britain, he underlies the challenge of Brian de Bois-Guilbert, which, if he answer not, I will proclaim him as a coward on the walls of every Temple Court in Europe."

"It will not need," said the Lady Rowena, breaking silence; "my voice shall be heard, if no other in this hall is raised in behalf of the absent Ivanhoe. I affirm he will meet fairly every honourable challenge.
Could my weak warrant add security to the inestimable pledge of this holy pilgrim, I would pledge name and fame that Ivanhoe gives this proud knight
the meeting he desires."

A crowd of conflicting emotions seemed to have occupied Cedric, and kept him silent during this discussion. Gratified pride, resentment, embarrassment, chased each other over his broad and open brow, like
the shadow of clouds drifting over a harvest-field;
while his attendants, on whom the name of the sixth knight seemed to produce an effect almost electrical, hung in suspense upon their master's looks. But when Rowena spoke, the sound of her voice seemed to startle him from his silence.

"Lady," said Cedric, "this beseems not; were further pledge necessary, I myself, offended, and justly offended, as I am, would yet gage my honour for the honour of Ivanhoe. But the wager of battle is complete, even according to the fantastic fashions of Norman chivalry. Is it not, Father Aymer?"

"It is," replied the Prior; "and the blessed relic
and rich chain will I bestow safely in the treasury
of our convent, until the decision of this warlike challenge."

Having thus spoken, he crossed himself again and again, and after many genuflections and muttered prayers, he delivered the reliquary to Brother Ambrose, his attendant monk, while he himself swept up with less ceremony, but perhaps with no less internal satisfaction, the golden chain, and bestowed it in a pouch lined with perfumed leather, which opened under his arm. "And now, Sir Cedric," he said,
"my ears are chiming vespers with the strength of your good wine — permit us another pledge to the welfare of the Lady Rowena, and indulge us with liberty to pass to our repose."

"By the rood of Bromholme," said the Saxon,
"you do but small credit to your fame, Sir Prior!
Report speaks you a bonny monk, that would hear the matin chime ere he quitted his bowl; and, old as I am, I feared to have shame in encountering you.
But, by my faith, a Saxon boy of twelve, in my time,
would not so soon have relinquished his goblet."

The Prior had his own reasons, however, for persevering in the course of temperance which he had adopted. He was not only a professional peacemaker, but from practice a hater of all feuds and brawls. It was not altogether from a love to his neighbour, or to himself, or from a mixture of both.
On the present occasion, he had an instinctive apprehension of the fiery temper of the Saxon, and saw
the danger that the reckless and presumptuous spirit,
of which his companion had already given so many proofs, might at length produce some disagreeable explosion. He therefore gently insinuated the incapacity of the native of any other country to engage in the genial conflict of the bowl with the hardy and strong-headed Saxons; something he mentioned, but slightly, about his own holy character, and ended by pressing his proposal to depart to repose.

The grace-cup was accordingly served round, and the guests, after making deep obeisance to their landlord and to the Lady Rowena, arose and mingled in the hall, while the heads of the family, by separate doors, retired with their attendants.

"Unbelieving dog," said the Templar to Isaac the Jew, as he passed him in the throng, "dost thou bend
thy course to the tournament?"

"I do so propose," replied Isaac, bowing in all humility, "if it please your reverend valour"

"Ay," said the Knight, "to gnaw the bowels of our nobles with usury, and to gull women and boys with gauds and toys—I warrant thee store of shekels in thy Jewish scrip."

"Not a shekel, not a silver penny, not a halfling—so help me the God of Abraham!" said the Jew, clasping his hands; "I go but to seek the assistance of some brethren of my tribe to aid me to pay the fine which the Exchequer of the Jews* have imposed upon me. Father Jacob! my speed! I am an impoverished man!—the very zaberdine I wear is borrowed from Reuben of Tadcaster."

The Templar smiled sourly as he replied, "Beshrew thee for a false-mouthed liar!" and passing onward, as if disdaining further conference, he commanded with his Moslem slaves in a language unknown to the bystanders. The poor Israelite seemed so staggered by the address of the military monk, that the Templar had passed on to the extremity of the hall ere he raised his head from the humble posture which he had assumed, so far as to be sensible of his deliverance. And when he did look around, it was with the astonished air of one at whose feet a tinundrelt has just burst, and who hears still the astounding report ringing in his ears.

The Templar and Prior were shortly after marshalled to their sleeping apartments by the steward and the cup-bearer, each attended by two torch-bearers and two servants carrying refreshments, while servants of inferior condition indicated to their retinue and to the other guests their respective places of repose.

CHAPTER VI.

> To buy his favour I extend this friendship:
> If he will take it, so: if not, adieu;
> And, for my love, I pray you wrong me not.
>
> Merchant of Venice.

As the Palmer, lighted by a domestic with a torch, past through the intricate combination of apartments of this large and irregular mansion, the cup-bearer coming behind him whispered in his ear, that if he had no objection to a cup of good mead in his apartment, there were many domestics in that family who would gladly hear the news he had brought from the Holy Land, and particularly that which concerned the Knight of Ivanhoe. Wamba presently appeared to urge the same request, observing that a cup after midnight was worth three after curfew. Without disputing a maxim urged by such grave authority, the Palmer thanked them for their courtesy, but observed that he had included in his religious vow, an obligation never to speak in the kitchen on matters which were prohibited in the hall. "That vow," said Wamba to the cup-bearer, "would scarce suit a serving-man."

The cup-bearer shrugged up his shoulders in displeasure. "I thought to have lodged him in the solere chamber," said he; "but since he is so unsocial to Christians, e'en let him take the next stall to Isaac the Jew's. Anwold," said he to the the torch-bearer, "carry the Pilgrim to the southern cell.—I give you good-night," he added, "Sir Palmer, with small thanks for short courtesy."

"Good-night, and Our Lady's benison!" said the Palmer, with composure; and his guide moved forward.

In a small antechamber, into which several doors opened, and which was lighted by a small iron lamp, they met a second interruption from the waiting-maid of Rowena, who, saying in a tone of authority, that her mistress desired to speak with the Palmer, took the torch from the hand of Anwold, and, bidding him await her return, made a sign to the Palmer to follow. Apparently he did not think it proper to decline this invitation as he had done the former; for, though his gesture indicated some surprise at the summons, he obeyed it without answer or remonstrance.

A short passage, and an ascent of seven steps, each of which was composed of a solid beam of oak, led him to the apartment of the Lady Rowena, the rude magnificence of which corresponded to the [illegible] which was paid to her by the lord of the m[illegible] The walls were covered with embroidered ha[illegible] on which different-coloured silks, interwove[illegible] gold and silver threads, had been employed [illegible] the art of which the age was capable, to repre[illegible] sports of hunting and hawking. The b[illegible] adorned with the same rich tapestry, and surr[illegible] with curtains dyed with purple. The seats [illegible] these stained coverings, and one, which was [illegible] than the rest, was accommodated with a foot[illegible] ivory, curiously carved.

No fewer than four silver candelabras, holdi[illegible] waxen torches, served to illuminate this apa[illegible] Yet let not modern beauty envy the magnific[illegible] a Saxon princess. The walls of the apartme[illegible] so ill finished and so full of crevices, that t[illegible] hangings shook to the night blast, and, in des[illegible] sort of screen intended to protect them from th[illegible] the flame of the torches streamed sideways i[illegible] air, like the untorled pennon of a chieftain. [illegible] inference there was, with some rude attempt a[illegible] but of comfort there was little, and, being un[illegible] it was unmissed.

The Lady Rowena, with three of her attendants standing at her back, and arranging her hair, lay down to rest, was seated in the sort of already mentioned, and looked as if born t[illegible] general homage. The Pilgrim acknowledg[illegible] claim to it by a low genuflection.

"Rise, Palmer," said she graciously. "The[illegible] of the absent has a right to favourable reception all who value truth, and honour manhood. [illegible] then said to her train, "Retire, excepting only [illegible] I would speak with this holy Pilgrim."

The maidens, without leaving the apartment, to its farther extremity, and sat down on a bench against the wall, where they remained as statues, though at such a distance that whispers could not have interrupted the conversation of their mistress.

"Pilgrim," said the Lady, after a moment's [illegible] during which she seemed uncertain how to [illegible] him, "you this night mentioned a name—I she said, with a degree of effort, "the name o[illegible] hoe, in the halls where by nature and kindred it have sounded most acceptably; and yet, such perverse course of fate, that of many whose must have throbbed at the sound, I, only, d[illegible] you where, and in what condition, you left whom you spoke? We heard, first, having re[illegible] in Palestine, on account of his impaired health the departure of the English army, he had expe[illegible] the persecution of the French faction, to wh[illegible] Templars are known to be attached."

"I know little of the Knight of Ivanhoe," a[illegible] ed the Palmer, with a troubled voice. "I w[illegible] knew him better, since you, lady, are interested [illegible] fate. He hath, I believe, surmounted the pe[illegible] of his enemies in Palestine, and is on the eve [illegible] returning to England, where you, lady, must better than I, what is his chance of happiness."

The Lady Rowena sighed deeply, and asked particularly when the Knight of Ivanhoe m[illegible] expected in his native country, and whether he not be exposed to great dangers by the road.

first point, the Palmer professed ignorance; second, he said that the voyage might be safel[illegible] by the way of Venice and Genoa, and from through France to England. "Ivanhoe," [illegible] "was so well acquainted with the language an[illegible] ners of the French, that there was no fear of [illegible] running any hazard during that part of his tra[illegible]

"Would to God," said the Lady Rowena, "[illegible] here safely arrived, and able to bear arms in [illegible] proaching tourney, in which the chivalry of t[illegible] are expected to display their address and [illegible] Should Athelstane of Coningsburgh obtain th[illegible] Ivanhoe is like to bear evil tidings when he [illegible] England. How looked he, stranger, when [illegible] saw him? Had disease laid her hand heavy u[illegible] strength and comeliness?"

"He was darker," said the Palmer, "and [illegible] than when he came from Cyprus in the train o[illegible]

* In those days the Jews were subjected to an Exchequer, specially dedicated to that purpose, and which laid them under the most exorbitant impositions. L. T.

and care seemed to sit heavy on his brow; roached not his presence, because he is un- me."

ll," said the lady, "I fear, find little in his nd to clear those clouds from his counte- Thanks, good Pilgrim, for your information g the companion of my childhood. Maid- said, "draw near, offer the soothing cup ly, man, whom I will no longer detain from the toast as presented a silver cup, contain- a mixture of wine and spices, which Rowe- put to her lips. It was then offered to er, who, after a few moments, tasted a few

t this alms, friend," continued the lady, piece of gold, "in acknowledgment of thy ance and of the storms thou hast visited." dress received the boon with another low , and followed Elgitha out of the apart-

reporter to found it's attendant Aywold, ve the torch from the hand of the waiting d him with more hospitable ceremony nor and grander part of the building, where a f small apartments, or rather cells, carved ng places to the lower order of domestics angers of mean degree.

dmen of these steeds the Jew?" said the mbeleaving day," answered Aywold, "hence ve call next your holiness, - St. Dunstan, how e scraped and bowed, and crossed himself in fit for an!"

where sleeps Gurth the swineherd?" said the

," replied the bondsman, "sleeps in the cor- right, as the Jew on that to your left; you rop the circle of circumcision separate from ination of his tribe. You might have ev- more honourable lodging had your reception invitation."

s well as it is," said the Palmer; "the com- of a Jew can hardly spread contamination n oaken partition."

ag, he entered the cell allotted to him, and e torch from the domestic's hand, thanked wished him good night. Having shut the cell, he placed the torch in a candlestick rood, and looked round him upon the apart- furniture of which (as was the most simple ever) consisted of a rude wooden stool, and still h or bed-frame, stuffed with clean straw, nished with two or three sheepskins and clothes.

lmer, having extinguished his torch, threw without taking off any part of his clothes, on couch, and slept or at least retained his posture, till the earliest sunbeams found through the high grated window, which once to admit both air and light to his mo- dell. He then started up and, after his matins, and adjusting his dress, he left d that of Isaac the Jew. I rue to latch as he could.

nate was living in trouble! slumber upon a ilar to that on which the Palmer thus lf had night. Such parts of his dress as the Jew side on the preceding evening, were disposed round his person, as if to prevent the hazard ing carried off during his slumbers. There ble on his brow amounting almost to agony, and arms moved convulsively, as if struggling the nightmare; and besides several ejac- n Hebrew, the following were distinctly ne Norman English, or mixed language of y: "For the sake of the God of Abraham, nhappy old man! I am poor, I am penni- ld your irons wrench my limbs asunder, I gratify you!"

lmer awaited not the end of the Jew's t stirred him with his pilgrim's staff. The obably associated, as is usual, with some of ensions excited by his dream; for the old man started up, his gray hair standing almost erect upon his head, and huddling some part of his garments about him, while he held the detached pieces with the tenacious grasp of a falconer, he fixed upon the Palmer his keen black eyes, expressive of wild surprise and of bodily apprehension.

"Fear nothing from me, Isaac," said the Palmer "I come as your friend."

"The God of Israel requite you," said the Jew, greatly relieved; "I dreamed - but Father Abraham be praised, it was but a dream!" Then, collecting himself, he added in his usual tone, "And what may it be your pleasure to want at so early an hour with the poor Jew?"

"It is to tell you," said the Palmer, "that if you leave not this mansion instantly, and travel not with some haste, your journey may prove a dangerous one."

"Holy father!" said the Jew, "whom could it interest to endanger so poor a wretch as I am?"

"The purpose you can best guess," said the Pilgrim; "let me say on this, that when the Templar crossed the barbacan, he spoke to his Mussulman slaves in the Saracen language, which I well understand, and charged them this morning to watch the journey of the Jew, to seize upon him when at a convenient distance from the mansion, and to conduct him to the castle of Philip de Malvoisin, or to that of Reginald Front-de-Bœuf."

It is impossible to describe the extremity of terror which seized upon the Jew at this information, and seemed at once to overpower his whole faculties. His arms fell down to his sides, and his head drooped on his breast, his knees bent under his weight, every nerve and muscle of his frame seemed to collapse and lose its energy, and he sunk at the foot of the Palmer, not in the fashion of one who intentionally stoops, kneels, or prostrates himself to excite compassion, but like a man borne down on all sides by the pressure of some invisible force, which crushes him to the earth without the power of resistance.

"Help! Cry of Abraham!" was his first exclamation, tearing and clenching his wrinkled hands, but without raising his gray head from the pavement; "Oh, holy Moses! Oh, blessed Aaron! the dream is not dreamed for nought, and the vision cometh not in vain! I feel their nails already tear my sinews! I feel the rack pass over my body like the saws, and harrows, and axes of iron over the men of Rabbah, and of Ammon! the children of Ammon!"

"Stand up, Jew, and hearken to me," said the Palmer, who viewed the extremity of his distress with a compassion in which contempt was largely mingled; "you have cause for your terror, considering how your brethren have been used, in order to extort from them their hoards, both by princes and nobles; but stand up, I say, and I will point out to you the means of escape. Leave this mansion instantly, while its inmates are yet sound after the last night's revel. I will guide you by the secret paths of the forest, known as well to me as to any forester that ranges it, and I will not leave you till you are under safe conduct of some chief or baron going to the tournament, whose good will you have probably the means of securing."

As the ears of Isaac received the hopes of escape which this speech intimated, he began gradually, and inch by inch, as it were, to raise himself up from the ground, until he fairly rested upon his knees, throwing back his long gray hair and beard, and fixing his keen black eyes upon the Palmer's face, with a look expressive at once of hope and fear, not unmingled with suspicion. But when he heard the concluding part of the sentence, his original terror appeared to revive in full force, and he drop[ped] once more on his face, exclaiming, "I possess the means of securing good-will! alas! there is but one road to the favour of a Christian, and how can the poor Jew find it, whom extortions have already reduced to the misery of Lazarus?" Then, as if suspicion had overpowered his other feelings, he suddenly exclaimed, "For the love of God, young man, betray me not - for the sake of the Great Father who made us all, Jew as well as Gentile, Israelite and Ishmaelite - do me no treason!

I have not means to secure the good-will of a Christian beggar, were he rating it at a single penny." As he spoke these last words, he raised himself, and grasped the Palmer's mantle with a look of the most earnest entreaty. The pilgrim extricated himself, as if there were contamination in the touch.

"Wert thou loaded with all the wealth of thy tribe," he said, "what interest have I to injure thee? In this dress I am vowed to poverty, nor do I change it for aught save a horse and a coat of mail. Yet think not that I care for thy company, or propose myself advantage by it; remain here if thou wilt—Cedric the Saxon may protect thee."

"Alas!" said the Jew, "he will not let me travel in his train—Saxon or Norman will be equally ashamed of the poor Israelite; and to travel by myself through the domains of Philip de Malvoisin and Reginald Front-de-Bœuf—Good youth, I will go with you!—Let us haste—let us gird up our loins—let us flee!—Here is thy staff, why wilt thou tarry?"

"I tarry not," said the Pilgrim, giving way to the urgency of his companion; "but I must secure the means of leaving this place—follow me."

He led the way to the adjoining cell, which, as the reader is apprised, was occupied by Gurth the swineherd.—"Arise, Gurth," said the Pilgrim, "arise quickly. Undo the postern gate, and let out the Jew and me."

Gurth whose occupation, though now held so mean, gave him as much consequence in Saxon England as that of Eumæus in Ithaca, was offended at the familiar and commanding tone assumed by the Palmer. "The Jew leaving Rotherwood," said he, raising himself on his elbow, and looking sourer ciliously at him without quitting his pallet, "and travelling in company with the Palmer to boot"——

"I should as soon have dreamt," said Wamba, who entered the apartment at the instant, "of his stealing away with a gammon of bacon."

"Nevertheless," said Gurth, again laying down his head on the wooden log which served him for a pillow "both Jew and Gentile must be content to abide the opening of the great gate—we suffer no visiters to depart by stealth at these unseasonable hours."

"Nevertheless," said the Pilgrim, in a commanding tone, "you will not, I think, refuse me that favour."

So saying, he stooped over the bed of the recumbent swineherd, and whispered something in his ear in Saxon. Gurth started up as if electrified. The Pilgrim, raising his finger in an attitude as if to express caution, added, "Gurth, beware—thou art wont to be prudent. I say, undo the postern—thou shalt know more anon."

With hasty alacrity Gurth obeyed him, while Wamba and the Jew followed, both wondering at the sudden change in the swineherd's demeanour.

"My mule, my mule!" said the Jew, as soon as they stood without the postern.

"Fetch him his mule," said the Pilgrim: "unbearest thou,—let me have another, that I may accompany him company till he is beyond these parts. I will return it safely to some of Cedric's train at Ashby. And do thou"—he whispered the rest in Gurth's ear.

"Willingly, most willingly shall it be done," said Gurth, and instantly departed to execute the commission.

"I wish I knew," said Wamba, when his comrade's back was turned, "what you Palmers learn in the Holy Land."

"To say our orisons, fool," answered the Pilgrim, "to repent our sins, and to mortify ourselves with fastings, vigils, and long prayers."

"Something more potent than that," answered the Jester; "for when would repentance or prayer make Gurth do a courtesy, or fasting or vigil persuade him to lend you a mule?—I trow you might as well have told his favourite black boar of thy vigils and penance, and wouldst have gotten as civil an answer."

"Go to," said the Pilgrim, "thou art but a Saxon fool."

"Thou sayest well," said the Jester; "had I been born a Norman, as I think thou art, I would have had luck on my side, and been next door to a wise man."

At this moment Gurth appeared on the side of the moat with the mules. The travellers ed the ditch upon a drawbridge of only two breadth, the narrowness of which was match the straitness of the postern, and with a little in the exterior palisade, which gave access to est. No sooner had they reached the mules, Jew, with hasty and trembling hands, secured the saddle a small bag of blue buckram, which from under his cloak, containing, as he s "a change of raiment only a change of r Then getting upon the animal with more alac haste than could have been anticipated from he lost no time in so disposing of the skir gabardine as to conceal completely from obs the burden which he had thus deposited en c

The Pilgrim mounted with more deliberatio ing, as he departed, his hand to Gurth, who with the utmost possible veneration. The sw stood gazing after the travellers until they w under the boughs of the forest path, when disturbed from his reverie by the voice of Wa

"Knowest thou," said the Jester, "my goo Gurth, that thou art strangely courteous a unwontedly pious on this summer morning? I were a black Prior or a barefoot Palmer, myself of thy unwonted zeal and courtesy—would make more out of it than a kiss of the

"Thou art no fool thus far, Wamba," s Gurth, "though thou argnest from appearan the wisest of us can do no more—But it i look after my charge."

So saying, he turned back to the mansion, by the Jester.

Mean while the travellers continued to pres journey with a despatch which argued the c of the Jew's fears, since persons at his age ar fond of rapid motion. The Palmer, to wh path and outlet in the wood appeared to be led the way through the most devious pa more than once excited anew the suspicio Israelite, that he intended to betray him i ambuscade of his enemies.

His doubts might have been indeed pardo except perhaps the flying fish, there was no ing on the earth, in the air, or the wat were the object of such an unintermitting and relentless persecution as the Jews of th Upon the slightest and most unreasonable p as well as upon accusations the most ab groundless, their persons and property were to every turn of popular fury; for Norman, Dane, and Briton, however adverse these ra to each other, contended which should lo greatest detestation upon a people, whom it counted a point of religion to hate, to revile, to plunder, and to persecute. The kings of t urian race, and the independent nobles, who their example in all acts of tyranny, ma against this devoted people a persecution o regular, calculated, and self-interested kind. well-known story of King John, that he o wealthy Jew in one of the royal castles, a caused one of his teeth to be torn out, until jaw of the unhappy Israelite was half disfurn consented to give a large sum, which it wa rant's object to extort from him. The litt money which was in the country was chiefl session of this persecuted people, and the nob taken not to follow the example of their sove wrung it from them by every species of op and even personal torture. Yet the passive inspired by the love of gain, induced the Jew the various evils to which they were subjecte sideration of the immense profits which t enabled to realize in a country naturally so as England. In spite of every kind of di ment, and even of the special court of taxati dy mentioned, called the Jew's Exchequ for the very purpose of despoiling and distress the Jews increased, multiplied, and accumul sums, which they transferred from one han ther by means of bills of exchange—an inve which commerce is said to be indebted to t abled them to transfer their wealth from nd, that, when threatened with oppression untry, their treasure might be secured in tinacy and avarice of the Jews being thus ure placed in opposition to the fanaticism ny of those under whom they lived, seemed e in proportion to the persecution with

y were visited; and the immense wealth
ly acquired in commerce, while it frequently em in danger, was at other times used to ir influence, and to secure to them a certain protection. On these terms they lived;
character, influenced accordingly, was suspicious, and timid yet obstinate, un-
, and skilful in evading the dangers to y were exposed.
he travellers had pushed on at a rapid rate
many devious paths, the Palmer at length ace.
large decayed oak," he said, "marks the s over which Front-de-Bœuf claims author-
re long since far from those of Malvoisin.
ow no fear of pursuit."
he wheels of their chariots be taken off," ew, "like those of the host of Pharaoh.
may drive heavily? But leave me not,
im—Think but of that fierce and savage
with his Saracen slaves they will regard ritory, nor manor, nor lordship."
ad," said the Palmer, "should here so pa-it becomes not men of my character and travel together longer than needs must be.
what succour couldst thou have from me, a Pilgrim, against two armed heathens?"
d youth," answered the Jew, "thou canst
, and I know thou wouldst. Poor as I am, ute it—not with money, for money, so help ther Abraham, I have none—but" —
and recompense," said the Palmer, inter-m, "I have already said I require not of ide thee I can; and, it may be, even in defend thee; since to protect a Jew against
, can scarce be accounted unworthy of a Therefore, Jew, I will see thee safe under ng escort. We are now not far from the Sheffield, where thou mayest easily find hy tribe with whom to take refuge."
essing of Jacob be upon thee, good youth!"
ew; "in Sheffield I can harbour with my Zareth, and find some means of travelling safety."
o," said the Palmer; "at Sheffield then we half-an-hour's riding will bring us in sight
wn."
f hour was spent in perfect silence on both
e Pilgrim perhaps disdaining to address except in case of absolute necessity, and the presuming to force a conversation with a ose journey to the Holy Sepulchre gave a netity to his character. They paused on
f a gently rising bank, and the Pilgrim,
o the town of Sheffield, which lay bem, repeated the words, "Here, then, we ill you have had the poor Jew's thanks,"

; "for I presume not to ask you to go with kinsman Zareth's, who will entertain me with ns of repaying your cost of others."
already said," answered the Pilgrim, "that o recompense. If among the baggage of rs, thou wilt, for my sake, spare the graver lungs on to some unhappy Christian who thy danger, I shall not this morning's servce will be stowed."
stay," said the Jew, laying hold of his gar-something would I do more than this, somethyself.—God knows the Jew is poor; yes,
the beggar of his tribe—but forgive me
guess what thou most lackest at this mo-

u wert to guess truly," said the Palmer, "it is what thou canst not supply, wert thou as wealthy
as thou sayst thou art poor."

"As I say?" echoed the Jew; "O! believe it, I say but the truth; I am a plundered, indebted, distressed man. Hard hands have wrung from me my goods,
my money, my ships, and all that I possessed.—Yet
I can tell thee what thou lackest, and, it may be, supply it too. Thy wish even now is for a horse and armour."

The Palmer started, and turned suddenly towards the Jew:—"What fiend prompted that guess?" said
he, hastily.

"No matter," said the Jew, smiling, "so that it be a true one—and, as I can guess thy want, so I can supply it."

"But consider," said the Palmer, "my character,
my dress, my vow."

"I know you Christians," replied the Jew, "and that the noblest of you will take the staff and sandal
in superstitious penance, and walk afoot to visit the graves of dead men."

"Blaspheme not, Jew!" said the Pilgrim, sternly.

"Forgive me," said the Jew; "I spoke rashly. But there drop words from you last night and this morning, that, like sparks from flint, showed the metal within; and in the bosom of that Palmer's gown, is hidden a knight's chain and spurs of gold. They glanced as you stooped over my bed in the morning."

The Pilgrim could not forbear smiling. "Were thy garments searched by as curious an eye, Isaac," said
he, "what discoveries might not be made!"

"No more of that," said the Jew, changing colour;
and drawing forth his writing materials in haste, as if to stop the conversation, he began to write upon a piece of paper which he supported on the top of his yellow cap, without dismounting from his mule.
When he had finished, he delivered the scroll, which was in the Hebrew character, to the Pilgrim, saying,
"In the town of Leicester all men know the rich Jew, Kirjath Jairam of Lombardy; give him this scroll—he hath on sale six Milan harnesses, the worst would suit a crowned head—ten goodly steeds, the worst might mount a king, were he to do battle for his throne. Of these he will give thee thy choice, with every thing else that can furnish thee forth for
the tournament: when it is over, thou wilt return them safely—unless thou shouldst have wherewith to pay their value to the owner."

"But, Isaac," said the Pilgrim, smiling, "dost thou know that in these sports, the arms and steed of the knight who is unhorsed are forfeit to his victor? Now
I may be unfortunate, and so lose what I cannot replace or repay."

The Jew looked somewhat astounded at this possibility; but collecting his courage, he replied hastily,
"No—no—no—It is impossible—I will not think so.
The blessing of Our Father will be upon thee. Thy lance will be powerful as the rod of Moses."

So saying, he was turning his mule's head away,
when the Palmer, in his turn, took hold of his gaberdine. "Nay, but Isaac, thou knowest not all the risk. The steed may be slain, the armour injured—for I will spare neither horse nor man. Besides, those of thy tribe give nothing for nothing; something
there must be paid for their use."

The Jew twisted himself in the saddle, like a man
in a fit of the colic; but his better feelings predominated over those which were most familiar to him.
"I care not," he said, "I care not—let me go. If there is damage, it will cost you nothing—if there is usage money, Kirjath Jairam will forgive it for the sake of his kinsman Isaac. Fare thee well!—Yet hark thee, good youth," said he, turning about, "thrust thyself not too forward into this vain hurly burly—I speak not for endangering the steed, and coat of armour, but for the sake of thine own life and limbs."

"Gramercy for thy caution," said the Palmer, again smiling; "I will use thy courtesy frankly, and it will go hard with me but I will requite it."

They parted, and took different roads for the town of Sheffield.

CHAPTER VII.

Knights with a long retinue of their squires,
In gaudy liveries march and quaint attires;
One laced the helm another heed the lance,
A third the shining buckler did advance.
The courser paw'd the ground with restless feet,
And snorting foam'd and champ'd the golden bit.
The smiths and armourers on palfreys ride,
Files in their hands, and hammers at their side;
And nails for loosen'd spears, and thongs for shields provide.
The yeomen guard the streets in seemly bands;
And clowns come crowding on, with cudgels in their hands.
Palamon and Arcite.

The condition of the English nation was at this time sufficiently miserable. King Richard was absent a prisoner, and in the power of the perfidious and cruel Duke of Austria. Even the very place of his captivity was uncertain, and his fate but very imperfectly known to the generality of his subjects, who were, in the mean time, a prey to every species of subaltern oppression.

Prince John, in league with Philip of France, Coeur-de-Lion's mortal enemy, was using every species of influence with the Duke of Austria, to prolong the captivity of his brother Richard, to whom he stood indebted for so many favours. In the mean time, he was strengthening his own faction in the kingdom, of which he proposed to dispute the succession, in case of the King's death, with the legitimate heir, Arthur Duke of Brittany, son of Geoffrey Plantagenet, the elder brother of John. This usurpation, it is well known, he afterwards effected. His own character being light, profligate, and perfidious, John easily attached to his person and faction, not only all who had reason to dread the resentment of Richard for criminal proceedings during his absence, but also the numerous class of "lawless resolutes," whom the crusades had turned back on their country, accomplished in the vices of the East, impoverished in substance, and hardened in character, and who placed their hopes of harvest in civil commotion.

To these causes of public distress and apprehension, must be added, the multitude of outlaws, who, driven to despair by the oppression of the feudal nobility, and the severe exercise of the forest laws, banded together in large gangs, and, keeping possession of the forests and the wastes, set at defiance the justice and magistracy of the country. The nobles themselves, each fortified within his own castle, and playing the petty sovereign over his own dominions, were the leaders of bands scarce less lawless and oppressive than those of the avowed depredators. To maintain these retainers, and to support the extravagance and magnificence which their pride induced them to affect, the nobility borrowed sums of money from the Jews at the most usurious interest, which gnawed into their estates like consuming cankers, scarce to be cured unless when circumstances gave them an opportunity of getting free, by exercising upon their creditors some act of unprincipled violence.

Under the various burdens imposed by this unhappy state of affairs, the people of England suffered deeply for the present, and had yet more dreadful cause to fear for the future. To augment this misery, a contagious disorder of a dangerous nature spread through the land; and, rendered more virulent by the nakedness, the indifferent food, and the wretched lodging of the lower classes, swept off many whose fate the survivors were tempted to envy, as exempting them from the evils which were to come.

Yet amid these accumulated distresses, the poor as well as the rich, the vulgar as well as the noble, in the event of a tournament, which was the grand spectacle of that age, felt as much interested as the half-starved citizen of Madrid, who has not a real left to buy provisions for his family, feels in the issue of a bull-feast. Neither duty nor infirmity could keep youth or age from such exhibitions. The Passage of Arms, as it was called, which was to take place at Ashby, in the county of Leicester, as champions of the first renown were to take the field in the presence of Prince John himself, who was expected to grace the lists, had attracted universal attention, and an immense confluence of persons of all ranks hastened upon the appointed morning to the place of combat.

The scene was singularly romantic. On the verge of a wood, which approached to within a mile of the town of Ashby, was an extensive meadow, of the finest and most beautiful green turf, surrounded on one side by the forest, and fringed on the other by straggling oak-trees, some of which had grown to an immense size. The ground, as if fashioned on purpose for the martial display which was intended, sloped gradually down on all sides to a level bottom, which was enclosed for the lists with strong posts, sides, forming a space of a quarter of a mile in length, and about half as broad. The form of the enclosure was an oblong square, save that the corners were considerably rounded off, in order to afford more convenience for the spectators. The openings for the entry of the combatants were at the northern and southern extremities of the lists, accessible by strong wooden gates, each wide enough to admit two horsemen riding abreast. At each of these portals were stationed two heralds, attended by six trumpets, as many persevaints, and a strong body of men-at-arms for maintaining order, and ascertaining the quality of the knights who proposed to engage in this martial game.

On a platform beyond the southern entrance, formed by a natural elevation of the ground, were pitched five magnificent pavilions, adorned with pennons of russet and black, the chosen colours of the five knights challengers. The cords of the tents were of the same colour. Before each pavilion was suspended the shield of the knight by whom it was occupied, and beside it stood his squire, quaintly disguised as a salvage or sylvan man, or in some other fantastic dress, according to the taste of his master, and the character he was pleased to assume during the game.* The central pavilion, as the place of honour, had been assigned to Brian de Bois-Guilbert, whose renown in all games of chivalry, no less than his connexion with the knights who had undertaken the Passage of Arms, had occasioned him to be eagerly received into the company of the challengers, and even adopted as their chief and leader, though he had so recently joined them. On one side of his tent were pitched those of Reginald Front-de-Bœuf and Richard de Malvoisin, and on the other was the pavilion of Hugh de Grantmesnil, a noble baron in the vicinity, whose ancestor had been Lord High Steward of England in the time of the Conqueror and his son William Rufus. Ralph de Vipont, a knight of St. John of Jerusalem, who had some ancient possessions in a place called Heather, near Ashby-de-la-Zouche, occupied the fifth pavilion. From the entrance into the lists, a gently sloping passage, ten yards in breadth, led up to the platform on which the tents were pitched. It was strongly secured by a palisade on each side, and was the esplanade in front of the pavilions, and the whole was guarded by men-at-arms.

The northern access to the lists terminated in a similar entrance of thirty feet in breadth, at the extremity of which was a large enclosed space for such knights as might be disposed to enter the lists with the challengers, behind which were placed tents containing refreshments of every kind for their accommodation, with armourers, farriers, and other attendants, in readiness to give their services wherever they might be necessary.

The exterior of the lists was in part occupied by temporary galleries, spread with tapestry and carpets and accommodated with cushions for the convenience of those ladies and nobles who were expected to attend the tournament. A narrow space, between these galleries and the lists, gave accommodation for yeomanry and spectators of a better degree than the mere vulgar, and might be compared to the pit of a theatre. The promiscuous multitude arranged themselves upon large banks of turf prepared for the purpose, which, aided by the natural elevation of the ground, enabled them to overlook the galleries, and obtain a fair view into the lists. Beside the accommodation which these stations afforded, many hundreds had perched themselves on the branches of the trees which surrounded the meadow; and even the

* This sort of masquerade is supposed to have occasioned the introduction of supporters into the science of heraldry.

f a country church, at some distance, was with spectators.

remains to notice respecting the general ment, that one gallery in the very centre of rn side of the lists, and consequently exactly o the spot where the shock of the combat ke place, was raised higher than the others, ly decorated, and graced by a sort of throne py, on which the royal arms were embla- Squires, pages, and yeomen in rich liveries, round this place of honour, which was de- e Prince John and his attendants. Oppo- s royal gallery was another, elevated to the ght, on the western side of the lists; and ly, if less sumptuously decorated, than that or the Prince himself. A train of pages and maidens, the most beautiful who could be ly dressed in fancy habits of green and rounded a throne decorated in the same Among pennons and flags bearing wounded ring hearts, bleeding hearts, bows and all the commonplace emblems of the of Cupid, a blazoned inscription informed tors, that this seat of honour was designed ne de la Beauté et des Amours. But who resent the Queen of Beauty and of Love sent occasion, no one was prepared to guess. hile spectators of every description thronged o occupy their respective stations, and not many quarrels concerning those which they led to hold. Some of these were settled by at-arms with brief ceremony; the shafts of le-axes, and pummels of their swords, being ployed as arguments to convince the more . Others, which involved the rival claims evated persons, were determined by the her- the two marshals of the field, William de d Stephen de Martival, who, armed at all e up and down the lists to enforce and pre- order among the spectators.

ly the galleries became filled with knights s, in their robes of peace, whose long and mantles were contrasted with the gayer splendid habits of the ladies, who, in a oportion than even the men themselves, o witness a sport, which one would have o bloody and dangerous to afford their sex asure. The lower and interior space was by substantial yeomen and burghers, and e lesser gentry, as, from modesty, poverty, title dared not assume any higher place. ourse among these that the most frequent r precedence occurred.

an unbeliever," said an old man, whose e tunic bore witness to his poverty, as his l dagger, and golden chain intimated his s to rank,—"whelp of a she-wolf! darest upon a Christian, and a Norman gentle- blood of Montdidier!"

gh expostulation was addressed to no other acquaintance Isaac, who, richly and even tly dressed in a gaberdine ornamented and fined with fur, was endeavouring to e in the foremost row beneath the gallery aughter, the beautiful Rebecca, who had at Ashby, and who was now hanging on s arm, not a little terrified by the popular which seemed generally excited by her resumption. But Isaac, though we have sufficiently timid on other occasions, knew t present he had nothing to fear. It was es of general resort, or where their equals mbled, that any avaricious or malevolent t offer him injury. At such meetings the under the protection of the general law; t proved a weak assurance, it usually hap- there were among the persons assembled ns, who, for their own interested motives, to act as their protectors. On the present Isaac felt more than usually confident, re that Prince John was even then in the negotiating a large loan from the Jews of e secured upon certain jewels and lands. n share in this transaction was considera-ble, and he well knew that the Prince's eager desire to bring it to a conclusion would ensure him his protection in the dilemma in which he stood.

Emboldened by these considerations, the Jew pursued his point, and jostled the Norman Christian, without respect either to his descent, quality, or religion. The complaints of the old man, however, excited the indignation of the by-standers. One of these, a stout well-set yeoman, arrayed in Lincoln-green, having twelve arrows stuck in his belt, with a baldric and badge of silver, and a bow of six feet length in his hand, turned short round, and while his countenance, which his constant exposure to weather had rendered brown as a hazel-nut, grew darker with anger, he advised the Jew to remember that all the wealth he had acquired by sucking the blood of his miserable victims had but swelled him like a bloated spider, which might be overlooked while it kept in a corner, but would be crushed if it ventured into the light. This intimation, delivered in Norman English with a firm voice and a stern aspect, made the Jew shrink back; and he would have probably withdrawn himself altogether from a vicinity so dangerous, had not the attention of every one been called to the sudden entrance of Prince John, who at that moment entered the lists, attended by a numerous and gay train, consisting partly of laymen, partly of churchmen, as light in their dress, and as gay in their demeanour, as their companions. Among the latter was the Prior of Jorvaulx, in the most gallant trim which a dignitary of the church could venture to exhibit. Fur and gold were not spared in his garments; and the points of his boots, out-heroding the preposterous fashion of the time, turned up so very far, as to be attached, not to his knees merely, but to his very girdle, and effectually prevented him from putting his foot into the stirrup. This, however, was a slight inconvenience to the gallant Abbot, who, perhaps, even rejoicing in the opportunity to display his accomplished horsemanship before so many spectators, especially of the fair sex, dispensed with the use of these supports to a timid rider. The rest of Prince John's retinue consisted of the favourite leaders of his mercenary troops, some marauding barons and profligate attendants upon the court, with several Knights Templars and Knights of St. John.

It may be here remarked, that the knights of these two orders were accounted hostile to King Richard, having adopted the side of Philip of France in the long train of disputes which took place in Palestine betwixt that monarch and the lion-hearted King of England. It was the well-known consequence of this discord that Richard's repeated victories had been rendered fruitless, his romantic attempts to besiege Jerusalem disappointed, and the fruit of all the glory which he had acquired had dwindled into an uncertain truce with the Sultan Saladin. With the same policy which had dictated the conduct of their brethren in the Holy Land, the Templars and Hospitallers in England and Normandy attached themselves to the faction of Prince John, having little reason to desire the return of Richard to England, or the succession of Arthur, his legitimate heir. For the opposite reason, Prince John hated and contemned the few Saxon families of consequence which subsisted in England, and omitted no opportunity of mortifying and affronting them; being conscious that his person and pretensions were disliked by them, as well as by the greater part of the English commons, who feared farther innovation upon their rights and liberties, from a sovereign of John's licentious and tyrannical disposition.

Attended by this gallant equipage, himself well mounted, and splendidly dressed in crimson and in gold, bearing upon his hand a falcon, and having his head covered by a rich fur bonnet, adorned with a circle of precious stones, from which his long curled hair escaped and overspread his shoulders, Prince John, upon a gray and high-mettled palfrey, caracoled within the lists at the head of his jovial party, laughing loud with his train, and eyeing with all the boldness of royal criticism the beauties who adorned the lofty galleries.

Those who remarked in the physiognomy of the Prince a dissolute and wholly unprincipled with extreme haughtiness and indifference to the feelings of others, could not exclude from his countenance that sort of comeliness which belongs to an open set of features, well formed by nature, modelled by art to the usual rules of courtesy, yet so far frank and honest, that they seemed as if they disclaimed to conceal the natural workings of the soul. Such an expression is often mistaken for manly frankness, when in truth it arises from the reckless indifference of a libertine disposition, conscious of superiority of birth, of wealth, or of some other adventitious advantage, totally unconnected with personal merit. To those who did not think so deeply, and they were the greater number by a hundred to one, the splendour of Prince John's rheno, the richness of his cloak, lined with the most costly sables, his maroquin boots and golden spurs, together with the grace with which he managed his palfrey, were sufficient to merit clamorous applause.

In his joyous caracole round the lists, the attention of the Prince was called by the commotion, not yet subsided, which had attended the ambitious movement of Isaac towards the higher places of the assembly. The quick eye of Prince John instantly recognised the Jew, but was much more agreeably attracted by the beautiful daughter of Zion, who, terrified by the tumult, clung close to the arm of her aged father.

The figure of Rebecca might indeed have compared with the proudest beauties of England, even though it had been judged by as shrewd a connoisseur as Prince John. Her form was exquisitely symmetrical, and was shown to advantage by a sort of Eastern dress, which she wore according to the fashion of the females of her nation. Her turban of yellow silk suited well with the darkness of her complexion. The brilliancy of her eyes, the superb arch of her eyebrows, her well-formed aquiline nose, her teeth as white as pearl, and the profusion of her sable tresses, which, each arranged in its own little spiral of twisted curls, fell down upon as much of a lovely neck and bosom as a simarre of the richest Persian silk, exhibiting flowers in their natural colours embossed upon a purple ground, permitted to be visible—all these constituted a combination of loveliness, which yielded not to the most beautiful of the maidens who surrounded her. It is true, that of the golden and pearl-studded clasps, which closed her vest from the throat to the waist, the three uppermost were left unfastened on account of the heat, which something enlarged the prospect to which we allude. A diamond necklace, with pendants of inestimable value, were by this means also made more conspicuous. The feather of an ostrich, fastened in her turban by an agraffe set with brilliants, was another distinction of the beautiful Jewess, scoffed and sneered at by the proud dames who sat above her, but secretly envied by those who affected to deride them.

"By the bald scalp of Abraham," said Prince John, "yonder Jewess must be the very model of that perfection, whose charms drove frantic the wisest king that ever lived! What sayest thou, Prior Aymer?—By the Temple of that wise king, which our wiser brother Richard proved unable to recover, she is the very Bride of the Canticles!"

"The Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley,"—answered the Prior, in a sort of snuffling tone; "but your Grace must remember she is still but a Jewess."

"Ay!" added Prince John, without heeding him, "and there is my Mammon of unrighteousness too—the Marquis of Marks, the Baron of Byzants, contesting for place with penniless dogs, whose threadbare cloaks have not a single cross in their pouches to keep the devil from dancing there. By the body of St. Mark, my prince of supplies, with his lovely Jewess, shall have a place in the gallery!—What is she, Isaac? Thy wife or thy daughter, that Eastern houri that thou lockest under thy arm as thou wouldst thy treasure-casket?"

"My daughter Rebecca, so please your Grace," answered Isaac, with a low congee, nothing embarrassed by the Prince's salutation, in which, however, there was at least as much mockery as courtesy.

"The wiser man thou," said John, wit[h] ... which his gay followers ... "But, daughter or wife, she sho[uld] ... according to her beauty and thy me[rits]. ... continued, bending ... the gallery. "Saxon churls, lolling at ... them sit ... make room for my prince of usurers and daughter. I'll make the hinds know they ... the high places of the synagogue with ... the synagogue properly belongs to."

Those who occupied the gallery to whom ... rious and unpolite speech was addressed ... family of Cedric the Saxon, with that of ... kinsman, Athelstane of Coningsburgh, a ... who, on account of his descent from the l[ast Saxon] monarchs of England, was held in the high[est respect] by all the Saxon natives of the north o[f England]. But with the blood of this ancient royal ... of their infirmities ... descended to Athel[stane]. ... was comely in countenance, bulky and str[ong in per]son, and in the flower of his age,—yet ... expression, dull-eyed, heavy-browed, ... sluggish in all his motions, and so slow in ... that the soubriquet of one of his ancestor[s was con]ferred upon him, and he was very gene[rally called] Athelstane the Unready. His friends, an[d he had] many, who, as well as Cedric, were passi[onately at]tached to him, contended that this slugg[ishness] arose not from want of courage, but from ... of decision; others alleged that his here[ditary vice] of drunkenness had obscured his faculties, ... very acute order, and that the passive co[urage and] meek good-nature which remained bel[ow were] merely the dregs of a character that might ... deserving of praise, but of which all the val[uable parts] had flown off in the progress of a long cour[se of] debauchery.

It was to this person, such as we hav[e described] him, that the Prince addressed his impe[rious com]mand to make place for Isaac and Rebec[ca. Athel]stane, utterly confounded at an order, whic[h the man]ners and feelings of the times rendered so ... insulting, unwilling to obey, yet undetermi[ned how to] resist, opposed only the vis inertiæ to t[he will of] John; and, without stirring or making a[ny motion] whatever of obedience, opened his large ... and stared at the Prince with an astonishm[ent which] had in it something extremely ludicrous. ... patient John regarded it in no such light.

"The Saxon porker," he said, "is eithe[r asleep or] minds me not—Prick him with your lance, ... speaking to a knight who rode near him, ... of a band of Free Companions, or Condo[ttieri; that is,] ... of mercenaries belonging to no partic[ular nation,] but attached for the time to any prince by ... were paid. There was a murmur even am[ong the at]tendants of Prince John; but De Bracy, ... fession freed him from all scruples, extend[ed his long] lance over the space which separated the g[allery from] the lists, and would have executed the co[mmands of] the Prince before Athelstane the Unready ... vered presence of mind sufficient even to ... his person from the weapon, had not Cedric ... as his companion was tardy, unsheathe[d, with the] speed of lightning, the short sword whic[h he wore,] and at a single blow severed the point o[f the lance] from the handle. The blood rushed into ... nance of Prince John. He swore one of ... oaths, and was about to utter some threat c[orrespond]ing in violence, when he was diverted fro[m his pur]pose, partly by his own attendants, wh[o gathered] around him conjuring him to be patient, ... general exclamation of the crowd, uttered ... plause of the spirited conduct of Cedric. ... rolled his eyes in indignation, as if to collec[t some safe] and easy victim; and chancing to encount[er the firm] glance of the same archer whom we ha[ve already] noticed, and who seemed to persist in his ... applause, in spite of the frowning aspect ... Prince bent upon him, he demanded his ... clamouring thus.

"I always add my hollo," said the yeom[an, "when] I see a good shot, or a gallant blow."

thou?" answered the Prince; "then thou
he white thyself, I'll warrant."
dman's mark, and at woodman's distance,
" answered the yeoman.
Nat Tyrrel's mark, at a hundred yards," ce from behind, but by whom uttered could cerned.
lusion to the fate of William Rufus, his er, at once incensed and alarmed Prince satisfied himself, however, with command-ien-at-arms, who surrounded the lists, to e on the braggart, pointing to the yeoman.
Grizzel," he added, "we will try his own is so ready to give his voice to the feats of

I not fly the trial," said the yeoman, with sure which marked his whole deportment.
while, stand up, ye Saxon churls," said the ce; "for, by the light of Heaven, since I it, the Jew shall have his seat amongst means, an it please your Grace!—it is not h as we to sit with the rulers of the land,"

w; whose ambition for precedence, though
him to dispute place with the extenuated
erished descendant of the line of Montdi-means stimulated him to an intrusion upon ges of the wealthy Saxons.
ifidel dog, when I command you," said
hn, "or I will have thy swarthy hide stript
nned for horse-furniture!"
ged, the Jew began to ascend the steep and eps which led up to the gallery.
e see," said the Prince, "who dare stop
ing his eye on Cedric, whose attitude
his intention to hurl the Jew down head-

astrophe was prevented by the clown Wam-pringing betwixt his master and Isaac, and
g, in answer to the Prince's defiance, "Marill I!" opposed to the beard of the Jew a rawn, which he plucked from beneath his
l with which, doubtless, he had furnished
st the tournament should have proved longer ppetite could endure abstinence. Finding nation of his tribe opposed to his very nose, Jester at the same time, flourished his word above his head, the Jew recoiled,
s footing, and rolled down the steps,- an jest to the spectators, who set up a loud
n which Prince John and his attendants
ined.
ne the prize, cousin Prince," said Wamba;
anquished my foe in fair fight with sword
," he added, brandishing the brawn in one
the wooden sword in the other.
and what art thou, noble champion?" said
n, still laughing.
by right of descent," answered the Jester; Wamba, the son of Witless, who was the eatherbrain, who was the son of an Alder-room for the Jew in front of the lower d Prince John, not unwilling perhaps to pology to desist from his original purpose;

the vanquished beside the victor were false

upon fool were worse," answered the nd Jew upon bacon worst of all."
ercy! good fellow," cried Prince John, assist me—Here, Isaac, lend me a handful
s."
Jew, stunned by the request, afraid to refuse,
lling to comply, fumbled in the furred bag
ng by his girdle, and was perhaps endea-ascertain how few coins might pass for a
the Prince stooped from his jennet and aac's doubts by snatching the pouch itself side; and flinging to Wamba a couple of pieces which it contained, he pursued his nd the lists, leaving the Jew to the derision around him, and himself receiving as much from the spectators as if he had done some d honourable action.

CHAPTER VIII.

At this the challenger with fierce defy
His trumpet sounds; the challenged makes reply;
With clangour rings the field, resounds the vaulted sky.
Their visors closed, their lances in the rest,
Or at the helmet pointed or the crest.
They vanish from the barrier, speed the race,
And spurring see decrease the middle space.
Palamon and Arcite.

In the midst of Prince John's cavalcade, he suddenly stopt, and appealing to the Prior of Jorvaulx, declared the principal business of the day had been forgotten.

"By my halidom," said he, "we have neglected, Sir Prior, to name the fair Sovereign of Love and of Beauty, by whose white hand the palm is to be distributed. For my part, I am liberal in my ideas, and I care not if I give my vote for the black-eyed Rebecca."

"Holy Virgin," answered the Prior, turning up his eyes in horror, "a Jewess!—We should deserve to be stoned out of the lists; and I am not yet old enough to be a martyr. Besides, I swear by my patron saint, that she is far inferior to the lovely Saxon, Rowena."

"Saxon or Jew," answered the Prince, "Saxon or Jew, dog or hog, what matters it! I say, name Rebecca, were it only to mortify the Saxon churls."

A murmur arose even among his own immediate attendants.

"Thus passes a jest, my lord," said De Bracy; "no knight here will lay lance in rest if such an insult is attempted."

"It is the mere wantonness of insult," said one of the oldest and most important of Prince John's followers, Waldemar Fitzurse, "and if your Grace attempt it, cannot but prove ruinous to your projects."

"I entertained you, sir," said John, reining up his palfrey haughtily, "for my follower, but not for my counsellor."

"Those who follow your Grace in the paths which you tread," said Waldemar, but speaking in a low voice, "acquire the right of counsellors; for your interest and safety are not more deeply gaged than their own."

From the tone in which this was spoken, John saw the necessity of acquiescence. "I did but jest," he said; "and you turn upon me like so many adders! Name whom you will, in the fiend's name, and please yourselves."

"Nay, nay," said De Bracy, "let the fair sovereign's throne remain unoccupied, until the conqueror shall be named, and then let him choose the lady by whom it shall be filled. It will add another grace to his triumph, and teach fair ladies to prize the love of valiant knights, who can exalt them to such distinction."

"If Brian de Bois-Guilbert gain the prize," said the Prior, "I will gage my rosary that I name the Sovereign of Love and Beauty."

"Bois-Guilbert," answered De Bracy, "is a good lance; but there are others around these lists, Sir Prior, who will not fear to encounter him."

"Silence, sirs," said Waldemar, "and let the Prince assume his seat. The knights and spectators are alike impatient, the time advances, and highly fit it is that the sports should commence."

Prince John, though not yet a monarch, had in Waldemar Fitzurse all the inconveniences of a favourite minister, who, in serving his sovereign, must always do so in his own way. The Prince acquiesced, however, although his disposition was precisely of that kind which is apt to be obstinate upon trifles, and, assuming his throne, and being surrounded by his followers, gave signal to the heralds to proclaim the laws of the tournament, which were briefly as follows:

First, the five challengers were to undertake all comers.

Secondly, any knight proposing to combat, might, if he pleased, select a special antagonist from among the challengers, by touching his shield. If he did so with the reverse of his lance, the trial of skill was made with what were called the arms of courtesy, that is, with lances at whose extremity a piece of round flat board was fixed, so that no danger was encountered, save from the shock of the horses and riders. But if the shield was touched with the sharp end of the lance, the combat was understood to be at outrance, that is, the knights were to fight with sharp weapons, as in actual battle.

Thirdly, when the knights present had accomplished their vow, by each of them breaking five lances, the Prince was to declare the victor in the first day's tourney, who should receive as prize a war-horse of exquisite beauty and matchless strength; and in addition to this reward of valour, it was now declared, he should have the peculiar honour of naming the Queen of Love and Beauty, by whom the prize should be given on the ensuing day.

Fourthly, it was announced, that, on the second day, there should be a general tournament, in which all the knights present, who were desirous to win renown, might take part; and being divided into two bands, of equal number, might fight it out manfully until the signal was given by Prince John to cease the combat. The Queen of Love and Beauty, who then was to crown the knight whom the Prince should adjudge to have borne himself best in this second day, was to receive a coronet composed of thin gold plate, cut into the shape of a laurel crown. On this second day the knightly games ceased. But on that which was to follow, feats of archery, of bull-baiting, and other popular amusements, were to be practised, for the more immediate amusement of the populace. In his manner did Prince John endeavour to lay the foundation of a popularity, which he was perpetually throwing down by some inconsiderate act of wanton aggression upon the feelings and prejudices of the people.

The lists now presented a most splendid spectacle. The sloping galleries were crowded with all that was noble, great, wealthy, and beautiful in the north of England; and the picturesque and various dresses of these dignified spectators, relieved the view as gay as it was rich, while the interior and lower seats, filled with the substantial burgesses and yeomen of merry England, formed, in their more plain attire, a dark fringe, or border, around this circle of brilliant embroidery, relieving, and at the same time, setting off its splendour.

The heralds finished their proclamation with their usual cry of "Largess, largess, gallant knights!" and gold and silver pieces were showered on them from the galleries, it being a high point of chivalry to exhibit liberality towards those whom the age accounted at once the secretaries and the historians of honour. The bounty of the spectators was acknowledged by the customary shouts of "Love of Ladies—Death of Champions—Honour to the Generous—Glory to the Brave!" To which the more humble spectators added their acclamations, and a numerous band of trumpeters the flourish of their martial instruments. When these sounds had ceased, the heralds withdrew from the lists in gay and glittering procession, and none remained within them save the marshals of the field, who, armed cap-a-pie, sat on horseback, motionless as statues, at the opposite end of the lists. Meantime, the enclosed space at the northern extremity of the lists, large as it was, was now completely crowded with knights desirous to prove their skill against the challengers, and, when viewed from the galleries, presented the appearance of a sea of waving plumage, intermixed with glistening helmets, and tall lances, to the extremities of which were, in many cases, attached small pennons of about a span's breadth, which, fluttering in the air as the breeze caught them, joined with the restless motion of the feathers to add liveliness to the scene.

At length the barriers were opened, and five knights, chosen by lot, advanced slowly into the area; a single champion riding in front, and the other four following in pairs. All were splendidly armed, and my Saxon authority (in the Wardour Manuscript) records at great length their devices, their colours, and the embroidery of their horse trappings. It is unnecessary to be particular on these subjects. To borrow lines from a contemporary poet, who has written but too little—

> "The knights are dust,
> And their good swords are rust,
> Their souls are with the saints, we

Their escutcheons have long moulde walls of their castles. Their castles t but green mounds and shattered ruins— once knew them, knows them no more race since theirs has died out and beer the very land which they occupied, with rity of feudal proprietors and feudal lords would it avail the reader to know their evanescent symbols of their martial ran

Now, however, no what anticipating which awaited their names and feats, t advanced through the lists, to examin steeds, and compelling them to move at the same time, they exhibited their p with the grace and dexterity of th r rocession entered the lists, the sound o brazen music was heard from behind the challengers which the performers were was of Eastern origin, having been brou Holy Land; and the mixture of the bells seemed to bid welcome at once to the knights as they advanced. Wi an immense concourse of spectators fixe the five knights advanced to the p which the tents of the challengers ste separating themselves, each touched with the reverse of his shield the shield nist to whom he wished to oppose l lower order of spectators in general the higher class, and it is even said s ladies, were rather disappointed at n choosing the terms of courtesy. For th persons, who, in the present day, a highly the deepest traverses, we think to make an overture or motion to th erred by the champions engaged.

Having intimated their pacific champions retired to the stricter where they remained drawn up in a li challengers, sallying each from his pavi their horses, and headed by Brian de-l dese noble fr m the platform, and oppos individually to the knights who had respective shields.

At the flourish of clarions and trumpets out against each other at full gallop; a the superior dexterity or good fortune o gers, that those opposed to Bois Guilbe and Front-de-Bœuf, rolled on the grou tazonist of Grantmesnil, instead of bear point fair against the crest or the shield swerved so much from the direct line a weapon athwart the person of his op cumstance which was accounted mo than that of being actually unhorsed; latter might happen from accident, wh nevertheless awkwardness and want of of the weapon and of the horse. The fifth maintained the honour of his party and with the Knight of St. John, both s lances without advantage on either side.

The shouts of the multitude, toget acclamations of the heralds, and the el trumpets, announced the triumph of th the defeat of the vanquished. The for to their pavilions, and the latter, gathering up as they could, withdrew from the lis and dejection, to agree with their victor the redemption of their arms and their h according to the laws of the tournam forfeited. The fifth of the numb r als the lists long enough to be greeted by t of the spectators, amongst whom he the aggravation, doubtless, of his compa fication.

A second and a third party of kn

* These lines are part of an unpublished poe whose muse so often tantalizes with fragments her powers, while the manner in which she f her betrays her caprice, yet whose unfinished more talent than the laboured masterpieces of c

d although they had various success, yet, whole, the advantage decidedly remained challengers, not one of whom lost his seat d from his charger misfortune which be r two of their antagonists in each encounter. ts, therefore, on those opposed to them, o be considerably dropped by their continued

Three knights only appeared on the fourth to, avoiding the shields of Bois-Guilbert and -Beraf, contented themselves with touching the three other knights, who had not also anifested the same strength and dexterity. ne selection did not alter the fortune of the challengers were still successful: one of tagonists was overthrown, and both the ded in the attaint, that is, in striking the ed shield of their antagonist firmly and with the lance-head in a direct line, so that on might break unless the champion was wn.

his fourth encounter, there was a considera- ; nor did it appear that any one was very o renewing the combat. The spectators d among themselves; for, among the ers, Malvoisin and Front-de-Bœuf were r from their characters, and the others, rantmesnil, were disliked as strangers and s.

ne shared the general feeling of dissatisfac- cently as Cedric the Saxon, who saw, in each e gained by the Norman challengers, a re- umph over the honour of England. His cation had taught him no skill in the games lry, although, with the arms of his Saxon s, he had manifested himself on many s a brave and determined soldier. He nxiously to Athelstane, who had learned the ishments of the age, as if desiring that he make some personal effort to recover the which was passing into the hands of the and his associates. But, though both stout und strong of person, Athelstane had a dis- oo inert and unambitious to make the exer- ich Cedric seemed to expect from him.

day as against England, my lord," said Ced- narked tone; "are you not tempted to take ?"

tilt to-morrow," answered Athelstane, "in ; it's not worth while for me to arm my- ay."

hings displeased Cedric in this speech. It l the Norman word combat (to express the onflict,) and it evinced some indifference to ir of the country; but it was spoken by Athel- om he held in such profound respect, that not trust himself to canvass his motives or s. Moreover, he had no time to make any or Wamba answered, "I would advise, "I- er, though scarce easier, to be the best man hundred, than the best man of two."

ane took the observation as a serious com- but Cedric, who better understood the Jester's darted at him a severe and menacing look; y it was for Wamba, perhaps, that the time e prevented his receiving, notwithstanding and service, more sensible marks of his mas- ntment.

use in the tournament was still uninterrupt- ting by the voices of the heralds exclaiming— f ladies, splintering of lances! stand forth, nights, fair eyes look upon your deeds!"

usic also of the challengers breathed from time wild bursts expressive of triumph or while the clowns grudged a holiday which o pass away in inactivity; and old knights es lamented in whispers the decay of martial oke of the triumphs of their younger days, d that the land did not now supply dames of ascendent beauty as had animated the jousts r times. Prince John began to talk to his ts about making ready the banquet, and the of adjudging the prize to Brian de Bois-

Guilbert, who had, with a single spear, overthrown two knights and foiled a third.

At length, as the Saracenic music of the challengers concluded one of those long and high flourishes with which they had broken the silence of the lists, it was answered by a solitary trumpet, which breathed a note of defiance from the northern extremity. All eyes were turned to see the new champion whom these sounds announced, and no sooner were the barriers opened than he paced into the lists. As far as could be argued of a man sheathed in armour, the new adventurer did not greatly exceed the middle size, and seemed to be rather slender than strongly made. His suit of armour was formed of steel, richly inlaid with gold, and the device on his shield was a young oak-tree pulled up by the roots, with the Spanish word Desdichado, signifying Disinherited. He was mounted on a gallant black horse, and as he passed through the lists he gracefully saluted the Prince and the ladies by lowering his lance. The dexterity with which he managed his steed, and something of youthful grace which he displayed in his manner won him the favour of the multitude, which some of the lower classes expressed by calling out, "Touch Ralph de Vipont's shield—touch the Hospitaller's shield; he has the least sure seat, he is your cheapest bargain."

The champion, moving onward amid these well-meant hints, ascended the platform by the sloping alley which led to it from the lists, and, to the astonishment of all present, riding straight up to the central pavilion, struck with the sharp end of his spear the shield of Brian de Bois-Guilbert until it rang again. All stood astonished at his presumption, but none more than the redoubted Knight whom he had thus defied to mortal combat, and who, little expecting so rude a challenge, was standing carelessly at the door of the pavilion.

"Have you confessed yourself, brother," said the Templar, "and have you heard mass this morning, that you peril your life so frankly?"

"I am fitter to meet death than thou art," answered the Disinherited Knight; for by this name the stranger had recorded himself in the books of the tourney.

"Then take your place in the lists," said Bois-Guilbert, "and look your last upon the sun; for this night thou shalt sleep in paradise."

"Gramercy for thy courtesy," replied the Disinherited Knight, "and to requite it, I advise thee to take a fresh horse and a new lance, for by my honour you will need both."

Having expressed himself thus confidently, he reined his horse backward down the slope which he had ascended, and compelled him in the same manner to move backward through the lists, till he reached the northern extremity, where he remained stationary, in expectation of his antagonist. This feat of horsemanship again attracted the applause of the multitude.

However incensed at his adversary for the precautions which he recommended, Brian de Bois-Guilbert did not neglect his advice; for his honour was too nearly concerned, to permit his neglecting any means which might ensure victory over his presumptuous opponent. He changed his horse for a proved and fresh one of great strength and spirit. He chose a new and tough spear, lest the wood of the former might have been strained in the previous encounters he had sustained. Lastly, he laid aside his shield, which had received some little damage, and received another from his squires. His first had only borne the general device of his rider, representing two knights riding upon one horse, an emblem expressive of the original humility and poverty of the Templars, qualities which they had since exchanged for the arrogance and wealth that finally occasioned their suppression. Bois-Guilbert's new shield bore a raven in full flight, holding in its claws a skull, and bearing the motto, Gare le Corbeau.

When the two champions stood opposed to each other at the two extremities of the lists, the public expectation was strained to the highest pitch. Few augured the possibility that the encounter could terminate well for the Disinherited Knight, yet his courage and gallantry secured the general good wishes of the spectators.

erm of chivalry transferred to the law, gives the being attainted of treason.

The trumpets had no sooner given the signal, than the champions vanished from their posts with the speed of lightning, and closed in the centre of the lists with the shock of a thunderbolt. The lances burst into shivers up to the very grasp, and it seemed at the moment that both knights had fallen, for the shock had made each horse recoil backwards upon its haunches. The address of the riders soon restored their steeds by use of the bridle and spur; and having glared on each other for an instant with eyes which seemed to flash fire through the bars of their visors, each made a courtesy-volte, and repaired to the extremity of the lists, to receive a fresh lance from the attendants.

A loud shout from the spectators, waving of scarfs and handkerchiefs, and general acclamations attested the interest taken by the spectators in this encounter; the most equal, as well as the best performed, which had graced the day. But no sooner had the knights resumed their station, than the clamour of applause was hushed into a silence, so deep and so dead, that it seemed the multitude were afraid even to breathe.

A few minutes' pause having been allowed, that the combatants and their horses might recover breath, Prince John with his truncheon signed to the trumpets to sound the onset. The champions a second time sprung from their stations, and closed in the centre of the lists, with the same speed, the same dexterity, the same violence, but not the same equal fortune as before.

In this second encounter, the Templar aimed at the centre of his antagonist's shield, and struck it so fair and forcibly, that his spear went to shivers, and the Disinherited Knight reeled in his saddle. On the other hand, that champion had, in the beginning of his career, directed the point of his lance towards Bois-Guilbert's shield, but, changing his aim almost in the moment of encounter, he addressed it to the helmet, a mark more difficult to hit, but which, if attained, rendered the shock more irresistible. Fair and true he hit the Norman on the visor, where his lance's point kept hold of the bars. Yet, even at this disadvantage, the Templar sustained his high reputation; and had not the girths of his saddle burst, he might not have been unhorsed. As it chanced, however, saddle, horse, and man, rolled on the ground under a cloud of dust.

To extricate himself from the stirrups and fallen steed, was to the Templar scarce the work of a moment; and, stung with madness, both at his disgrace and at the acclamations with which it was hailed by the spectators, he drew his sword and waved it in defiance of his conqueror. The Disinherited Knight sprung from his steed, and also unsheathed his sword. The marshals of the field, however, spurred their horses between them, and reminded them, that the laws of the tournament did not, on the present occasion, permit this species of encounter.

"We shall meet again, I trust," said the Templar, casting a resentful glance at his antagonist; "and where there are none to separate us."

"If we do not," said the Disinherited Knight, "the fault shall not be mine. On foot or horseback, with spear, with axe, or with sword, I am alike ready to encounter thee."

More and angrier words would have been exchanged, but the marshals, crossing their lances betwixt them, compelled them to separate. The Disinherited Knight returned to his first station, and Bois-Guilbert to his tent, where he remained for the rest of the day in an agony of despair.

Without alighting from his horse, the conqueror called for a bowl of wine, and opening the beaver, or lower part of his helmet, announced that he quaffed it, "To all true English hearts, and to the confusion of foreign tyrants." He then commanded his trumpet to sound a defiance to the challengers, and desired a herald to announce to them, that he should make no election, but was willing to encounter them in the order in which they pleased to advance against him.

The gigantic Front-de-Bœuf, armed in sable armour, was the first who took the field. He bore on a white shield a black bull's head, half defaced by the numerous encounters which he had undergone, and bearing the arrogant motto, Cave, Adsum. Over this champion the Disinherited Knight obtained a slight but decisive advantage. Both Knights broke their lances fairly, but Front-de-Bœuf, who lost a stirrup at the encounter, was adjudged to have the disadvantage.

In the stranger's third encounter with Sir Philip Malvoisin, he was openly successful; striking that baron so forcibly on the casque, that the laces of the helmet broke, and Malvoisin, only saved from falling by being unbuckled, was declared vanquished like his companions.

In his fourth combat with De Grantmesnil, the Disinherited Knight showed as much courtesy as he had hitherto evinced courage and dexterity. De Grantmesnil's horse, which was young and violent, reared and plunged in the course of the career so as to disturb the rider's aim, and the stranger, declining to take the advantage which this accident afforded him, raised his lance, and passing his antagonist without touching him, wheeled his horse and rode back again to his own end of the lists, offering his antagonist, by a herald, the chance of a second encounter. Thus De Grantmesnil declined, avowing himself vanquished as much by the courtesy as by the address of his opponent.

Ralph de Vipont summed up the list of the stranger's triumphs, being hurled to the ground with such force, that the blood gushed from his nose and his mouth, and he was borne senseless from the lists.

The acclamations of thousands applauded the unanimous award of the Prince and marshals, announcing that day's honours to the Disinherited Knight

CHAPTER IX.

——In the midst was seen
A lady of a more majestic mien,
By stature and by beauty marked their sovereign Queen.
* * * * * *
And as in beauty she surpassed the choir,
So nobler than the rest was her attire;
A crown of ruddy gold enclosed her brow,
Plain without pomp, and rich without a show;
A branch of Agnus Castus in her hand,
She bore aloft her symbol of command.

The Flower and the Leaf.

William de Wyvil and Stephen de Martival, the marshals of the field, were the first to offer their congratulations to the victor, praying him at the same time, to suffer his helmet to be unlaced, or, at least, that he would raise his visor ere they conducted him to receive the prize of the day's tourney from the hands of Prince John. The Disinherited Knight, with all knightly courtesy, declined their request, alleging that he could not at this time suffer himself to be seen, for reasons which he had assigned to the heralds when he entered the lists. The marshals were perfectly satisfied by this reply; for amidst the frequent and capricious vows by which knights were accustomed to bind themselves in the days of chivalry, there were none more common than those by which they engaged to remain incognito for a certain space, or until some particular adventure was achieved. The marshals, therefore, pressed no farther into the mystery of the Disinherited Knight, but, announcing to Prince John the conqueror's desire to remain unknown, they requested permission to bring him before his Grace, in order that he might receive the reward of his valour.

John's curiosity was excited by the mystery observed by the stranger; and, being already displeased with the issue of the tournament, in which the challengers whom he favoured had been successively defeated by one knight, he answered haughtily to the marshals, "By the light of Our Lady's brow, this same knight hath been disinherited as well of his courtesy as of his lands, since he desires to appear before us without uncovering his face. But ye, my lords," he said, turning round to his train, "who the gallant can be, that bears himself thus proudly?"

"I cannot guess," answered De Bracy, "nor do I think there had been within the four seas that girt Britain a champion that could bear down three of one day's jousting. By my faith, I shall t the force with which he shocked De e poor Hospitaller was hurled from his stone from a sling."

ot of that," said a Knight of St. John,
esent; "your Templo champion had no
I saw your brave lance, Bois-Guilbert, over, grasping his hands full of sand at

, being attached to the Templars, would
l, but was prevented by Prince John.
rs!" he said, "what unprofitable debate
?"
ior," said De Wyvil, "still wars the
your highness."
pleasure," answered John, "that he do
l we learn whether there is not some one
t least guess at his name and quality.
remain there till nightfall, he has had
h to keep him warm."
nce," said Waldemar Fitzurse, "will do
e honour to the victor, if you compel him
ve to tell your highness that which we can-
at least I can form no guess—unless he
he good lances who accompanied King Palestine, and who are now straggling
from the Holy Land."
e the Earl of Salisbury," said De Bracy,
t the same pitch"
mas de Multon, the Knight of Gilsland,
d Fitzurse; "Salisbury is bigger in the whisper arose among the train, but by suggested could not be ascertained. "It
e King—it might be Richard Cœur-de-lf!"
od's forbode!" said Prince John, involun-
g at the same time as pale as death, and
s if blighted by a flash of lightning;
!—De Bracy! brave knights and gentember your promises, and stand truly by no danger impending," said Waldemar are you so little acquainted with the ks of your father's son, as to think they

within the circumference of yonder suit
—De Wyvil and Martival, you will best ince by bringing forward the victor to the ending an error that has conjured all the his cheeks.—Look at him more closely,"
l, "your highness will see that he wants of King Richard's height, and twice as shoulder-breadth. The very horse he not have carried the ponderous weight
ard through a single course."
was yet speaking, the marshals brought Disinherited Knight to the foot of a t of steps, which formed the ascent from Prince John's throne. Still discomposed a that his brother, so much injured, and e was so much incensed, had suddenly is native kingdom, even the distinctions
by Fitzurse did not altogether remove apprehensions; and while, with a short assed eulogy upon his valour, he caused ed to him the war horse assigned as the mbled lest from the barred visor of the
before him, an answer might be returned,
nd awful accents of Richard the Lionisinherited Knight spoke not a word in compliment of the Prince, which he only

ed with a courteous obeisance.
e was led into the lists by two grooms
d, the animal itself being fully accoutred chest war-furniture; which, however, ed to the value of the noble creature in ose who were judges. Laying one hand mmed of the saddle, the Disinherited
lted at once upon the back of the steed
king use of the stirrup and, brandishing ce, rode twice around the lists, exhibiting nd paces of the horse with the skill of a eman.
rance of vanity, which might otherwise have been attributed to this display, was removed by the propriety shown in exhibiting to the best advantage the princely reward with which he had been just honoured, and the Knight was again greeted by the acclamations of all present.

In the mean while, the bustling Prior of Jorvaulx had remarked Prince John, in a whisper, that the victor must now display his good judgment, instead of his valour, by selecting from among the beauties who graced the galleries, a lady, who should fill the throne of the Queen of Beauty and of Love, and deliver the prize of the tourney upon the ensuing day. The Prince accordingly made a sign with his truncheon, as the Knight passed him at his second career around the lists. The Knight turned towards the throne, and sinking his lance, until the point was within a foot of the ground, remained motionless, as if expecting John's commands; while all admired the sudden dexterity with which he instantly reduced his fiery steed from a state of violent emotion and high excitation to the stillness of an equestrian statue.

"Sir Disinherited Knight," said Prince John, "since that is the only title by which we can address you, it is now your duty, as well as privilege, to name the fair lady, who, as Queen of Honour and of Love, is to preside over next day's festival. If, as a stranger in our land, you should require the aid of other judgment to guide your own, we can only say that Alicia, the daughter of our gallant knight Waldemar Fitzurse, has at our court been long held the first in beauty as in place. Nevertheless, it is your undoubted prerogative to confer on whom you please this crown, by the delivery of which to the lady of your choice, the election of to-morrow's Queen will be formal and complete. Raise your lance."

The knight obeyed; and Prince John placed upon its point a coronet of green satin, having around its edge a circlet of gold, the upper edge of which was relieved by arrow-points and hearts placed interchangeably, like the strawberry leaves and balls upon a ducal crown.

In the broad hint which he dropped respecting the daughter of Waldemar Fitzurse, John had more than one motive, each the offspring of a mind, which was a strange mixture of carelessness and presumption with low artifice and cunning. He wished to banish from the minds of the chivalry around him his own indecent and unacceptable jest respecting the Jewess Rebecca; he was desirous of conciliating Alicia's father Waldemar, of whom he stood in awe, and who had more than once shown himself dissatisfied during the course of the day's proceedings. He had also a wish to establish himself in the good graces of the lady; for John was at least as licentious in his pleasures as profligate in his ambition. But besides all these reasons, he was desirous to raise up against the Disinherited Knight (towards whom he already entertained a strong dislike) a powerful enemy in the person of Waldemar Fitzurse, who was likely, he thought, highly to resent the injury done to his daughter, in case, as was not unlikely, the victor should make another choice.

And so indeed it proved. For the Disinherited Knight passed the gallery close to that of the Prince, in which the Lady Alicia was seated in the full pride of triumphant beauty, and, pacing forwards as slowly as he had hitherto rode swiftly around the lists, he seemed to exercise his right of examining the numerous fair faces which adorned that splendid circle.

It was worth while to see the different conduct of the beauties who underwent this examination, during the time it was proceeding. Some blushed, some assumed an air of pride and dignity, some looked straight forward, and essayed to seem utterly unconscious of what was going on, some drew back in alarm, which was perhaps affected, some endeavoured to forbear smiling, and there were two or three who laughed outright. There were also some who dropped their veils over their charms; but as the Wardour Manuscript says these were fair ones of ten years standing, it may be supposed that, having had their full share of such vanities, they were willing to withdraw their claim in order to give a fair chance to the rising beauties of the age.

At length the champion paused beneath the balcony in which the Lady Rowena was placed, and the expectation of the spectators was excited to the utmost.

It must be owned, that if an interest displayed in his success could have biassed the Disinherited Knight, the part of the lists before which he paused had merited his predilection. Cedric the Saxon, overjoyed at the discomfiture of the Templar, and still more at the miscarriage of his two malevolent neighbours, Front-de-Bœuf and Malvoisin, had, with his body half stretched over the balcony, accompanied the victor in each course, not with his eyes only, but with his whole heart and soul. The Lady Rowena had watched the progress of the day with equal attention, though without openly betraying the same intense interest. Even the unmoved Athelstane had shown symptoms of shaking off his apathy, when, calling for a huge goblet of muscadine, he quaffed it to the health of the Disinherited Knight.

Another group, stationed under the gallery occupied by the Saxons, had shown no less interest in the fate of the day.

"Father Abraham!" said Isaac of York, when the first course was run betwixt the Templar and the Disinherited Knight, "how fiercely that Gentile rides! Ah, the good horse that was brought all the long way from Barbary, he takes no more care of him than if he were a wild ass's colt—and the noble armour that was worth so many zecchins to Joseph Pareira, the armourer of Milan, besides seventy in the hundred of profits, he cares for it as little as if he had found it in the highways!"

"If he risks his own person and limbs, father," said Rebecca, "in doing such a dreadful battle, he can scarce be expected to spare his horse and armour."

"Child!" replied Isaac, somewhat heated, "thou knowest not what thou speakest. His neck and limbs are his own, but his horse and armour belong to — Holy Jacob! what was I about to say!—Nevertheless, it is a good youth.—See, Rebecca! see, he is again about to go up to battle against the Philistine. Pray, child—pray for the safety of the good youth,—and of the speedy horse, and the rich armour.—God of my fathers!" he again exclaimed, "he hath conquered, and the uncircumcised Philistine hath fallen before his lance,—even as Og the King of Bashan, and Sihon, King of the Amorites, fell before the sword of our fathers!—Surely he shall take their gold and their silver, and their war-horses, and their armour of brass and of steel, for a prey and for a spoil."

The same anxiety did the worthy Jew display during every course that was run, seldom failing to hazard a hasty calculation concerning the value of the horse and armour which were forfeited to the champion upon each new success. There had been therefore no small interest taken in the success of the Disinherited Knight, by those who occupied the part of the lists before which he now paused.

Whether from indecision or some other motive of hesitation, the champion of the day remained stationary for more than a minute, while the eyes of the silent audience were riveted upon his motions; and then, gradually and gracefully sinking the point of his lance, he deposited the coronet which it supported at the feet of the fair Rowena. The trumpets instantly sounded, while the heralds proclaimed the Lady Rowena the Queen of Beauty and of Love for the ensuing day, menacing with suitable penalties those who should be disobedient to her authority. They then repeated their cry of Largesse, to which Cedric, in the height of his joy, replied by an ample donative, and to which Athelstane, though less promptly, added one equally large.

There was some murmuring among the damsels of Norman descent, who were as much unused to see the preference given to a Saxon beauty, as the Norman nobles were to sustain defeat in the games of chivalry which they themselves had introduced. But these sounds of disaffection were drowned by the popular shout of "Long live the Lady Rowena, the chosen and lawful Queen of Love and of Beauty!" To which many in the lower area added, "Long live the Saxon Princess! long live the race of the immortal Alfred!"

However unacceptable these sounds might Prince John, and to those around him, he saw self nevertheless obliged to confirm the nom
of the victor, and accordingly calling to horse,
he left his throne, and mounting his jennet, accompa nied by his train, he again entered the lists. The Prince paused a moment beneath the gallery of the Alicia, to whom he paid his compliments, obs
at the same time, to those around him—"By m halidome, sirs! if the Knight's feats in arms have
that he hath limbs and sinews, his choice hath n
less proved that his eyes are none of the clear

It was on this occasion, as during his whole life,
John's misfortune not perfectly to understa
characters of those whom he wished to con Waldemar Fitzurse was rather offended than at the Prince stating thus broadly an opinion, t daughter had been slighted.

"I know no right of chivalry," he said, "mo precious or inalienable than that of each free kn
choose his lady-love by his own judgment.
daughter courts distinction from no one; and own character, and in her own sphere, will ne
to receive the full proportion of that which is he

Prince John replied not; but, spurring his h
if to give vent to his vexation, he made the bound forward to the gallery where Rowe
seated, with the crown still at her feet.

"Assume," he said, "fair lady, the mark o sovereignty, to which none vows homage mo
cerely than ourself, John of Anjou; and if it
you to-day, with your noble sire and friends, t our banquet in the Castle of Ashby, we shall l know the empress to whose service we dev morrow."

Rowena remained silent, and Cedric answ
her in his native Saxon.

"The Lady Rowena," he said, "possesses language in which to reply to your courtesy sustain her part in your festival. I also, and th Athelstane of Coningsburgh, speak only the la and practise only the manners of our father
therefore decline with thanks your Highness'
teous invitation to the banquet. To-morrow, t Rowena will take upon her the state to which been called by the free election of the victor K confirmed by the acclamations of the people."

So saying, he lifted the coronet, and placed Rowena's head, in token of her acceptance temporary authority assigned to her.

"What says he?" said Prince John, affect to understand the Saxon language, in which ever he was well skilled. The purport of C speech was repeated to him in French. "It i
he said; "to-morrow we will ourself cond mute sovereign to her seat of dignity. You, a Sir Knight," he added, turning to the victo had remained near the gallery, "will this da
our banquet?"

The Knight, speaking for the first time, in a l
hurried voice, excused himself by pleading f
and the necessity of preparing for to-morro counter.

"It is well," said Prince John, haughtily; "al
unused to such refusals, we will endeavour t our banquet as we may, though ungraced by t
successful in arms, and his elected Queen of B

So saying, he prepared to leave the lists w glittering train, and his turning his steed for th pose, was the signal for the breaking up and
sion of the spectators.

Yet, with the vindictive memory proper to o
pride, especially when combined with consciou
of desert, John had hardly proceeded three pa
again, turning around, he fixed an eye of stern
ment upon the yeoman who had displeased
the early part of the day, and issued his com
to the men-at-arms who stood near—"On y suffer not that fellow to escape."

The yeoman stood the angry glance of the
with the same unvaried steadiness which had his former deportment, saying, with a smile,
no intention to leave Ashby until the day a morrow. I must see how Staffordshire and draw their bows—the forests of Needharnwood must rear good archers."

Prince John to les—rede—, but not in—"I will see how ye can draw his own: be him unless—his skill should prove some use or solence!"*
—" said De Bracy, "that the —
—ments should be restrained by —"
— who—bly thought his pat—the readiest road to popularity —shoulders and was silent. Prince —from the lists, and the dis—multitude became general.
—routes, according to the different quar—they came, and in groups of various —spectators were seen retiring over the —most numerous part streamed to—wards Ashby, where many of the distin—and where —accommodation in the town itself —were most of the knights who had —in the tournament, or who proposed —morrow, and who, as they rode —talking over the events of the day, were —The same —were bestowed upon Prince John —to the splen—to the popu—character.
—and more general, as well as a bet—acclamation, attended the victor of the —to withdraw himself from popular —the accommodation of one of those —at the extremities of the lists, the —was courteously tendered him by the —the field. On his retiring to his tent, —had lingered in the lists, to look upon and —concerning him, also dispersed. —and sounds of a tumultuous concourse —crowded together in one place, and agi—same passing events, were now exchanged —of voices of different groups re—directions, and these speedily died away. No other sounds were heard save the —menials who stripped the galleries of —and tapestry, in order to put them in —night, and wrangled among themselves —bottles of wine and relics of the —which had been served round to the spec—

—the precincts of the lists more than one —erected; and these now began to glimmer —twilight, announcing the toil of the ar—which was to continue through the whole —to repair or alter the suits of armour —again on the morrow.
—guard of men-at-arms, renewed at inter—two hours to two hours, surrounded the —watch during the night.

CHAPTER X.

—like the sad presaging raven, that tolls
—sick man's passport in her hollow beak,
—the shadow of the silent night
—shake contagion from her sable wings;
—and tormented, tempest Barrabas,
—vital curses towards these Christians.

Jew of Malta.

—herited Knight had no sooner reached his —squires and pages in abundance ten—services to disarm him, to bring fresh —offer him the refreshment of the bath. —on this occasion was perhaps sharpened —since every one desired to know who the —that had gained so many laurels, yet had —at the command of Prince John, to lift —to name his name. But their officious—ness was not gratified. The Disinherited —used all other assistance save that of his —or rather yeoman—a clownish-looking —wrapt in a cloak of dark-coloured felt, and —head and face half-buried in a Norman bonnet made of black fur, seemed to affect the incognito as much as his master. All others being excluded from the tent, this attendant relieved his master from the more burdensome parts of his armour, and placed food and wine before him, which the exertions of the day rendered very acceptable.

The Knight had scarcely finished a hasty meal, ere his menial announced to him that five men, each leading a barbed steed, desired to speak with him. The Disinherited Knight had exchanged his armour for the long robe usually worn by those of his condition, which, being furnished with a hood, concealed the features, when such was the pleasure of the wearer, almost as completely as the visor of the helmet itself; but the twilight, which was now fast darkening, would of itself have rendered a disguise unnecessary, unless to persons to whom the face of an individual chanced to be particularly well known.

The Disinherited Knight therefore, stept boldly forth to the front of his tent, and found in attendance the squires of the challengers, whom he easily knew by their russet and black dresses, each of whom led his master's charger, loaded with the armour in which he had that day fought.

"According to the laws of chivalry," said the foremost of these men, "I, Baldwin de Oyley, squire to the redoubted Knight Brian de Bois Guilbert, make offer to you, styling yourself for the present, the Disinherited Knight, of the horse and armour used by the said Brian de Bois Guilbert in this day's Passage of Arms, leaving it with your nobleness to retain or to ransom the same, according to your pleasure; for such is the law of arms."

The other squires repeated nearly the same formula, and then stood to await the decision of the Disinherited Knight.

"To you four, sirs," replied the Knight, addressing those who had last spoken, "and to your honourable and valiant masters, I have one common reply. Commend me to the noble knights, your masters, and say, I should do ill to deprive them of steeds and arms which can never be used by braver cavaliers.—I would I could here end my message to these gallant knights, but being, as I term myself, in truth and earnest, the Disinherited, I must be thus far bound to your masters, that they will, of their courtesy, be pleased to ransom their steeds and armour, since that which I wear I can hardly term mine own."

"We stand commissioned, each of us," answered the squire of Reginald Front-de-Bœuf, "to offer a hundred zecchins in ransom of these horses and suits of armour."

"It is sufficient," said the Disinherited Knight. "Half the sum my present necessities compel me to accept; of the remaining half, distribute one moiety among yourselves, sir squires, and divide the other half betwixt the heralds and the pursuivants, and minstrels, and attendants."

The squires, with cap in hand, and low reverences, expressed their deep sense of a courtesy and generosity not often practised, at least upon a scale so extensive. The Disinherited Knight then addressed his discourse to Baldwin, the squire of Brian de Bois-Guilbert. "From your master," said he, "I will accept neither arms nor ransom. Say to him in my name, that our strife is not ended—no, not till we have fought as well with swords as with lances—as well on foot as on horseback. To this mortal quarrel he has himself defied me, and I shall not forget the challenge. Meantime, let him be assured that I hold him not as one of his companions, with whom I can with pleasure exchange courtesies; but rather as one with whom I stand upon terms of mortal defiance."

"My master," answered Baldwin, "knows how to requite scorn with scorn, and blows with blows, as well as courtesy with courtesy. Since you disdain to accept from him any share of the ransom at which you have rated the arms of the other knights, I must leave his armour and his horse here, being well assured that he will never deign to mount the one nor wear the other."

"You have spoken well, good squire," said the Disinherited Knight, "well and boldly, as it beseemeth

* Presumption, insolence.

him to speak who answers for an absent master. Leave not, however, the horse and armour here. Restore them to thy master; or, if he scorns to accept them, retain them, good friend, for thine own use. So far as they are mine, I bestow them upon you freely."

Baldwin made a deep obeisance, and retired with his companions; and the Disinherited Knight entered the pavilion.

"Thus far, Gurth," said he, addressing his attendant, "the reputation of English chivalry hath not suffered in my hands."

"And I," said Gurth, "for a Saxon swineherd, have not ill played the personage of a Norman squire-at-arms."

"Yea, but," answered the Disinherited Knight, "thou hast ever kept me in anxiety lest thy clownish bearing should discover thee."

"Tush!" said Gurth, "I fear discovery from none, saving my playfellow, Wamba the Jester, of whom I could never discover whether he were most knave or fool. Yet I could scarce choose but laugh, when my old master passed so near to me, dreaming all the while that Gurth was keeping his porkers many a mile off, in the thickets and swamps of Rotherwood. If I am discovered"——

"Enough," said the Disinherited Knight, "thou knowest my promise."

"Nay, for that matter," said Gurth, "I will never fail my friend for fear of my skin-cutting. I have a tough hide, that will bear knife or scourge as well as any boar's hide in my herd."

"Trust me, I will requite the risk you run for my love, Gurth," said the Knight. "Mean while, I pray you accept these ten pieces of gold."

"I am richer," said Gurth, putting them into his pouch, "than ever was swineherd or bondsman."

"Take this bag of gold to Ashby," continued his master, "and find out Isaac the Jew of York, and let him pay himself for the horse and arms with which his credit supplied me."

"Nay, by St. Dunstan," replied Gurth, "that I will not do."

"How, knave," replied his master, "wilt thou not obey my commands?"

"So they be honest, reasonable, and Christian commands," replied Gurth; "but this is none of these. To suffer the Jew to pay himself would be dishonest, for it would be cheating my master; and unreasonable, for it were the part of a fool; and unchristian, since it would be plundering a believer to enrich an infidel."

"See him contented, however, thou stubborn varlet," said the Disinherited Knight.

"I will do so," said Gurth, taking the bag under his cloak, and leaving the apartment; "and it will go hard," he muttered, "but I content him with one-half of his own asking." So saying, he departed, and left the Disinherited Knight to his own perplexed ruminations; which, upon more accounts than it is now possible to communicate to the reader, were of a nature peculiarly agitating and painful.

We must now change the scene to the village of Ashby, or rather to a country house in its vicinity belonging to a wealthy Israelite, with whom Isaac, his daughter, and retinue, had taken up their quarters; the Jews, it is well known, being as liberal in exercising the duties of hospitality and charity among their own people, as they were alleged to be reluctant and churlish in extending them to those whom they termed Gentiles, and whose treatment of them certainly merited little hospitality at their hand.

In an apartment, small indeed, but richly furnished with decorations of an Oriental taste, Rebecca was seated on a heap of embroidered cushions, which, piled along a low platform that surrounded the chamber, served, like the estrada of the Spaniards, instead of chairs and stools. She was watching the motions of her father with a look of anxious and filial affection, while he paced the apartment with a dejected mien and disordered step; sometimes clasping his hands together—sometimes casting his eyes to the roof of the apartment, as one who laboured under great mental tribulation. "O, Jacob!" he exclaimed—"O, all ye twelve Holy Fathers of our tribe! what a venture is this for one who hath duly kept jot and tittle of the law of Moses—Fifty ze wrenched from me at one clutch, and by the of a tyrant!"

"But father," said Rebecca, "you seemed the gold to Prince John willingly."

"Willingly? the blotch of Egypt upon h Willingly, saidst thou?—Ay, as willingly as wi the Gulf of Lyons, I flung over my merchan lighten the ship, while she laboured in the ten robed the seething billows in my choice silks faced their briny foam with myrrh and aloe riched their caverns with gold and silver work was not that an hour of unutterable misery, t my own hands made the sacrifice?"

"But it was a sacrifice which Heaven exac save our lives," answered Rebecca, "and th of our fathers has since blessed your store an gettings."

"Ay," answered Isaac, "but if the tyrant la on them as he did to-day, and compels me t while he is robbing me?—O, daughter, disin and wandering as we are, the worst evil whi falls our race, is, that when we are wronge plundered, all the world laughs around, and compelled to suppress our sense of injury, t smile tamely, when we would revenge bravely."

"Think not thus of it, my father," said Re "we also have advantages. These Gentile and oppressive as they are, are in some sort dep on the dispersed children of Zion, whom they and persecute. Without the aid of our wealt could neither furnish forth their hosts in war, n triumphs in peace; and the gold which we len returns with increase to our coffers. We are l herb which flourisheth most when it is most tr on. Even this day's pageant had not proceede out the consent of the despised Jew, who fu the means."

"Daughter," said Isaac, "thou hast harpe another string of sorrow. The goodly steed a rich armour, equal to the full profit of my adv with our Kirjath Jairam of Leicester—there is loss too—ay, a loss which swallows up the ga week; ay, of the space between two Sabaoth yet it may end better than I now think, fo good youth."

"Assuredly," said Rebecca, "you shall not you of requiting the good deed received of the s knight."

"I trust so, daughter," said Isaac, "and I t in the rebuilding of Zion; but as well do I ho my own bodily eyes to see the walls and batt of the new Temple, as to see a Christian, y very best of Christians, repay a debt to a Jew, under the awe of the judge and jailor."

So saying, he resumed his discontented through the apartment; and Rebecca, perceivi her attempts at consolation only served to new subjects of complaint, wisely desisted fr unavailing efforts—a prudential line of condu we recommend to all who set up for comforte advisers to follow in the like circumstances.

The evening was now becoming dark, w Jewish servant entered the apartment, and upon the table two silver lamps, fed with pe oil; the richest wines, and the most delicate ments, were at the same time displayed by Israelitish domestic on a small ebony table with silver; for, in the interior of their hou Jews refused themselves no expensive indul At the same time the servant informed Isaac Nazarene (so they termed Christians, while c ing among themselves) desired to speak wi He that would live by traffic, must hold hin the disposal of every one claiming business wi Isaac at once replaced on the table the u glass of Greek wine which he had just raise lips, and saying hastily to his daughter, "R veil thyself," commanded the stranger to be ad

Just as Rebecca had dropped over her f tures a screen of silver gauze which reache feet, the door opened, and Gurth entered, v lds of his Norman mantle. His appear-ther suspicions than prepossessing, espe-

tead of doffing his bonnet he pulled it ver his rugged brow.

Isaac the Jew of York?" said Gurth, in eplied Isaac, in the same language, (for ad rendered every tongue spoken in Eu-

to him)—"even who art thou?"

ot to the purpose," answered Gurth.

as my name is to thee," replied Isaac;
t knowing thine, how can I hold inter-thee?

answered Gurth; "I bring to pay money,
that I deliver it to the right person; thou,
receive it, will not, I think, care very hose hands it is delivered."

the Jew, "you are come to pay monies?
ner Abraham! that alters the relation
r. And from whom dost thou bring it?"

e Disinherited Knight," said Gurth, "vicay's tournament. It is the price of the lied to him by Knight Jurain of Laces-recommendation. The steed is restored
e. I desire to know the amount of the I am to pay for the armour."

e was a good youth!" exclaimed Isaac,
exultation. "A cup of wine will do thee
e added, filling and handing to the swine-er draught than Gurth had ever before nd how much money," continued Isaac,
brought with thee?"

rgin!" said Gurth, setting down the cup.
tar these unbelieving dogs drink, while ians are fain to quaff ale as muddy and e draff we give to hogs!—What money
ught with me?" continued the Saxon,
d finished this unrivd ejaculation, "even
l sum; something in hand the whilst.
! thou must bear a conscience, though it one."

?" said Isaac, "thy master has won good-l rich armours with the strength of his
f his right hand but 'tis a good youth-take these in present payment, and reu-
the surplus."

ter has disposed of them already," said

t was wrong," said the Jew, "that was a fool. No Christian here could buy so s and armour—no Jew except myself him half the values. But thou hast a chins with thee in that bag,' see! Isaac, Gurth's cloak, "it is a heavy one."

eads for cross-bow bolts in it," said Gurth,

en," said Isaac, panting and hesitating pitual love of gain and a new-born desire
in the present instance, "if I should say
d take eighty zecchins for the good steed
armour, which leaves me not a guilder's
you money to pay me?"

said Gurth, though the sum demanded
easonable than he expected, "are not it will aster nigh pounds.—Nevertheless, if
r less offer, I myself be content."

self another goblet of wine," said the Jew, zecchins is too little. It leaveth no pro-sages of the monies; and, besides, the may have suffered wrong in this day's O, it was a fearful an; a dangerous meet-
nd steed rushing on each other like wild shan! the horse cannot but have had

ay," replied Gurth, "he is sound, wind
nd you may see him now in your stable.
over and above, that seventy zecchins is the armour, and I hope a Christen's word s a Jew's. If you will not take seventy, I is bag" (and he shook it till the contents
ck to my master."

y!" said Isaac; "lay down the talents—
—the eighty zecchins, and thou shalt see I r thee liberally."

Gurth at length complied; and telling out eighty zecchins upon the table, the Jew delivered out to him an acquittance for the horse and suit of armour. The Jew's hand trembled for joy as he wrapped up the first seventy pieces of gold. The last ten he told over with much deliberation, pausing, and saying something as he took each piece from the table, and dropt it into his purse. It seemed as if his avarice were struggling with his better nature, and compelling him to pouch zecchin after zecchin, while his generosity urged him to restore some part at least to his benefactor, or as a donation to his agent. His whole speech ran nearly thus:

"Seventy-one—seventy-two; thy master is a good youth—seventy-three, an excellent youth—seventy-four that piece hath been clipt within the ring—seventy-five and that looketh light of weight—seventy-six—when thy master wants money, let him come to Isaac of York—seventy-seven—that is, with reasonable security." Here he made a considerable pause, and Gurth had good hope that the last three pieces might escape the fate of their comrades; but the enumeration proceeded.—"Seventy-eight—thou art a good fellow—seventy-nine—and deservest something for thyself"——

Here the Jew paused again, and looked at the last zecchin, intending, doubtless, to bestow it upon Gurth. He weighed it upon the tip of his finger, and made it ring by dropping it upon the table. Had it rung too flat, or had it felt a hair's breadth too light, generosity had carried the day; but unhappily for Gurth the chime was full and true, the zecchin plump, newly coined, and a grain above weight. Isaac could not find in his heart to part with it, so dropt it into his purse as if in absence of mind, with the words, "Eighty completes the tale, and I trust thy master will reward thee handsomely. Surely," he added, looking earnestly at the bag, "thou hast more coins in that pouch?"

Gurth grinned, which was his nearest approach to a laugh, as he replied, "About the same quantity which thou hast just told over so carefully." He then folded the quittance, and put it under his cap, adding, "Peril of thy beard, Jew, see that this be full and ample!" He filled himself, unbidden, a third goblet of wine, and left the apartment without ceremony.

"Rebecca," said the Jew, "that Ishmaelite hath gone somewhat beyond me. Nevertheless his master is a good youth—ay, and I am well pleased that he hath gained shekels of gold and shekels of silver, even by the speed of his horse and by the strength of his lance, which, like that of Goliath the Philistine, might vie with a weaver's beam."

As he turned to receive Rebecca's answer, he observed, that during his chaffering with Gurth, she had left the apartment unperceived.

In the mean while, Gurth had descended the stair, and, having reached the dark antechamber or hall, was puzzling about to discover the entrance, when a figure in white, shown by a small silver lamp which she held in her hand, beckoned him into a side apartment. Gurth had some reluctance to obey the summons. Rough and impetuous as a wild boar, where only earthly force was to be apprehended, he had all the characteristic terrors of a Saxon superstitious fears, for spectres, white women and the whole of the superstitions which his ancestors had brought with them from the wilds of Germany. He remembered, moreover, that he was in the house of a Jew, a people who, besides the other unwinnable qualities which popular report ascribed to them, were supposed to be profound necromancers and cabalists. Nevertheless, after a moment's pause, he obeyed the beckoning summons of the apparition, and followed her into the apartment which she indicated, where he found to his joyful surprise that his fair guide was the beautiful Jewess whom he had seen at the tournament, and a short time in her father's apartment.

She asked him the particulars of his transaction with Isaac, which he detailed accurately.

"My father did but jest with thee, good fellow," said Rebecca; "he owes thy master deeper kindness than these arms and steel could pay, were their value

enfold. What sum didst thou pay my father even now?"

"Eighty zecchins," said Gurth, surprised at the question.

"In this purse," said Rebecca, "thou wilt find a hundred. Restore to thy master that which is his due, and enrich thyself with the remainder. Haste—begone—stay not to render thanks! and beware how you pass through this crowded town, where thou mayst easily lose both thy burden and thy life. Reuben," she added, clapping her hands together, "light forth this stranger, and fail not to draw lock and bar behind him."

Reuben, a dark-browed and black-bearded Israelite, obeyed her summons, with a torch in his hand; undid the outward door of the house, and conducting Gurth across a paved court, let him out through a wicket in the entrance-gate, which he closed behind him with such bolts and chains as would well have become that of a prison.

"By St. Dunstan," said Gurth, as he stumbled up the dark avenue, "this is no Jewess, but an angel from heaven! Ten zecchins from my brave young master—twenty from this pearl of Zion—Oh, happy day!—Such another, Gurth, will redeem thy bondage, and make thee a brother as free of thy guild as the best. And then do I lay down my swineherd's horn and staff, and take the freeman's sword and buckler, and follow my young master to the death, without hiding either my face or my name."

CHAPTER XI.

1st Outlaw. Stand, sir, and throw us that you have about you;
If not, we'll make you sit, and rifle you.
Speed. Sir, we are undone! these are the villains
That all the travellers do fear so much.
Val. My friends,—
1st Out. That's not so, sir, we are your enemies.
2d Out. Peace! we'll hear him.
3d Out. Ay, by my beard, will we;
For he's a proper man.

Two Gentlemen of Verona.

The nocturnal adventures of Gurth were not yet concluded; indeed he himself became partly of that mind, when, after passing one or two straggling houses which stood in the outskirts of the village, he found himself in a deep lane, running between two banks overgrown with hazel and holly, while here and there a dwarf oak flung its arms altogether across the path. The lane was moreover much rutted and broken up by the carriages which had recently transported articles of various kinds to the tournament; and it was dark, for the banks and bushes intercepted the light of the harvest moon.

From the village were heard the distant sounds of revelry, mixed occasionally with loud laughter, sometimes broken by screams, and sometimes by wild strains of distant music. All these sounds, intimating the disorderly state of the town, crowded with military nobles and their dissolute attendants, gave Gurth some uneasiness. "The Jewess was right," he said to himself. "By heaven and St. Dunstan, I would I were safe at my journey's end with all this treasure! Here are such numbers, I will not say of arrant thieves, but of errant knights and errant squires, errant monks and errant minstrels, errant jugglers and errant jesters, that a man with a single merk would be in danger, much more a poor swineherd with a whole bagful of zecchins. Would I were out of the shade of these infernal bushes, that I might at least see any of St. Nicholas's clerks before they spring on my shoulders!"

Gurth accordingly hastened his pace, in order to gain the open common to which the lane led, but was not so fortunate as to accomplish his object. Just as he had attained the upper end of the lane, where the underwood was thickest, four men sprung upon him, even as his fears anticipated, two from each side of the road, and seized him so fast, that resistance, if at first practicable, would have been now too late. "Surrender your charge," said one of them; "we are the deliverers of the commonwealth, who ease every man of his burden."

"You should not ease me of mine so lightly,"

muttered Gurth, whose surly honesty coul
tamed even by the pressure of immediate vi
"and I'll but in my power to give three strok defence."

"We shall see that presently," said the
and, speaking to his companions, "he added
along the knave. I see he would have l broken, as well as his purse cut, and so be in two veins at once."

Gurth was hurried along agreeably to this and having been dragged somewhat roughly bank, on the left-hand side of the lane, foun
in a straggling thicket, which lay betwixt open common. He was compelled to fo rough conductors into the very depth of th
where they stopped unexpectedly in an irreg
space, free in a great measure from trees,
which, therefore, the beams of the moon fell
much interruption from boughs and leaves.
captors were joined by two other persons, a belonging to the gang. They had short sw their sides, and quarter-staves in their ha Gurth could now observe that all six wo which rendered the occupation a matter of tion, even had their former proceedings l doubt.

"What money hast thou, churl?" said o
thieves.

"Thirty zecchins of my own property,"
Gurth, doggedly.

"A forfeit—a forfeit," shouted the robbers;
hath thirty zecchins, and returns sober from An undeniable and unredeemable forfeit of a about him."

"I hoarded it to purchase my freedo Gurth.

"Thou art an ass," replied one of the
"three quarts of double ale had rendered th
as thy master, ay, and freer too, if he be a S thyself."

"A sad truth," replied Gurth; "but if th thirty zecchins will buy my freedom from loose my hands, and I will pay them to you

"Hold," said one who seemed to exer
authority over the others; "this bag wh
bearest, as I can feel through thy cloak,
more coin than thou hast told us of."

"It is the good knight my master's," Gurth, "of which, assuredly, I would r spoken a word, had you been satis
working your will upon mine own property."

"Thou art an honest fellow," replied th
"I warrant thee; and we worship not St.
so devoutly but what thy thirty zecchins escape, if thou deal uprightly with us. M render up thy trust for the time." So saying from Gurth's breast the large leathern p which the purse given him by Rebecca was
as well as the rest of the zecchins, and the ued his interrogation. "Who is thy master"

"The Disinherited Knight," said Gurth.

"Whose good lance," replied the robber, "
prize in to-day's tourney? What is his n lineage?"

"It is his pleasure," answered Gurth, "th concealed; and from me, assuredly, you w naught of them."

"What is thine own name and lineage?"

"To tell that," said Gurth, "might r master's."

"Thou art a saucy groom," said the robb
of that anon. How comes thy master by th is it of his inheritance, or by what mean accrued to him?"

"By his good lance," answered Gurth.—
bags contain the ransom of four good horses
good suits of armour."

"How much is there?" demanded the ro

"Two hundred zecchins."

"Only two hundred zecchins!" said th
"your master hath dealt liberally by the va
and put them to a cheap ransom. Name t paid the gold."

Gurth did so.

armour and horse of the Templar Brian de
ilbert, at what ransom were they held?—Thou
u canst not deceive me."
master," replied Gurth, "will not take naught Templar save his life's-blood. They are on f mortal defiance, and cannot hold courteous se together."
ed!"—repeated the robber, and paused after
said the word. "And what wert thou now Ashby with such a charge in thy custody?"
ent thither to render to Isaac the Jew of replied Gurth, "the price of a suit of ar-
th which he fitted my master for this tour-
"
how much did thou pay to Isaac?—Moo judge by weight, there is still two hundred
in this pouch."
id to Isaac," said the Saxon, "trusty zec-
d he restored me a hundred in lieu thereof."
e! what!" exclaimed all the robbers at once;
thou trifle with us thus? thou to jest with such in-lies!"
t I tell you," said Gurth, "is as true as the
in heaven. You will find the just sum in a rse within the leathern pouch, and separate rest of the gold."
ink thee, man," said the Captain, "thou
of a Jew of an Israelite, as unapt to red, as the dry sands of his deserts to return the ater which the pilgrim spills upon them." e is no more mercy in them," said another of ian, "than in an unbelieving sheriff's officer."
, however, as I [illegible] said Gurth
se a light instantly," said the Captain; "I mine this said purse; and if it be as this fel-
s, the Jew's bounty is little less miraculous stream which relieved his fathers in the wil-
"
t was procured accordingly, and the robber
l to examine the purse. The others crowded
m, and even two who had held Gurth
r grasp while the stretched their necks to sue of the search. Availing himself of their e, by a sudden exertion of strength and Gurth shook himself free of their hold, and ve escaped, could he have resolved to leave r's property behind him. But such was no is intention. He wrenched a quarter-staff of the fellows, struck down the Captain, altogether unaware of his purpose, and had repossessed himself of the [illegible] treasure, s, however, were too much for him, and
ared both the bag and the trusty Gurth.
l" said the Captain, getting up, "thou hast
r head; and with other men of our sort thou fare the worse for thy insolence. But thou w thy fate instantly. First let us speak of r; the knight's matters must go before the according to the due order of chivalry. Stand
m the mean time—if thou wilt ransom thy-e that will make the quest for life. Come then said, addressing his gang, "this mbroidered with Hebrew characters, and I ve the yeoman's tale is true. The errant
s master, must needs pass us toll-free. He ourselves for us to make booty of him, since
ld not worry dogs where wolves and foxes found in abundance."
s?" answered one of the gang; "I should
r how that is made good."
thou fool, answered the Captain, "is he not disinherited as we are? Doth he not win ance at the sword's point as we do?—Hath aten Front-de-Bœuf and Malvoisin, even as beat them if we could? Is he not the enemy death of Brian de Bois-Guilbert, whom we much reason to fear? And were all this , wouldst thou have us show a worse conan an unbeliever, a Hebrew Jew?"
that were a shame," muttered the other fel-
d yet, when I served in the band of stout old
, we had no such scruples of conscience.
nsolent peasant,—he too, I warrant me, is to sed scatheless?"
L

"Not if thou canst scathe him," replied the Captain.—"Here, fellow," continued he, addressing Gurth, "Canst thou use the staff, that thou starts to it so readily?"

"I think," said Gurth, "thou shouldst be best able to reply to that question."

"Nay, by my troth, thou gavest me a round knock," replied the captain; "do as much for this fellow, and thou shalt pass scot-free; and if thou dost not—why, by my faith, as thou art such a sturdy knave, I think I must pay thy ransom myself. Take thy staff, Miller," he added, and keep thy head; and do you others let the fellow go, and give him a staff—there is light enough to lay on load by."

The two champions being alike armed with quarter-staves, stepped forward into the centre of the open space, in order to have the full benefit of the moonlight; the thieves in the mean time laughing, and crying to their comrade, "Miller! beware thy toll-dish." The Miller, on the other hand, holding his quarter-staff by the middle, and making it flourish round his head after the fashion which the French call faire le moulinet, exclaimed boastfully, "Come on, churl, an thou darest: thou shalt feel the strength of a miller's thumb!"

"If thou be'st a miller," answered Gurth, undauntedly, making his weapon play around his head with equal dexterity, "thou art doubly a thief, and I, as a true man, bid thee defiance."

So saying, the two champions closed together, and for a few minutes they displayed great equality in strength, courage, and skill, interchanging and returning the blows of their adversary with the most rapid dexterity, while, from the continued clatter of their weapons, a person at a distance might have supposed that there were at least six persons engaged on each side. Less obstinate, and even less dexterous combats, have been described in good heroic verse; but that of Gurth and the Miller must remain unsung for want of a sacred poet to do justice to its eventful progress. Yet, though quarter-staff play be out of date, what we can suppose we will find to be bold champions.

Long they fought equally, until the Miller began to lose temper at finding himself so stoutly opposed, and at hearing the laughter of his companions, who, as usual in such cases, enjoyed his vexation. This was not a state of mind favourable to the noble game of quarter-staff, in which, as in ordinary cudgel-playing, the utmost coolness is required; and Gurth, who, however, was strongly, though stoutly, the opportunity of acquiring a decided advantage, in availing himself of which he displayed great dexterity.

The Miller pressed furiously forward, dealing blows with either end of his weapon as readily, and striving to come to half-staff distance, which Gurth defended himself against the attack, keeping his hands about a yard asunder, and covering himself by shifting his weapon with great celerity, so as to protect his head and body. Thus did he maintain the defensive, making his eye, foot, and hand keep true time, until, observing his antagonist to lose wind, he darted the staff at his face with his left hand; and, as the Miller endeavoured to parry the thrust, he shifted his right hand down to his left, and with the full swing of the weapon struck his opponent on the left side of the head, who instantly measured his length upon the green sward.

"Well and yeomanly done!" shouted the robbers; "fair play and Old England for ever! The Saxon hath saved both his purse and his hide, and the Miller has met his match."

"Thou mayst go thy ways, my friend," said the Captain, addressing Gurth, in special confirmation of the general voice, "and I will cause two of my comrades to guide thee by the best way to thy master's pavilion, and to guard thee from night-walkers that might have less tender consciences than ours; for there is many one of them upon the amble in such a night as this. Take heed, however," he added sternly, "remember thou hast refused to tell thy name—ask not after ours, nor endeavour to discover who or what we are; for, if thou makest such an attempt, thou wilt come by worse fortune than has yet befallen thee."

Gurth thanked the Captain for his courtesy, and promised to attend to his recommendation. Two of the outlaws, taking up their quarter-staves, and desiring Gurth to follow close in their rear, walked roundly forward along a by-path, which traversed the thicket and the broken ground adjacent to it. On the very verge of the thicket two men spoke to his conductors, and receiving an answer in a whisper, withdrew into the wood, and suffered them to pass unmolested. This circumstance induced Gurth to believe both that the gang were strong in numbers, and that they kept regular guards around their place of rendezvous.

When they arrived on the open heath, where Gurth might have had some trouble in finding his road, the thieves guided him straight forward to the top of a little eminence, whence he could see, spread beneath him in the moonlight, the palisades of the lists, the shimmering pavilions pitched at either end, with the pennons which adorned them fluttering in the moonbeam, and from which could be heard the hum of the song with which the sentinels were beguiling their night-watch.

Here the thieves stopt.

"We go with you no farther," said they; "it were not safe that we should do so. Remember the warning you have received—keep secret what has this night befallen you, and you will have no room to repent it—neglect what is now told you, and the Tower of London shall not protect you against our revenge."

"Good night to you, kind sirs," said Gurth; "I shall remember your orders, and trust that there is no offence in wishing you a safer and an honester trade."

Thus they parted, the outlaws returning in the direction from whence they had come, and Gurth proceeding to the tent of his master, to whom, notwithstanding the injunction he had received, he communicated the whole adventures of the evening.

The Disinherited Knight was filled with astonishment, no less at the generosity of Rebecca, by which, however, he resolved he would not profit, than that of the robbers, to whose profession such a quality seemed totally foreign. His course of reflections upon these singular circumstances was, however, interrupted by the necessity for taking repose, which the fatigue of the preceding day, and the propriety of refreshing himself for the morrow's encounter, rendered alike indispensable.

The knight, therefore, stretched himself for repose upon a rich couch with which the tent was provided; and the faithful Gurth, extending his hardy limbs upon a bear-skin which formed a sort of carpet to the pavilion, laid himself across the opening of the tent, so that no one could enter without awakening him.

CHAPTER XII.

> The heralds left their pricking up and down,
> Now rusen trumpets loud and clarion.
> There is no more to say, but east and west,
> In go the speares sadly in the rest.
> In goth the sharp spur into the side.
> There see men who can just and who can rade
> There sheaf shafts upon shoulders thick,
> He feleth through the heart spone the prick.
> Up-springen speares, twenty feet in bright.
> Out go the swords to the silver bright.
> The helms they to-hewn and to-shred;
> Out rusts the blood with stern streames red.
>
> CHAUCER.

Monstrelet, whose unabridged splendour, and the sun was much above the horizon, the idlest of the most eager of the spectators appear I on the common, moving to the lists as to a general centre, in order to secure a favourable situation for viewing the continuation of the expected games.

The marshals and their attendants appeared next on the field, together with the heralds, for the purpose of receiving the names of the knights who intended to just, with the side which each chose to espouse. This was a necessary precaution, in order to secure equality betwixt the two bodies who should be opposed to each other.

According to due formality, the Disinherited Knight was to be considered as leader of the one bo Brian de Bois-Guilbert, who had been ruled a done second-best in the preceeding day, wa first champion of the other band. Those concurred in the challenge adhered to his course, excepting only Ralph de Vipont, w fall had rendered unfit so soon to put on his There was no want of distinguished and not dates to fill up the ranks on either side.

In fact, although the general tournament all knights fought at once, was more danger single encounters, they were, nevertheless, quented and practised by the chivalry of Many knights, who had not sufficient conf their own skill to defy a single adversary reputation, were, nevertheless, desirous of d their valour in the general combat, where th meet others with whom they were more equality. On the present occasion, about fift were inscribed as desirous of combating u side; when the marshals declared that no m be admitted, to the disappointment of sev were too late in preferring their claim to be

About the hour of ten o'clock, the whole p crowded with horsemen, horsewomen, a passengers, hastening to the tournament; an after, a grand flourish of trumpets announce John and his retinue, attended by many knights who meant to take share in the gam as others who had no such intention.

About the same time arrived Cedric th with the Lady Rowena, unattended, how Athelstane. This Saxon lord had arraye and strong person in armour, in order to place among the combatants; and, consid the surprise of Cedric, had chosen to enlis on the part of the Knight Templar. The S deed, had remonstrated strongly with his fri the injudicious choice he had made of his p he had only received that sort of answe given by those who are more obstinate in their own course, than strong in justifying

His best, if not his only reason, for adher party of Brian de Bois-Guilbert, Athelstane prudence to keep to himself. Though his disposition prevented his taking any means mend himself to the Lady Rowena, he was, less, by no means insensible to her charms, sidered his union with her as a matter alre beyond doubt, by the assent of Cedric and friends. It had therefore been with smoot pleasure that the proud though indolent Coningsburgh beheld the victor of the prec select Rowena as the object of that honou became his privilege to confer. In order him for a preference which seemed to inte his own suit, Athelstane, confident of his and to whom his flatterers, at least, ascri skill in arms, had taught not only to de Disinherited Knight of his powerful succo an opportunity should occur, to make him weight of his battle-axe.

De Bracy, and other knights attached John, in obedience to a hint from him, h the party of the challengers, John being d secure, if possible, the victory to that side. other hand, many of the knights, both En Norman, native and stranger, took part a challengers, the more readily that the oppo was to be led by so distinguished a champi Disinherited Knight had removed himself.

As soon as Prince John observed that th Queen of the day, and arrayed upon the field, that air of courtesy which sat well upon h he was pleased to grace, he rode forwar her, doffed his bonnet, and, alighting from assisted the Lady Rowena from her sadd his followers uncovered at the same time, of the most distinguished, dismounted to palfrey.

"It is thus," said Prince John, "that w dutiful example of loyalty to the Queen of Beauty, and are ourselves her guide to th which she must this day occupy.—Ladies," your Queen, as you wish in your turn to be shed by like honours."

ing the Prince marshalled Rowena to the nour opposite his own, while the fairest and nguished ladies present crowded after her places as near as possible to their temporary t.

oner was Rowena seated than a burst of alternated by the shouts of the multitude, r new dignity. Meantime, the sun shone st bright upon the polished arms of the of either side, who crowded the opposite es of the lists, and held eager conference concerning the best mode of arranging their ttle, and supporting the conflict.

eralds then proclaimed silence until the laws ourney should be rehearsed. These were d in some degree to abate the dangers of a precaution the more necessary, as the was to be maintained with sharp swords and ances.

ampions were therefore prohibited to thrust sword, and were confined to striking. A t was announced, might use a mace or bat- t pleasure, but the dagger was a prohibited A knight unhorsed might renew the fight with any other on the opposite side in the sheament; but mounted horsemen were in forbidden to assail him. When any knight ree his antagonist to the extremity of the as to touch the palisade with his person or ch opponent was obliged to yield himself van- and his armour and horse were placed at osal of the conqueror. A knight thus over- as not permitted to take farther share in the If any combatant was struck down, and o recover his feet, his squire or page might lists, and drag his master out of the press; at case the knight was adjudged vanquished, arms and horse declared forfeited. The com- to cease as soon as Prince John should throw s leading staff, or truncheon; another pre- usually taken to prevent the unnecessary of blood by the too long endurance of a sport rate. Any knight breaking the rules of the ent, or otherwise transgressing the rules of le chivalry, was liable to be stript of his d, having his shield reversed, to be placed osture astride upon the bars of the palisade, osed to public derision, in punishment of his ly conduct. Having announced these pre- the heralds concluded with an exhortation good knight to do his duty, and to merit om the Queen of Beauty and Love.

roclamation having been made, the heralds r to their stations. The knights, entering at d of the lists in long procession, arranged es in a double file, precisely opposite to each e leader of each party being in the centre of most rank, a post which he did not occupy h had carefully arranged the ranks of his d stationed every one in his place.

as a goodly, and at the same time an anxious behold so many gallant champions, mounted and armed richly, stand ready prepared for an r so formidable, seated on their war-saddles many pillars of iron, and awaiting the signal er with the same ardour as their generous which, by neighing and pawing the ground, nal of their impatience.

t the knights held their long lances upright, ight points glancing to the sun, and the s with which they were decorated fluttering plumage of the helmets. Thus they remained e marshals of the field surveyed their ranks utmost exactness, lest either party had more than the appointed number. The tale was actly complete. The marshals then with- om the lists, and William de Wyvil, with a thunder, pronounced the signal words- aller! The trumpets sounded as he spoke rs of the champions were at once lowered and the rests—the spurs were dashed into the the horses, and the two foremost ranks of either party rushed upon each other in full gallop, and met in the middle of the lists with a shock, the sound of which was heard at a mile's distance. The rear rank of each party advanced at a slower pace to sustain the defeated, and follow up the success of the victors of their party.

The consequences of the encounter were not instantly seen, for the dust raised by the trampling of so many steeds darkened the air, and it was a minute ere the anxious spectators could see the fate of the encounter. When the fight became visible, half the knights on each side were dismounted, some by the dexterity of their adversary's lance,—some by the superior weight and strength of opponents, which had borne down both horse and man,—some lay stretched on earth as if never more to rise,—some had already gained their feet, and were closing hand to hand with those of their antagonists who were in the same predicament,—and several on both sides, who had received wounds by which they were disabled, were stopping their blood by their scarfs, and endeavouring to extricate themselves from the tumult. The mounted knights, whose lances had been almost all broken by the fury of the encounter, were now closely engaged with their swords, shouting their war-cries, and exchanging buffets, as if honour and life depended on the issue of the combat.

The tumult was presently increased by the advance of the second rank on either side, which, acting as a reserve, now rushed on to aid their companions. The followers of Brian de Bois-Guilbert shouted—"*Ha! Beau-seant! Beau-seant! For the Temple—For the Temple!" The opposite party shouted in answer—"Desdichado! Desdichado!" which watch-word they took from the motto upon their leader's shield.

The champions thus encountering each other with the utmost fury, and with alternate success, the tide of battle seemed to flow now toward the southern, now toward the northern extremity of the lists, as the one or the other party prevailed. Meantime the clang of the blows, and the shouts of the combatants, mixed fearfully with the sound of the trumpets, and drowned the groans of those who fell, and lay rolling defenceless beneath the feet of the horses. The splendid armour of the combatants was now defaced with dust and blood, and gave way at every stroke of the sword and battle-axe. The gay plumage, shorn from the crests, drifted upon the breeze like snow-flakes. All that was beautiful and graceful in the martial array had disappeared, and what was now visible was only calculated to awake terror or compassion.

Yet such is the force of habit, that not only the vulgar spectators, who are naturally attracted by sights of horror, but even the ladies of distinction who crowded the galleries, saw the conflict with a thrilling interest certainly, but without a wish to withdraw their eyes from a sight so terrible. Here and there, indeed, a fair cheek might turn pale, or a faint scream might be heard, as a lover, a brother, or a husband, was struck from his horse. But, in general, the ladies around encouraged the combatants, not only by clapping their hands and waving their veils and kerchiefs, but even by exclaiming "Brave lance! Good sword!" when any successful thrust or blow took place under their observation.

Such being the interest taken by the fair sex in this bloody game, that of the men is the more easily understood. It showed itself in loud acclamations upon every change of fortune, while all eyes were so riveted on the lists, that the spectators seemed as if they themselves had dealt and received the blows which were there so freely bestowed. And between every pause, was heard the voice of the heralds, exclaiming, "Fight on, brave knights! Man dies, but glory lives! Fight on; death is better than defeat! Fight on, brave knights! for bright eyes behold your deeds!"

Amid the varied fortunes of the combat, the eyes of all endeavoured to discover the leaders of each band, who, mingling in the thick of the fight, encouraged their companions both by voice and example. Both displayed great feats of gallantry, nor did either Bois-Guilbert or the Disinherited Knight find in the ranks opposed to them a champion who could be termed their unquestioned match. They repeatedly endeavoured to single out each other, spurred by mutual animosity, and aware that the fall of either leader might be considered as decisive of victory. Such, however, was the crowd and confusion that during the earlier part of the conflict, their efforts to meet were unavailing, and they were repeatedly separated by the eagerness of their followers, each of whom was anxious to win honour by measuring his strength against the leader of the opposite party.

* Beau-seant was the name of the Templars' banner, which was half black, half white, to intimate, it is said, that they were candid and fair towards Christians, but black and terrible towards infidels.

But when the field became thin by the numbers on either side who had yielded themselves vanquished, had been compelled to the extremity of the lists, or been otherwise rendered incapable of continuing the strife, the Templar and the Disinherited Knight at length encountered hand to hand, with all the fury that mortal animosity, jealousy or rivalry of honour, could inspire. Such was the address of each in parrying and striking, that the spectators broke forth into a unanimous and involuntary shout, expressive of their delight and admiration.

But at this moment the party of the Disinherited Knight had the worst; the gigantic arm of Front-de-Boeuf on the flank, and the ponderous strength of Athelstane on the other, bearing down and dispersing those immediately exposed to them. Finding themselves freed from their immediate antagonists, it seems to have occurred to both these knights at the same instant, that they would render the most decisive advantage to their party, by aiding the Templar in his contest with his rival. Turning their horses, therefore, at the same moment, the Norman spurred against the Disinherited Knight on the one side, and the Saxon on the other. It was utterly impossible that the object of this unequal and unexpected assault could have sustained it, had he not been warned by a general cry from the spectators, who could not but take interest in one exposed to such disadvantage.

"Beware! Beware! Sir Disinherited!" was shouted so universally, that the knight became aware of his danger; and striking a full blow at the Templar, he reined back his steed in the same moment, so as to escape the charge of Athelstane and Front-de-Boeuf. These knights, therefore, their aim being thus eluded, rushed from opposite sides betwixt the object of their attack and the Templar, almost running their horses against each other ere they could stop their career. Recovering their horses, however, and wheeling them round, the whole three pursued their united purpose of bearing to the earth the Disinherited Knight.

Nothing could have saved him, except the remarkable strength and activity of his noble horse which he had won on the preceding day.

This stood him in the more stead, as the horse of Bois-Guilbert was wounded, and those of Front-de Boeuf and Athelstane were both tired with the weight of their gigantic masters, clad in complete armour, and with the preceding exertions of the day. The masterly horsemanship of the Disinherited Knight, and the activity of the noble animal which he mounted, enabled him for a few minutes to keep at sword's point his three antagonists, turning and wheeling with the agility of a hawk upon the wing, keeping his enemies as far separate as he could, and rushing now against the one, now against the other, dealing sweeping blows with his sword, without waiting to receive those which were aimed at him in return.

But although the lists rang with the applauses of his dexterity, it was evident that he must at last be overpowered; and the nobles around Prince John implored him with one voice to throw down his warder, and to save so brave a knight from the disgrace of being overcome by odds.

"Not I, by the light of Heaven!" answered Prince John; "this same springal, who conceals his name, and despises our proffered hospitality, hath already gained one prize, and may now afford to let others have their turn." As he spoke thus, an unexpected incident changed the fortune of the day.

There was among the ranks of the Disinherited Knight, a champion in black armour, mounted on a black horse, large of size, tall, and to all appearance powerful and strong, like the rider by whom he was mounted. This knight, who bore on his shield no device of any kind, had hitherto evinced very little interest in the event of the fight, resting on the spear, and warning those combatants who attacked him, but neither pursuing his advantages, nor himself assailing any one. In short, he had hitherto played the part rather of a spectator than of a party in the tournament, a circumstance which procured for him among the spectators the name of Le Noir Faineant, or the Black Sluggard.

At once this knight seemed to throw aside his inactivity, when he discovered the leader of his own band beset; for, setting spurs to his horse, who was quite fresh, he came to his assistance like a thunderbolt, exclaiming in a voice, like a trumpet, "Desdichado, to the rescue!" It was high time, while the Disinherited Knight was pressed on by the Templar, Front-de-Boeuf had got hold of his bridle-rein and sword; but ere the blow could fall, the Sable Knight dealt a stroke on his head which, glancing from the polished helmet lighted with a fierce scintillation, abated on the crest of the Saxon, and Front-de-Boeuf rolled on the ground, both stunned and soon equally stunned by the fury of the Noir Faineant then turned his horse upon the state of Coningsburgh; and his own sword having been broken in the encounter with Front-de-Boeuf, he wrenched from the hand of the bulky Saxon the battle-axe which he wielded, and, like one familiar with the use of the weapon, bestowed that a single blow upon the crest, that Athelstane also lay senseless on the field. Having achieved this exploit, for which he was the more highly applauded that it was totally unexpected from him, the Knight proceeded to resume the sluggishness of his character, retiring calmly to the northern extremity of the lists, and leaving his leader to cope as he best could with Bois-Guilbert. This was no longer matter of much difficulty as formerly. The Templar's horse had bled much, and gave way under the shock of the Disinherited Knight's charge. Brian de Bois-Guilbert rolled on the field encumbered with the steed from which he was unable to draw his foot. His antagonist sprung from horseback, waved his sword over the head of his adversary, and commanded him to yield himself; when Prince John, more moved by the Templar's dangerous situation than he had been by that of his rival, saved him the mortification of confessing himself vanquished, by casting down his warder, and putting an end to the conflict.

It was, indeed, only the relics and embers of the fight which continued to burn; for of the knights who still continued in the lists, the greater part, by tacit consent, forbore the conflict for the present, leaving it to be determined by the strife of the squires.

The squires, who had found it a matter of difficulty and difficulty to attend their masters during the engagement, now thronged into the lists to perform dutiful attendance to the wounded, who were removed with the utmost care and attention to the neighbouring pavilions, or to the quarters prepared for them in the adjoining village.

Thus ended the memorable field of Ashby-de-la-Zouche, one of the most gallantly contested tournaments of that age; for although only four knights, including one who was smothered by the heat of his armour, had died upon the field, yet upwards of fifty were desperately wounded, four or five of whom never recovered. Several more were disabled for life; and those who escaped best carried the marks of the conflict to the grave with them. Hence it is always mentioned in the old records, as the Gentle and Joyous Passage of Arms of Ashby.

It being now the duty of Prince John to name the knight who had done best, he determined that the honour of the day remained with the knight whom the popular voice had termed Le Noir Faineant. It was pointed out to the Prince, in support of this decree, that the victory had been in fact

Disinherited Knight, who, in the course ay, had overcome six champions with hand, and who had finally unhorsed and wn the leader of the opposite party. But ohn adhered to his own opinion, on the at the Disinherited Knight and his party he day, but for the powerful assistance of t of the Black Armour, to whom, therefore, ed in awarding the prize.

surprise of all present, however, the knight ted was nowhere to be found. He had left mmediately when the conflict ceased, and observed by some spectators to move down forest glades with the same slow pace and id indifferent manner which had procured nthet of the Black Sluggard. After he had noned twice by sound of trumpet, and pro- of the heralds, it became necessary to name o receive the honours which had been as- im. Prince John had now no further excuse ng the claim of the Disinherited Knight, erefore, he named the champion of the day. n a field slippery with blood, and encum- h broken armour and the bodies of slain ded horses, the marshals of the lists again the victor to the foot of Prince John's erited Knight," said Prince John, "since by only you will consent to be known to us, we time award to you the honours of this tour- nd announce to you your right to claim and om the hands of the Queen of Love and e Chaplet of Honour which your valour has rved." The Knight bowed low and grace- eturned no answer.

he trumpets sounded, while the heralds heir voices in proclaiming honour to the glory to the victor—while ladies waved kerchiefs and embroidered veils, and while joined in a clamorous shout of exultation, hals conducted the Disinherited Knight lists to the foot of that throne of honour s occupied by the Lady Rowena.

ower step of this throne the champion was neel down. Indeed his whole action since nd ended, seemed rather to have been upon se of those around him than from his own and it was observed that he tottered as ed him the second time across the lists. descending from her station with a graceful fied step, was about to place the chaplet e held in her hand upon the helmet of the , when the marshals exclaimed with one must not be thus his head must be bare." t muttered faintly a few words, which were hollow of his helmet, but their purport seem- lésire that his casque might not be removed. from love of form, or from curiosity, the paid no attention to his expressions of re- out unhelmed him by cutting the laces of and undoing the fastening of his gorget. helmet was removed, the well-formed, yet features of a young man of twenty-five amidst a profusion of short fair hair. His ce was as pale as death, and marked in one es with streaks of blood.

had no sooner beheld him than she uttered ck; but at once summoning up the energy osition, and compelling herself, as it were, , while her frame yet trembled with the f sudden emotion, she placed upon the head of the victor the splendid chaplet the destined reward of the day, and pro- n a clear and distinct tone, these words: on thee this chaplet, Sir Knight, as the alour assigned to this day's victor:" Here l a moment, and then firmly added, "And s more worthy could a wreath of chivalry laced!"

ght stooped his head, and kissed the hand ly Sovereign by whom his valour had been and then, sinking yet farther forward, lay t her feet.

ras a general consternation. Cedric who had been struck mute by the sudden appearance of his banished son, now rushed forward, as if to separate him from Rowena. But this had been already accomplished by the marshals of the field, who, guessing the cause of Ivanhoe's swoon, had hastened to undo his armour, and found that the head of a lance had penetrated his breastplate, and inflicted a wound in his side.

CHAPTER XIII.

"Heroes, approach!" Atrides thus aloud,
"Stand forth distinguish'd from the circling crowd,
Ye who by skill or manly force may claim,
Your rivals to surpass and merit fame,
This cow, worth twenty oxen, is decreed,
For him who farthest sends the winged reed."

Iliad.

The name of Ivanhoe was no sooner pronounced than it flew from mouth to mouth, with all the celerity with which eagerness could convey and curiosity receive it. It was not long ere it reached the circle of the Prince, whose brow darkened as he heard the news. Looking around him, however, with an air of scorn, "My lords," said he, "and especially you, Sir Prior, what think ye of the doctrine the learned tell us, concerning innate attractions and antipathies? Methinks that I felt the presence of my brother's minion, even when I least guessed whom yonder suit of armour enclosed."

"Front-de-Bœuf must prepare to restore his fief of Ivanhoe," said De Bracy, who, having discharged his part honourably in the tournament, had laid his shield and helmet aside, and again mingled with the Prince's retinue.

"Ay," answered Waldemar Fitzurse, "this gallant is likely to reclaim the castle and manor which Richard assigned to him, and which your Highness's generosity has since given to Front-de-Bœuf."

"Front-de-Bœuf," replied John, "is a man more willing to swallow three manors such as Ivanhoe, than to disgorge one of them. For the rest, sirs, I hope none here will deny my right to confer the fiefs of the crown upon the faithful followers who are around me, and ready to perform the usual military service, in the room of those who have wandered to foreign countries, and can neither render homage nor service when called upon."

The audience were too much interested in the question not to pronounce the Prince's assumed right altogether indubitable. "A generous Prince!—a most noble Lord, who thus takes upon himself the task of rewarding his faithful followers!"

Such were the words which burst from the train, expectants all of them of similar grants at the expense of King Richard's followers and favourites, if indeed they had not as yet received such. Prior Aymer also assented to the general proposition, observing, however, "That the blessed Jerusalem could not indeed be termed a foreign country. She was communis mater—the mother of all Christians. But he saw not," he declared, "how the Knight of Ivanhoe could plead any advantage from this, since he" (the Prior) "was assured that the crusaders, under Richard, had never proceeded much farther than Askalon, which, as all the world knew, was a town of the Philistines, and entitled to none of the privileges of the Holy City."

Waldemar, whose curiosity had led him towards the place where Ivanhoe had fallen to the ground, now returned. "The gallant," said he, "is likely to give your Highness little disturbance, and to leave Front-de-Bœuf in the quiet possession of his gains—he is severely wounded."

"Whatever becomes of him," said Prince John, "he is victor of the day; and were he tenfold our enemy, or the devoted friend of our brother, which is perhaps the same, his wounds must be looked to—our own physician shall attend him."

A stern smile curled the Prince's lip as he spoke. Waldemar Fitzurse hastened to reply, that Ivanhoe was already removed from the lists, and in the custody of his friends.

"I was somewhat afflicted," he said, "to see the grief of the Queen of Love and Beauty, whose sovereignty of a day this event has changed into mourn

ing. I am not a man to be moved by a woman's lament for her lover, but this same Lady Rowena suppressed her sorrow with such dignity of manner, that it could only be discovered by her folded hands, and her tearless eye, which trembled as it remained fixed on the lifeless form before her."

"Who is this Lady Rowena," said Prince John, "of whom we have heard so much?"

"A Saxon heiress of large possessions," replied the Prior Aymer; "a rose of loveliness, and a jewel of wealth; the fairest among a thousand, a bundle of myrrh, and a cluster of camphire."

"We shall cheer her sorrows," said Prince John, "and amend her blood, by wedding her to a Norman. She seems a minor, and must therefore be at our royal disposal in marriage.—How sayst thou, De Bracy? What thinkst thou of gaining fair lands and livings, by wedding a Saxon, after the fashion of the followers of the Conqueror?"

"If the lands are to my liking, my lord," answered De Bracy, "it will be hard to displease me with a bride; and deeply will I hold myself bound to your highness for a good deed, which will fulfil all promises made in favour of your servant and vassal."

"We will not forget it," said Prince John; "and that we may instantly go to work, command our seneschal presently to order the attendance of the Lady Rowena and her company—that is, the rude churl her guardian, and the Saxon ox whom the Black Knight struck down in the tournament, upon this evening's banquet.—De Bigot," he added to his seneschal, "thou wilt word this our second summons so courteously, as to gratify the pride of these Saxons, and make it impossible for them again to refuse; although, by the bones of Becket, courtesy to them is casting pearls before swine."

Prince John had proceeded thus far, and was about to give the signal for retiring from the lists, when a small billet was put into his hand.

"From whence?" said Prince John, looking at the person by whom it was delivered.

"From foreign parts, my lord, but from whence I know not," replied his attendant. "A Frenchman brought it hither, who said, he had ridden night and day to put it into the hands of your highness."

The Prince looked narrowly at the superscription, and then at the seal, placed so as to secure the flox-silk with which the billet was surrounded, and which bore the impression of three fleurs-de-lis. John then opened the billet with apparent agitation, which visibly and greatly increased when he had perused the contents, which were expressed in these words—

"Take heed to yourself, for the Devil is unchained!"

The Prince turned as pale as death, looked first on the earth, and then up to heaven, like a man who has received news that sentence of execution has been passed upon him. Recovering from the first effects of his surprise, he took Waldemar Fitzurse and De Bracy aside, and put the billet into their hands successively. "It means," he added, in a faltering voice, "that my brother Richard has obtained his freedom."

"This may be a false alarm, or a forged letter," said De Bracy.

"It is France's own hand and seal," replied Prince John.

"It is time, then," said Fitzurse, "to draw our party to a head, either at York, or some other centrical place. A few days later, and it will be indeed too late. Your highness must break short this present mummery."

"The yeomen and commons," said De Bracy, "must not be dismissed discontented, for lack of their share in the sports."

"The day," said Waldemar, "is not yet very far spent—let the archers shoot a few rounds at the target, and the prize be adjudged. This will be an abundant fulfilment of the Prince's promises, so far as this herd of Saxon serfs is concerned."

"I thank thee, Waldemar," said the Prince; "thou remindest me, too, that I have a debt to pay to that insolent peasant who yesterday insulted our person. Our banquet also shall go forward to-night as we proposed. Were this my last hour of power, it should be an hour sacred to revenge and to pleasure—let new cares come with to-morrow's new day."

The sound of the trumpets soon recalled those spectators who had already begun to leave the field; and proclamation was made that Prince John, suddenly called by high and peremptory public duties, held himself obliged to discontinue the entertainments of to-morrow's festival: Nevertheless, that, unwilling so many good yeomen should depart without a trial of skill, he was pleased to appoint them, before leaving the ground, presently to execute the competition of archery intended for the morrow. To the best archer a prize was to be awarded, being a bugle-horn, mounted with silver, and a silken baldric richly ornamented with a medallion of St. Hubert, the patron of silvan sport.

More than thirty yeomen at first presented themselves as competitors, several of whom were rangers and under-keepers in the royal forests of Needwood and Charnwood. When, however, the archers understood with whom they were to be matched, upwards of twenty withdrew themselves from the contest, unwilling to encounter the dishonour of almost certain defeat. For in those days the skill of each celebrated marksman was as well known for many miles round him, as the qualities of a horse trained at Newmarket are familiar to those who frequent that well-known meeting.

The diminished list of competitors for silvan fame still amounted to eight. Prince John stepped from his royal seat to view more nearly the persons of these chosen yeomen, several of whom wore the royal livery. Having satisfied his curiosity by this investigation, he looked for the object of his resentment, whom he observed standing on the same spot, and with the same composed countenance which he had exhibited upon the preceding day.

"Fellow," said Prince John, "I guessed by thy insolent babble thou wert no true lover of the long-bow, and I see thou darest not adventure thy skill among such merry-men as stand yonder."

"Under favour, sir," replied the yeoman, "I have another reason for refraining to shoot, besides the fearing discomfiture and disgrace."

"And what is thy other reason?" said Prince John, who for some cause which perhaps he could not himself have explained, felt a painful curiosity respecting this individual.

"Because," replied the woodsman, "I know not if these yeomen and I are used to shoot at the same marks; and because, moreover, I know not how your Grace might relish the winning of a third prize by one who has unwittingly fallen under your displeasure."

Prince John coloured as he put the question, "What is thy name, yeoman?"

"Locksley," answered the yeoman.

"Then, Locksley," said Prince John, "thou shalt shoot in thy turn, when these yeomen have displayed their skill. If thou carriest the prize, I will add to it twenty nobles; but if thou losest it, thou shalt be stript of thy Lincoln green, and scourged out of the lists with bowstrings, for a wordy and insolent braggart."

"And how if I refuse to shoot on such a wager?" said the yeoman.—"Your Grace's power, supported, as it is, by so many men-at-arms, may indeed easily strip and scourge me, but cannot compel me to bend or to draw my bow."

"If thou refusest my fair proffer," said the Prince, "the Provost of the lists shall cut thy bowstring, break thy bow and arrows, and expel thee from the presence as a faint-hearted craven."

"This is no fair chance you put on me, proud Prince," said the yeoman, "to compel me to pit myself against the best archers of Leicester and Staffordshire, under the penalty of infamy if they should overshoot me. Nevertheless, I will obey your pleasure."

"Look to him close, men-at-arms," said Prince John, "his heart is sinking; I am jealous lest he attempt to escape the trial.—And do you, good fellows, shoot boldly round; a buck and a butt of wine are ready for your refreshment in yonder tent, when the prize is won."

A target was placed at the upper end of the southern avenue which led to the lists. The contending archers took their station in turn, at the bottom of the southern access; the distance between that station and the mark allowing full distance for what was called a shot at rovers. The archers, having previously determined by lot their order of precedence, were to shoot each three shafts in succession. The sports were regulated by an officer of inferior rank, termed the Provost of the Games; for the high rank of the marshals of the lists would have been held degraded, had they condescended to superintend the sports of the yeomanry.

One by one the archers, stepping forward, delivered their shafts yeomanlike and bravely. Of twenty-four arrows, shot in succession, ten were fixed in the target, and the others ranged so near it, that, considering the distance of the mark, it was accounted good archery. Of the ten shafts which hit the target, two within the inner ring were shot by Hubert, a forester in the service of Malvoisin, who was accordingly pronounced victorious.

"Now, Locksley," said Prince John to the bold yeoman, with a bitter smile, "wilt thou try conclusions with Hubert, or wilt thou yield up bow, baldric, and quiver, to the Provost of the sports?"

"Sith it be no better," said Locksley, "I am content to try my fortune; on condition that when I have shot two shafts at yonder mark of Hubert's, he shall be bound to shoot one at that which I shall propose."

"That is but fair," answered Prince John, "and it shall not be refused thee.—If thou dost beat this braggart, Hubert, I will fill the bugle with silver-pennies for thee."

"A man can do but his best," answered Hubert: 'but my grandsire drew a good long bow at Hastings, and I trust not to dishonour his memory."

The former target was now removed, and a fresh one of the same size placed in its room. Hubert, who, as victor in the first trial of skill, had the right to shoot first, took his aim with great deliberation, long measuring the distance with his eye, while he held in his hand his bended bow, with the arrow placed on the string. At length he made a step forward, and raising the bow at the full stretch of his left arm, till the centre or grasping-place was nigh level with his face, he drew his bowstring to his ear. The arrow whistled through the air, and lighted within the inner ring of the target, but not exactly in the centre.

"You have not allowed for the wind, Hubert," said his antagonist, bending his bow, "or that had been a better shot."

So saying, and without showing the least anxiety to pause upon his aim, Locksley stept to the appointed station, and shot his arrow as carelessly in appearance as if he had not even looked at the mark. He was speaking almost at the instant that the shaft left the bowstring, yet it alighted in the target two inches nearer to the white spot which marked the centre, than that of Hubert.

"By the Light of heaven!" said Prince John to Hubert, "an thou suffer that runagate knave to overshoot thee, thou art worthy of the gallows!"

Hubert had but one set speech for all occasions. "Let your highness grace me," he said, "I can but do my best. Nevertheless, my grandsire drew a good bow"——

"The foul fiend on thy grandsire and all his generation!" interrupted John; "shoot, knave, and shoot thy best, or it shall be the worse for thee!"

Thus exhorted, Hubert resumed his place, and not neglecting the caution which he had received from his adversary, he made the necessary allowance for a very light air of wind, which had just arisen, and shot so successfully that his arrow alighted in the very centre of the target.

"A Hubert! a Hubert!" shouted the populace, more interested in a known person than in a stranger. "In the clout!—in the clout!—a Hubert for ever!"

"Thou canst not mend that shot, Locksley," said the Prince, with an insulting smile.

"I will notch his shaft for him, however," replied Locksley.

And letting fly his arrow with a little more precaution than before, it lighted right upon that of his competitor, which it split to shivers. The people who stood around were so astonished at his wonderful dexterity, that they could not even give vent to their surprise in their usual clamour. "This must be the devil, and no man of flesh and blood," whispered the yeomen to each other; "such archery was never seen since a bow was first bent in Britain."

"And now," said Locksley, "I will crave your Grace's permission to plant such a mark as is used in the North Country; and will endeavour to find every brave yeoman who shall try a shot at it to win a smile from the bonny lass he loves best."

He then turned to leave the lists. "Let your guards attend me," he said, "if you please—I go but to cut a rod from the next willow-bush."

Prince John made a signal that some attendants should follow him in case of his escape: but the cry of "Shame! shame!" which burst from the multitude, induced him to alter his ungenerous purpose.

Locksley returned almost instantly with a willow wand about six feet in length, perfectly straight, and rather thicker than a man's thumb. He began to peel this with great composure, observing at the same time, that to ask a good woodsman to shoot at a target so broad as had hitherto been used, was to put shame upon his skill. "For his own part," he said, "and in the land where he was bred, men would as soon take for their mark King Arthur's round-table, which held sixty knights around it. A child of seven years old," he said, "might hit yonder target with a headless shaft; but," added he, walking deliberately to the other end of the lists, and sticking the willow wand upright in the ground, "he that hits that rod at five-score yards, I call him an archer not to bear both bow and quiver before a king, an it were the stout King Richard himself."

"My grandsire," said Hubert, "drew a good bow at the battle of Hastings, and never shot at such a mark in his life and neither will I. If this yeoman can cleave that rod, I give him the bucklers—or rather, I yield to the devil that is in his jerkin, and not to any human skill; a man can but do his best, and I will not shoot where I am sure to miss. I might as well shoot at the edge of our parson's whittle, or at a wheat straw, or at a sunbeam, as at a twinkling white streak which I can hardly see."

"Cowardly dog!" said Prince John.—"Sirrah Locksley, do thou shoot; but, if thou hittest such a mark, I will say thou art the first man ever did so. Howe'er it be, thou shalt not crow over us with a mere show of superior skill."

"I will do my best, as Hubert says," answered Locksley; "no man can do more."

So saying, he again bent his bow, but on the present occasion looked with attention to his weapon, and changed the string, which he thought was no longer truly round, having been a little frayed by the two former shots. He then took his aim with some deliberation, and the multitude awaited the event in breathless silence. The archer vindicated their opinion of his skill: his arrow split the willow rod against which it was aimed. A jubilee of acclamations followed; and even Prince John, in admiration of Locksley's skill, lost for an instant his dislike to his person. "These twenty nobles," he said, "which, with the bugle, thou hast fairly won, are thine own; we will make them fifty, if thou wilt take livery and service with us as a yeoman of our body guard, and be near to our person. For never did so strong a hand bend a bow, or so true an eye direct a shaft."

"Pardon me, noble Prince," said Locksley; "but I have vowed, that if ever I take service, it should be with your royal brother King Richard. These twenty nobles I leave to Hubert, who has this day drawn as brave a bow as his grandsire did at Hastings. Had his modesty not refused the trial, he would have hit the wand as well as I."

Hubert shook his head as he received with reluctance the bounty of the stranger; and Locksley, anxious to escape further observation, mixed with the crowd, and was seen no more.

The victorious archer would not perhaps have escaped John's attention so easily, had not that Prince had other subjects of anxious and more important meditation pressing upon his mind at that instant. He called upon his chamberlain as he gave the signal for retiring from the lists, and commanded him instantly to gallop to Ashby, and seek out Isaac the Jew. "Tell the dog," he said, "to send me, before sun-down, two thousand crowns. He knows the security; but thou mayst show him this ring for a token. The rest of the money must be paid at York within six days. If he neglects, I will have the unbelieving villain's head. Look, that thou pass him not on the way; for the circumcised slave was displaying his stolen finery amongst us."

So saying, the Prince resumed his horse, and returned to Ashby, the whole crowd breaking up and dispersing upon his retreat.

CHAPTER XIV.

In rough magnificence array'd,
When ancient Chivalry display'd
The pomp of her heroic games,
And crested chiefs and warlike dames
Assembled at the royal call,
In some proud castle's high arch'd hall.
WARTON.

PRINCE JOHN held his high festival in the Castle of Ashby. This was not the same building of which the stately ruins still interest the traveller, and which was erected at a later period by the Lord Hastings, High Chamberlain of England, one of the first victims of the tyranny of Richard the Third, and yet better known as one of Shakspeare's characters than by his historical fame. The castle and town of Ashby, at this time, belonged to Roger de Quincy, Earl of Winchester, who, during the period of our history, was absent in the Holy Land. Prince John, in the mean while, occupied his castle, and disposed of his domains without scruple; and seeking at present to dazzle men's eyes by his hospitality and magnificence, had given orders for great preparations, in order to render the banquet as splendid as possible.

The purveyors of the Prince, who exercised on this and other occasions the full authority of royalty, had swept the country of all that could be collected which was esteemed fit for their master's table. Guests also were invited in great numbers; and in the necessity in which he then found himself of courting popularity, Prince John had extended his invitation to a few distinguished Saxon and Danish families, as well as to the Norman nobility and gentry of the neighbourhood. However despised and degraded on ordinary occasions, the great numbers of the Anglo-Saxons must necessarily render them formidable in the civil commotions which seemed approaching, and it was an obvious point of policy to secure popularity with their leaders.

It was accordingly the Prince's intention, which he for some time maintained, to treat these unwonted guests with a courtesy to which they had been little accustomed. But although no man with less scruple made his ordinary haunts and feelings bend to his interest, it was the misfortune of this Prince, that his levity and petulance were perpetually breaking out, and undoing all that had been gained by his previous dissimulation.

Of this fickle temper he gave a memorable example in Ireland, when sent thither by his father, Henry the Second, with the purpose of buying golden opinions of the inhabitants of that new and important acquisition to the English Crown. Upon this occasion the Irish chieftains contended which should first offer to the young Prince their loyal homage and the kiss of peace. But, instead of receiving their salutations with courtesy, John and his petulant attendants could not resist the temptation of pulling the long beards of the Irish chieftains; a conduct which, as might have been expected, was highly resented by these insulted dignitaries, and produced fatal consequences to the English domination in Ireland. It is necessary to keep these inconsistencies of John's character in view, that the reader may understand his conduct during the present evening.

In execution of the resolution which he had formed during his cooler moments, Prince John received Cedric and Athelstane with distinguished courtesy, and expressed his disappointment, without resentment when the indisposition of Rowena was alleged by the former as a reason for her not attending upon his gracious summons. Cedric and Athelstane were both dressed in the ancient Saxon garb, which, although not unhandsome in itself, and in the present instance composed of costly materials, was so remote in shape and appearance from that of the other guests, that Prince John took great credit to himself with Waldemar Fitzurse for refraining from laughter at a sight which the fashion of the day rendered ridiculous. Yet, in the eye of sober judgment, the short close tunic and long mantle of the Saxons was a more graceful, as well as a more convenient dress, than the garb of the Normans, whose under garment was a long doublet, so loose as to resemble a shirt or waggoner's frock, covered by a cloak of scanty dimensions neither fit to defend the wearer from cold or from rain, and the only purpose of which appeared to be to display as much fur, embroidery, and jewellery work, as the ingenuity of the tailor could contrive to lay upon it. The Emperor Charlemagne, in whose reign they were first introduced, seems to have been very sensible of the inconveniences arising from the fashion of this garment. "In Heaven's name," said he, "to what purpose serve these abridged cloaks? If we are in bed they are no cover, on horseback they are no protection from the wind and rain, and when seated they do not guard our legs from the damp or the frost."

Nevertheless, spite of this imperial objurgation, the short cloaks continued in fashion down to the time of which we treat, and particularly among the princes of the House of Anjou. They were therefore in universal use among Prince John's courtiers; and the long mantle, which formed the upper garment of the Saxons, was held in proportional derision.

The guests were seated at a table which groaned under the quantity of good cheer. The numerous cooks who attended on the Prince's progress, having exerted all their art in varying the forms in which the ordinary provisions were served up, had succeeded almost as well as the modern professors of the culinary art in rendering them perfectly unlike their natural appearance. Besides these dishes of domestic origin, there were various delicacies brought from foreign parts, and a quantity of rich pastry, as well as of the simnel-bread and wastle cakes, which were only used at the tables of the highest nobility. The banquet was crowned with the richest wines, both foreign and domestic.

But, though luxurious, the Norman nobles were not, generally speaking, an intemperate race. While indulging themselves in the pleasures of the table, they aimed at delicacy, but avoided excess, and were apt to attribute gluttony and drunkenness to the vanquished Saxons, as vices peculiar to their inferior station. Prince John, indeed, and those who courted his pleasure by imitating his foibles, were apt to indulge to excess in the pleasures of the trencher and the goblet; and indeed it is well known that his death was occasioned by a surfeit upon peaches and new ale. His conduct, however, was an exception to the general manners of his countrymen.

With sly gravity, uninterrupted only by private signs to each other, the Norman knights and nobles beheld the ruder demeanour of Athelstane and Cedric at a banquet, to the form and fashion of which they were unaccustomed. And while their manners were thus the subject of sarcastic observation, the untaught Saxons unwittingly transgressed several of the arbitrary rules established for the regulation of society. Now, it is well known, that a man may with more impunity be guilty of an actual breach either of real good breeding or of good morals, than appear ignorant of the most minute point of fashionable etiquette. Thus Cedric, who dried his hands with a towel, instead of suffering the moisture, to exhale by waving them gracefully in the air, incurred more ridicule than his companion Athelstane, when he swallowed to his own single share the whole of a large pasty out of the most exquisite foreign delicacies, and at that time a Karum-pie. When howev- as discovered by a serious cross-examination Thane of Coningsburgh (or Franklin, as the is termed him) had no idea what he had been ng, and that he had taken the contents of the pie for larks and pigeons, whereas they were breeaficos and nightingales, his ignorance him in for an ample share of the ridicule vould have been more justly bestowed on his r.

ng feast had at length its end; and, while et circulated freely, men talked of the feats receding tournament,—of the unknown victo rchery games, of the Black Knight, whose ral had induced him to withdraw from the he had won,—and of the gallant Ivanhoe, d so dearly bought the honours of the day. ies were treated with military frankness, and and laugh went round the hall. The frow of John alone was overclouded during thes ons; some overpowering care seemed agita mind, which was only when he received ral hints from his attendants, that he seemed nterest in what was passing around him. On casions he would start up, quaff a cup of wine aise his spirits, and then mingle in the con n by some observation made abruptly or at drink this beaker," said he, "to the health of of Ivanhoe, champion of this Passage of nd grieve that his wound renders him absent ur board—Let all fill to the pledge, and ly Cedric of Rotherwood, the worthy father so promising."

my lord," replied Cedric, standing up, and on the table his untasted cup, "I yield not le of son to the disobedient youth, who at spises my commands, and relinquishes the and customs of his fathers."

impossible," cried Prince John, with well- astonishment, "that so gallant a knight e an unworthy or disobedient son!"

my lord," answered Cedric, "so it is with red. He left my homely dwelling to mingle gay nobility of your brother's court, where ed to the close tricks of horsemanship which e so highly. He left it contrary to my wish mand: nay, in the days of Alfred that would en termed disobedience—ay, and a crime punishable."

!" replied Prince John, with a deep sigh of sympathy, "since your son was a follower thappy brother, it need not be inquired where whom he learned the lesson of filial disobe-

spake Prince John, wilfully forgetting, that e sons of Henry the Second, though no one from the charge, he himself had been most shed for rebellion and ingratitude to his father. nk," said he, after a moment's pause, "that ner proposed to confer upon his favourite the or of Ivanhoe."

did endow him with it," answered Cedric; it my least quarrel with my son, that he to hold, as a feudal vassal, the very domains s fathers possessed in free and independent shall then have your willing sanction, good said Prince John, "to confer this fief upon whose dignity will not be diminished by land of the British crown.—Sir Reginald -Bœuf," he said, turning towards that I trust you will so keep the goodly Barony oe, that Sir Wilfred shall not incur his farther displeasure by again entering upon it, Anthony!" answered the black-brow'd will consent that your highness shall hold ton, if either Cedric or Wilfred, or the best bore English blood, shall wrench from ift with which your highness has graced me." ever shall call thee Saxon, Sir Baron," re- ric, offended at a mode of expression by which the Normans frequently expressed their habitual contempt of the English, "will do thee an honour as great as it is undeserved."

Front-de-Bœuf would have replied, but Prince John's petulance and levity got the start.

"Assuredly," said he, "my lords, the noble Cedric speaks truth; and his race may claim precedence over us as much in the length of their pedigrees as in the longitude of their cloaks."

"They go before us indeed in the field—as deer before dogs," said Malvoisin.

"And with good right may they go before us—forget not," said the Prior Aymer, "the superior decency and decorum of their manners."

"Their singular abstemiousness and temperance," said De Bracy, forgetting the plan which promised him a Saxon bride.

"Together with the courage and conduct," said Brian de Bois-Guilbert, by which they distinguished themselves at Hastings and elsewhere."

While with smooth and smiling cheek, the courtiers, each in turn, followed their Prince's example, and aimed a shaft of ridicule at Cedric, the face of the Saxon became inflamed with passion, and he glanced his eyes fiercely from one to another, as if the quick succession of so many injuries had prevented his replying to them in turn; or, like a baited bull, who, surrounded by his tormentors, is at a loss to choose from among them the immediate object of his revenge. At length he spoke, in a voice half choaked with passion; and, addressing himself to Prince John as the head and front of the offence which he had received, "Whatever," he said, "have been the follies and vices of our race, a Saxon would have been held nidering,"* (the most emphatic term for abject worthlessness) "who should in his own hall, and while his own wine-cup passed, have treated, or suffered to be treated, an unoffending guest as your highness has this day beheld me used; and whatever was the misfortune of our fathers on the field of Hastings, those may at least be silent," here he looked at Front-de Bœuf and the Templar, "who have within these few hours once and again lost saddle and stirrup before the lance of a Saxon."

"By my faith, a biting jest!" said Prince John. "How like you it, sirs?—Our Saxon subjects rise in spirit and courage; become shrewd in wit, and bold in bearing, in these unsettled times. What say ye, my lords?—By this good light, I hold it best to take our galleys, and return to Normandy in time."

"For fear of the Saxons?" said De Bracy, laughing; "we should need no weapon but our hunting spears to bring these boars to bay."

"A truce with your raillery, Sir Knights," said Fitzurse;—"and it were well," he added, addressing the Prince, "that your highness should assure the worthy Cedric there is no insult intended him by jests, which must sound but harshly in the ear of a stranger."

"Insult?" answered Prince John, resuming his courtesy of demeanour; "I trust it will not be thought that I could mean, or permit any, to be offered in my presence. Here! I fill my cup to Cedric himself, since he refuses to pledge his son's health."

The cup went round amid the well-dissembled applause of the courtiers, which, however, failed to make the impression on the mind of the Saxon that had been designed. He was not naturally acute of perception, but those too much undervalued his understanding who deemed that this flattering compliment would obliterate the sense of the prior insult. He was silent, however, when the royal pledge again passed round, "To Sir Athelstane of Coningsburgh."

The knight made his obeisance, and showed his sense of the honour by draining a huge goblet in answer to it.

"And now, sirs," said Prince John, who began to be warmed with the wine which he had drank,

* There was nothing accounted so ignominious among the Saxons as to merit this disgraceful epithet. Even William the Conqueror, hated as he was by them, continued to draw a considerable army of Anglo-Saxons to his standard, by threatening to stigmatize those who staid at home, as nidering. Bartholinus, I think, mentions a similar phrase which had like influence on the Danes.

"having done justice to our Saxon guests, we will pray of them some requital to our courtesy.—Worthy Thane," he continued, addressing Cedric, "may we pray you to name to us some Norman whose mention may least sully your mouth, and to wash down with a goblet of wine all bitterness which the sound may leave behind it?"

Fitzurse arose while Prince John spoke, and gliding behind the seat of the Saxon, whispered to him not to omit the opportunity of putting an end to unkindness betwixt the two races, by naming Prince John. The Saxon replied not to this politic insinuation, but, rising up, and filling his cup to the brim, he addressed Prince John in these words: "Your highness has required that I should name a Norman deserving to be remembered at our banquet. This, perchance, is a hard task, since it calls on the slave to sing the praises of the master—upon the vanquished, while pressed by all the evils of conquest, to sing the praises of the conqueror. Yet I will name a Norman—the first in arms and in place—the best and noblest of his race. And the lips that shall refuse to pledge me to his well-earned fame, I term false and dishonoured, and will so maintain them with my life.—I quaff this goblet to the health of Richard the Lion-hearted!"

Prince John, who had expected that his own name would have closed the Saxon's speech, started when that of his injured brother was so unexpectedly introduced. He raised mechanically the wine-cup to his lips, then instantly set it down, to view the demeanour of the company at this unexpected proposal, which many of them felt it as unsafe to oppose as to comply with. Some of them, ancient and experienced courtiers, closely imitated the example of the Prince himself, raising the goblet to their lips, and again replacing it before them. There were many, who, with a more generous feeling, exclaimed, "Long live King Richard! and may he be speedily restored to us!" And some few, among whom were Front-de-Bœuf and the Templar, in sullen disdain suffered their goblets to stand untasted before them. But no man ventured directly to gainsay a pledge filled to the health of the reigning monarch.

Having enjoyed his triumph for about a minute, Cedric said to his companions, "Up, noble Athelstane! we have remained here long enough, since we have requited the hospitable courtesy of Prince John's banquet. Those who wish to know further of our rude Saxon manners must henceforth seek us in the homes of our fathers, since we have seen enough of royal banquets, and enough of Norman courtesy."

So saying, he arose and left the banqueting room, followed by Athelstane, and by several other guests, who, partaking of the Saxon lineage, held themselves insulted by the sarcasms of prince John and his courtiers.

"By the bones of St. Thomas," said Prince John, as they retreated, "the Saxon churls have borne off the best of the day, and have retreated with triumph!"

"Conclamatum est, poculatum est," said Prior Aymer; "we have drunk and we have shouted,—it were time we left our wine flagons."

"The monk hath some fair penitent to shrive tonight, that he is in such a hurry to depart," said De Bracy.

"Not so, Sir Knight," replied the Abbot; "but I must move several miles forward this evening upon my homeward journey."

"They are breaking up," said the Prince in a whisper to Fitzurse; "their fears anticipate the event, and this coward Prior is the first to shrink from me."

"Fear not, my lord," said Waldemar; "I will show him such reasons as shall induce him to join us when we hold our meeting at York.—Sir Prior," he said, I must speak with you in private, before you mount your palfrey."

The other guests were now fast dispersing, with the exception of those immediately attached to Prince John's faction, and his retinue.

"This, then, is the result of your advice," said the Prince, turning an angry countenance upon Fitzurse; "that I should be bearded at my own board by a drunken Saxon churl, and that, on the mere sound of my brother's name, men should fall off from me as if I had the leprosy?"

"Have patience, sir," replied his counsellor; "I might retort your accusation, and blame the inconsiderate levity which foiled my design, and misled your own better judgment. But this is no time for recrimination. De Bracy and I will instantly go among these shuffling cowards, and convince them they have gone too far to recede."

"It will be in vain," said Prince John, pacing the apartment with disordered steps, and expressing himself with an agitation to which the wine he had drunk partly contributed—"It will be in vain—they have seen the handwriting on the wall—they have marked the paw of the lion in the sand—they have heard his approaching roar shake the wood—nothing will reanimate their courage."

"Would to God," said Fitzurse to De Bracy, "that aught could reanimate his own! His brother's very name is an aguc to him. Unhappy are the counsellors of a Prince, who wants fortitude and perseverance alike in good and in evil!"

CHAPTER XV.

> And yet he thinks,—ha, ha, ha, ha,—he thinks
> I am the tool and servant of his will.
> Well, let it be; through all the maze of trouble
> His plots and base oppression must create,
> I'll shape myself a way to higher things,
> And who will say 'tis wrong?
>
> Basil, a Tragedy.

No spider ever took more pains to repair the shattered meshes of his web, than did Waldemar Fitzurse to reunite and combine the scattered members of Prince John's cabal. Few of these were attached to him from inclination, and none from personal regard. It was therefore necessary, that Fitzurse should open to them new prospects of advantage, and remind them of those which they at present enjoyed. To the young and wild nobles, he held out the prospect of unpunished license and uncontrolled revelry; to the ambitious, that of power, and to the covetous, that of increased wealth and extended domains. The leaders of the mercenaries received a donation in gold; an argument the most persuasive to their minds, and without which all others would have proved in vain. Promises were still more liberally distributed than money by this active agent; and, in fine, nothing was left undone that could determine the wavering, or animate the disheartened. The return of King Richard he spoke of as an event altogether beyond the reach of probability; yet, when he observed, from the doubtful looks and uncertain answers which he received, that this was the apprehension by which the minds of his accomplices were most haunted, he boldly treated that event, should it really take place, as one which ought not to alter their political calculations.

"If Richard returns," said Fitzurse, "he returns to enrich his needy and impoverished crusaders at the expense of those who did not follow him to the Holy Land. He returns to call to a fearful reckoning, those who, during his absence, have done aught that can be construed offence or encroachment upon either the laws of the land or the privileges of the crown. He returns to avenge upon the Orders of the Temple and the Hospital, the preference which they showed to Philip of France during the wars in the Holy Land. He returns, in fine, to punish as a rebel every adherent of his brother Prince John. Are ye afraid of his power?" continued the artful confidant of that Prince; "we acknowledge him a strong and valiant knight; but these are not the days of King Arthur, when a champion could encounter an army. If Richard indeed comes back, it must be alone,—unfollowed—unfriendly. The bones of his gallant army have whitened the sands of Palestine. The few of his followers who have returned have straggled hither like this Wilfred of Ivanhoe, beggared and broken men.—And what talk ye of Richard's right of birth?" he proceeded, in answer to those who objected scruples on that head. "Is Richard's title of primogeniture more decidedly certain than that of Duke Robert of Normandy, the Conqueror's eldest son? And yet William the Red, and Henry, his second and third brothers, were suc-

ed to him by the voice of the nation.
ry merit which can be pleaded for s a bold knight, a good leader, geneids and to the church, and, to crown saader and a conqueror of the Holy
yet he died a blind and miserable Castle of Cardiff, because he opposed vill of the people, who chose that he over them. It is our right," he said, the blood royal the prince who is best
l the supreme power—that is," said mself, "him whose election will best ter sts of the nobility. In personal
e added, "it was possible that Prince inferior to his brother Richard; but sidered that the latter returned with geance in his hand, while the former s, immunities, privileges, wealth, and
l not be doubted which was the king
m the nobility were called on to sup-

any more arguments, some adapted circumstances of those whom he ad-expected weight with the nobles of action. Most of them consented to sed meeting at York, for the purpose
l arrangements for placing the crown
f Prince John.
night, when, worn out and exhausted exertions, however gratified with the returning to the Castle of Ashby,
ncy, who had exchanged his banquet-
r a short green kirtle, with hose of
and colour, a leathern cap or head-
ord, a horn slung over his shoulder,
s hand, and a bundle of arrows stuck
l Fitzurse met this figure in an outer
ould have passed him without notice,
omen of the guard; but finding him
, he looked at him with more atten-ised the Norman knight in the dress oman.
nery is this, De Bracy?" said Fitzangrily; "is this a time for Christ-d quaint maskings, when the fate of ce John, is on the very verge of deast thou not been, like me, among ravens, whom the very name of King
as it is said to do the children of the attending to mine own business," racy calmly, "as you, Fitzurse, have urs."

ine own business!" echoed Waldcgen engaged in that of Prince John,
"
ldst any other reason for that, Wal-Bracy," than the promotion of thine interest? Come Fitzurse, we know
ition is thy pursuit, pleasure is mine,
our different ages. Of Prince John I do; that he is too weak to be a
arch, too tyrannical to be an easy insolent and presumptuous to be a
, and too fickle and timid to be long y kind. But he is a monarch by nd De Bracy hope to rise and thrive;
aid him with your policy, and I with Free Companions."
xiliary," said Fitzurse impatiently;
l in the very moment of utter neces-
arth dost thou purpose by this absurd
ment so urgent?
wife," answered De Bracy coolly,
er of the tribe of Benjamin."
Benjamin?" said Fitzurse; "I com-
"
t in presence yester-even," said De e heard the Prior Aymer tell us a he romance which was sung by the old bow, long since in Palestine, a between the tribe of Benjamin and raelitish nation; and how they cut
h all the chivalry of that tribe; and how they swore by our blessed Lady, that they would not permit those who remained to marry in their lineage; and how they became grieved for their vow, and sent to consult his holiness the Pope how they might be absolved from it; and how, by the advice of the Holy Father, the youth of the tribe of Benjamin carried off from a superb tournament all the ladies who were there present, and thus won them wives without the consent either of their brides or their brides' families."

"I have heard the story," said Fitzurse, "though either the Prior or thou has made some singular alterations in date and circumstances."

"I tell thee," said De Bracy, "that I mean to purvey me a wife after the fashion of the tribe of Benjamin; which is as much as to say, that in this same equipment I will fall upon that herd of Saxon bullocks, who have this night left the castle, and carry off from them the lovely Rowena."

"Art thou mad, De Bracy?" said Fitzurse. "Bethink thee that, though the men be Saxons, they are rich and powerful, and regarded with the more respect by their countrymen, that wealth and honour are but the lot of few of Saxon descent."

"And should belong to none," said De Bracy; "the work of the Conquest should be completed."

"This is no time for it at least," said Fitzurse; "the approaching crisis renders the favour of the multitude indispensable, and Prince John cannot refuse justice to any one who injures their favourites."

"Let him grant it, if he dare," said De Bracy; "he will soon see the difference betwixt the support of such a lusty lot of spears as mine, and that of a heartless mob of Saxon churls. Yet I mean no immediate discovery of myself. Seem I not in this garb as bold a forester as ever blew horn? The blame of the violence shall rest with the outlaws of the Yorkshire forests. I have sure spies on the Saxons' motions—To-night they sleep in the convent of Saint Wittol, or Withold, or whatever they call that churl of a Saxon Saint at Burton-on-Trent. Next day's march brings them within our reach, and, falcon-ways, we swoop on them at once. Presently after I will appear in mine own shape, play the courteous knight, rescue the unfortunate and afflicted fair one from the hands of the rude ravishers, conduct her to Front-de-Bœuf's Castle, or to Normandy, if it should be necessary, and produce her not again to her kindred until she be the bride and dame of Maurice de Bracy."

"A marvellously sage plan," said Fitzurse, "and, as I think, not entirely of thine own device.—Come, be frank, De Bracy, who aided thee in the invention? and who is to assist in the execution? for, as I think, thine own band lies as far off as York."

"Marry, if thou must needs know," said De Bracy, "it was the Templar Brian de Bois-Guilbert that shaped out the enterprise, which the adventure of the men of Benjamin suggested to me. He is to aid me in the onslaught, and he and his followers will personate the outlaws, from whom my valorous arm is, after changing my garb, to rescue the lady."

"By my halidome," said Fitzurse, "the plan was worthy of your united wisdom! and thy prudence, De Bracy, is most especially manifested in the project of leaving the lady in the hands of thy worthy confederate. Thou mayst, I think, succeed in taking her from her Saxon friends, but how thou wilt rescue her afterwards from the clutches of Bois-Guilbert seems considerably more doubtful—He is a falcon well accustomed to pounce on a partridge, and to hold his prey fast."

"He is a Templar," said De Bracy, "and cannot therefore rival me in my plan of wedding this heiress;—and to attempt aught dishonourable against the intended bride of De Bracy—By Heaven! were he a whole Chapter of his Order in his single person, he dared not do me such an injury!"

"Then since naught that I can say," said Fitzurse, "will put this folly from thy imagination, (for well I know the obstinacy of thy disposition,) at least waste as little time as possible—let not thy folly be lasting as well as untimely."

"I tell thee," answered De Bracy, "that it will be the work of a few hours, and I shall be at York at the head of my daring and valorous fellows, as ready to support any bold design as thy policy can be to form one.—But I hear my comrades assembling, and the steeds stamping and neighing in the outer court.—Farewell.—I go, like a true knight, to win the smiles of beauty."

"Like a true knight?" repeated Fitzurse, looking after him: "like a fool, I should say, or like a child, who will leave the most serious and needful occupation, to chase the down of the thistle that drives past him.—But it is with such tools that I must work;—and for whose advantage?—For that of a Prince as unwise as he is profligate, and as likely to be an ungrateful master as he has already proved a rebellious son and an unnatural brother. But he—he, too, is but one of the tools with which I labour; and, proud as he is, should he presume to separate his interest from mine, this is a secret which he shall soon learn."

The meditations of the statesman were here interrupted by the voice of the Prince from an interior apartment, calling out, "Noble Waldemar Fitzurse!" and, with bonnet doffed, the future Chancellor (for to such high preferment did the wily Norman aspire) hastened to receive the orders of the future sovereign.

CHAPTER XVI.

Far in a wild, unknown to public view,
From youth to age a reverend hermit grew;
The moss his bed, the cave his humble cell,
His food the fruits, his drink the crystal well;
Remote from man, with God he pass'd his days,
Prayer all his business—all his pleasure praise.

PARNELL.

The reader cannot have forgotten that the event of the tournament was decided by the exertions of an unknown knight, whom, on account of the passive and indifferent conduct which he had manifested on the former part of the day, the spectators had entitled, Le Noir Faineant. This knight had left the field abruptly when the victory was achieved; and when he was called upon to receive the reward of his valour, he was nowhere to be found. In the mean time, while summoned by heralds and by trumpets, the knight was holding his course northward, avoiding all frequented paths, and taking the shortest road through the woodlands. He paused for the night at a small hostelry lying out of the ordinary route, where, however, he obtained from a wandering minstrel news of the event of the tourney.

On the next morning the knight departed early, with the intention of making a long journey; the condition of his horse, which he had carefully spared during the preceding morning, being such as enabled him to travel far without the necessity of much repose. Yet his purpose was baffled by the devious paths through which he rode, so that when evening closed upon him, he only found himself on the frontiers of the West Riding of Yorkshire. By this time both horse and man required refreshment, and it became necessary, moreover, to look out for some place in which they might spend the night, which was now fast approaching.

The place where the traveller found himself seemed unpropitious for obtaining either shelter or refreshment, and he was likely to be reduced to the usual expedient of knights-errant, who, on such occasions, turned their horses to graze, and laid themselves down to meditate on their lady-mistress, with an oak-tree for a canopy. But the Black Knight either had no mistress to meditate upon, or, being as indifferent in love as he seemed to be in war, was not sufficiently occupied by passionate reflections upon her beauty and cruelty, to be able to parry the effects of fatigue and hunger, and suffer love to act as a substitute for the solid comforts of a bed and supper. He felt dissatisfied, therefore, when, looking around, he found himself deeply involved in woods, through which indeed there were many open glades, and some paths, but such as seemed only formed by the numerous herds of cattle which then grazed in the forest, or by the animals of chase, and the hunters who made prey of them.

The sun, by which the knight had chiefly directed his course, had now sunk behind the Derbyshire hills on his left, and every effort which he might make to pursue his journey was as likely to lead him out of his road as to advance him on his route. After having in vain endeavoured to select the most beaten path, in hopes it might lead to the cottage of some herdsman, or the sylvan lodge of a forester, and having repeatedly found himself totally unable to determine on a choice, the knight resolved to trust to the sagacity of his horse; experience having, on former occasions, made him acquainted with the wonderful talent possessed by these animals for extricating themselves and their riders on such emergences.

The good steed, grievously fatigued with so long a day's journey under a rider cased in mail, had no sooner found, by the slackened reins, that he was abandoned to his own guidance, than he seemed to assume new strength and spirit; and whereas formerly he had scarce replied to the spur, otherwise than by a groan, he now, as if proud of the confidence reposed in him, pricked up his ears, and assumed, of his own accord, a more lively motion. The path which the animal adopted rather turned off from the course pursued by the knight during the day; but as the horse seemed confident in his choice, the rider abandoned himself to his discretion.

He was justified by the event; for the footpath soon after appeared a little wider and more worn, and the tinkle of a small bell gave the knight to understand that he was in the vicinity of some chapel or hermitage.

Accordingly, he soon reached an open plat of turf, on the opposite side of which, a rock, rising abruptly from a gently sloping plain, offered its gray and weatherbeaten front to the traveller. Ivy mantled its sides in some places, and in others oaks and holly bushes, whose roots found nourishment in the cliffs of the crag, waved over the precipices below, like the plumage of the warrior over his steel helmet, giving grace to that whose chief expression was terror. At the bottom of the rock, and leaning, as it were, against it, was constructed a rude hut, built chiefly of the trunks of trees felled in the neighbouring forest, and secured against the weather by having its crevices stuffed with moss mingled with clay. The stem of a young fir-tree lopped of its branches, with a piece of wood tied across near the top, was planted upright by the door, as a rude emblem of the holy cross. At a little distance on the right hand, a fountain of the purest water trickled out of the rock, and was received in a hollow stone, which labour had formed into a rustic basin. Escaping from this place, the stream murmured down the descent by a channel which its course had long worn, and so wandered through the little plain to lose itself in the neighbouring wood.

Beside this fountain were the ruins of a very small chapel, of which the roof had partly fallen in. The building, when entire, had never been above sixteen feet long by twelve feet in breadth, and the roof, low in proportion, rested upon four concentric arches, which sprung from the four corners of the building, each supported upon a short and heavy pillar. The ribs of two of these arches remained, though the roof had fallen down betwixt them; over the others it remained entire. The entrance to this ancient place of devotion was under a very low round arch, ornamented by several courses of that zig-zag moulding, resembling shark's teeth, which appears so often in the most ancient Saxon architecture. A belfry rose above the porch on four small pillars, within which hung a green and weatherbeaten bell, the feeble sounds of which had been some time before heard by the Black Knight.

The whole peaceful and quiet scene lay glimmering in twilight before the eyes of the traveller, giving him good assurance of lodging for the night; since it was a special duty of those hermits who dwelt in the woods, to exercise hospitality towards benighted and bewildered passengers.

Accordingly, the knight took no time to consider minutely the particulars which we have detailed, but (thanking Saint Julian (the patron of travellers) who had sent him good harbourage, as reason from his horse and assailed the door of the hermitage with the butt of his lance, in order to arouse attention and gain admittance.

was some time before he obtained any answer, the reply, when made, was unpropitious.

Pass on, whosoever thou art," was the answer n by a deep hoarse voice from within the hut, d disturb not the servant of God and St. Dunstan is evening devotions."

Worthy father," answered the knight, "here is a r wanderer bewildered in these woods, who gives e the opportunity of exercising thy charity and pitality."

Good brother," replied the inhabitant of the her- age, "It has pleased Our Lady and St. Dunstan to line me for the object of those virtues, instead of exercise thereof. I have no provisions here which n dog would share with me, and a horse of any leaness of nurture would despise my couch—pass fore on thy way, and God speed thee."

But how," replied the knight, "is it possible for to find my way through such a wood as this, when ness is coming on? I pray you, reverend father, ou are a Christian, to unco your door, and at least t out to me my road."

And I pray you, good Christian brother," replied anchorite, "to disturb me no more. You have dly interrupted one pater, two aves, and a credo, h I, miserable sinner that I am, should, according y vow, have said before moonrise."

The road—the road!" vociferated the knight "give irections for the road, if I am to expect no more thee."

The road," replied the hermit, "is easy to hit. path from the wood leads to a morass, and from ce to a ford, which, as the rains have abated, may be passable. When thou hast crossed the ford, wilt take care of thy footing up the left bank, as omewhat precipitous; and the path, which hangs the river, has lately, as I learn, (for I seldom leave ities of my chapel,) given way in sundry places. t will then keep straight forward"—— broken path—a precipice—a ford, and a mo- " said the knight, interrupting him,—" Sir Her- f you were the holiest that ever wore beard or ead, you shall scarce prevail on me to hold this to-night. I tell thee, that thou, who livest by harity of the country—ill deserved, as I doubt it set no right to refuse shelter to the wayfarer n in distress. Either open the door quickly, or, e rood, I will beat it down and make entry for lf."

Friend wayfarer," replied the hermit, "be not rimate; if thou puttest me to use the carnal pon in mine own defence, it will be e'en the worse ee."

; this moment a distant noise of barking and ling, which the traveller had for some time l, became extremely loud and furious, and made ught suppose that the hermit, alarmed by his t of making forcible entry, had called the dogs made this clamour to aid him in his defence, out me inner recess in which they had been kennelled. ased at this preparation on the hermit's part for ng good his inhospitable purpose, the knight k the door so furiously with his foot, that posts ll as staples shook with violence.

e anchorite, not caring again to expose his door similar shock, now called out aloud, "Patience, ace—spare thy strength, good traveller, and I presently undo the door, though, it may be, my go will be little to thy pleasure.

e door accordingly was opened; and the hermit, ge, strong-built man, in his sackcloth gown and girt with a rope of rushes, stood before the t. He had in the one hand a lighted torch, or and in the other a baton of crab-tree, so thick eavy, that it might well be termed a club. Two shaggy dogs, half greyhound half mastiff, stood to rush upon the traveller as soon as the door ld be opened. But when the torch glanced upon ky crest and golden spurs of the knight, who without, the hermit, altering probably his ori- intentions, repressed the rage of his auxiliaries, changing his tone to a sort of churlish courtesy, d the knight to enter his hut, making excuse for unwillingness to open his lodge after sunset, by alleging the multitude of robbers and outlaws who were abroad, and who gave no honour to Our Lady or St. Dunstan, nor to those holy men who spent life in their service.

"The poverty of your cell, good father," said the knight, looking around him, and seeing nothing but a bed of leaves, a crucifix rudely carved in oak, a missal, with a rough-hewn table and two stools, and one or two clumsy articles of furniture—" the poverty of your cell should seem a sufficient defence against any risk of thieves, not to mention the aid of two trusty dogs, large and strong enough, I think, to pull down a stag, and of course, to match with most men."

"The good keeper of the forest," said the hermit, "hath allowed me the use of these animals, to protect my solitude until the times shall mend."

Having said this, he fixed his torch in a twisted branch of iron which served for a candlestick; and, placing the oaken trivet before the embers of the fire, which he refreshed with some dry wood, he placed a stool upon one side of the table, and beckoned to the knight to do the same upon the other.

They sat down, and gazed with great gravity at each other, each thinking in his heart that he had seldom seen a stronger or more athletic figure than was placed opposite to him.

"Reverend hermit," said the knight, after looking long and fixedly at his host, "were it not to interrupt your devout meditations, I would pray to know three things of your holiness; first, where I am to put my horse?—secondly, what I can have for supper?—thirdly, where I am to take up my couch for the night?"

"I will reply to you," said the hermit, "with my finger, it being against my rule to speak by words where signs can answer the purpose." So saying, he pointed successively to two corners of the hut. "Your stable," said he, "is there—your bed there; and," reaching down a platter with two handfuls of parched pease upon it from the neighbouring shelf, and placing it upon the table, he added, "your supper is here."

The knight shrugged his shoulders, and leaving the hut, brought in his horse, (which in the interim he had fastened to a tree,) unsaddled him with much attention, and spread upon the steed's weary back his own mantle.

The hermit was apparently somewhat moved to compassion by the anxiety as well as address which the stranger displayed in tending his horse; for, muttering something about provender left for the keeper's palfrey, he dragged out of a recess a bundle of forage, which he spread before the knight's charger, and immediately afterwards shook down a quantity of dried fern in the corner which he had assigned for the rider's couch. The knight returned him thanks for his courtesy; and, this duty done, both resumed their seats by the table, whereon stood the trencher of pease placed between them. The hermit, after a long grace, which had once been Latin, but of which original language few traces remained, excepting here and there the long rolling termination of some word or phrase, set example to his guest, by modestly putting into a very large mouth, furnished with teeth which might have ranked with those of a boar both in sharpness and whiteness, some three or four dried pease, a miserable grist as it seemed for so large and able a mill.

The knight, in order to follow so laudable an example, laid aside his helmet, his corslet, and the greater part of his armour, and showed to the hermit a head thick-curled with yellow hair, high features, blue eyes, remarkably bright and sparkling, a mouth well formed, having an upper lip clothed with mustaches darker than his hair, and bearing altogether the look of a bold, daring, and enterprising man, with which his strong form well corresponded.

The hermit, as if wishing to answer to the confidence of his guest, threw back his cowl, and showed a round bullet head belonging to a man in the prime of life. His close-shaven crown, surrounded by a circle of stiff curled black hair, had something the appearance of a parish pinfold begirt by its high hedge. The features expressed nothing of monastic austerity, or of ascetic privations; on the contrary, it was a bold blunt countenance, with broad black eyebrows, a well-turned forehead, and cheeks as round and vermilion as those of a trumpeter, from which descended a long and curly black beard. Such a visage, joined to the brawny form of the holy man, spoke rather of sirloins and haunches, than of pease and pulse. This incongruity did not escape the guest. After he had with great difficulty accomplished the mastication of a mouthful of the dried pease, he found it absolutely necessary to request his pious entertainer to furnish him with some liquor; who replied to his request by placing before him a large can of the purest water from the fountain.

"It is from the well of St. Dunstan," said he, "in which, betwixt sun and sun, he baptized five hundred heathen Danes and Britons—blessed be his name!" And applying his black beard to the pitcher, he took a draught much more moderate in quantity than his encomium seemed to warrant.

"It seems to me, reverend father," said the knight, "that the small morsels which you eat, together with this holy, but somewhat thin beverage, have thriven with you marvellously. You appear a man more fit to win the ram at a wrestling match, or the ring at a bout at quarter-staff, or the bucklers at a sword-play, than to finger out your time in this desolate wilderness, saying masses, and living upon parched pease and cold water."

"Sir Knight," answered the hermit, "your thoughts, like those of the ignorant laity, are according to the flesh. It has pleased Our Lady and my patron saint to bless the pittance to which I restrain myself, even as the pulse and water was blessed to the children Shadrach, Meshech, and Abednego, who drank the same rather than defile themselves with the wine and meats which were appointed them by the King of the Saracens."

"Holy Father," said the knight, "upon whose countenance it hath pleased Heaven to work such a miracle, permit a sinful layman to crave thy name?"

"Thou mayst call me," answered the hermit, "the Clerk of Copmanhurst, for so I am termed in these parts—They add, it is true, the epithet holy, but I stand not upon that, as being unworthy of such addition.—And now, valiant knight, may I pray ye for the name of my honourable guest?"

"Truly," said the knight, "Holy Clerk of Copmanhurst, men call me in these parts the Black Knight,—many, sir, add to it the epithet of Sluggard, whereby I am no way ambitious to be distinguished."

The hermit could scarcely forbear from smiling at his guest's reply.

"I see," said he, "Sir Sluggish Knight, that thou art a man of prudence and of counsel; and moreover, I see that my poor monastic fare likes thee not, accustomed, perhaps, as thou hast been, to the license of courts and of camps, and the luxuries of cities; and now I bethink me, Sir Sluggard, that when the charitable keeper of this forest-walk left these dogs for my protection, and also those bundles of forage, he left me also some food, which, being unfit for my use, the very recollection of it had escaped me amid my more weighty meditations."

"I dare be sworn he did so," said the knight; "I was convinced that there was better food in the cell. Holy Clerk, since you first doffed your cowl.—Your keeper is ever a jovial fellow; and none who beheld thy grinders contending with these pease, and thy throat flooded with this ungenial element, could see thee doomed to such horse-provender and horse-beverage," (pointing to the provisions upon the table,) "and refrain from mending thy cheer. Let us see the keeper's bounty, therefore, without delay."

The hermit cast a wistful look upon the knight, in which there was a sort of comic expression of hesitation, as if uncertain how far he should act prudently in trusting his guest. There was, however, as much of bold frankness in the knight's countenance as was possible to be expressed by features. His smile, too, had something in it irresistibly comic, and gave an assurance of faith and loyalty, with which his host could not refrain from sympathizing.

After exchanging a mute glance or two, the hermit went to the further side of the hut, and opened a hutch, which was concealed with great care and sor nuity. Out of the recesses of a dark closet, int this aperture gave admittance, he brought pasty, baked in a pewter platter of unusual sions. This mighty dish he placed before h who, using his poniard to cut it open, lost no making himself acquainted with its contents.

"How long is it since the good keeper h here?" said the knight to his host, after havir lowed several hasty morsels of this reinforce the hermit's good cheer.

"About two months," answered the father

"By the true Lord," answered the knight, thing in your hermitage is miraculous, Holy for I would have been sworn that the fat buc furnished this venison had been running within the week."

The hermit was somewhat discountenance observation; and, moreover, he made but figure while gazing on the diminution of the p which his guest was making desperate inr warfare in which his previous profession of ab left him no pretext for joining.

"I have been in Palestine, Sir Clerk," s knight, stopping short of a sudden, "and I h me it is a custom there that every host who eat a guest shall assure him of the wholesomene food, by partaking of it along with him. F from me to suspect so holy a man of aught i table; nevertheless I will be highly bound would you comply with this Eastern custom.'

"To ease your unnecessary scruples, Sir K will for once depart from my rule," replied the And as there were no forks in those days, his were instantly in the bowels of the pasty.

The ice of ceremony being once broken, it matter of rivalry between the guest and th tainer which should display the best appeti although the former had probably fasted lon the hermit fairly surpassed him.

"Holy Clerk," said the knight, when his was appeased, "I would gage my good horse against a zecchin, that that same honest k whom we are obliged for the venison has le stoup of wine, or a runlet of canary, or soo trifle, by way of ally to th's noble pasty. Thi be a circumstance, doubtless, totally unwo dwell in the memory of so rigid an anchorit think, were you to search yonder crypt onc you would find that I am right in my conjectu

The hermit only replied by a grin; and n to the hutch, he produced a leathern bottle might contain about four quarts. He also forth two large drinking cups, made out of t of the urus, and hooped with silver. Havin this goodly provision for washing down the he seemed to think no farther ceremonies necessary on his part; but filling both cups, a ing, in the Saxon fashion, "Waes hael, Sir K Knight!" he emptied his own at a draught.

"Drink hael, Holy Clerk of Copmanhurs swered the warrior, and did his host reason in lar brimmer.

"Holy Clerk," said the stranger, after the was thus swallowed, "I cannot but marve man possessed of such thews and sinews a and who therewithal shows the talent of so trencher-man, should think of abiding by hi this wilderness. In my judgment, you are keep a castle or a fort, eating of the fat and of the strong, than to live here upon pulse an or even upon the charity of the keeper. were I as thou, I should find myself both and plenty out of the king's deer. There is goodly herd in these forests, and a buck wi be missed that goes to the use of Saint D chaplain."

"Sir Sluggish Knight," replied the Clerk are dangerous words, an I I pray you to forbe I am true hermit to the king and law, and w spoil my liege's game. I should be sure of th and, an my gown saved me not, were in so of hanging."

"Nevertheless, were I as thou," said the

: my walk by moonlight, when forest-rs were warm in bed, and ever and attered my prayers,—I would let fly a he herds of dun deer that feed in the 'e me, Holy Clerk, hast thou never a pastime?"

ggard," answered the hermit, "thou
that can concern thee of my houseomething more than he deserves who quarters by violence. Credit me, it is the good which God sends thee, than erily curious how it comes. Fill thy me; and do not, I pray thee, by fur-
r inquiries, put me to show that thou have made good thy lodging; had I
: oppose thee."

h," said the Knight, "thou makest me
ran ever! Thou art the most myste-ever met; and I will know more of art. As for thy threats, know, holy akest to one whose trade it is to find erever it is to be met with."

sh Knight, I drink to thee," said the ecting thy valour much, but deeming rtly of thy discretion. If thou wilt take h me, I will give thee, in all friendship
love, such sufficing penance and com-
on, that thou shalt not for the next sin the sin of excess of curiosity."

pledged him, and desired him to name tone," replied the hermit, "from the dilah and the tenpenny nail of Jael, to f Goliath, at which I am not a match

if I am to make the election, what od friend, to these trinkets?"

ng, he opened another hutch, and took couple of broadswords and bucklers,
used by the yeomanry of the period.
ıo watched his motions, observed that ce of concealment was furnished with od long-bows, a cross-bow, a bundle ıe latter, and half-a-dozen sheaves of former. A harp, and other matters of onical appearance, were also visible
: recess was opened.

thee, brother Clerk," said he, "I will ore offensive questions. The contents
rd are an answer to all my inquiries;
apon there" there he stooped and took on which I would more gladly prove hee, than at the sword and buckler."

Knight," said the hermit, "thou hast reason for thy surname of the Slugonise thus I suspect thee grievously.
hou art my guest, and I will not put to the proof without thine own free
down, then, and fill thy cup; let us d be merry. If thou knowest ever a shalt be welcome to a nook of pasty
st so long as I serve the chapel of St.
h, please God, shall be till I change
ing for one of green turf. But come, or it will crave some time to tune the ight pitches the voice and sharpens the of wine. For my part, I love to feel ny very finger-ends before they make ge tinkle."

CHAPTER XVII.

e, within yon studious nook,
my brass embossed book,
ayed with many a holy deed
irtyrs crowned with heavenly meed;
, as my taper wastes dim,
i, ere I sleep, my measured hymn.
* * * *
but would cast his pomp away,
ike my staff and amice gray,
to the world's tumultuous stage
r the peaceful HERMITAGE. WARTON.

ANDING the prescription of the genial which his guest willingly complied, he

HERMIT.—All readers, however slightly ac-

found it no easy matter to bring the harp to harmony.

"Methinks, holy father," said he, "the instrument wants one string, and the rest have been somewhat misused."

"Ay, mark'st thou that," replied the hermit; "that shows thee a master of the craft, wine and wassail," he added, gravely casting up his eyes—"all the fault of wine and wassail!—I told Allan-a-Dale, the northern minstrel that he would damage the harp if he touched it after the seventh cup, but he would not be controlled—Friend, I drink to thy successful performance."

So saying, he took off his cup with much gravity, at the same time shaking his head at the intemperance of the Scottish harper.

The knight, in the mean time, had brought the strings into some order, and after a short prelude, asked his host whether he would choose a sirvente in the language of oc, or a lai in the language of oui, or a virelai, or a ballad in the vulgar English.*

"A ballad, a ballad," said the hermit, "against all the oes and ouis of France. Downright English am I, Sir Knight, and downright English was my patron St. Dunstan, and scorned oc and oui, as he would have scorned the parings of the devil's hoof—downright English alone shall be sung in this cell."

"I will assay, then," said the knight, "a ballad composed by a Saxon glee-man, whom I knew in Holy Land."

It speedily appeared, that if the knight was not a complete master of the minstrel art, his taste for it had at least been cultivated under the best instructers. Art had taught him to soften the faults of a voice which had little compass, and was naturally rough rather than mellow, and, in short, had done all that culture can do in supplying natural deficiencies. His performance, therefore, might have been termed very respectable by abler judges than the hermit, especially as the knight threw into the notes now a degree of spirit, and now of plaintive enthusiasm, which gave force and energy to the verses which he sung.

THE CRUSADER'S RETURN.

1.

High deeds achieved of knightly fame,
From Palestine the champion came;
The cross upon his shoulders borne,
Battle and blast had dimm'd and torn.
Each dint upon his batter'd shield
Was token of a foughten field;
And thus beneath his lady's bower,
He sung, as fell the twilight hour:—

2.

"Joy to the fair!—thy knight behold,
Return'd from yonder land of gold;
No wealth he brings, nor wealth can need,
Save his good arms and battle-steed;
His spurs, to dash against a foe,
His lance and sword to lay him low;
Such all the trophies of his toil,
Such—and the hope of Tekla's smile!

3.

"Joy to the fair! whose constant knight
Her favour fired to feats of might;
Unnoted shall she not remain,
Where meet the bright and noble train;
Minstrel shall sing and herald tell—
'Mark yonder maid of beauty well,
'Tis she for whose bright eyes was won
The listed field at Askalon!

4

"'Note well her smile!'—it edged the blade
Which fifty wives to widows made,
When, vain his strength and Mahound's spell, Iconium's turban'd Soldan fell.

quainted with black letter, must recognise in the Clerk of Copmanhurst, Friar Tuck, the Luxom Confessor of Robin Hood's gang, the Curtal Friar of Fountain's Abbey.

* The realm of France, it is well known, was divided betwixt the Norman and Teutonic race, who spoke the language in which the word Yes is pronounced as oui, and the inhabitants of the southern provinces, whose speech bearing some affinity to the Italian, pronounced the same word oc. The poets of the former race were called Minstrels, and their poems Lays; those of the latter were termed Troubadours, and their compositions called sirvents, and other names. Richard, a professed admirer of the joyous science in all its branches, could imitate either the minstrel or troubadour. It is less likely that he should have been able to compose or sing an English ballad; yet so much do we wish to assimilate Him of the Lion Heart to the band of warriors whom he led, that the anachronism, if there be one, may readily be forgiven.

Sweet thou her locks, whose sunny glow
Half shows, half shades, her neck of snow?
Twines not of them one golden thread,
But for its sake a Paynim bled.'

5.

"'Joy to the fair!—my name unknown,
Each deed, and all its praise thine own;
Then oh! unbar this churlish gate,
The night dew falls, the hour is late.
Inured to Syria's glowing breath,
I feel the north breeze chill as death;
Let grateful love quell maiden shame,
And grant him bliss who brings thee fame."

During this performance, the hermit demeaned himself much like a first-rate critic of the present day at a new opera. He reclined back upon his seat, with his eyes half shut; now folding his hands and twisting his thumbs, he seemed absorbed in attention, and anon, balancing his expanded palms, he gently flourished them in time to the music. At one or two favourite cadences, he threw in a little assistance of his own, where the knight's voice seemed unable to carry the air so high as his worshipful taste approved. When the song was ended, the anchorite emphatically declared it a good one, and well sung.

"And yet," said he, "I think my Saxon countrymen had herded long enough with the Normans, to fall into the tone of their melancholy ditties. What took the honest knight from home? or what could he expect but to find his mistress agreeably engaged with a rival on his return, and his serenade, as they call it, as little regarded as the caterwauling of a cat in the gutter? Nevertheless, Sir Knight, I drink this cup to thee, to the success of all true lovers: I fear you are none," he added, on observing that the knight (whose brain began to be heated with these repeated draughts) qualified his flagon from the water pitcher.

"Why," said the knight, "did you not tell me that this water was from the well of your blessed patron, St. Dunstan?"

"Ay, truly," said the hermit, "and many a hundred of pagans did he baptize there, but I never heard that he drank any of it. Every thing should be put to its proper use in this world. St. Dunstan knew, as well as any one, the prerogatives of a jovial friar."

And so saying, he reached the harp, and entertained his guest with the following characteristic song, to a sort of derry-down chorus, appropriate to an old English ditty.*

THE BAREFOOTED FRIAR.

1.

I'll give thee, good fellow, a twelvemonth or twain,
To search Europe through, from Byzantium to Spain:
But ne'er shall you find, should you search till you tire,
So happy a man as the Barefooted Friar.

2.

Your knight for his lady pricks forth in career,
And is brought home at even-song prick'd through with a spear;
I confess him in haste—for his lady desires
No comfort on earth save the Barefooted Friar's.

3.

Your monarch?—Pshaw! many a prince has been known
To barter his robes for our cowl and our gown,
But which of us e'er felt the idle desire
To exchange for a crown the gray hood of a Friar!

4.

The Friar has walk'd out, and where'er he has gone,
The land and its fatness is mark'd for his own;
He can roam where he lists, he can stop when he tires,
For every man's house is the Barefooted Friar's.

5.

He's expected at noon, and no wight till he comes
May profane the great chair, or the porridge of plums;
For the best of the cheer, and the seat by the fire,
Is the undoubted right of the Barefooted Friar.

6.

He's expected at night, and the pasty's made hot,
They broach the brown ale, and they fill the black pot.
And the goodwife would wish the goodman in the mire,
Ere he lack'd a soft pillow, the Barefooted Friar.

7.

Long flourish the sandal, the cord, and the cope,
The dread of the devil and trust of the Pope;
For to gather life's roses, unscathed by the briar,
Is granted alone to the Barefooted Friar.

* It may be proper to remind the reader, that the chorus of "derry down" is supposed to be as ancient, not only as the times of the Heptarchy, but as those of the Druids, and to have furnished the chorus to the hymns of those venerable persons when they went to the wood to gather mistletoe.

"By my troth," said the knight, "thou l
well and lustily, and in high praise of th
And talking of the devil, Holy Clerk, ar afraid that he may pay you a visit durin
your uncanonical pastimes?"

"I uncanonical!" answered the hermit;
the charge—I scorn it with my heels!—I duty of my chapel duly and truly—Two ma morning and evening, primes, noons an aves, credos, paters"——

"Excepting moonlight nights, when th is in season," said his guest.

"Exceptis excipiendis," replied the he our old abbot taught me to say, when in laymen should ask me if I kept every p
mine order."

"True, holy father," said the knight;
devil is apt to keep an eye on such exce
goes about, thou knowest, like a roaring lio

"Let him roar here if he dares," said the touch of my cord will make him roar as lo tongs of St. Dunstan himself did. I ne man, and I as little fear the devil and his im
Dunstan, Saint Dubric, Saint Winibald, Sa
fred, Saint Swibert, Saint Willick, not Saint Thomas a Kent, and my own pat speed. I defy every devil of them, come ca tail.—But to let you into a secret, I never u
such subjects, my friend, until after morning

He changed the conversation; fast a grew the mirth of the parties, and many a exchanged betwixt them, when their revel terrupted by a loud knocking at the door mitage.

The occasion of this interruption we ca
plain by resuming the adventures of ano
our characters; for, like old Ariosto, we d ourselves upon continuing uniformly to pany with any one personage of our drama

CHAPTER XVIII.

Away! our journey lies through dell and dis
Where the blithe fawn trips by its timid mot
Where the broad oak, with intercepting boa
Chequers the sunbeam in the green-sward al
Up and away! for lovely paths are these
To tread, when the glad Sun is on his throne
Less pleasant, and less safe, when Cynthia's
With doubtful glimmer lights the dreary for Ent

When Cedric the Saxon saw his son senseless in the lists at Ashby, his first in to order him into the custody and care attendants, but the words chonked in his t
could not bring himself to acknowledge i
of such an assembly, the son whom he ha
and disinherited. He ordered, however, keep an eye upon him; and directed that o
two of his serfs, to convey Ivanhoe to Ash
as the crowd had dispersed. Oswald, ho anticipated in this good office. The crowd indeed, but the knight was nowhere to be

It was in vain that Cedric's cup-bearer loo
for his young master- he saw the bloo
which he had lately sunk down, but him
no longer; it seemed as if the fairies ha him from the spot. Perhaps Oswald (for were very superstitious) might have ad
such hypothesis, to account for Ivanhoe's
ance, had he not suddenly cast his eye up attired like a squire, in whom he recogni
tures of his fellow-servant Gurth. Anxio ing his master's fate, and in despair at his appearance, the translated swine-herd wa
for him every where, and had neglected,
the concealment on which his own safet
Oswald deemed it his duty to secure Gu
gitive of whose fate his master was to juc

Renewing his inquiries concerning Ivanhoe, the only information which the could collect from the bystanders was, tha
had been raised with care by certain grooms, and placed in a litter belonging
among the spectators, which had immedi

of the press. Oswald, on receiving
, resolved to return to his master for ions, carrying along with him Gurth, ered in some sort as a deserter from edric.

d been under very intense and ago-
sions concerning his son; for Nature
r rights, in spite of the patriotic stoipured to disown her. But no sooner
d that Ivanhoe was in careful, and idly hands, than the paternal anxiety
excited by the dubiety of his fate,
to the feeling of injured pride and what he termed Wilfred's filial disо-him wander his way," said he—"let rounds for whose sake he encountered tter to do the juggling tricks of the y that, to maintain the fame and hoglish ancestry with the glaive and good old weapons of his country."

ain the honour of ancestry," said
as present, "it is sufficient to be wise
brave in execution—to be bold st
, and gentlest among the gentle. I save his father's"— ady Rowena!—on this subject only I Prepare yourself for the Prince's festi-

en summoned thither with unwonted honour and of courtesy, such as the ns have rarely used to our race since Hastings. Thither will I go, were it ese proud Normans how little the fate
ould of their bravest, can affect a id Rowena, "do I now go; and I pray lest what you mean for courage and be accounted hardness of heart."

ome, then, ungrateful lady," answered
is the hard heart, which can sacrifice
ppressed people to an idle and unau-
ment. I seek the noble Athelstane, tend the banquet of John of Anjou."

ordingly to the banquet, of which we entioned the principal events. Immеtiring from the castle, the Saxon ir attendants, took horse; and it was e which attended their doing so, that irst time, cast his eyes upon the de-
The noble Saxon had returned from
we have seen, in no very placid hued but a pretext for wreaking his un-
one. "The gyves!" he said, "the —Hundibert!—Dogs and villains!—
e knave unfettered?"

ig to remonstrate, the companions of
m with a halter, as the readiest cord

He submitted to the operation with-
e, except that, darting a reproachful ster, he said, "This comes of loving ood better than mine own.
id forward!" said Cedric.
full time," said the noble Athelstane;
not the faster, the worthy Abbot Wal-tions for a rere-supper[1] will be alto-

s, however, used such speed as to nt of St. Withold's before the appreplace. The Abbot, himself of ancient received the noble Saxons with the uberant hospitality of their nation,
ndulged to a late, or rather an early
ey take leave of their reverend host ng until they had shared with him a tion.

ade left the court of the monastery,
oened somewhat alarming to the Sax-
people of Europe, were most addicted
s observance of omens, and to whose
e traced most of those notions upon till to be found among our popular
r the Normans being a mixed race,
and better informed according to the information of the times, had lost most of the superstitious prejudices which their ancestors had brought from Scandinavia, and piqued themselves upon thinking freely on such topics.

In the present instance, the apprehension of impending evil was inspired by no less respectable a prophet than a large lean black dog, which, sitting upright, howled most piteously as the foremost riders left the gate, and presently afterwards, barking wildly, and jumping to and fro, seemed bent upon attaching itself to the party.

"I like not that music, father Cedric," said Athelstane; for by this title of respect he was accustomed to address him.

"Nor I either, uncle," said Wamba; "I greatly fear we shall have to pay the piper."

"In my mind," said Athelstane, upon whose memory the Abbot's good ale (for Burton was already famous for that genial liquor) had made a favourable impression, "in my mind we had better turn back, and abide with the Abbot until the afternoon. It is unlucky to travel where your path is crossed by a monk, a hare, or a howling dog, until you have eaten your next meal."

"Away!" said Cedric, impatiently; "the day is already too short for our journey. For the dog, I know it to be the cur of the runaway slave Gurth, a useless fugitive like its master."

So saying, and rising at the same time in his stirrups, impatient at the interruption of his journey, he launched his javelin at poor Fangs—for Fangs it was, who, having traced his master thus far upon his stolen expedition had here lost him, and was now, in his uncouth way, rejoicing at his reappearance. The javelin inflicted a wound upon the animal's shoulder, and narrowly missed pinning him to the earth; and Fangs fled howling from the presence of the enraged thane. Gurth's heart swelled within him; for he felt this meditated slaughter of his faithful adherent in a degree much deeper than the harsh treatment he had himself received. Having in vain attempted to raise his hand to his eyes, he said to Wamba, who, seeing his master's ill humour, had prudently retreated to the rear, "I pray thee, do me the kindness to wipe my eyes with the skirt of thy mantle: the dust offends me, and these bonds will not let me help myself one way or another."

Wamba did him the service he required, and they rode side by side for some time, during which Gurth maintained a moody silence. At length he could repress his feelings no longer.

"Friend Wamba," said he, "of all these who are fools enough to serve Cedric, thou alone hast dexterity enough to make thy folly acceptable to him. Go to him, therefore, and tell him that neither for love nor fear will Gurth serve him longer. He may strike the head from me—he may scourge me—he may load me with irons—but henceforth he shall never compel me either to love or to obey him. Go to him, then, and tell him that Gurth the son of Beowulph renounces his service."

"Assuredly," said Wamba, "fool as I am, I shall not do your fool's errand. Cedric hath another javelin stuck in his girdle, and thou knowest he does not always miss his mark."

"I care not," replied Gurth, "how soon he makes a mark of me. Yesterday he left Wilfred, my young master, in his blood. To-day he has striven to kill before my face the only other living creature that ever showed me kindness. By St. Edmund, St. Dunstan, St. Withold, St. Edward the Confessor, and every other Saxon saint in the calendar," (for Cedric never swore by any that was not of Saxon lineage, and all his household had the same limited devotion,) "I will never forgive him!"

"To my thinking now," said the Jester, who was frequently wont to act as peace-maker in the family, "our master did not propose to hurt Fangs, but only to affright him. For, if you observed, he rose in his stirrups, as thereby meaning to overcast the mark; and so he would have done, but Fangs happening to bound up at the very moment, received a scratch, which I will be bound to heal with a penny's breadth of wax!"

[1] was a night-meal, and sometimes signified a as given at a late hour, after the regular sup- ppearance. L. T.

"If I thought so," said Gurth—"if I could but think so—but no—I saw the javelin was well aimed—I heard it whizz through the air with all the wrathful malevolence of him who cast it, and it quivered after it had pitched in the ground, as if with regret for having missed its mark. By the hog dear to St. Anthony, I renounce him!"

And the indignant swineherd resumed his sullen silence, which no efforts of the Jester could again induce him to break.

Mean while Cedric and Athelstane, the leaders of the troop, conversed together on the state of the land, on the dissensions of the royal family, on the feuds and quarrels among the Norman nobles, and on the chance which there was that the oppressed Saxons might be able to free themselves from the yoke of the Normans, or at least to elevate themselves into national consequence and independence, during the civil convulsions which were likely to ensue. On this subject Cedric was all animation. The restoration of the independence of his race was the idol of his heart, to which he had willingly sacrificed domestic happiness and the interests of his own son. But, in order to achieve this great revolution in favour of the native English, it was necessary that they should be united among themselves, and act under an acknowledged head. The necessity of choosing their chief from the Saxon blood-royal was not only evident in itself, but had been made a solemn condition by those whom Cedric had intrusted with his secret plans and hopes. Athelstane had this quality at least; and though he had few mental accomplishments or talents to recommend him as a leader, he had still a goodly person, was no coward, had been accustomed to martial exercises, and seemed willing to defer to the advice of counsellors more wise than himself. Above all, he was known to be liberal and hospitable, and believed to be good-natured. But whatever pretensions Athelstane had to be considered as head of the Saxon confederacy, many of that nation were disposed to prefer to his the title of the Lady Rowena, who drew her descent from Alfred, and whose father having been a chief renowned for wisdom, courage, and generosity, his memory was highly honoured by his oppressed contrymen.

It would have been no difficult thing for Cedric, had he been so disposed, to have placed himself at the head of a third party, as formidable at least as any of the others. To counterbalance their royal descent, he had courage, activity, energy, and above all, that devoted attachment to the cause which had procured him the epithet of THE SAXON, and his birth was inferior to none, excepting only that of Athelstane and his ward. These qualities, however, were unalloyed by the slightest shade of selfishness; and, instead of dividing yet farther his weakened nation by forming a faction of his own, it was a leading part of Cedric's plan to extinguish that which already existed by promoting a marriage betwixt Rowena and Athelstane. An obstacle occurred to this his favourite project, in the mutual attachment of his ward and his son; and hence the original cause of the banishment of Wilfred from the house of his father.

This stern measure Cedric had adopted, in hopes that, during Wilfred's absence, Rowena might relinquish her preference, but in this hope he was disappointed; a disappointment which might be attributed in part to the mode in which his ward had been educated. Cedric, to whom the name of Alfred was as that of a deity, had treated the sole remaining scion of that great monarch with a degree of observance, such as, perhaps, was in those days scarce paid to an acknowledged princess. Rowena's will had been in almost all cases a law to his household; and Cedric himself, as if determined that her sovereignty should be fully acknowledged within that little circle at least, seemed to take a pride in acting as the first of her subjects. Thus trained in the exercise not only of free will, but despotic authority, Rowena was, by her previous education, disposed both to resist and to resent any attempt to control her affections, or dispose of her hand contrary to her inclinations, and to assert her independence in a case in which even those females who have been trained up to ob subjection, are not infrequently apt to dis thority of guardians and parents. The op she felt strongly, she avowed boldly; who could not free himself from his ha erence to her opinions, felt totally at a enforce his authority of guardian.

It was in vain that he attempted to da the prospect of a visionary throne. R possessed strong sense, neither considere practicable, nor as desirable, so far as s cerned, could it have been achieved. tempting to conceal her avowed preferen of Ivanhoe, she declared that, were t knight out of question, she would rat finge in a convent, than share a throne stane, whom, living always despised, gan on account of the trouble she rec account, thoroughly to detest.

Nevertheless, Cedric, whose opinion constancy was far from strong, persist every means in his power to bring ab posed match, in which he conceived he w an important service to the Saxon caus den and romantic appearance of his son at Ashby, he had justly regarded as alm blow to his hopes. His paternal affecti had for an instant gained the victory ov patriotism; but both had returned in fu under their joint operation, he was no making a determined effort for the union and Rowena, together with expediting measures which seemed necessary to for toration of Saxon independence.

On this last subject, he was now lat Athelstane, not without having reason and then, to lament, like Hotspur, th have moved such a dish of skimmed mi nourishable an action. Athelstane, it is tr enough, and loved to have his ears tickl of his high descent, and of his right by i homage and sovereignty. But his petty va ficiently gratified by receiving this homage of his immediate attendants, and of the approached him. If he had the courage danger, he at least hated the trouble of it: and while he agreed in the general pr down by Cedric concerning the claim of to independence, and was still more easi of his own title to reign over them when t dence should be attained, yet when the s serting these rights came to be discussed "Athelstane the Unready," slow, irresolu tinating, and unenterprising. The warm sioned exhortations of Cedric had as littl his impassive temper, as red-hot balls the water, which produce a little sound and are instantly extinguished.

If, leaving this task, which might be spurring a tired jade, or to hammering up Cedric fell back to his ward Rowena, little more satisfaction from conferring wi as his presence interrupted the discourse lady and her favourite attendant upon t and fate of Wilfred. Elgitha failed not to her mistress and herself, by recurring to th of Athelstane in the lists, the most disas jest which could greet the ears of Ced sturdy Saxon, therefore, the day's journey with all manner of displeasure and dis that he more than once internally cursed ment, and him who had proclaimed it, to his own folly in ever thinking of going th

At noon, upon the motion of Athelstan lers paused in a woodland shade by a repose their horses and partake of some with which the hospitable Abbot had loa ter mule. Their repast was a pretty lon these several interruptions rendered it im them to hope to reach Rotherwood witho all night, a conviction which induced the on their way at a more hasty pace th hitherto used.

CHAPTER XIX.

A train of armed men, some noble dame
Escorting, (so their scatter'd words discover'd,
As unperceived I hung upon their rear,)
Are close at hand, and mean to pass the night
Within the castle.

Orra, a Tragedy.

THE travellers had now reached the verge of the ooded country, and were about to plunge into its cesses, held dangerous at that time from the numr of outlaws whom oppression and poverty had iven to despair, and who occupied the forests in ich large bands as could easily bid defiance to the eble police of the period. From these rovers, howrer, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, Cedc and Athelstane accounted themselves secure, as ey had in attendance ten servants, besides Wamba ad Gurth, whose aid could not be counted upon, the e being a jester and the other a captive. It may be lded, that in travelling thus late through the forest, edric and Athelstane relied on their descent and naracter, as well as their courage. The outlaws, hom the severity of the forest laws had reduced to ils roving and desperate mode of life, were chiefly easants and yeomen of Saxon descent, and were merally supposed to respect the persons and property their countrymen.

As the travellers journeyed on their way, they were armed by repeated cries for assistance; and when ey rode up to the place from whence they came, ey were surprised to find a horse-litter placed upon e ground, beside which sat a young woman, richly essed in the Jewish fashion, while an old man, hose yellow cap proclaimed him to belong to the me nation, walked up and down with gestures exessive of the deepest despair, and wrung his hands, if affected by some strange disaster.

To the inquiries of Athelstane and Cedric, the old w could for some time only answer by invoking the otection of all the patriarchs of the Old Testament cessively against the sons of Ishmael, who were eaing to smite them, hip and thigh, with the edge the sword. When he began to come to himself t of this agony of terror, Isaac of York (for it was r old friend) was at length able to explain, that he d hired a body-guard of six men at Ashby, together ith mules for carrying the litter of a sick friend. his party had undertaken to escort him as far as ncaster. They had come thus far in safety; but ving received information from a wood-cutter that ere was a strong band of outlaws lying in wait in e woods before them, Isaac's mercenaries had not nly taken flight, but had carried off with them the orses which bore the litter, and left the Jew and his aughter without the means either of defence or of treat, to be plundered, and probably murdered, by e banditti, who they expected every moment would ing down upon them. "Would it but please your lours," added Isaac, in a tone of deep humiliation, to permit the poor Jews to travel under your safeard, I swear by the tables of our law, that never s favour been conferred upon a child of Israel since e days of our captivity, which shall be more gratefly acknowledged."

"Dog of a Jew!" said Athelstane, whose memory as of that petty kind which stores up trifles of all inds, but particularly trifling offences, "dost not reember how thou didst beard us in the gallery at the k-yard? Fight or flee, or compound with the outrs as thou dost list, ask neither aid nor company om us; and if they rob only such as thee, who rob l the world, I, for mine own share, shall hold them ght honest folk."

Cedric did not assent to the severe proposal of his mpanion. "We shall do better," said he, "to leave em two of our attendants and two horses to convey em back to the next village. It will diminish our ength but little; and with your good sword, noble lstane, and the aid of those who remain, it will ght work for us to face twenty of those runa-s."

Rowena, somewhat alarmed by the mention of outw in force, and so near them, strongly seconded e proposal of her guardian. But Rebecca, suddenly quitting her dejected posture, and making her way through the attendants to the palfrey of the Saxon lady, knelt down, and, after the Oriental fashion in addressing superiors, kissed the hem of Rowena's garment. Then rising, and throwing back her veil, she implored her in the great name of the God whom they both worshipped, and by that revelation of the Law upon Mount Sinai, in which they both believed, that she would have compassion upon them, and suffer them to go forward under their safeguard. "It is not for myself that I pray this favour," said Rebecca; "nor is it even for that poor old man. I know, that to wrong and to spoil our nation is a light fault, if not a merit, with the Christians; and what is it to us whether it be done in the city, in the desert, or in the field? But it is in the name of one dear to many, and dear even to you, that I beseech you to let this sick person be transported with care and tenderness under your protection. For, if evil chance them, the last moment of your life would be imbittered with regret for denying that which I ask of you."

The noble and solemn air with which Rebecca made this appeal, gave it double weight with the fair Saxon.

"The man is old and feeble," she said to her guardian, "the maiden young and beautiful, their friend sick and in peril of his life—Jews though they be, we cannot as Christians leave them in this extremity. Let them unload two of the sumpter-mules, and put the baggage behind two of the serfs. The mules may transport the litter, and we have led horses for the old man and his daughter."

Cedric readily assented to what she proposed, and Athelstane only added the condition, "that they should travel in the rear of the whole party, where Wamba," he said, "might attend them with his shield of boar's brawn."

"I have left my shield in the tilt-yard," answered the Jester, "as has been the fate of many a better knight than myself."

Athelstane coloured deeply, for such had been his own fate on the last day of the tournament; while Rowena, who was pleased in the same proportion, as if to make amends for the brutal jest of her unfeeling suitor, requested Rebecca to ride by her side.

"It were not fit I should do so," answered Rebecca, with proud humility, "where my society might be held a disgrace to my protectress."

By this time the change of baggage was hastily achieved; for the single word "outlaws" rendered every one sufficiently alert, and the approach of twilight made the sound yet more impressive. Amid the bustle, Gurth was taken from horseback, in the course of which removal he prevailed upon the Jester to slack the cord with which his arms were bound. It was so negligently refastened, perhaps intentionally, on the part of Wamba, that Gurth found no difficulty in freeing his arms altogether from bondage, and then, gliding into the thicket, he made his escape from the party.

The bustle had been considerable, and it was some time before Gurth was missed; for, as he was to be placed for the rest of the journey behind a servant, every one supposed that some other of his companions had him under his custody, and when it began to be whispered among them that Gurth had actually disappeared, they were under such immediate expectation of an attack from the outlaws, that it was not held convenient to pay much attention to the circumstance.

The path upon which the party travelled was now so narrow, as not to admit, with any sort of convenience, above two riders abreast, and began to descend into a dingle, traversed by a brook whose banks were broken, swampy, and overgrown with dwarf willows. Cedric and Athelstane, who were at the head of their retinue, saw the risk of being attacked at this pass; but neither of them having had much practice in war, no better mode of preventing the danger occurred to them than that they should hasten through the defile as fast as possible. Advancing, therefore, without much order, they had just crossed the brook with a part of their follo were, when they were assailed in front, flank, and rear at once, with an impetuosity to which, in their confused and ill-prepared condition, it was impossible to offer effectual resistance. The shout of "A white dragon!—a white dragon!—Saint George for merry England!" war-cries adopted by the assailants, as belonging to their assumed character of Saxon outlaws, was heard on every side, and on every side enemies appeared with a rapidity of advance and attack which seemed to multiply their numbers.

Both the Saxon chiefs were made prisoners at the same moment, and each under circumstances expressive of his character. Cedric, the instant that an enemy appeared, launched at him his remaining javelin, which, taking better effect than that which he had hurled at Fangs, nailed the man against an oak-tree that happened to be close behind him. Thus far successful, Cedric spurred his horse against a second, drawing his sword at the same time, and striking with such inconsiderate fury, that his weapon encountered a thick branch which hung over him, and he was disarmed by the force of his own blow. He was instantly made prisoner, and pulled from his horse by two or three of the banditti who crowded around him. Athelstane shared his captivity, his bridle having been seized, and he himself forcibly dismounted, long before he could draw his weapon, or assume any posture of effectual defence.

The attendants, embarrassed with baggage, surprised and terrified at the fate of their masters, fell an easy prey to the assailants; while the Lady Rowena, in the centre of the cavalcade, and the Jew and his daughter in the rear, experienced the same misfortune.

Of all the train none escaped except Wamba, who showed upon the occasion much more courage than those who pretended to greater sense. He possessed himself of a sword belonging to one of the domestics, who was just drawing it with a furdy and irresolute hand, laid it about him like a lion, drove back several who approached him, and made a brave though ineffectual attempt to succour his master. Finding himself overpowered, the Jester at length threw himself from his horse, plunged into the thicket, and favoured by the general confusion, escaped from the scene of action.

Yet the valiant Jester, as soon as he found himself safe, hesitated more than once whether he should not turn back and share the captivity of a master to whom he was sincerely attached.

"I have heard men talk of the blessings of freedom," he said to himself, "but I wish any wise man would teach me what use to make of it now that I have it."

As he pronounced these words aloud, a voice very near him called out in a low and cautious tone, "Wamba!" and, at the same time, a dog, which he recognised to be Fangs, jumped up and fawned upon him. "Gurth!" answered Wamba, with the same caution, and the swineherd immediately stood before him.

"What is the matter?" said he eagerly; "what mean these cries, and that clashing of swords?"

"Only a trick of the times," said Wamba; "they are all prisoners."

"Who are prisoners?" exclaimed Gurth, impatiently.

"My lord, and my lady, and Athelstane, and Hundibert, and Oswald."

"In the name of God!" said Gurth, "how came they prisoners?—and to whom?"

"Our master was too ready to fight," said the Jester; "and Athelstane was not ready enough, and no other person was ready at all. And they are prisoners to green cassocks, and black visors. And they lie all tumbled about on the green, like the crab-apples that you shake down to your swine. And I would laugh at it," said the honest Jester, "if I could for weeping." And he shed tears of unfeigned sorrow.

Gurth's countenance kindled—"Wamba," he said, "thou hast a weapon, and thy heart was ever stronger than thy brain—we are only two—but a sudden attack from men of resolution will do much—follow me!"

"Whither?—and for what purpose?" said the Jester

"To rescue Cedric."

"But you have renounced his service but now," said Wamba.

"That," said Gurth, "was but while he was fortunate—follow me!"

As the Jester was about to obey, a third person suddenly made his appearance, and commanded them both to halt. From his dress and arms, Wamba would have conjectured him to be one of those outlaws who had just assailed his master; but, besides that he wore no mask, the glittering baldric across his shoulder, with the rich bugle-horn which it supported, as well as the calm and commanding expression of his voice and manner, made him, not withstanding the twilight, recognise Locksley the yeoman, who had been victorious, under such disadvantageous circumstances, in the contest for the prize of archery.

"What is the meaning of all this," said he, "or who is it that rifle, and ransom, and make prisoners, in these forests?"

"You may look at their cassocks close by," said Wamba, "and see whether they be thy children's coats or no—for they are as like thine own, as one green pea-cod is to another."

"I will learn that presently," answered Locksley; "and I charge ye, on peril of your lives, not to stir from the place where ye stand, until I have returned. Obey me, and it shall be the better for you and your masters.—Yet stay, I must render myself as like these men as possible."

So saying, he unbuckled his baldric with the bugle, took a feather from his cap, and gave them to Wamba; then drew a vizard from his pouch, and, repeating his charges to them to stand fast, went to execute his purposes of reconnoitring.

"Shall we stand fast, Gurth?" said Wamba; "or shall we e'en give him leg-bail? In my foolish mind he had all the equipage of a thief too much in readiness, to be himself a true man."

"Let him be the devil," said Gurth, "an he will. We can be no worse of waiting his return. If he belong to that party, he must already have given the alarm, and it will avail nothing either to fight or fly. Besides, I have late experience, that arrant thieves are not the worst men in the world to have to deal with."

The yeoman returned in the course of a few minutes. "Friend Gurth," he said, "I have mingled among yon men, and have learnt to whom they belong, and whither they are bound. There is, I think, no cause that they will proceed to any actual violence against their prisoners. For three men to attempt them at this moment, were little else than madness; for they are good men of war, and have, as such, placed sentinels to give the alarm when any one approaches. But I trust soon to gather such a force, as may act in defiance of all their precautions; you are both servants, and, as I think, faithful servants, of Cedric, the Saxon, the friend of the rights of Englishmen. He shall not want English hands to help him in the extremity. Come then with me, until I gather more aid."

So saying, he walked through the wood at a quick pace, followed by the jester and the swine-herd. It was not consistent with Wamba's humour to travel long in silence.

"I think," said he, looking at the baldric and bugle which he still carried, "that I saw the arrow that won which won this gay prize, and that not so long since as Christmas."

"And I," said Gurth, "could take it on my conscience, that I have heard the voice of the good yeoman who won it, by night as well as by day, and that the moon is not three days older since I did so."

"Mine honest friends," replied the yeoman, "whether I am, or what I am, is little to the present purpose; all that I free your master, you will have reason to think the best friend you have ever had in your lives. Enough whether I am known by one name or another—enough whether I can draw a bow as well or better than a cow-keeper, or whether it is my pleasure to walk in sunshine or by moonlight, are matters which, as I said, do not concern you, so neither need ye busy yourselves respecting them."

eads are in the lion's mouth," said Wamba, per to Gurth, "get them out how we can." —be silent," said Gurth. "Offend him not ly, and I trust sincerely that all will go well."

CHAPTER XX.

hen autumn nights were long and drear,
And forest walks were dark and dim,
w sweetly on the pilgrim's ear
Was wont to steal the hermit's hymn!
votion borrows Music's tone,
And Music took Devotion's wing;
d, like the bird it hails the sun,
They soar to heaven, and soaring sing.
The Hermit of St. Clement's Well.

s after three hours' good walking that the of Cedric, with their mysterious guide, ar- small opening in the forest, in the centre of rew an oak-tree of enormous magnitude, ; its twisted branches in every direction. this tree four or five yeomen lay stretched ound, while another, as sentinel, walked to n the moonlight shade.

hearing the sound of feet approaching, the stantly gave the alarm, and the shapers as started up and bent their bows. Six arrows n the string were pointed towards the quar- which the travellers approached, when their ing recognised, was welcomed with every respect and attachment and all signs and rough reception at once subsided.

re is the Miller?" was his first question.

he road towards Rotherham."

h how many?" demanded the leader, for such d to be.

six men, and good hope of booty, if it please ndas."

ardly spoken," said Locksley; "and where is Dale?"

ed up towards the Watling-street, to watch rior of Jorvaulx."

is well thought on also," replied the Cap- and where is the Friar?"

s cell."

ver will I go," said Locksley. "Disperse and r companions. Collect what force you can, s game afoot that must be hunted hard, and t to bay. Meet me here by daybreak.—And, e added, "I have forgotten what is most y of the whole. Two of you take the road ioward's Torquilstone, the Castle of Front- . A set of gallants, who have been mas- g in such guise as our own, are carrying a prisoners thither. Watch them closely, for hey reach the castle before we collect our r honour is concerned to punish them, and ind means to do so. Keep a close watch on refore; and dispatch one of your comrades, est of foot, to bring the news of the yeomen ut."

promised implicit obedience, and departed erity on their different errands. In the ader, their leader and his two companions, y looked upon him with great respect, as some fear, pursued their way to the Chapel nhurst.

they had reached the little moonlight glade, from the reverend, though ruinous chapel. ude hermitage, so well suited to ascetic de- Wamba whispered to Gurth, "If this be the n of a thief, it makes good the old proverb, er the church the farther from God.—And ck seconds," he added, "I think it be even so n but to the black sanctus which they are the hermitage!"

the anchorite and his guest were perform- full extent of their very powerful lungs, an ng song, of which this was the burden:—

ho, trowl the brown bowl to me,
ally boy, bully boy,
o, trowl the brown bowl to me;
's jolly Jenkin, I spy a knave in drinking,
o, trowl the brown bowl to me."

hat is not ill sung," said Wamba, who had thrown in a few of his own flourishes to help out the chorus. "But who, in the saint's name, ever expected to have heard such a jolly chant come from out a hermit's cell at midnight!"

"Marry, that should I," said Gurth, "for the jolly Clerk of Copmanhurst is a known man, and kills half the deer that are stolen in this walk. Men say that the keeper has complained to his official, and that he will be stripped of his cowl and cope altogether, if he keep not better order."

While they were thus speaking, Locksley's loud and repeated knocks had at length disturbed the anchorite and his guest. "By my beads," said the hermit, stopping short in a grand flourish, "here come more benighted guests. I would not for my cowl that they found us in this goodly exercise. All men have their enemies, good Sir Sluggard; and there be those malignant enough to construe the hospitable refreshment which I have been offering to you, a weary traveller, for the matter of three short hours, into sheer drunkenness and debauchery, vices alike alien to my profession and my disposition."

"Base calumniators!" replied the knight; "I would I had the chastising of them. Nevertheless, Holy Clerk, it is true that all have their enemies; and there be those in this very land whom I would rather speak to through the bars of my helmet than bare-faced."

"Get thine iron pot on thy head then, friend Sluggard, as quickly as thy nature will permit," said the hermit, "while I remove these pewter flagons, whose late contents run strangely in mine own pate; and to drown the clatter—for, in faith, I feel somewhat unsteady—strike into the tune which thou hearest me sing; it is no matter for the words—I scarce know them myself."

So saying, he struck up a thundering De profundis clamavi, under cover of which he removed the apparatus of their banquet; while the knight, laughing heartily, and arming himself all the while, assisted his host with his voice from time to time as his mirth permitted.

"What devil's matins are you after at this hour?" said a voice from without.

"Heaven forgive you, Sir Traveller!" said the hermit, whose own noise, and perhaps his nocturnal potations, prevented him from recognising accents which were tolerable familiar to him—"Wend on your way, in the name of God and Saint Dunstan, and disturb not the devotions of me and my holy brother."

"Mad priest," answered the voice from without, "open to Locksley!"

"All's safe—all's right," said the hermit to his companion.

"But who is he?" said the Black Knight; "it imports me much to know."

"Who is he?" answered the hermit; "I tell thee he is a friend."

"But what friend?" answered the knight; "for he may be friend to thee and none of mine?"

"What friend?" replied the hermit; "that, now, is one of the questions that is more easily asked than answered. What friend?—why, he is, now that I bethink me a little, the very same honest keeper I told thee of a while since."

"Ay, as honest a keeper as thou art a pious hermit," replied the knight, "I doubt it not. But undo the door to him before he beat it from its hinges."

The dogs, in the mean time, which had made a dreadful baying at the commencement of the disturbance, seemed now to recognise the voice of him who stood without; for totally changing their manner, they scratched and whined at the door, as if interceding for his admission. The hermit speedily unbolted his portal, and admitted Locksley, with his two companions.

"Why, hermit," was the yeoman's first question as soon as he beheld the knight, "what boon companion hast thou here?"

"A brother of our order," replied the friar, shaking his head; "we have been at our orisons all night."

"He is a monk of the church militant, I think,' answered Locksley; "and there be more of them abroad. I tell thee, friar, thou must lay down the rosary and take up the quarter-staff; we shall see every one of our merry men, whether clerk or layman.—But," he added, taking him a step aside, "art thou mad? to give admittance to a knight thou dost not know? Hast thou forgot our articles?"

"Not know him!" replied the friar, boldly, "I know him as well as the beggar knows his dish."

"And what is his name, then?" demanded Locksley.

"His name," said the hermit—"his name is Sir Anthony of Scrabelstone—as if I would drink with a man, and did not know his name!"

"Thou hast been drinking more than enough, friar," said the woodsman, "and I fear, prating more than enough too."

"Good yeoman," said the knight, coming forward, "be not wroth with my merry host. He did but afford me the hospitality which I would have compelled from him if he had refused it."

"Thou compel!" said the friar; "wait but till I have changed this gray gown for a green cassock, and if I make not a quarter-staff ring twelve upon thy pate, I am neither true clerk nor good woodsman."

While he spoke thus, he stript off his gown, and appeared in a close black buckram doublet and drawers, over which he speedily did on a cassock of green, and hose of the same colour. "I pray thee truss my points," said he to Wamba, "and thou shalt have a cup of sack for thy labour."

"Gramercy for thy sack," said Wamba; "but think'st thou it is lawful for me to aid you to transmew thyself from a holy hermit into a sinful forester?"

"Never fear," said the hermit; "I will but confess the sins of my green cloak to my grayfriar's frock, and all shall be well again."

"Amen!" answered the Jester; "a broadcloth penitent should have a sackcloth confessor, and your frock may absolve my motley doublet into the bargain."

So saying, he accommodated the friar with his assistance in tying the endless number of points, as the laces which attached the hose to the doublet were then termed.

While they were thus employed, Locksley led the knight a little apart, and addressed him thus:—"Deny it not, Sir Knight—you are he who decided the victory to the advantage of the English against the strangers on the second day of the tournament at Ashby."

"And what follows if you guess truly, good yeoman?" replied the knight.

"I should in that case hold you," replied the yeoman, "a friend to the weaker party."

"Such is the duty of a true knight at least," replied the Black Champion; "and I would not willingly that there were reason to think otherwise of me."

"But for my purpose," said the yeoman, "thou shouldst be as well a good Englishman as a good knight; for that, which I have to speak of, concerns, indeed, the duty of every honest man, but is more especially that of a true-born native of England."

"You can speak to no one," replied the knight, "to whom England, and the life of every Englishman, can be dearer than to me."

"I would willingly believe so," said the woodsman, "for never had this country such need to be supported by those who love her. Hear me, and I will tell thee of an enterprise, in which, if thou be'st really that which thou seemest, thou mayst take an honourable part. A band of villains, in the disguise of better men than themselves, have made themselves master of the person of a noble Englishman, called Cedric the Saxon, together with his ward, and his friend Athelstane of Coningsburgh, and have transported them to a castle in this forest, called Torquilstone. I ask of thee, as a good knight and a good Englishman, wilt thou aid in their rescue?"

"I am bound by my vow to do so," replied the knight; "but I would willingly know who you are, who request my assistance in their behalf?"

"I am," said the forester, "a nameless man; but I am the friend of my country, and of my country's friends—With this account of me you must for the present remain satisfied, the more especially since you yourself desire to continue unknown. Believe, however, that my word, when pledged, is as inviolate as if I wore golden spurs."

"I willingly believe it," said the knight; "I have been accustomed to study men's countenances, and I can read in thine honesty and resolution. I will, therefore, ask thee no further questions, but aid thee in setting at freedom these oppressed captives; which done, I trust we shall part better acquainted, and well satisfied with each other."

"So," said Wamba to Gurth,—for the friar being now fully equipped, the Jester, having approached to the other side of the hut, had heard the conclusion of the conversation,—"So we have got a new ally?—I trust the valour of the knight will be truer metal than the religion of the hermit, or the honesty of the yeoman; for this Locksley looks like a born deer-stealer, and the priest like a lusty hypocrite."

"Hold thy peace, Wamba," said Gurth; "it may all be as thou dost guess; but were the horned devil to rise and proffer me his assistance to set at liberty Cedric and the Lady Rowena, I fear I should hardly have religion enough to refuse the foul fiend's offer, and bid him get behind me."

The friar was now completely accoutred as a yeoman, with sword and buckler, bow, and quiver, and a strong partisan over his shoulder. He left his cell at the head of the party, and, having carefully locked the door, deposited the key under the threshold.

"Art thou in condition to do good service, friar," said Locksley, "or does the brown bowl still run in thy head?"

"Not more than a draught of St. Dunstan's fountain will allay," answered the priest; "something there is of a whizzing in my brain, and of instability in my legs, but you shall presently see both pass away."

So saying, he stepped to the stone basin, in which the waters of the fountain as they fell formed bubbles which danced in the white moonlight, and took as long a draught as if he had meant to exhaust the spring.

"When didst thou drink as deep a draught of water before, Holy Clerk of Copmanhurst?" said the Black Knight.

"Never since my wine-but leaked, and let out its liquor by an illegal vent," replied the friar, "and so left me nothing to drink but my patron's bounty here."

Then plunging his hands and head into the fountain, he washed from them all marks of the midnight revel.

Thus refreshed and sobered, the jolly priest twirled his heavy partisan round his head with three fingers, as if he had been balancing a reed, exclaiming at the same time, "Where be those false ravishers, who carry off wenches against their will? May the foul fiend fly off with me, if I am not man enough for a dozen of them."

"Swearest thou, Holy Clerk?" said the Black Knight.

"Clerk me no Clerks," replied the transformed priest; "by Saint George and the Dragon, I am no longer a shaveling than while my frock is on my back—When I am cased in my green cassock, I will drink, swear, and woo a lass, with any blithe forester in the West Riding."

"Come on, Jack Priest," said Locksley, "and be silent; thou art as noisy as a whole convent on a holy eve, when the Father Abbot has gone to bed.—Come on, come on, you, too, my masters, tarry not to talk of it—I say come on, we must collect all our forces, and fast enough we shall have, if we are to storm the Castle of Reginald Front-de-Bœuf."

"What! is it Front-de-Bœuf," said the Black Knight, "who has stopt on the king's highway the king's liege subjects?—Is he turned thief and oppressor?"

"Oppressor he ever was," said Locksley.

"And for thief," said the priest, "I doubt if ever there were even half so honest a man as many a thief of my acquaintance."

"Move on, priest, and be silent," said the yeoman; "it were better you led the way to the place of rendezvous, than say what should be left unsaid, both in decency and prudence."

CHAPTER XXI.

w many hours and years have past,
man forms have round this table sate,
or taper, on it's surface gleam'd!
e. I hear the sound of time long pass'd murmuring o'er us, in the lofty void
dark arches, like the hug'ring voices
who long within their graves have slept.
Orra, a Tragedy.

these measures were taking in behalf of his companions, the armed men by whom had been seized, hurried their captives ards the place of security, where they inimprison them. But darkness came on the paths of the wood seemed but imperwn to the marauders. They were comake several long halts, and once or twice to their road to resume the direction which d to pursue. The summer morn had dawned ere they could travel in full assurance that the right path. But confidence returned and the cavalcade now moved rapidly for-ard, while, the following dialogue took place
te two leaders of the banditti.
me thou shouldst leave us, Sir Maurice," emplar to De Bracy, "in order to prepare part of thy mystery. Thou art next, thou o act the Knight Deliverer."
thought better of it," said De Bracy; "I ave thee till the prize is fairly deposited in Bœuf's castle. There will I appear before Rowena in mine own shape, and trust that t down to the vehemence of my passion the f which I have been guilty."
what has made thee change thy plan, De replied the Knight Templar.
concerns thee nothing," answered his com-

d hope, however, Sir Knight," said the
"that this alteration of measures arises uspicion of my honourable meaning, such endeavoured to instil into thee?"
ughts are my own," answered De Bracy;
l laughs, they say, when one thief robs
and we know, that were he to spit fire and instead, it would never prevent a Templar ving his bent."
leader of a Free Company," answered the
'from dreading at the hands of a comrade
, the injustice he does to all mankind."
unprofitable and perilous recrimination," De Bracy; "suffice it to say, I know the
the Temple-Order, and I will not give thee of cheating me out of the fair prey for ave run such risks."
;" replied the Templar, "what hast thou to ou knowest the vows of our order."
well," said De Bracy, "and also how they Come, Sir Templar, the laws of gallantry eral interpretation in Palestine, and this is which I will trust nothing to your con-

he truth, then," said the Templar; "I care ar blue-eyed beauty. There is in that train vill make me a better mate."
I wouldst thou stoop to the waiting dam-De Bracy.
ir Knight," said the Templar, haughtily.
raiting-woman will I not stoop. I have a ng the captives as lovely as thine own."
e mass, thou meanest the fair Jewess!"
racy.
I do," said Bois-Guilbert, "who shall gain-

e that I know," said De Bracy, "unless it
w of celibacy, or a check of conscience for e with a Jewess."
ly vow," said the Templar, "our Grand ith granted me a dispensation. And for ence, a man that has slain three hundred need not reckon up every little failing, like girl at her first confession upon Good Fri-

knowest best thine own privileges," said
"Yet, I would have sworn thy thought had been more on the old usurer's money bags, than on the black eyes of the daughter."

"I can admire both," answered the Templar; "besides, the old Jew is but half-prize. I must share his spoils with Front-de-Bœuf, who will not lend us the use of his castle for nothing. I must have something that I can term exclusively my own by this foray of ours, and I have fixed on the lovely Jewess as my peculiar prize. But, now thou knowest my drift, thou wilt resume thine own original plan, wilt thou not?—Thou hast nothing, thou seest, to fear from my interference."

"No," replied De Bracy, "I will remain beside my prize. What thou sayst is passing true, but I like not the privileges acquired by the dispensation of the Grand Master, and the merit acquired by the slaughter of three hundred Saracens. You have too good a right to a free pardon, to render you very scrupulous about peccadilloes."

While this dialogue was proceeding, Cedric was endeavouring to wring out of those who guarded him an avowal of their character and purpose. "You should be Englishmen," said he; "and yet, sacred Heaven! you prey upon your countrymen as if you were very Normans. You should be my neighbours, and, if so, my friends; for which of my English neighbours have reason to be otherwise? I tell ye, yeomen, that even those among ye who have been branded with outlawry have had from me protection; for I have pitied their miseries, and cursed the oppression of their tyrannic nobles. What, then, would you have of me? or in what can this violence serve ye?—Ye are worse than brute beasts in your actions, and will you imitate them in their very dumbness?"

It was in vain that Cedric expostulated with his guards, who had too many good reasons for their silence to be induced to break it either by his wrath or his expostulations. They continued to hurry him along, travelling at a very rapid rate, until, at the end of an avenue of huge trees, arose Torquilstone, now the hoary and ancient castle of Reginald Front-de-Bœuf. It was a fortress of no great size, consisting of a donjon, or large and high square tower, surrounded by buildings of inferior height, which were encircled by an inner court-yard. Around the exterior of the wall was a deep moat, supplied with water from a neighbouring rivulet. Front-de-Bœuf, whose character placed him often at feud with his enemies, had made considerable additions to the strength of his castle, by building towers upon the outward wall, so as to flank it at every angle. The access, as usual in castles of the period, lay through an arched barbican, or outwork, which was terminated and defended by a small turret at each corner.

Cedric no sooner saw the turrets of Front-de-Bœuf's castle raise their gray and moss-grown battlements, glimmering in the morning sun above the wood by which they were surrounded, than he instantly augured more truly concerning the cause of his misfortune.

"I did injustice," he said, "to the thieves and outlaws of these woods, when I supposed such banditti to belong to their bands; I might as justly have confounded the foxes of these brakes with the ravening wolves of France. Tell me, ye dogs—is it my life or my wealth that your master aims at? Is it too much that two Saxons, myself, and the noble Athelstane, should hold land in the country which was once the patrimony of our race?—Put us then to death, and complete your tyranny by taking our lives, as you began with our liberties. If the Saxon Cedric cannot rescue England, he is willing to die for her. Tell your tyrannical master, I do only beseech him to dismiss the Lady Rowena in honour and safety. She is a woman, and he need not dread her; and with us will die all who dare fight in her cause."

The attendants remained as mute to this address as to the former, and they now stood before the gate of the castle. De Bracy winded his horn three times, and the archers and cross-bow men, who had manned the wall upon seeing their approach, hastened to lower the drawbridge, and admit them. The prisoners were compelled by their guards to alight, and were conducted to an apartment where a hasty repast was offered them, of which none but Athelstane fel any inclination to partake. Neither had the descendant of the Confessor much time to do justice to the good cheer placed before them, for their guards gave him and Cedric to understand that they were to be imprisoned in a chamber apart from Rowena. Resistance was vain; and they were compelled to follow to a large room, which rising on clumsy Saxon pillars, resembled those refectories and chapter-houses which may be still seen in the most ancient parts of our most ancient monasteries.

The Lady Rowena was next separated from her train, and conducted, with courtesy, indeed, but still without consulting her inclination, to a distant apartment. The same alarming distinction was conferred on Rebecca, in spite of her father's entreaties, who offered even money, in this extremity of distress, that she might be permitted to abide with him. "Base unbeliever," answered one of his guards, "when thou hast seen thy kin, thou wilt not wish thy daughter to partake it." And, without farther discussion, the old Jew was forcibly dragged off in a different direction from the other prisoners. The domestics, after being carefully searched and disarmed, were confined in another part of the castle; and Rowena was refused even the comfort she might have derived from the attendance of her handmaiden Elgitha.

The apartment in which the Saxon chiefs were confined, for to them we turn our first attention, although at present used as a sort of guard-room, had formerly been the great hall of the castle. It was now abandoned to meaner purposes, because the present lord, among other additions to the convenience, security, and beauty of his baronial residence, had erected a new and noble hall, whose vaulted roof was supported by lighter and more elegant pillars, and fitted up with that higher degree of ornament, which the Normans had already introduced into architecture.

Cedric paced the apartment, filled with indignant reflections on the past and on the present, while the apathy of his companion served, instead of patience and philosophy, to defend him against every thing save the inconvenience of the present moment; and so little did he feel even this last, that he was only from time to time roused to a reply by Cedric's animated and impassioned appeal to him.

"Yes," said Cedric, half speaking to himself, and half addressing himself to Athelstane, "it was in this very hall that my father feasted with Torquil Wolfganger, when he entertained the valiant and unfortunate Harold, then advancing against the Norwegians, who had united themselves to the rebel Tosti. It was in this hall that Harold returned the magnanimous answer to the ambassador of his rebel brother. Oft have I heard my father kindle as he told the tale. The envoy of Tosti was admitted, when this ample room could scarce contain the crowd of noble Saxon lenders, who were quaffing the blood-red wine around their monarch."

"I hope," said Athelstane, somewhat moved by this part of his friend's discourse, "they will not forget to send us some wine and refections at noon—we had scarce a breathing-space allowed to break our fast, and I never have the benefit of my food when I eat immediately after dismounting from horseback, though the leeches recommend that practice."

Cedric went on with his story without noticing this interjectional observation of his friend.

"The envoy of Tosti," he said, "moved up the hall, undismayed by the frowning countenances of all around him, until he made his obeisance before the throne of King Harold.

'What terms,' he said, 'Lord King, hath thy brother Tosti to hope, if he should lay down his arms, and crave peace at thy hands?'

'A brother's love,' cried the generous Harold, 'and the fair earldom of Northumberland.'

'But should Tosti accept these terms,' continued the envoy, 'what lands shall be assigned to his faithful ally, Hardrada, King of Norway?'

'Seven feet of English ground,' answered Harold, fiercely, 'or, as Hardrada is said to be a giant, perhaps we may allow him twelve inches more.'

"The hall rung with acclamations, and c horn was filled to the Norwegian, who sh
speedily in possession of his English territory.

"I could have pledged him with all my so Athelstane, "for my tongue cleaves to my pa

"The baffled envoy," continued Cedric, p
with animation his tale, though it interested listener, "retreated, to carry to Tosti and his ominous answer of his injured brother. It w that the distant towers of York, and the bloody of the Derwent,* beheld that direful conflict, n
after displaying the most undaunted valour, t
of Norway, and Tosti, both fell, with ten thou their bravest followers. Who would have that upon the proud day when this battle w
the very gale which waved the Saxon banner
umph, was filling the Norman sails, and in them to the fatal shores of Sussex!- Who have thought that Harold, within a few bri
would himself possess no more of his kingdo
the share which he allotted in his wrath to t wegian invader? Who would have thought t noble Athelstane—that you, descended of I blood, and that I, whose father was not th
defender of the Saxon crown, should be prise
a vile Norman, in the very hall in which our tors held such high festival?"

"It is sad enough," replied Athelstane;
trust they will hold us to a moderate ransom—
rate it cannot be their purpose to starve us o
and yet, although it is high noon, I see no tions for serving dinner. Look up at the v noble Cedric, and judge by the sunbeams if
on the verge of noon."

"It may be so," answered Cedric; "but I look on that stained lattice without its aw
other reflections than those which concern th ing moment, or its privations. When that was wrought, my noble friend, our hardy
knew not the art of making glass, or of stai
The pride of Wolfganger's father brought a from Normandy to adorn his hall with this r
cies of emblazonment, that breaks the gold
of God's blessed day into so many fantas
The foreigner came here poor, beggarly,
and subservient, ready to doff his cap to the native of the household. He returned pamp proud, to tell his rapacious countrymen of th
and the simplicity of the Saxon nobles—a Athelstane, foreboded of old, as well as fore
those descendants of Hengist and his hard who retained the simplicity of their manne
made these strangers our bosom friends, o dential servants; we borrowed their artists a arts, and despised the honest simplicity an hood with which our brave ancestors supporte
selves, and we became enervated by Norm long ere we fell under Norman arms. Far be our homely diet, eaten in peace and liberty,

* A great topographical blunder occurred here in fo
tions. The bloody battle alluded to in the text, f won by King Harold, over his brother the rebellious
an auxiliary force of Danes, or Norsemen, was said n
and a corresponding note, to have taken place at Sta Leicestershire, and upon the river Welland. This is into which the author has been led by trusting to hi
and so confounding two places of the same name.
ford, Stanigfield, or Stanford, at which the battle fought, is a ford upon the river Derwent, at the d about seven miles from York, and situated in that opulent county. A long wooden bridge over the Der sit of which with one remaining buttress, is still sh curious traveller, was furiously contested. One N long defended it by his single arm, and was at leng
with a spear thrust through the planks of the bridge fr beneath.

The neighbourhood of Stamford, on the Derwent
some memorials of the battle. Horseshoes, sword heads of halberds, or bills, are often found there; or called the "Danes' Well," another the "Battle flats tradition that the weapon with which the Norwegian was slain, resembled a pear, or as others say, that t or boat in which the soldier floated under the bridge
the blow, had such a shape, the country people usual great market, which is held at Stamford, with an ante called the Pear-pie feast, which after all may be a of the Spear-pie feast. For more particulars, Drake of York may be referred to. The author's mistake w out to him, in the most obliging manner, by Robert of Bosal House. The battle was fought in 1066.

luxurious dainties, the love of which hath delivered us a bondsmen to the foreign conqueror!"

"I should," replied Athelstane, "hold very humble diet a luxury at present; and it astonishes me, noble Cedric, that you can bear so truly in mind the memory of past needs, when it appeareth you forget the very sour of dinner."

"It is time lost," muttered Cedric apart and impatiently, "to speak to him of aught else but that which concerns his appetite! The soul of Hardicanute hath taken possession of him, and he hath no pleasure save to fill, to swill, and to cram for more. Alas!" said he, looking at Athelstane with compassion, "that so dull a spirit should be lodged in so goodly a form! Alas! that such an enterprise as the regeneration of England should turn on a hinge so imperfect! Wedded to Rowena, indeed, is a nobler and more generous soul may yet awake the better nature which is torpid within him. Yet how should this be, while Rowena, Athelstane, and I myself, remain the prisoners of this brutal marauder, and have been made so perhaps from a sense of the dangers which our liberty might bring to the usurped power of this nation?"

While the Saxon was plunged in these painful reflections, the door of their prison opened, and gave entrance to a sewer, holding his white rod of office. This important person advanced into the chamber with a grave pace, followed by four attendants, bearing in a table cover with dishes, the sight and smell of which seemed to be an instant compensation to Athelstane for all the inconvenience he had undergone. The persons who attended on the feasts were masked and cloaked.

"What mummery is this?" said Cedric; "think you that we are ignorant whose prisoners we are, when we are in the castle of your master? Tell him," he continued, willing to use this opportunity to open a negotiation for his freedom, "Tell your master, Reginald Front-de-Boeuf, that we know no reason he can have for withholding our liberty, excepting his unawful desire to enrich himself at our expense. Tell him that we yield to his rapacity, as in similar circumstances we should do to that of a literal robber. Let him name the ransom at which he rates our liberty, and it shall be paid, providing the exaction is united to our means."

The sewer made no answer, but bowed his head.

"And tell Sir Reginald Front-de-Boeuf," said Athelstane, "that I send him my mortal defiance, and challenge him to combat with me, on foot or horseback, at any secure place, within eight days after our liberation; which, if he be a true knight, he will not, under these circumstances, venture to refuse or to delay."

"I shall deliver to the knight your defiance," answered the sewer; "mean while I leave you to your food."

The challenge of Athelstane was received with no good grace; for a large mouthful, which required the exercise of both jaws at once, added to a natural hesitation, considerably damped the effect of the bold defiance it contained. Still, however, his speech was hailed by Cedric as an incontestible token of reviving spirit in his companion, whose previous indifference had begun, notwithstanding his respect for Athelstane's descent, to wear out his patience. But he now cordially shook hands with him in token of his approbation, and was somewhat grieved when Athelstane observed, "that he would fight a dozen such men as Front-de-Boeuf, if, by so doing, he could hasten his departure from a dungeon where they put so much garlic into their pottage." Notwithstanding this intimation of a relapse into the apathy of sensuality, Cedric placed himself opposite to Athelstane, and soon showed, that if the distresses of his country could banish the recollection of food while the table was uncovered, yet no sooner were the victuals put here, than he proved that the appetite of his Saxon ancestors had descended to him along with their other qualities.

The captives had not long enjoyed their refreshment, however, ere their attention was disturbed even in this most serious occupation by the blast of a horn winded before the gate. It was repeated three times, with as much violence as if it had been blown before an enchanted castle by the destined knight, at whose summons halls and towers, barbican and battlement, were to roll off like a morning vapour. The Saxons started from the table, and hastened to the window. But their curiosity was disappointed; for these outlets only looked upon the court of the castle, and the sound came from beyond its precincts. The summons, however, seemed of importance, for a considerable degree of bustle instantly took place in the castle.

CHAPTER XXII.

> My daughter—O my ducats—O my daughter!
> ——— O my Christian ducats!
> Justice—the Law—my ducats, and my daughter!
>
> Merchant of Venice.

LEAVING the Saxon chiefs to return to their banquet as soon as their ungratified curiosity should permit them to attend to the calls of their half-satiated appetite, we have to look in upon the yet more severe imprisonment of Isaac of York. The poor Jew had been hastily thrust into a dungeon-vault of the castle, the floor of which was deep beneath the level of the ground, and very damp, being lower than even the moat itself. The only light was received through one or two loop-holes far above the reach of the captive's hand. These apertures admitted, even at midday, only a dim and uncertain light, which was changed for utter darkness long before the rest of the castle had lost the blessing of day. Chains and shackles, which had been the portion of former captives, from whom active exertions to escape had been apprehended, hung rusted and empty on the walls of the prison, and in the rings of one of those sets of fetters there remained two mouldering bones, which seemed to have been once those of the human leg, as if some prisoner had been left not only to perish there, but to be consumed to a skeleton.

At one end of this ghastly apartment was a large fire-grate, over the top of which were stretched some transverse iron bars, half devoured with rust.

The whole appearance of the dungeon might have appalled a stouter heart than that of Isaac, who, nevertheless, was more composed under the imminent pressure of danger, than he had seemed to be while affected by terrors, of which the cause was as yet remote and contingent. The lovers of the chase say that the hare feels more agony during the pursuit of the greyhounds, than when she is struggling in their fangs.* And thus it is probable, that the Jews, by the very frequency of their fear on all occasions, had their minds in some degree prepared for every effort of tyranny which could be practised upon them; so that no aggression, when it had taken place, could bring with it that surprise which is the most disabling quality of terror. Neither was it the first time that Isaac had been placed in circumstances so dangerous. He had therefore experience to guide him, as well as hope, that he might again, as formerly, be delivered as a prey from the fowler. Above all, he had upon his side the unyielding obstinacy of his nation, and that unbending resolution, with which Israelites have been frequently known to submit to the uttermost evils which power and violence can inflict upon them, rather than gratify their oppressors by granting their demands.

In this humour of passive resistance, and with his garment collected beneath him to keep his limbs from the wet pavement, Isaac sat in a corner of his dungeon, where his folded hands, his dishevelled hair and beard, his furred cloak and high cap, seen by the wiry and broken light, would have afforded a study for Rembrandt, had that celebrated painter existed at the period. The Jew remained, without altering his position, for nearly three hours, at the expiry of which, steps were heard on the dungeon stair. The bolts screamed as they were withdrawn—the hinges creaked as the wicket opened, and Reginald Front-de-Boeuf, followed by the two Saracen slaves of the Templar, entered the prison.

* Nota Bene.—We by no means warrant the accuracy of this piece of natural history, which we give on the authority of the Wardour MS. L. T.

Front-de-Bœuf, a tall and strong man, whose life had been spent in public war or in private feuds and broils, and who had hesitated at no means of extending his feudal power, had features corresponding to his character, and which strongly expressed the fiercer and more malignant passions of the mind. The scars with which his visage was seamed, would, on features of a different cast, have excited the sympathy and veneration due to the marks of honourable valour; but, in the peculiar case of Front-de-Bœuf, they only added to the ferocity of his countenance, and to the dread which his presence inspired. This formidable baron was clad in a leathern doublet, fitted close to his body, which was frayed and soiled with the stains of his armour. He had no weapon, excepting a poniard at his belt, which served to counterbalance the weight of the bunch of rusty keys that hung at his right side.

The black slaves who attended Front-de-Bœuf were stripped of their gorgeous apparel, and attired in jerkins and trowsers of coarse linen, their sleeves being tucked up above the elbow, like those of butchers when about to exercise their function in the slaughter-house. Each had in his hand a small pannier; and, when they entered the dungeon, they stopt at the door until Front-de-Bœuf himself carefully locked and double-locked it. Having taken this precaution, he advanced slowly up the apartment towards the Jew, upon whom he kept his eye fixed, as if he wished to paralyze him with his glance, as some animals are said to fascinate their prey. It seemed indeed as if the sullen and malignant eye of Front-de-Bœuf possessed some portion of that supposed power over his unfortunate prisoner. The Jew sate with his mouth a-gape, and his eyes fixed on the savage baron with such earnestness of terror, that his frame seemed literally to shrink together, and to diminish in size while encountering the fierce Norman's fixed and baleful gaze. The unhappy Isaac was deprived not only of the power of rising to make the obeisance which his terror dictated, but he could not even doff his cap, or utter any word of supplication; so strongly was he agitated by the conviction that tortures and death were impending over him.

On the other hand, the stately form of the Norman appeared to dilate in magnitude, like that of the eagle, which ruffles up its plumage when about to pounce on its defenceless prey. He paused within three steps of the corner in which the unfortunate Jew had now, as it were, coiled himself up into the smallest possible space, and made a sign for one of the slaves to approach. The black satellite came forward accordingly, and, producing from his basket a large pair of scales and several weights, he laid them at the feet of Front-de-Bœuf, and again retired to the respectful distance, at which his companion had already taken his station.

The motions of these men were slow and solemn as if there impended over their souls some preconception of horror and of cruelty. Front-de-Bœuf himself opened the scene by thus addressing his ill-fated captive.

"Most accursed dog of an accursed race," he said awaking with his deep and sullen voice the sullen echoes of his dungeon vault, "seest thou these scales?"

The unhappy Jew returned a feeble affirmative.

"In these very scales shalt thou weigh me out," said the relentless Baron, "a thousand silver pounds, after the just measure and weight of the Tower of London."

"Holy Abraham!" returned the Jew, finding voice through the very extremity of his danger, "heard man ever such a demand?—Who ever heard, even in a minstrel's tale, of such a sum as a thousand pounds of silver?—What human sight was ever blessed with the vision of such a mass of treasure?—Not within the walls of York, ransack my house and that of all my tribe, wilt thou find the tithe of that huge sum of silver that thou speakest of."

"I am reasonable," answered Front-de-Bœuf, "and if silver be scant, I refuse not gold. At the rate of a mark of gold for each six pounds of silver, thou shalt free thy unbelieving carcass from such punishment as thy heart has never even conceived."

"Have mercy on me, noble knight!" exclaimed Isaac; "I am old, and poor and helpless. unworthy to triumph over me—It is a poor crush a worm."

"Old thou mayst be," replied the knight; shame to their folly who have suffered thee gray in usury and knavery—Feeble thou mays when had a Jew either heart or hand—But well known thou art."

"I swear to you, noble knight," said the Je all which I believe, and by all which we be common"——

"Perjure not thyself," said the Norman, inter him, "and let not thine obstinacy seal thy doo thou hast seen and well considered the fa awaits thee. Think not I speak to thee only t thy terror, and practise on the base cowardi hast derived from thy tribe. I swear to thee which thou dost not believe, by the gospel wh church teaches, and by the keys which are gi to bind and to loose, that my purpose is deep peremptory. This dungeon is no place for Prisoners ten thousand times more distinguish thou have died within these walls, and their fa never been known! But for thee is reserved and lingering death, to which theirs were luxu

He again made a signal for the slaves to ap and spoke to them apart, in their own langua he also had been in Palestine, where, perhaps, learnt his lesson of cruelty. The Saracens pr from their baskets a quantity of charcoal, a bellows, and a flask of oil. While the one s light with a flint and steel, the other dispos charcoal in the large rusty grate which we h ready mentioned, and exercised the bellows u fuel came to a red glow.

"Seest thou, Isaac," said Front-de-Bœuf," th of iron bars above that glowing charcoal?—a warm couch thou shalt lie, stripped of thy clo if thou wert to rest on a bed or down. One o

* This horrid species of torture may remind the reade to which the Spaniards subjected Guatimozin, in ord tort a discovery of his concealed wealth. But, in fac stance of similar barbarity is to be found nearer home, curs in the annals of Queen Mary's time, containing other examples of atrocity. Every reader must recoll after the fall of the Catholic Church, and the Pres Church Government had been established by law, the n especially the wealth, of the Bishops, Abbots, Priors forth, were no longer vested in ecclesiastics, but in la priators of the church revenues, or, as the Scottish called them, lluiars of the temporalities of the benefice having no claim to the spiritual character of their pred in office.

Of these laymen, who were thus invested with eccle revenues, some were men of high birth and rank, like mous Lord James Stewart, the Prior of St. Andrews, not fail to keep for their own use the rents, lands, and of the church. But if, on the other hand, the titulars w of inferior importance, who had been inducted into the the interest of some powerful person, it was generall stood that the new Abbot should grant for his patron's such leases and conveyances of the church lands and t might afford their protector the lion's share of the best was the origin of those who were wittily termed T Bishops, being a sort of imaginary prelate, whose im set up to enable his patron and principal to plunder the under his name.

There were other cases, however, in which men who grants of these secularized benefices, were desirous of r them for their own use, without having the influence n to establish their purpose; and these became frequently to protect themselves, however unwilling to submit to actions of the feudal tyrant of the district

Bannatyne, secretary to John Knox, recounts a singula of oppression practised on one of those titular abbots Earl of Cassilis in Ayrshire, whose extent of feudal p was so wide that he was usually termed the King of We give the fact as it occurs in Bannatyne's Journal, c musing that the Journalist held his master's opinions, be respect to the Earl of Cassilis as an opponent of the king and as being a detester of the practice of granting chur nues to titulars, instead of their being devoted to pur such as the support of the clergy, expense of schools, relief of the national poor. He mingles in the narrativ fore, a well deserved feeling of execration against the who employed the torture, with a tone of ridicule towa patient, as if, after all, it had not been ill bestowed on equivocal and amphibious character as a titular abbot. tells his narrative,

† A Tulchan is a calf's skin stuffed, and placed before who has lost its calf, to induce the animal to part w milk. The resemblance between such a Tulchan and a named to transmit the temporalities of a benefice to som ential patron, is easily understood.

hall maintain the fire beneath thee, while the ill anoint thy wretched limbs with oil, lest should burn.—Now, choose betwixt such a scorching bed and the payment of a thousand pounds of silver; for, by the head of my father, thou hast no other option."

OF CASSILIS' TYRANNY AGAINST A QUICK (i. e.) LIVING MAN.

Allan Stewart, friend to Captain James Stewart of by means of the Queen's corrupted court, obtained of Crossraguel. The said Earl thinking himself any King in these quarters, determined to have that piece (as he hath divers others) to pay at his plea to cause he could not find sic security as his insatia be required, this shift was devised. The said Mr g in company with the Laird of Bargany, (also a Ken the Earl and his friends, enticed to leave the which he had with the Laird, and come to make with the said Earl. The simplicity of the impru was suddenly abused; and so he passed his time with ain days, which he did in Mayble with Thomas uncle to the said Earl; after which the said Mr Allan the quiet company, to visit the place and bounds of l, [his abbacy,] of which the said Earl being surely ad termined to put in practice the tyranny which long had conceaved. And so, as king of the country, ap the said Mr. Allan, and carried him to the house of here for a season he was honourably treated, (gif a n think any entertainment pleasing,) but after that s were spent, and that the Earl could not obtain the ssraguel according to his awin appetite, he deter rove gif a collation could work that which neither supper could do for a long time. And so the said was carried to a secret chamber; with him passed able Earl, his worshipful brother, and such as were to be servants at that banquet. In the chamber there iron chimlay, under it a fire; other grit provision was The first course was,—'My Lord Abbot,' (said the ill please you confess here, that with your own con main in my company, because ye durst not commit the hands of others.' The Abbot answered, 'Would ed, that I should make a manifest lie for your plea truth is, my lord, it is against my will that I am here; have I any pleasure in your company.'—'But ye in with me, nevertheless, at this time,' said the Earl. able to resist your will and pleasure,' said the Abbot, ace.'—'Ye must then obey me,' said the Earl,—and were presented unto him certain letters to subscribe, which there was a five years' tack, and a nineteen , and a charter of feu of all the lands of Crossraguel, e clauses necessary for the Earl to haste him to hell. ultery, sacrilege, oppression, barbarous cruelty, and ed upon theft, deserve hell, the great King of Car more escape hell for ever, than the imprudent Ab the fire for a season as follows.

at the Earl spied repugnance, and saw that he could his purpose by fair means, he commanded his cooks he banquet: and so first they flayed the sheep, that k off the Abbot's clothes even to his skin, and next him to the chimney—his legs to the one end, and the other; and so they began to beet [i. e. feed] the nes to his buttocks, sometimes to his legs, some shoulders and arms; and that the roast might not hat it might rest in sobbe, they spared not flambing asting as a cook bastes roasted meat); Lord, look cruelty! and that the crying of the miserable man be heard, they closed his mouth that the voice opped. It may be suspected that some partisan of Darnley's] murder was there. In that torment they or man, till that often he cried for God's sake to m'; for he had as meikle gold in his awin purse as powder enough to shorten his pain. The famous rick and his cooks perceiving the roast to be aneuch, it to be tane fra the fire, and the Earl himself be se in this manner:—'Benedicite, Jesus Maria, you are stinate man that ever I saw; gif I had known that n so stubborn, I would not for a thousand crowns ed you so; I never did so to man before you.' And rned to the same practice within two days, and till that he had obtained his forenost purpose, that had got all his pieces subscryvit alswell as ane half nd could do it. The Earl thinking himself sure ong as he had the half roasted Abbot in his awin d yet being ashamed of his presence by reason of cruelty, left the place of Denure in the hands of cer servants, and the half roasted Abbot to be kept there

The Laird of Bargany, out of whose company the had been entised, understanding, (not the extremity,) aining of the man, sent to the court, and raised let erance of the person of the man, according to the h being disobeyed, the said Earl for his contempt need rebel, and put to the horne. But yet hope was neither to the afflicted to be delivered, neither yet to er [i. e. procurer] of the letters to obtain any comfort r in that time God was despised, and the lawful au contemned in Scotland, in hope of the sudden re giment of that cruel murderer of her awin husband, ords the said Earl was called one; and yet, oftener he was solemnly sworn to the King and to his Re-nalist then recites the complaint of the injured Allan ommendator of Crossraguel, to the Regent and Privy rerring his having been carried, partly by flattery, rce, to the black vault of Denure, a strong fortalice, rock overhanging the Irish channel, where its ruins ible. Here he stated he had been required to execute conveyances of the whole churches and parsonages belonging to the Abbey of Crossraguel, which he utterly refused as an unreasonable demand, and the more so that he had already conveyed them to John Stewart of Cardonall, by whose interest he had been made Commendator. The complainant proceeds to state, that he was, after many menaces, stript, bound, and his limbs exposed to fire in the manner already described, till, compelled by excess of agony, he subscribed the charter and leases presented to him, of the contents of which he was totally ignorant. A few days afterwards, being again required to execute a ratification of these deeds before a notary and witnesses, and refusing to do so, he was once more subjected to the same torture, until his agony was so excessive that he exclaimed, "Fye on you, why do you not strike your whingers into me, or blow me up with a barrel of powder, rather than torture me thus unmercifully?" upon which the Earl commanded Alexander Richard, one of his attendants, to stop the patient's mouth with a napkin, which was done accordingly. Thus he was once more compelled to submit to their tyranny. The petition concluded with stating, that the Earl, under pretence of the deeds thus iniquitously obtained, had taken possession of the whole place and living of Crossraguel, and enjoyed the profits thereof for three years.

The doom of the Regent and Council shows singularly the total interruption of justice at this calamitous period, even in the most clamant cases of oppression. The Council declined interference with the course of the ordinary justice of the county, (which was completely under the said Earl of Cassilis' control,) and only enacted, that he should forbear molestation of the unfortunate commendator, under the surety of two thousand pounds Scots. The Earl was appointed also to keep the peace towards the celebrated George Buchanan, who had a pension out of the same Abbacy, to a similar extent, and under the like penalty.

The consequences are thus described by the Journalist already quoted.

"The said Laird of Bargany perceiving that the ordiner justice could neither help the oppressed, nor yet the afflicted, applied his mind to the next remedy, and in the end, by his servants, took the house of Denure, where the poor Abbot was kept prisoner. The bruit flew fra Carrick to Galloway, and so suddenly assembled herd and hyre-man that pertained to the band of the Kennedies; and so within a few hours was the house of Denure environed again. The master of Cassilis was the frackast [i. e. the readiest or boldest] and would not stay, but in his heat would lay fire to the dungeon, with no small boasting that all enemies within the house should die.

"He was required and admonished by those that were within to be more moderate, and not to hazard himself so foolishly. But no admonition would help, till that the wind of an hacquebute blasted his shoulder, and then ceased he from further pursuit in fury. The Laird of Bargany had before purchest (obtained) of the authorities, letters, charging all faithful subjects to the King's Majesty, to assist him against that cruel tyrant and mansworn traitor, the Earl of Cassilis; which letters, with his private writings, he published, and shortly found sic concurrence of Kyle and Cunynghame with his other friends, that the Carrick company drew back fra the house: and so the other approached, furnished the house with more men, delivered the said Mr. Allan, and carried him to Ayr, where, publicly at the market cross of the said town, he declared how cruelly he was entreated, and how the murdered King suffered not sic torment as he did, excepting only he escaped the death: and, therefore, publicly did revoke all things that were done in that extremity, and especially he revoked the subscription of the three writings, to wit, of a fyve yeir tack and nineteen year tack, and of a charter of feu. And so the house remained, and remains (till this day, the 7th of February, 1571,) in the custody of the said Laird of Bargany and of his servants. And so cruelty was disappointed of proffeit present, and shall be eternallie punished, unless he earnestly repent. And this far for the cruelty committed, to give occasion unto others, and to such as hate the monstrous dealing of degenerate nobility, to look more diligently upon their behaviours, and to paint them forth unto the world, that they themselves may be ashamed of their own beastliness, and that the world may be advertised and admonished to abhor, detest, and avoid the company of all sic tyrants, who are not worthy of the society of men, but ought to be sent suddenly to the devil, with whom they must burn without end, for their contempt of God, and cruelty committed against his creatures. Let Cassilis and his brother be the first to be the example unto others. Amen. Amen."*

This extract has been somewhat amended or modernized in orthography, to render it more intelligible to the general reader. I have to add, that the Kennedies of Bargany, who interfered in behalf of the oppressed Abbot, were themselves a younger branch of the Cassilis family, but held different politics, and were powerful enough in this, and other instances, to bid them defiance.

The ultimate issue of this affair does not appear; but as the house of Cassilis are still in possession of the greater part of the feus and leases which belonged to Crossraguel Abbey, it is probable the talons of the King of Carrick were strong enough in those disorderly times, to retain the prey which they had so mercilessly fixed upon.

I may also add, that it appears by some papers in my possession, that the officers or Country Keepers on the border, were accustomed to torment their prisoners by binding them to the iron bars of their chimneys, to extort confession.

* Bannatyne's Journal.

"It is impossible," exclaimed the miserable Jew—"it is impossible that your purpose can be real! The good God of nature never made a heart capable of exercising such cruelty!"

"Trust not to that, Isaac," said Front-de-Bœuf, "it were a fatal error. Dost thou think that I, who have seen a town sacked, in which thousands of my Christian countrymen perished by sword, by flood, and by fire, will blench from my purpose for the outcries or screams of one single wretched Jew! or thinkest thou that these swarthy slaves, who have neither law, country, nor conscience, but their master's will—who use the poison, or the stake, or the poniard, or the cord, at his slightest wink—thinkest thou that they will have mercy, who do not even understand the language in which it is asked?—Be wise, old man; discharge thyself of a portion of thy superfluous wealth; repay to the hands of a Christian a part of what thou hast acquired by the usury thou hast practised on those of his religion. Thy cunning may soon swell out once more thy shrivelled purse, but neither leech nor medicine can restore thy scorched hide and flesh wert thou once stretched on these bars. Tell down thy ransom, I say, and rejoice that at such rate thou canst redeem thee from a dungeon, the secrets of which few have returned to tell. I waste no more words with thee—choose between thy dross and thy flesh and blood, and as thou choosest, so shall it be."

"So may Abraham, Jacob, and all the fathers of my people assist me," said Isaac, "I cannot make the choice, because I have not the means of satisfying your exorbitant demand!"

"Seize him and strip him slaves," said the knight, "and let the fathers of his race assist him if they can."

The assistants, taking their directions more from the Baron's eye and his hand than his tongue, once more stepped forward, laid hands on the unfortunate Isaac, plucked him up from the ground, and, holding him between them, waited the hard-hearted Baron's farther signal. The unhappy Jew eyed their countenances and that of Front-de-Bœuf, in hope of discovering some symptoms of relenting; but that of the Baron exhibited the same cold, half-sullen, half-sarcastic smile which had been the prelude to his cruelty; and the savage eyes of the Saracens, rolling gloomily under their dark brows, acquiring a yet more sinister expression by the whiteness of the circle which surrounds the pupil, evinced rather the secret pleasure which they expected from the approaching scene, than any reluctance to be its directors or agents. The Jew then looked at the glowing furnace, over which he was presently to be stretched, and seeing no chance of his tormentor's relenting, his resolution gave way.

"I will pay," he said, "the thousand pounds of silver—That is," he added after a moment's pause, "I will pay it with the help of my brethren; for I must beg as a mendicant at the door of our synagogue ere I make up so unheard-of a sum.—When and where must it be delivered?"

"Here," replied Front-de-Bœuf, "here it must be delivered—weighed it must be weighed and told down on this very dungeon floor.—Thinkest thou I will part with thee until thy ransom is secure?"

"And what is to be my surety," said the Jew, "that I shall be at liberty after this ransom is paid?"

"The word of a Norman noble, thou pawn-broking slave," answered Front-de-Bœuf; "the faith of a Norman nobleman, more pure than the gold and silver of thee and all thy tribe."

"I crave pardon, noble lord," said Isaac timidly, "but wherefore should I rely wholly on the word of one who will trust nothing to mine?"

"Because thou canst not help it, Jew," said the knight, sternly. "Wert thou now in thy treasure-chamber at York, and were I craving a loan of thy shekels, it would be thine to dictate the time of payment, and the pledge of security. This is my treasure-chamber. Here I have thee at advantage, nor will I again deign to repeat the terms on which I grant thee liberty."

The Jew groaned deeply. "Grant me," he said, "at least with my own liberty, that of the companions with whom I travel. They scorned Jew, yet they pitied my desolation, and lent tarried to aid me by the way, a share of my come upon them; moreover, they may even some sort to my redemption."

"If thou meanest yonder Saxon churl Front-de-Bœuf," the ransom will be paid to terms than mine. Mind thine own concerns warn thee, and meddle not with things of th

"I am, then," said Isaac, "only to be set together with mine wounded friend?"

"Shall I twice recommend it?" said Bœuf, "to a son of Israel, to meddle with concerns, and leave those of others alone thou hast made thy choice, it remains but payest down thy ransom, and that at a sho

"Yet hear me," said the Jew, "for the that very wealth which thou wouldst of expense of thy"—Here he stopped short, afr taining the savage Norman. Front-de-Bœ laughed, and himself filled up the blank at v Jew had hesitated. "At the expense of science, thou wouldst say, Isaac; speak it o thee, I am reasonable. I can bear the repr a loser, even when that loser is a Jew. Th not so patient, Isaac, when thou didst invol against Jacques Fitzdotterel, for calling thi rious blood-sucker, when thy exactions had his patrimony."

"I swear by the Talmud," said the Jew, "t valour has been misled in that matter. Fit drew his poniard upon me in mine own because I craved him for mine own silver. of payment was due at the Passover."

"I care not what he did," said Front-d "the question is, when shall I have mine when shall I have the shekels, Isaac?"

"Let my daughter Rebecca go forth to answered Isaac, "with your safe conduc knight, and so soon as man and horse ca the treasure"—Here he groaned deeply, after the pause of a few seconds.—"The shall be told down on this very floor."

"Thy daughter!" said Front-de-Bœuf, s prised,—"By heavens, Isaac, I would I hac of this. I deemed that yonder black-browed been thy concubine, and I gave her to be maiden to Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert, after ion of patriarchs and heroes of the days of set us in these matters a wholesome exampl

The yell which Isaac raised at this unfeel munication made the very vault to ring, rounded the two Saracens so much that th their hold of the Jew. He availed himse enlargement to throw himself on the paven clasp the knees of Front-de-Bœuf.

"Take all that you have asked," said Knight—take ten times more—reduce me to to beggary, if thou wilt,—nay, place me with iard, broil me on that furnace, but spare my d deliver her in safety and honour!—As thou of woman, spare the honour of a helpless She is the image of my deceased Rachael, s last of six pledges of her love—Will you widowed husband of his sole remaining co Will you reduce a father to wish that his ol child were laid beside her dead mother, in of our fathers?"

"I would," said the Norman, somewhat "that I had known of this before. I thou race had loved nothing save their money-ba

"Think not so vilely of us, Jews though said Isaac, eager to improve the moment of sympathy; "the hunted fox, the tortured loves its young—the despised and persecute Abraham love their children?"

"Be it so," said Front-de-Bœuf; "I will in future, Isaac, for thy very sake—but it a now, I cannot help what has happened, or v follow; my word is passed to my comrade nor would I break it for ten Jews and Je boot. Besides, why shouldst thou think come to the girl, even if she became Bois-G booty?"

ere will, there must?" exclaimed Isaac, wring-
s hands in agony; "when did Templars
e aught but cruelty to men, and dishonour to n!"
g of an infidel," said Front-de-Bœuf, with ir eyes, and not sorry, perhaps, to seize a pre-
r working himself into a passion, "blaspheme Holy Order of the Temple of Zion, but take derstand to pay me the ransom thou hast pro-
or wouldst thy Jewish throat!"
bber and villain!" said the Jew, retorting the s of his oppressor with passion, which, however
, he now found it impossible to bridle, "I ay thee nothing—not one silver penny will I
, unless my daughter is delivered to me in and honour?"
ration in thy senses, Israelite?" said the Nor-sternly—"has thy flesh and blood a charm heated iron and scalding oil?"
are not!" said the Jew, rendered desperate by ral affection; "do thy worst. My daughter is sh and blood, dearer to me a thousand times
thy limbs which thy cruelty threatens. No will I give thee, unless I were to pour it molten thy avaricious throat—no, not a silver penny give thee, Nazarene, were it to save thee from ep damnation thy whole life has merited! Take e if thou wilt, and say, the Jew, amidst his tor-
, knew how to disappoint the Christian."
We shall see that," said Front-de-Bœuf; "for by blessed rood, which is the abomination of thy sed tribe, thou shalt feel the extremities of fire
steel!—Strip him, slaves, and chain him down
the bars."
spite of the feeble struggles of the old man, the eens had already torn from him his upper gar-
, and were proceeding totally to disrobe him,
the sound of a bugle, twice winded without the
, penetrated even to the recesses of the dungeon,
mmediately after loud voices were heard calling Sir Reginald Front-de-Bœuf. Unwilling to be l engaged in his hellish occupation, the savage
n gave the slaves a signal to restore Isaac's gar-
, and, quitting the dungeon with his attendants,
t the Jew to thank God for his own deliverance,
lament over his daughter's captivity, and probaute, as his personal or parental feelings might strongest.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Nay, if the gentle spirit of moving words
Can no way change you to a milder form,
I'll woo you, like a soldier, at arms' end,
And love you 'gainst the nature of love, force you.
Two Gentlemen of Verona.

s apartment to which the Lady Rowena had introduced was fitted up with some rude ats at ornament and magnificence, and her being
l there might be considered as a peculiar mark pect not offered to the other prisoners. But the of Front-de-Bœuf, for whom it had been origi-
furnished, was long dead, and decay and negad impaired the few ornaments with which her had adorned it. The tapestry hung down from alls in many places, and in others was tarnished aded under the effects of the sun, or tattered and ed by age. Desolate, however, as it was, this the apartment of the castle which had been d most fitting for the accommodation of the n heiress; and here she was left to meditate
her fate, until the actors in this nefarious drama
rranged the several parts which each of them
o perform. This had been settled in a council by Front-de-Bœuf, De Bracy, and the Templar, ich, after a long and warm debate concerning several advantages which each insisted upon ng from his peculiar share in this audacious prise, they had at length determined the fate of unhappy prisoners.
was about the hour of noon, therefore, when De for whose advantage the expedition had been planned, appeared to prosecute his views upon
and and possessions of the Lady Rowena.

The interval had not entirely been bestowed in holding council with his confederates, for De Bracy had found leisure to decorate his person with all the foppery of the times. His green cassock and vizard were now flung aside. His long luxuriant hair was trained to flow in quaint tresses down his richly furred cloak. His beard was closely shaved, his doublet reached to the middle of his leg, and the girdle which secured it, and at the same time supported his ponderous sword, was embroidered and embossed with gold work. We have already noticed the extravagant fashion of the shoes at this period, and the points of Maurice de Bracy's might have challenged the prize of extravagance with the gayest, being turned up and twisted like the horns of a ram. Such was the dress of a gallant of the period; and, in the present instance, that effect was aided by the handsome person and good demeanour of the wearer, whose manners partook alike of the grace of a courtier, and the frankness of a soldier.

He saluted Rowena by doffing his velvet bonnet, garnished with a golden brooch, representing St. Michael trampling down the Prince of Evil. With this, he gently motioned the lady to a seat; and, as she still retained her standing posture, the knight ungloved his right hand, and motioned to conduct her thither. But Rowena declined, by her gesture, the proffered compliment, and replied, "If I be in the presence of my jailor, Sir Knight—nor will circumstances allow me to think otherwise—it best becomes his prisoner to remain standing till she learns her doom."

"Alas! fair Rowena," returned De Bracy, "you are in presence of your captive, not your jailor; and it is from your fair eyes that De Bracy must receive that doom which you fondly expect from him."

"I know you not, sir," said the lady, drawing herself up with all the pride of offended rank and beauty; "I know you not—and the insolent familiarity with which you apply to me the jargon of a troubadour, forms no apology for the violence of a robber."

"To thyself, fair maid," answered De Bracy, in his former tone—"to thine own charms be ascribed whate'er I have done which passed the respect due to her whom I have chosen queen of my heart, and loadstar of my eyes."

"I repeat to you, Sir Knight, that I know you not, and that no man wearing chain and spurs ought thus to intrude himself upon the presence of an unprotected lady."

"That I am unknown to you," said De Bracy, "is indeed my misfortune; yet let me hope that De Bracy's name has not yet been always unspoken, when minstrels or heralds have praised deeds of chivalry, whether in the lists or in the battle-field."

"To heralds and to minstrels, then, leave thy praise, Sir Knight," replied Rowena, "more suiting for their mouths than for thine own; and tell me which of them shall record in song, or in book of tourney, the memorable conquest of this night, a conquest obtained over an old man, followed by a few timid hinds; and its booty, an unfortunate maiden, transported against her will to the castle of a robber?"

"You are unjust, Lady Rowena," said the knight, biting his lips in some confusion, and speaking in a tone more natural to him than that of affected gallantry, which he had at first adopted; "yourself free from passion, you can allow no excuse for the frenzy of another, although caused by your own beauty."

"I pray you, Sir Knight," said Rowena, "to cease a language so commonly used by strolling minstrels that it becomes not the mouth of knights or nobles. Certes, you constrain me to sit down, since you enter upon such commonplace terms, of which each lazy crowder hath a stock that might last from hence to Christmas."

"Proud damsel," said De Bracy, incensed at being his gallant style procured him nothing but tempt—"proud damsel, thou shalt be as proud encountered. Know then, that I have supported pretensions to your hand in the way that best thy character. It is meeter for thy humour wooed with bow and bill, than in set terms, courtly language."

"Courtesy of tongue," said Rowena, "

used to veil churlishness of deed, is but a knight's girdle around the breast of a base clown. I wonder not that the restraint appears to gall you—more it were for your honour to have retained the dress and language of an outlaw, than to veil the deeds of one under an affectation of gentle language and demeanour."

"You counsel well, lady," said the Norman; "and in the bold language which best justifies bold action, I tell thee, thou shalt never leave this castle, or thou shalt leave it as Maurice de Bracy's wife. I am not wont to be baffled in my enterprises, nor needs a Norman noble scrupulously to vindicate his conduct to the Saxon maiden whom he distinguishes by the offer of his hand. Thou art proud, Rowena, and thou art the fitter to be my wife. By what other means couldst thou be raised to high honour and to princely place, saving by my alliance? How else wouldst thou escape from the mean precincts of a country grange, where Saxons herd with the swine which form their wealth, to take thy seat, honoured as thou shouldst be, and shalt be, amid all in England that is distinguished by beauty, or dignified by power?"

"Sir Knight," replied Rowena, "the grange which you contemn hath been my shelter from infancy; and, trust me, when I leave it—should that day ever arrive—it shall be with one who has not learnt to despise the dwelling and manners in which I have been brought up."

"I guess your meaning, lady," said De Bracy, "though you may think it lies too obscure for my apprehension. But dream not, that Richard Cœur de Lion will ever resume his throne, far less that Wilfred of Ivanhoe, his minion, will ever lead thee to his footstool, to be there welcomed as the bride of a favourite. Another suitor might feel jealousy while he touched this string; but my firm purpose cannot be changed by a passion so childish and so hopeless. Know, lady, that this rival is in my power, and that it rests but with me to betray the secret of his being within the castle to Front-de-Bœuf, whose jealousy will be more fatal than mine."

"Wilfred here?" said Rowena, in disdain; "that is as true as that Front-de-Bœuf is his rival."

De Bracy looked at her steadily for an instant. "Wert thou really ignorant of this?" said he; "didst thou not know that Wilfred of Ivanhoe travelled in the litter of the Jew?—a meet conveyance for the crusader, whose doughty arm was to reconquer the Holy Sepulchre!" And he laughed scornfully.

"And if he is here," said Rowena, compelling herself to a tone of indifference, though trembling with an agony of apprehension which she could not suppress, "in what is he the rival of Front-de-Bœuf? or what has he to fear beyond a short imprisonment, and an honourable ransom, according to the use of chivalry?"

"Rowena," said De Bracy, "art thou, too, deceived by the common error of thy sex, who think there can be no rivalry but that respecting their own charms? Knowest thou not there is a jealousy of ambition and of wealth, as well as of love; and that this our host Front-de-Bœuf, will push from his road him who opposes his claim to the fair barony of Ivanhoe, as readily, eagerly, and unscrupulously, as if he were preferred to him by some blue-eyed damsel? But smile on my suit, lady, and the wounded champion shall have nothing to fear from Front-de-Bœuf, whom else thou mayst mourn for, as in the hands of one who has never shown compassion."

"Save him, for the love of Heaven!" said Rowena, her firmness giving way under terror for her lover's impending fate.

"I can—I will—it is my purpose," said De Bracy; "for, when Rowena consents to be the bride of De Bracy, who is it shall dare to put forth a violent hand upon her kinsman—the son of her guardian—the companion of her youth? But it is thy love must buy his protection. I am not romantic fool enough to further the fortune, or avert the fate, of one who is likely to be a successful obstacle between me and my wishes. Use thine influence with me in his behalf, and he is safe,—refuse to employ it, Wilfred dies, and thou thyself art not the nearer to freedom."

"Thy language," answered Rowena, "ha indifferent bluntness something which ca reconciled with the horrors it seems to ex believe not that thy purpose is so wicked, or t so great."

"Flatter thyself, then, with that belief," Bracy, "until time shall prove it false. Thy wounded in this castle—thy preferred lover. bar betwixt Front-de-Bœuf and that which I Bœuf loves better than either ambition o What will it cost beyond the blow of a roman thrust of a javelin, to silence his opposition Nay, were Front-de-Bœuf afraid to justify open, let the chamberlain, or the nurse who tends pluck the pillow from his head, and Wilfr present condition, is sped without the effusion Cedric also"——

"And Cedric also," said Rowena, repea words; "my noble—my generous guardian served the evil I have encountered, for forge fate even in that of his son!"

"Cedric's fate also depends upon thy nation," said De Bracy; "and I leave thee to

Hitherto Rowena had sustained her part in ing scene with undismayed courage, but it cause she had not considered the danger a and imminent. Her disposition was natura which physiognomists consider as proper to plexions, mild, timid, and gentle; but it had b pered, and, as it were, hardened, by the circu of her education. Accustomed to see the wi even of Cedric himself, (sufficiently arbitr others,) give way before her wishes, she had that sort of courage and self-confidence whi from the habitual and constant deference of t in which we move. She could scarce con possibility of her will being opposed, far les its being treated with total disregard.

Her haughtiness and habit of domination w force, a fictitious character, induced over th was natural to her, and it deserted her when were opened to the extent of her own danger as that of her lover and her guardian; and v found her will, the slightest expression of wi wont to command respect and attention, no in opposition to that of a man of a strong, fi determined mind, who possessed the advant her, and was resolved to use it, she quailed be

After casting her eyes around, as if to in aid which was nowhere to be found, and aft broken interjections, she raised her hands to and burst into a passion of uncontrolled vexa sorrow. It was impossible to see so beautifu ture in such extremity without feeling for her Bracy was not unmoved, though he was embarrassed than touched. He had, in fa too far to recede; and yet, in Rowena's pre dition, she could not be acted on either by a or threats. He paced the apartment to and vously, exhorting the terrified maiden to ne self, now hesitating concerning his ow conduct.

If, thought he, I should be moved by the sorrow of this disconsolate damsel, what r an but the loss of those fair hopes for whi encountered so much risk, and the ridicule John and his jovial comrades. "And yet, to himself, "I feel myself ill-framed for which I am playing. I cannot look on so while it is disturbed with agony, or on th when they are drowned in tears. I would retained her original haughtiness of dispo that I had a larger share of Front-de-Bœuf tempered hardness of heart!"

Agitated by these thoughts, he could on unfortunate Rowena be comforted, and as that as yet she had no reason for the exc spair to which she was now giving way. B task of consolation De Bracy was interrupt horn, "hoarse-winded blowing far and keen had at the same time alarmed the other in the castle, and interrupted their several avarice and of license. Of them all, per cy least regretted the interruption; for his conferer with the Lady Rowena had arrived at a point, re he found it equally difficult to prosecute or to gn his enterprise.

nd here we cannot but think it necessary to offer e better proof than the incidents of an idle tale, to licate the melancholy representation of manners ch has been just laid before the reader. It is ous to think that those valiant barons, to whose d against the crown the liberties of England were bted for their existence, should themselves have such dreadful oppressors, and capable of excesses rary not only to the laws of England, but to e of nature and humanity. But, alas! we have to extract from the industrious Henry one of e numerous passages which he has collected contemporary historians, to prove that fiction f can hardly reach the dark reality of the horof the period.

ne description given by the author of the Saxon onicle of the cruelties exercised in the reign of Stephen by the great barons and lords of castwho were all Normans, affords a strong proof of excesses of which they were capable when their ions were inflamed. "They grievously oppressed oor people by building castles; and when they built, they filled them with wicked men, or er devils, who seized both men and women who imagined had any money, threw them into priand put them to more cruel tortures than the tyrs ever endured. They suffocated some in mud, suspended others by the feet, or the head, or the mbe, kindling fires below them. They squeezed heads of some with knotted cords till they eed their brains, while they threw others into geons swarming with serpents, snakes, and ds." But it would be cruel to put the reader to the of perusing the remainder of this description.*

another instance of these bitter fruits of con, and perhaps the strongest that can be quoted, may mention, that the Empress Matilda, though ughter of the King of Scotland, and afterwards Queen of England and Empress of Germany, daughter, the wife, and the mother of monarchs, obliged, during her early residence for education England, to assume the veil of a nun, as the only ns of escaping the licentious pursuit of the Norn nobles. This excuse she stated before a great ncil of the clergy of England, as the sole reason her having taken the religious habit. The assembl clergy admitted the validity of the plea, and the osity of the circumstances upon which it was ded; giving thus an indubitable and most remarkle testimony to the existence of that disgraceful me by which that age was stained. It was a ter of public knowledge, they said, that after the uest of King William, his Norman followers, d by so great a victory, acknowledged no law their own wicked pleasure, and not only despoiled conquered Saxons of their lands and their goods, invaded the honour of their wives and of their ghters with the most unbridled license; and e it was then common for matrons and maidens noble families to assume the veil, and take shelter onvents, not as called thither by the vocation of , but solely to preserve their honour from the ndled wickedness of man.

ch and so licentious were the times, as attested by the public declaration of the assembled y, recorded by Eadmer; and we need add no more to vindicate the probability of the scenes h we have detailed, and are about to detail, upon nore apocryphal authority of the Wardour MS.

CHAPTER XXIV.

I'll woo her as the lion woos his bride.
Douglas.

ILE the scenes we have described were passing her parts of the castle, the Jewess Rebecca ed her fate in a distant and sequestered turret. r she had been led by two of her disguised ers, and on being thrust into the little cell, she found herself in the presence of an old sybil, who kept murmuring to herself a Saxon rhyme, as if to beat time to the revolving dance which her spindle was performing upon the floor. The hag raised her head as Rebecca entered, and scowled at the fair Jewess with the malignant envy with which old age and ugliness, when united with evil conditions, are apt to look upon youth and beauty.

"Thou must up and away, old house-cricket," said one of the men; "our noble master commands it—Thou must even leave this chamber to a fairer guest."

"Ay," grumbled the hag, "even thus is service requited. I have known when my bare word would have cast the best man-at-arms among ye out of saddle and out of service; and now must I up and away at the command of every groom such as thou."

"Good Dame Urfried," said the other man, "stand not to reason on it, but up and away. Lord's hests must be listened to with a quick ear. Thou hast had thy day, old dame, but thy sun has long been set. Thou art now the very emblem of an old war-horse turned out on the barren heath—thou hast had thy paces in thy time, but now a broken amble is the best of them.—Come, amble off with thee."

"Ill omens dog ye both!" said the old woman; "and a kennel be your burying-place! May the evil demon Zernebock tear me limb from limb, if I leave my own cell ere I have spun out the hemp on my distaff!"

"Answer it to our lord, then, old housefiend," said the man, and retired; leaving Rebecca in company with the old woman, upon whose presence she had been thus unwillingly forced.

"What devil's deed have they now in the wind?" said the old hag, murmuring to herself, yet from time to time casting a sidelong and malignant glance at Rebecca; "but it is easy to guess—Bright eyes, black locks, and a skin like paper, ere the priest stains it with his black unguent—Ay, it is easy to guess why they send her to this lone turret, whence a shriek could no more be heard than at the depth of five hundred fathoms beneath the earth.—Thou wilt have owls for thy neighbours, fair one; and their screams will be heard as far, and as much regarded, as thine own. Outlandish, too," she said, marking the dress and turban of Rebecca—"What country art thou of?—a Saracen? or an Egyptian?—Why dost not answer?—thou canst weep, canst thou not speak?"

"Be not angry, good mother," said Rebecca.

"Thou needst say no more," replied Urfried; "men know a fox by the train, and a Jewess by her tongue."

"For the sake of mercy," said Rebecca, "tell me what I am to expect as the conclusion of the violence which hath dragged me hither! Is it my life they seek, to atone for my religion? I will lay it down cheerfully."

"Thy life, minion?" answered the sybil; "what would taking thy life pleasure them?—Trust me, thy life is in no peril. Such usage shalt thou have as was once thought good enough for a noble Saxon maiden. And shall a Jewess, like thee, repine because she hath no better? Look at me—I was as young and twice as fair as thou, when Front-de-Bœuf, father of this Reginald, and his Normans, stormed this castle. My father and his seven sons defended their inheritance from story to story, from chamber to chamber.—There was not a room, not a step of the stair, that was not slippery with their blood. They died—they died every man; and ere their bodies were cold, and ere their blood was dried, I had become the prey and the scorn of the conqueror!"

"Is there no help?—Are there no means of escape?" said Rebecca—"Richly, richly would I requite thine aid."

"Think not of it," said the hag; "from hence there is no escape but through the gates of death; and it is late, late," she added, shaking her gray head, "ere these open to us.—Yet it is comfort to think that we leave behind us on earth those who shall be wretched as ourselves. Fare thee well, Jewess!—Jew or Gentile, thy fate would be the same; for thou hast to do with them that have neither scruple nor pity. Fare thee well, I say. My thread is spun out—thy task is yet to begin."

* Henry's Hist. edit. 1805, vol. vii. p. 346.

"Stay! stay! for Heaven's sake!" said Rebecca; "stay, though it be to curse and to revile me—thy presence is yet some protection."

"The presence of the mother of God were no protection," answered the old woman. "There she stands," pointing to a rude image of the Virgin Mary, "see if she can avert the fate that awaits thee."

She left the room as she spoke, her features writhed into a sort of sneering laugh, which made them seem even more hideous than their habitual frown. She locked the door behind her, and Rebecca might hear her curse every step for its steepness, as slowly and with difficulty she descended the turret-stair.

Rebecca was now to expect a fate even more dreadful than that of Rowena; for what probability was there that either softness or ceremony would be used towards one of her oppressed race, whatever shadow of these might be preserved towards a Saxon heiress? Yet had the Jewess this advantage, that she was better prepared by habits of thought, and by natural strength of mind, to encounter the dangers to which she was exposed. Of a strong and observing character, even from her earliest years, the pomp and wealth which her father displayed within his walls, or which she witnessed in the houses of other wealthy Hebrews, had not been able to blind her to the precarious circumstances under which they were enjoyed. Like Damocles at his celebrated banquet, Rebecca perpetually beheld, amid that gorgeous display, the sword which was suspended over the heads of her people by a single hair. These reflections had tamed and brought down to a pitch of sounder judgment a temper, which, under other circumstances, might have waxed haughty, supercilious, and obstinate.

From her father's example and injunctions, Rebecca had learnt to bear herself courteously towards all who approached her. She could not indeed imitate his excess of subservience, because she was a stranger to the meanness of mind, and to the constant state of timid apprehension, by which it was dictated; but she bore herself with a proud humility, as if submitting to the evil circumstances in which she was placed as the daughter of a despised race, while she felt in her mind the consciousness that she was entitled to hold a higher rank from her merit, than the arbitrary despotism of religious prejudice permitted her to aspire to.

Thus prepared to expect adverse circumstances, she had acquired the firmness necessary for acting under them. Her present situation required all her presence of mind, and she summed it up accordingly.

Her first care was to inspect the apartment; but it afforded few hopes either of escape or protection. It contained neither secret passage nor trap-door, and unless where the door by which she had entered joined the main building, seemed to be circumscribed by the round exterior wall of the turret. The door had no inside bolt or bar. The single window opened upon an embattled space surmounting the turret, which gave Rebecca at first sight, some hopes of escaping; but she soon found it had no communication with any other part of the battlements, being an isolated bartisan, or balcony, secured, as usual, by a parapet, with embrasures, at which a few archers might be stationed for defending the turret, and flanking with their shot the wall of the castle on that side.

There was therefore no hope but in passive fortitude, and in that strong reliance on Heaven natural to great and generous characters. Rebecca, however erroneously taught to interpret the promises of Scripture to the chosen people of Heaven, did not err in supposing the present to be their hour of trial, or in trusting that the children of Zion would be one day called in with the fulness of the Gentiles. In the mean while, all around her showed that their present state was that of punishment and probation, and that it was their especial duty to suffer without sinning. Thus prepared to consider herself as the victim of misfortune, Rebecca had early reflected upon her own state, and schooled her mind to meet the dangers which she had probably to encounter.

The prisoner trembled, however, and changed colour, when a step was heard on the stair, and the door of the turret-chamber slowly opened, and a tall man, dressed as one of those banditti to whom owed their misfortune, slowly entered, and door behind him; his cap, pulled down brows, concealed the upper part of his face held his mantle in such a manner as to rest. In this guise, as if prepared for the ex some deed, at the thought of which he was ashamed, he stood before the affrighted yet, ruffian as his dress bespoke him, he see loss to express what purpose had brought ther, so that Rebecca, making an effort to had time to anticipate his explanation. already unclasped two costly bracelets and which she hastened to proffer to the supposed concluding naturally that to gratify his av to be speak his favour.

"Take these," she said, "good friend, and sake be merciful to me and my aged father ornaments are of value, yet are they trifling he would bestow to obtain our dismissal castle, free and uninjured."

"Fair flower of Palestine," replied the "these pearls are orient, but they yield in w to your teeth; the diamonds are brilliant, cannot match your eyes; and ever since I ha up this wild trade, I have made a vow to pref to wealth."

"Do not do yourself such wrong," said "take ransom, and have mercy!- Gold will you pleasure, - to misuse us, could only brin morse. My father will willingly satiate th wishes; and if thou wilt act wisely, thou m chase with our spoils thy restoration to civil mayst obtain pardon for past errors, and beyond the necessity of committing more."

"It is well spoken," replied the outlaw i finding it difficult probably to sustain, in conversation which Rebecca had opened in gunge; "but know, bright lily of the vale that thy father is already in the hands of a alchemist, who knows how to convert into silver even the rusty bars of a dungeon gr venerable Isaac is subjected to an alembic, v distil from him all he holds dear, without a ance from my requests or thy entreaty. Th must be paid by love and beauty, and in no will I accept it."

"Thou art no outlaw," said Rebecca, in language in which he addressed her; "no o refused such offers. No outlaw in this land dialect in which thou hast spoken. Thou a law, but a Norman—a Norman, noble p birth—O, be so in thy actions, and cast off t mask of outrage and violence!"

"And thou, who canst guess so truly," s de Bois-Guilbert, dropping the mantle from "art no true daughter of Israel, but in all, a and beauty, a very witch of Endor. I am n law, then, fair rose of Sharon. And I am will be more prompt to hang thy neck and pearls and diamonds, which so well beco than to deprive thee of these ornaments."

"What wouldst thou have of me," said "if not my wealth? We can have naugh mon between us—you are a Christian—I a ess.—Our union were contrary to the law the church and the synagogue."

"It were so, indeed," replied the Temp ing; "wed with a Jewess? Despardieux, she were the Queen of Sheba! And know sweet daughter of Zion, that were the most king to offer me his most Christian daug Languedoc for a dowery, I could not wed against my vow to love any maiden, other par amours, as I will love thee. I am a Behold the cross of my Holy Order."

"Dare'st thou appeal to it," said Rebec occasion like the present?"

"And if I do so," said the Templar, "i not thee, who art no believer in the blessed salvation."

"I believe as my fathers taught," said "and may God forgive my belief if erroneous Sir Knight, what is yours, when you appe

which you deem most holy, even ut to transgress the most solemn of ught, and as a man of religion?"
an I well preached, O daughter of ed the Templar; "but, gentle Ec-rrow Jewish prejudices make thee privilege. Marriage were an endur-part of a Templar; but what lesser se, I shall speedily be absolved from ptory of our Order. Not the wisest
t his father, whose examples you
v are waggary, claimed wider privi-
r soldiers of the Temple of Zion have in its defence. The protectors of l may claim license by the example

st the Scriptures," said the Jewess,
th saints, only to justify thine own
gery, thy crime is like that of him
ison from the most healthful and

T mplar flashed fire at this reproof said, "Rebecca; I have hitherto thee, but now my language shall be
or. Thou art the captive of my bow st to my will by the laws of all I abate an inch of my right, or ng by violence what thou refusest essity."

said Rebecca—"stand back, and offer at to commit a sin so deadly!
mayst indeed overpower, for God
ak, and trusted their defence to

But I will proclaim thy villany, end of Europe to the other. I superstition of thy brethren what ught refuse me. Each Preceptory
f thy Order, shall learn, that, like a sumed with a Jewess. Those who y century will hold thee accursed for honoured the cross thou wearest, as ter of my people."

-witted, Jewess," replied the Temof the truth of what she spoke, and his Order condemned in the most and under high penalties, such in-ow prosecuted, and that, in some legradation had followed upon it—
-witted," he said; "but loud must mplain, if it is heard beyond the iron
le; within these, murmurs, laments,
s, and screams for help, die alike
e thing only can save thee, Rebecca.
te—embrace our religion, and thou
such state, that many a Norman
s well in point as in beauty to the best lance among the defenders of

y fate!" said Rebecca—"and, sacred t fate?—embrace thy religion! and it be that harbours such a villain?
lance of the Templars!—Craven rn priest! I spit at thee, and I defy of Abraham's promise hath opened
s daughter—even from this abyss of

she threw open the lattice window
bartisan, and in an instant after,
y verge of the parapet, with not the between her and the tremendous nprepared for such a desperate effort,
rto stood perfectly motionless, Bois-
her time to intercept nor to stop her.
advance, she exclaimed, "Remain
proud Templar, or at thy choice ad-nearer, and I plunge myself from y body shall be crushed out of the anity upon the stones of that court-ne the victim of thy brutality!"

his, she clasped her hands and ex-
ards heaven, as if imploring mercy
e she made the final plunge. The d, and a resolution which had never distress, gave way to his admiration of her fortitude. "Come down," he said, "rash girl! I swear by earth, and sea, and sky, I will offer thee no offence."

"I will not trust thee, Templar," said Rebecca; "thou hast taught me better how to estimate the virtues of thine Order. The next Preceptory would grant thee absolution for an oath, the keeping of which concerned naught but the honour or the dishonour of a miserable Jewish maiden."

"You do me injustice," exclaimed the Templar fervently; "I swear to you by the name which I bear—by the cross on my bosom—by the sword on my side—by the ancient crest of my fathers do I swear, I will do thee no injury whatsoever! If not for thyself, yet for thy father's sake forbear! I will be his friend, and in this castle he will need a powerful one."

"Alas!" said Rebecca, "I know it but too well—dare I trust thee?"

"May my arms be reversed, and my name dishonoured," said Brian de Bois-Guilbert, "if thou shalt have reason to complain of me! Many a law, many a commandment have I broken, but my word never."

"I will then trust thee," said Rebecca, "thus far;" and she descended from the verge of the battlement, but remained standing close by one of the embrasures, or machicolles, as they were then called.—"Here," she said, "I take my stand. Remain where thou art, and if thou shalt attempt to diminish by one step the distance now between us, thou shalt see that the Jewish maiden will rather trust her soul with God, than her honour to the Templar!"

While Rebecca spoke thus, her high and firm resolve, which corresponded so well with the expressive beauty of her countenance, gave to her looks, air, and manner, a dignity that seemed more than mortal. Her glance quailed not, her cheek blanched not, for the fear of a fate so instant and so horrible; on the contrary, the thought that she had her fate at her command, and could escape at will from infamy to death, gave a yet deeper colour of carnation to her complexion, and a yet more brilliant fire to her eye. Bois-Guilbert, proud himself and high-spirited, thought he had never beheld beauty so animated and so commanding.

"Let there be peace between us, Rebecca," he said.

"Peace, if thou wilt," answered Rebecca—"Peace—but with this space between."

"Thou needst no longer fear me," said Bois-Guilbert.

"I fear thee not," replied she; "thanks to him that reared this dizzy tower so high, that naught could fall from it and live—thanks to him, and to the God of Israel!—I fear thee not."

"Thou dost me injustice," said the Templar; "by earth, sea, and sky, thou dost me injustice! I am not naturally that which you have seen me; hard, selfish, and relentless. It was woman that taught me cruelty, and on woman therefore I have exercised it; but not upon such as thou. Hear me, Rebecca—Never did knight take lance in his hand with a heart more devoted to the lady of his love than Brian de Bois-Guilbert. She, the daughter of a petty baron, who boasted for all his domains but a ruinous tower, and an unproductive vineyard, and some few leagues of the barren Landes of Bourdeaux, her name was known wherever deeds of arms were done, known wider than that of many a lady's that had a county for a dowery.—Yes," he continued, pacing up and down the little platform, with an animation in which he seemed to lose all consciousness of Rebecca's presence—"Yes, my deeds, my danger, my blood, made the name of Adelaide de Montemare known from the court of Castile to that of Byzantium. And how was I requited?—When I returned with my dear-bought honours, purchased by toil and blood, I found her wedded to a Gascon squire, whose name was never heard beyond the limits of his own paltry demain! Truly did I love her, and bitterly did I revenge me of her broken faith! But my vengeance has recoiled on myself. Since that day I have separated myself from life and its ties—My manhood must know no domestic home—must be soothed by no affectionate wife—My age must know no kindly hearth—My grave must be solitary, and no offspring must outlive me, to bear the ancient name of Bois-Guilbert. At the feet of my Superior I have laid down the right of self-action—the privilege of independence. The Templar, a serf in all but the name, can possess neither lands nor goods, and lives, moves, and breathes, but at the will and pleasure of another."

"Alas!" said Rebecca, "what advantages could compensate for such an absolute sacrifice?"

"The power of vengeance, Rebecca," replied the Templar, "and the prospects of ambition."

"An evil recompense," said Rebecca, "for the surender of the rights which are dearest to humanity."

"Say not so, maiden," answered the Templar; "revenge is a feast for the gods! And if they have reserved it, as priests tell us, to themselves, it is because they hold it an enjoyment too precious for the possession of mere mortals. And ambition? it is a temptation which could disturb even the bliss of heaven itself."—He paused a moment, and then added, "Rebecca! she who could prefer death to dishonour, must have a proud and a powerful soul. Mine thou must be!—Nay, start not," he added, "it must be with thine own consent, and on thine own terms. Thou must consent to share with me hopes more extended than can be viewed from the throne of a monarch!—Hear me ere you answer, and judge ere you refuse.—The Templar loses, as thou hast said, his social rights, his power of free agency, but he becomes a member and a limb of a mighty body, before which thrones already tremble,—even as the single drop of rain which mixes with the sea becomes an individual part of that resistless ocean, which undermines rocks and ingulfs royal armadas. Such a swelling flood is that powerful league. Of this mighty Order I am no mean member, but already one of the Chief Commanders, and may well aspire one day to hold the batoon of Grand Master. The poor soldiers of the Temple will not alone place their foot upon the necks of kings—a hemp-sandall'd monk can do that. Our mailed step shall ascend their throne—our gauntlet shall wrench the sceptre from their grips. Not the reign of your vainly-expected Messiah offers such power to your dispersed tribes as my ambition may aim at. I have sought but a kindred spirit to share it, and I have found such in thee."

"Sayest thou this to one of my people?" answered Rebecca. "Bethink thee"——

"Answer me not," said the Templar, "by urging the difference of our creeds; within our secret conclaves we hold these nursery tales in derision. Think not we long remained blind to the idiotical folly of our founders, who foreswore every delight of life for the pleasure of dying martyrs by hunger, by thirst, and by pestilence, and by the swords of savages, while they vainly strove to defend a barren desert, valuable only in the eyes of superstition. Our Order soon adopted bolder and wider views, and found out a better indemnification for our sacrifices. Our immense possessions in every kingdom of Europe, our high military fame, which brings within our circle the flower of chivalry from every Christian clime—these are dedicated to ends of which our pious founders little are aware, and which are equally concealed from such weak spirits as embrace our Order on the ancient principles, and whose superstition makes them our passive tools. But I will not further withdraw the veil of our mysteries. That bugle-sound announces something which may require my presence. Think on what I have said.—Farewell! I do not say forgive me the violence I have threatened, for it was necessary to the display of thy character. Gold can be only known by the application of the touchstone. I will soon return, and hold further conference with thee."

He re-entered the turret-chamber, and descended the stair, leaving Rebecca scarcely more terrified at the prospect of the death to which she had been so lately exposed, than at the furious ambition of the bold bad man in whose power she found herself so unhappily placed. When she entered the turret-chamber, her first duty was to return thanks to the God of Jacob for the protection which he had afforded her, and to implore its continuance for her and for her father. Another name glided into her petition—it was that of the wounded Christian, whom fate had placed in the hands of bloodthirsty men, his enemies. Her heart indeed checked her, as in communing with the Deity in prayer, she in her devotions the recollection of one with fate hers could have no alliance—a Nazarene enemy to her faith. But the petition was breathed, nor could all the narrow prejudices sect induce Rebecca to wish it recalled.

CHAPTER XXV.

A damn'd cramp piece of penmanship as ever I saw in
She Stoops to C

When the Templar reached the hall of the he found De Bracy already there. "Your lov said De Bracy, "hath, I suppose, been disturb mine, by this obstreperous summons. But y come later and more reluctantly, and therefor some your interview has proved more agreeab mine."

"Has your suit, then, been unsuccessfully the Saxon heiress?" said the Templar.

"By the bones of Thomas a Becket," an De Bracy, "the Lady Rowena must have heard cannot endure the sight of women's tears."

"Away!" said the Templar; "thou a lead Free Company, and regard a woman's tears! drops sprinkled on the torch of love, make th blaze the brighter."

"Gramercy for the few drops of thy sprin replied De Bracy; "but this damsel hath wept to extinguish a beacon-light. Never was such ing of hands and such overflowing of eyes, si days of St. Niobe, of whom Prior Aymer to A water-fiend hath possessed the fair Saxon."

"A legion of fiends have occupied the bosom Jewess," replied the Templar; "for, I think n one, not even Apollyon himself, could have such indomitable pride and resolution.—But w Front-de-Bœuf? That horn is sounded mo more clamorously."

"He is negotiating with the Jew, I suppose," De Bracy, coolly; "probably the howls of Isa drowned the blast of the bugle. Thou mayst by experience, Sir Brian, that a Jew parting w treasures on such terms as our friend Front-d is like to offer, will raise a clamour loud enoug heard over twenty horns and trumpets to boot we will make the vassals cull him."

They were soon after joined by Front-de-Bœu had been disturbed in his tyrannic cruelty in th ner with which the reader is acquainted, and h tarried to give some necessary directions.

"Let us see the cause of this cursed clamou Front-de-Bœuf—"here is a letter, and, if I n not, it is in Saxon."

He looked at it, turning it round and round a had really some hopes of coming at the meani inverting the position of the paper, and then han to De Bracy.

"It may be magic spells for aught I know," s Bracy, who possessed his full proportion of the rance which characterized the Chivalry of the "Our chaplain attempted to teach me to wri said, "but all my letters were formed like spea and sword-blades, and so the old shaveling g the task."

"Give it me," said the Templar. "We have the priestly character, that we have some kno to enlighten our valour."

"Let us profit by your most reverend knov then," said De Bracy; "what says the scroll?

"It is a formal letter of defiance," answe Templar; "but, by our Lady of Bethlehem, if it a foolish jest, it is the most extraordinary cart ever was sent across the drawbridge of a k castle."

"Jest!" said Front-de-Bœuf, "I would gladly who dares jest with me in such a matter!—R Sir Brian."

* I wish the Prior had also informed them when Ni sainted. Probably during that enlightened period when

"Pan to Moses lent his pagan horn."

The Templar accordingly read it as follows:—

"I, Wamba, the son of Witless, Jester to a noble and free-born man, Cedric of Rotherwood, called the Saxon,—And I, Gurth, the son of Beowulph, the swineherd"——

"Thou art mad," said Front-de-Bœuf, interrupting the reader.

"By St. Luke, it is so set down," answered the Templar. Then resuming his task, he went on,—"I, Gurth, the son of Beowulph, swineherd unto the said Cedric, with the assistance of our allies and confederates, who make common cause with us in this our feud, namely, the good knight, called for the present Le Noir Faincant, and the stout yeoman, Robert Locksley, called Cleave-the-wand, Do you, Reginald Front-de-Bœuf, and your allies and accomplices whomsoever, to wit, that whereas you have, without cause given or feud declared, wrongfully and by mastery seized upon the person of our lord and master the said Cedric; also upon the person of a noble and freeborn damsel, the Lady Rowena of Hargottstandstede; also upon the person of a noble and freeborn man, Athelstane of Coningsburgh; also upon the persons of certain freeborn men, their cnichts; also upon certain serfs, their born bondsmen; also upon a certain Jew, named Isaac of York, together with his daughter, a Jewess, and certain horses and mules: Which noble persons, with their cnichts and slaves, and also with the horses and mules, Jew and Jewess aforesaid, were all in peace with his majesty, and travelling as liege subjects upon the king's highway; therefore we require and demand that the said noble persons, namely, Cedric of Rotherwood, Rowena of Hargottstandstede, Athelstane of Coningsburgh, with their servants, cnichts, and followers, also the horses and mules, Jew and Jewess aforesaid together with all goods and chattels to them pertaining, be, within an hour after the delivery hereof, delivered to us, or to those whom we shall appoint to receive the same, and that untouched and unharmed in body and goods. Failing of which, we do pronounce to you, that we hold ye as robbers and traitors, and will wager our bodies against ye in battle, siege, or otherwise, and do our utmost to your annoyance and destruction. Wherefore may God have you in his keeping.—Signed by us upon the eve of St. Withold's day, under the great trysting oak in the Hart-hill Walk, as above being written by a holy man, Clerk to God, our Lady, and St. Dunstan, in the Chapel of Copmanhurst."

At the bottom of this document was scrawled, in the first place, a rude sketch of a cock's head and comb, with a legend expressing this hieroglyphic to be the sign manual of Wamba, son of Witless. Under this respectable emblem stood a cross, stated to be the mark of Gurth, the son of Beowulph. Then was written, in rough bold characters, the words, Le Noir Faineant. And, to conclude the whole, an arrow, coarsely enough drawn, was described as the mark of the yeoman Locksley.

The knights heard this uncommon document read from end to end, and then gazed upon each other in great amazement as being utterly at a loss to know what it could portend. De Bracy was the first to break silence by an uncontrollable fit of laughter, in which he was joined, though with more moderation, by the Templar. Front-de-Bœuf, on the contrary, showed impatient of their ill-timed jocularity.

"I give you plain warning," he said, "fair sirs, that we had better consult how to bear ourselves under these circumstances, than give way to such misplaced merriment."

"Front-de-Bœuf has not recovered his temper since his late overthrow," said De Bracy to the Templar; "he is cowed at the very idea of a cartel, though it come but from a fool and a swineherd."

"By St. Michael, answered Front-de-Bœuf, "I wish thou couldst stand the whole brunt of this adventure thyself, De Bracy. These fellows dared not have acted with such inconceivable impudence, unless they had not been supported by some strong bands. There are enough of outlaws in this forest to resemble protecting the deer. I did but tie one fellow, who was taken redhanded and in the fact, to the horns of a wild stag, which gored him to death in five minutes, and I had as many arrows shot at me as there were launched against yonder target at Ashby.—Here, fellow," he added, to one of his attendants, "hast thou sent out to see by what force this precious challenge is to be supported?"

"There are at least two hundred men assembled in the woods," answered a squire who was in attendance.

"Here is a proper matter!" said Front-de-Bœuf; "this comes of lending you the use of my castle, that cannot manage your undertaking quietly, but you must bring this nest of hornets about my ears!"

"Of hornets?" said De Bracy; "of stingless drones rather; a band of lazy knaves, who take to the wood, and destroy the venison rather than labour for their maintenance."

"Stingless!" replied Front-de-Bœuf; "fork-headed shafts of a cloth-yard in length, and these shot within the breadth of a French crown, are sting enough."

"For shame, Sir Knight!" said the Templar. "Let us summon our people, and sally forth upon them. One knight—ay, one man-at-arms, were enough for twenty such peasants."

"Enough, and too much," said De Bracy; "I should only be ashamed to couch lance against them."

"True," answered Front-de-Bœuf: "were they black Turks or Moors, Sir Templar, or the craven peasants of France, most valiant De Bracy; but these are English yeomen, over whom we shall have no advantage, save what we may derive from our arms and horses, which will avail us little in the glades of the forest. Sally, saidst thou? we have scarce men enough to defend the castle. The best of mine are at York; so is all your band, De Bracy; and we have scarcely twenty, besides the handful that were engaged in this mad business."

"Thou dost not fear," said the Templar, "that they can assemble in force sufficient to attempt the castle?"

"Not so, Sir Brian," answered Front-de-Bœuf. "These outlaws have indeed a daring captain; but without machines, scaling ladders, and experienced leaders, my castle may defy them."

"Send to thy neighbours," said the Templar "let them assemble their people, and come to the rescue of three knights, besieged by a jester and a swineherd in the baronial castle of Reginald Front-de-Bœuf!"

"You jest, Sir Knight," answered the baron; "but to whom should I send?—Malvoisin is by this time at York with his retainers, and so are my other allies, and so should I have been, but for this infernal enterprise."

"Then send to York, and recall our people," said De Bracy. "If they abide the shaking of my standard, or the sight of my Free Companions, I will give them credit for the boldest outlaws ever bent bow in green-wood."

"And who shall bear such a message?" said Front-de Bœuf; "they will beset every path, and rip the errand out of his bosom.—I have it," he added, after pausing for a moment—"Sir Templar, thou canst write as well as read, and if we can but find the writing materials of my chaplain, who died a twelvemonth since in the midst of his Christmas carousals"——

"So please ye," said the squire, who was still in attendance, "I think old Urfried has them somewhere in keeping, for love of the confessor. He was the last man, I have heard her tell, who ever said aught to her, which man ought in courtesy to address to maid or matron."

"Go, search them out, Engerbred," said Front-de-Bœuf; "and then, Sir Templar, thou shalt return an answer to this bold challenge."

"I would rather do it at the sword's point, than at that of the pen," said Bois-Guilbert; "but be it as you will."

He sat down accordingly, and indited, in the French language, an epistle of the following tenor:—

"Sir Reginald Front-de-Bœuf, with his noble and knightly allies and confederates, receive no defiances at the hands of slaves, bondsmen, or fugitives. If the person calling himself the Black Knight have indeed a claim to the honours of chivalry he ought to know that he stands degraded by his present association, and has no right to ask reckoning at the hands of good men of noble blood. Touching the prisoners we have made, we do in Christian charity require you to send a man of religion, to receive their confession, and reconcile them with God; since it is our fixed intention to execute them this morning before noon, so that their heads being placed on the battlements, shall show to all men how lightly we esteem those who have bestirred themselves in their rescue. Wherefore, as above, we require you to send a priest to reconcile them to God, in doing which you shall render them the last earthly service."

This letter being folded, was delivered to the squire, and by him to the messenger who waited without, as the answer to that which he had brought.

The yeoman having thus accomplished his mission, returned to the head-quarters of the allies, which were for the present established under a venerable oak-tree, about three arrow-flights distant from the castle. Here Wamba and Gurth, with their allies the Black Knight and Locksley, and the jovial hermit, awaited with impatience an answer to their summons. Around, and at a distance from them, were seen many a bold yeoman, whose sylvan dress and weather-beaten countenances showed the ordinary nature of their occupation. More than two hundred had already assembled, and others were fast coming in. Those whom they obeyed as leaders were only distinguished from the others by a feather in the cap, their dress, arms, and equipments being in all other respects the same.

Besides these bands, a less orderly and a worse armed force, consisting of the Saxon inhabitants of the neighbouring township, as well as many bondsmen and servants from Cedric's extensive estate, had already arrived, for the purpose of assisting in his rescue. Few of these were armed otherwise than with such rustic weapons as necessity sometimes converts to military purposes. Boar-spears, scythes, flails, and the like, were their chief arms; for the Normans, with the usual policy of conquerors, were jealous of permitting to the vanquished Saxons the possession or the use of swords and spears. These circumstances rendered the assistance of the Saxons far from being so formidable to the besieged, as the strength of the men themselves, their superior numbers, and the animation inspired by a just cause, might otherwise well have made them. It was to the leaders of this motley army that the letter of the Templar was now delivered.

Reference was at first made to the chaplain for an exposition of its contents.

"By the crook of St. Dunstan," said that worthy ecclesiastic, "which hath brought more sheep within the sheepfold than the crook of e'er another saint in Paradise, I swear that I cannot expound unto you this jargon, which, whether it be French or Arabic, is beyond my guess."

He then gave the letter to Gurth, who shook his head gruffly, and passed it to Wamba. The Jester looked at each of the four corners of the paper with such a grin of affected intelligence as a monkey is apt to assume upon similar occasions, then cut a caper, and gave the letter to Locksley.

"If the long letters were bows, and the short letters broad arrows, I might know something of the matter," said the brave yeoman; "but as the matter stands, the meaning is as safe, for me, as the stag that's at twelve miles' distance."

"I must be clerk, then," said the Black Knight; and taking the letter from Locksley, he first read it over to himself, and then explained the meaning in Saxon to his confederates.

"Execute the noble Cedric!" exclaimed Wamba; "by the rood, thou must be mistaken, Sir Knight."

"Not I, my worthy friend," replied the knight, "I have explained the words as they are here set down."

"Then, by St. Thomas of Canterbury," replied Gurth, "we will have the castle, should we tear it down with our hands!"

"We have nothing else to tear it with," replied Wamba; "but mine are scarce fit to make mammocks of freestone and mortar."

"'Tis but a contrivance to gain time," said Locksley; "they dare not do a deed for which I could exact a fearful penalty."

"I would," said the Black Knight, "there were some one among us who could obtain admission into the castle, and discover how the case stands with the besieged. Methinks, as they require a confessor to be sent, this holy hermit might at once exercise his pious vocation, and procure us the information we desire."

"A plague on thee, and thy advice!" said the pious hermit; "I tell thee, Sir Slothful Knight, that when I doff my friar's frock, my priesthood, my sanctity, my very Latin, are put off along with it; and when in my green jerkin, I can better kill twenty deer than confess one Christian."

"I fear," said the Black Knight, "I fear greatly, there is no one here that is qualified to take upon him, for the nonce, this same character of father confessor?"

All looked on each other, and were silent.

"I see," said Wamba, after a short pause, "that the fool must be still the fool, and put his neck in the venture which wise men shrink from. You must know, my dear cousins and countrymen, that I wore russet before I wore motley, and was bred to be a friar, until a brain-fever came upon me and left me just wit enough to be a fool. I trust, with the assistance of the good hermit's frock, together with the priesthood, sanctity, and learning which are stitched into the cowl of it, I shall be found qualified to administer both worldly and ghostly comfort to our worthy master Cedric, and his companions in adversity."

"Hath he sense enough, thinkst thou?" said the Black Knight, addressing Gurth.

"I know not," said Gurth; "but if he hath not, it will be the first time he hath wanted wit to turn his folly to account."

"On with the frock, then, good fellow," quoth the Knight, "and let thy master send us an account of their situation within the castle. Their numbers must be few, and it is five to one they may be accessible by a sudden and bold attack. Time wears away with thee."

"And in the mean time," said Locksley, "we will beset the place so closely, that not so much as a fly shall carry news thence. So that, my good friend," he continued, addressing Wamba, "thou mayst assure these tyrants, that whatever violence they exercise on the persons of their prisoners, shall be most severely repaid upon their own."

"Pax robiscum," said Wamba, who was now muffled in his religious disguise.

And so saying, he imitated the solemn and stately deportment of a friar, and departed to execute his mission.

CHAPTER XXVI.

The hottest horse will oft be cool,
The dullest will show fire;
The friar will often play the fool,
The fool will play the friar. Old Song.

When the Jester, arrayed in the cowl and frock of the hermit, and having his knotted cord twisted round his middle, stood before the portal of the castle of Front de Bœuf, the warder demanded of him his name and errand.

"Pax robiscum," answered the Jester, "I am a poor brother of the Order of St. Francis, who come hither to do my office to certain unhappy persons now secured within this castle."

"Thou art a bold friar," said the warder, "to come hither, where, saving our own drunken confessor, a cock of thy feather hath not crowed these seven years."

"Yet I pray thee, do mine errand to the lord of the castle," answered the pretended friar; "trust me, it will find good acceptance with him, and the cock shall crow, that the whole castle shall hear him."

"Gramercy," said the warder; "but if I come to shame for leaving my post upon thine errand, I will try whether a friar's gray gown be proof against a gray-goose shaft."

With this threat he left his turret, and carried

hall of the castle his unwonted intelligence, that oly friar stood before the gate and demanded in- nt admission. With no small wonder he received master's commands to admit the holy man immie- tely; and, having previously manned the entrance guard against surprise, he obeyed, without further uple, the commands which he had received. The ebrained self-conceit which had emboldened Wam- to undertake this dangerous office, was scarce suf- ent to support him when he found himself in the sence of a man so dreadful, and so much dreaded, Reginald Front-de-Bœuf, and he brought out his robiscum, to which he, in a good measure, trusted supporting his character, with more anxiety and ration than had hitherto accompanied it. But nt-de-Bœuf was accustomed to see men of all ks tremble in his presence, so that the timidity of supposed father did not give him any cause of picion. "Who and whence art thou, priest?" l he.

Pax robiscum," reiterated the Jester, "I am a r servant of St. Francis, who, travelling through wilderness, have fallen among thieves, (as Scrip- hath it,) quidam viator incidit in latrones, which ves have sent me unto this castle in order to do ghostly office on two persons condemned by your ourable justice."

Ay, right," answered Front-de-Bœuf; "and canst u tell me, holy father, the number of those ban- i?"

Gallant sir," answered the Jester, "nomen illis io, their name is legion."

Tell me in plain terms what numbers there are, priest, thy cloak and cord will ill protect thee."

Alas!" said the supposed friar, "cor meum eructa- , that is to say, I was like to burst with fear! but I ceive they may be—what of yeomen—what of mmons, at least five hundred men."

What!" said the Templar, who came into the hall t moment, "must we the wasps so thick here? it is e to stifle such a mischievous brood." Then taking nt-de-Bœuf aside, "Knowest thou the priest?"

He is a stranger from a distant convent," said nt-de-Bœuf; "I know him not."

Then trust him not with thy purpose in words," wered the Templar. "Let him carry a written r to De Bracy's company of Free Companions, to ar instantly to their master's aid. In the mean e, and that the shaveling may suspect nothing, mit him to go freely about his task of preparing se Saxon hogs for the slaughter-house."

It shall be so," said Front-de-Bœuf. And he forth- h appointed a domestic to conduct Wamba to the rtment where Cedric and Athelstane were con- ed.

The impatience of Cedric had been rather enhanced n diminished by his confinement. He walked n one end of the hall to the other, with the attitude ne who advances to charge an enemy, or to storm breach of a beleaguered place, sometimes ejaculat- to himself, sometimes addressing Athelstane, who atly and stoically awaited the issue of the adven- e, digesting, in the meantime, with great com- sure, the liberal meal which he had made at noon, d not greatly interesting himself about the dura- n of his captivity, which he concluded, would, e all earthly evils, find an end in Heaven's good te.

Pax robiscum," said the Jester, entering the rtment; "the blessing of St. Dunstan, St. Dunis, Duthoc, and all other saints whatsoever, be upon and about ye."

Enter freely," answered Cedric to the supposed r; "with what intent art thou come hither?"

To bid you prepare yourselves for death," an- ered the Jester.

It is impossible!" replied Cedric, starting. "Fear- s and wicked as they are, they dare not attempt h open and gratuitous cruelty!"

Alas!" said the Jester, "to restrain them by their se of humanity, is the same as to stop a runaway se with a bridle of silk thread. Bethink thee, efore, noble Cedric, and you also, gallant Athel- ne, what crimes you have committed in the flesh; for this very day will ye be called to answer at a higher tribunal."

Hearest thou this, Athelstane?" said Cedric; "we must rouse up our hearts to this last action, since bet- ter it is we should die like men, than live like slaves."

I am ready," answered Athelstane, "to stand the worst of their malice, and shall walk to my death with as much composure as ever I did to my dinner."

Let us then unto our holy gear, father," said Cedric.

Wait yet a moment, good uncle," said the Jester, in his natural tone; "better look long before you leap in the dark."

By my faith," said Cedric, "I should know that voice!"

It is that of your trusty slave and jester," an- swered Wamba, throwing back his cowl. "Had you taken a fool's advice formerly, you would not have been here at all. Take a fool's advice now, and you will not be here long."

How mean'st thou knave?" answered the Saxon.

Even thus," replied Wamba; "take thou this frock and cord, which are all the orders I ever had, and march quietly out of the castle, leaving me your cloak and girdle to take the long leap in thy stead."

Leave thee in my stead!" said Cedric, astonished at the proposal; "why, they would hang thee, my poor knave."

E'en let them do as they are permitted," said Wamba; "I trust —no disparagement to your birth— that the son of Witless may hang in a chain with as much gravity as the chain hung upon his ancestor the alderman."

Well, Wamba," answered Cedric, "for one thing will I grant thy request. And that is, if thou wilt make the exchange of garments with Lord Athel- stane instead of me."

No, by St. Dunstan," answered Wamba; "there were little reason in that. Good right there is, that the son of Witless should suffer to save the son of Hereward; but little wisdom there were in his dying for the benefit of one whose fathers were strangers to his."

Villain," said Cedric, "the fathers of Athelstane were monarchs of England!"

They might be whomsoever they pleased," replied Wamba; "but my neck stands too straight upon my shoulders to have it twisted for their sake. Where- fore, good my master, either take my proffer your- self, or suffer me to leave this dungeon as free as I entered."

Let the old tree wither," continued Cedric, "so the stately hope of the forest be preserved. Save the noble Athelstane, my trusty Wamba! it is the duty of each who has Saxon blood in his veins. Thou and I will abide together the utmost rage of our injurious oppressors, while he, free and safe, shall arouse the awakened spirits of our countrymen to avenge us."

Not so, father Cedric," said Athelstane, grasping his hand,—for, when roused to think or act, his deeds and sentiments were not unbecoming his high race —"Not so," he continued; "I would rather remain in this hall a week without food save the prisoner's allotted loaf, or drink save the prisoner's measure of water, than embrace the opportunity to escape which the slave's untaught kindness has purveyed for his master."

You are called wise men, sirs," said the Jester, "and I a crazed fool; but uncle Cedric, and cousin Athelstane, the fool shall decide this controversy for ye, and save ye the trouble of straining courtesies any farther. I am like John-a-Duck's mare, that will let no man mount her but John-a-Duck. I came to save my master, and if he will not consent—basta I can but go away home again. Kind service cannot be chucked from hand to hand like a shuttlecock or stool-ball. I'll hang for no man but my own born master."

Go, then, noble Cedric," said Athelstane, "neglect not this opportunity. Your presence without may encourage friends to our rescue—your remaining here would ruin us all."

And is there any prospect, then of rescue from without?" said Cedric, looking to the Jester.

"Prospect, indeed!" echoed Wamba; "let me tell you, when you fill my cloak, you are wrapped in a general's cassock. Five hundred men are there without, and I was this morning one of their chief leaders. My fool's cap was a casque, and my bauble a truncheon. Well, we shall see what good they will make by exchanging a fool for a wise man. Truly, I fear they will lose in valour what they may gain in discretion. And so farewell, master, and be kind to poor Gurth and his dog Fangs; and let my cockscomb hang in the hall at Rotherwood, in memory that I flung away my life for my master, like a faithful ——fool."

The last word came out with a sort of double expression, betwixt jest and earnest. The tears stood in Cedric's eyes.

"Thy memory shall be preserved," he said, "while fidelity and affection have honour upon earth! But that I trust I shall find the means of saving Rowena, and thee, Athelstane, and thee also, my poor Wamba, thou shouldst not overbear me in this matter."

The exchange of dress was now accomplished, when a sudden doubt struck Cedric.

"I know no language," he said, "but my own, and a few words of their mincing Norman. How shall I bear myself like a reverend brother?"

"The spell lies in two words," replied Wamba—"Pax vobiscum will answer all queries. If you go or come, eat or drink, bless or ban. Pax vobiscum carries you through it all. It is as useful to a friar as a broomstick to a witch, or a wand to a conjurer. Speak it but thus, in a deep grave tone, Pax vobiscum!—it is irresistible.—Watch and ward, knight and squire, foot and horse, it acts as a charm upon them all. I think, if they bring me out to be hanged tomorrow, as is much to be doubted they may, I will try its weight upon the finisher of the sentence."

"If such prove the case," said his master, "my religious orders are soon taken—Pax vobiscum. I trust I shall remember the pass-word.—Noble Athelstane, farewell; and farewell, my poor boy, whose heart might make amends for a weaker head—I will save you, or return and die with you. The royal blood of our Saxon kings shall not be spilt while mine beats in my veins; nor shall one hair fall from the head of the kind knave who risked himself for his master, if Cedric's peril can prevent it.—Farewell."

"Farewell, noble Cedric," said Athelstane; "remember it is the true part of a friar to accept refreshment, if you are offered any."

"Farewell, uncle," added Wamba; "and remember Pax vobiscum."

Thus exhorted, Cedric sallied forth upon his expedition; and it was not long ere he had occasion to try the force of that spell which his Jester had recommended as omnipotent. In a low-arched and dusky passage, by which he endeavoured to work his way to the hall of the castle, he was interrupted by a female form.

"Pax vobiscum!" said the pseudo friar, and was endeavouring to hurry past, when a soft voice replied, "Et vobis—quæso, domine reverendissime, pro misericordia vestra."

"I am somewhat deaf," replied Cedric, in good Saxon, and at the same time muttered to himself, "A curse on the fool, and his Pax vobiscum! I have lost my javelin at the first cast."

It was, however, no unusual thing for a priest of those days to be deaf of his Latin ear, and this the person who now addressed Cedric knew full well.

"I pray you of dear love, reverend father," she replied in his own language, "that you will deign to visit with your ghostly comfort a wounded prisoner of this castle, and have such compassion upon him and us, as thy holy office teaches—Never shall good deed so highly advantage thy convent."

"Daughter," answered Cedric, much embarrassed, "my time in this castle will not permit me to exercise the duties of mine office—I must presently forth—there is life and death upon my speed."

"Yet, father, let me entreat you by the vow you have taken on you," replied the suppliant, "not to leave the oppressed and endangered without counsel or succour."

"May the fiend fly away with me, and leave me in Ifrin with the souls of Odin and of Thor!" answered Cedric impatiently, and would probably have proceeded in the same tone of total departure from his spiritual character, when the colloquy was interrupted by the harsh voice of Urfried, the old crone of the turret.

"How, minion," said she to the female speaker, "is this the manner in which you requite the kindness which permitted thee to leave thy prison-cell yonder?—Puttest thou the reverend man to use un gracious language to free himself from the importunities of a Jewess?"

"A Jewess!" said Cedric, availing himself of the information to get clear of their interruption,—"Let me pass, woman! stop me not at your peril. I am fresh from my holy office, and would avoid pollution."

"Come this way, father," said the old hag, "thou art a stranger in this castle, and canst not leave it without a guide. Come hither, for I would speak with thee.—And you, daughter of an accursed race, go to the sick man's chamber, and tend him until my return; and woe betide you if you again quit it without my permission!"

Rebecca retreated. Her importunities had prevailed upon Urfried to suffer her to quit the turret, and Urfried had employed her services where she herself would most gladly have paid them, by the bedside of the wounded Ivanhoe. With an understanding awake to their dangerous situation, and prompt to avail herself of each means of safety which occurred, Rebecca had hoped something from the presence of a man of religion, who, she learned from Urfried, had penetrated into this godless castle. She watched the return of the supposed ecclesiastic, with the purpose of addressing him, and interesting him in favour of the prisoners; with what imperfect success the reader has been just acquainted.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Fond wretch! and what canst thou relate,
But deeds of sorrow, shame, and sin?
Thy deeds are proved—thou know'st thy fate;
But come, thy tale—begin—begin.

* * * * *

But I have griefs of other kind,
Troubles and sorrows more severe;
Give me to ease my tortured mind,
Lend to my woes a patient ear;
And let me, if I may not find
A friend to help—find one to hear.

Crabbe's Hall of Justice

When Urfried had with clamours and menaces driven Rebecca back to the apartment from which she had sallied, she proceeded to conduct the unwilling Cedric into a small apartment, the door of which she heedfully secured. Then fetching from a cupboard a stoup of wine and two flagons, she placed them on the table, and said in a tone rather asserting a fact than asking a question, "Thou art Saxon, father—Deny it not," she continued, observing that Cedric hastened not to reply; "the sounds of my native language are sweet to mine ears, though seldom heard save from the tongues of the wretched and degraded serfs on whom the proud Normans impose the meanest drudgery of this dwelling. Thou art a Saxon, father—a Saxon, and, save as thou art a servant of God, a freeman.—Thine accents are sweet in mine ear."

"Do not Saxon priests visit this castle, then?" replied Cedric; "it were, methinks, their duty to comfort the outcast and oppressed children of the soil."

"They come not—or if they come, they better love to revel at the boards of their conquerors," answered Urfried, "than to hear the groans of their countrymen—so, at least, report speaks of them—of myself I can say little. This castle, for ten years, has opened to no priest save the debauched Norman chaplain who partook the nightly revels of Front-de-Bœuf, and he has been long gone to render an account of his stewardship.—But thou art a Saxon—a Saxon priest, and I have one question to ask of thee."

"I am a Saxon," answered Cedric, "but unworthy, surely, of the name of priest. Let me begone on y—I swear I will return, or send one of our more worthy to hear your confession."

y yet awhile," said Urfried; "the accents of ce which thou hearest now will soon be choked e cold earth, and I would not descend to it beast I have lived. But wine must give me h to tell the horrors of my tale." She poured p, and drank it with a frightful avidity, which desirous of draining the last drop in the gob- lt stupifies," she said, looking upwards as she l her draught, "but it cannot cheer.—Partake r, if you would hear my tale without sinking pon the pavement." Cedric would have avoid- ging her in this ominous conviviality, but the ich she made to him expressed impatience pair. He complied with her request, and an- her challenge in a large wine-cup; she then ed with her story, as if appeased by his com- ce.

as not born," she said, "father, the wretch u now scest me. I was free, was happy, was d, loved, and was beloved. I am now a slave, le and degraded—the sport of my masters' s while I had yet beauty—the object of their pt, scorn, and hatred, since it has passed Dost thou wonder, father, that I should hate d, and, above all, the race that has wrought nge in me? Can the wrinkled decrepit hag here, whose wrath must vent itself in impotent forget she was once the daughter of the noble of Torquilstone, before whose frown a thou- ssals trembled?"

u the daughter of Torquil Wolfganger!" said receding as he spoke; "thou—thou—the r of that noble Saxon, my father's friend and ion in arms!"

father's friend!" echoed Urfried; "then Ce- led the Saxon stands before me, for the noble rd of Rotherwood had but one son, whose well known among his countrymen. But if t Cedric of Rotherwood, why this religious -hast thou too despaired of saving thy country, ght refuge from oppression in the shade of the ?"

natters not who I am," said Cedric; "proceed, y woman, with thy tale of horror and guilt!— ere must be—there is guilt even in thy living ."

re is—there is," answered the wretched wo- ep, black, damning guilt—guilt, that lies like at my breast—guilt, that all the penitential hereafter cannot cleanse.—Yes, in these halls, with the noble and pure blood of my father r brethren—in these very halls, to have lived amour of their murderer, the slave at once and taker of his pleasures, was to render every which I drew of vital air, a crime and a tched woman!" exclaimed Cedric. "And e friends of thy father—while each true Saxon s it breathed a requiem for his soul, and those aliant sons, forgot not in their prayers the d Ulrica—while all mourned and honoured l, thou hast lived to merit our hate and exe- —lived to unite thyself with the vile tyrant rdered thy nearest and dearest—who shed the f infancy, rather than a male of the noble f Torquil Wolfganger should survive—with thou lived to unite thyself, and in the bands ss love!"

awless bands, indeed, but not in those of answered the hag; "love will sooner visit the of eternal doom, than those unhallowed -No, with that at least I cannot reproach -hatred to Front-de-Beuf and his race go- ny soul most deeply, even in the hour of his idearments."

hated him, and yet you lived," replied Ced- retch! was there no poniard—no knife—no —Well was it for thee, since thou didst prize existence, that the secrets of a Norman cas- ke those of the grave. For had I but dreamed aughter of Torquil living in foul communion murderer of her father the sword of a true Saxon had found thee out even in the arms paramour!"

"Wouldst thou indeed have done this justice name of Torquil!" said Ulrica, for we may n aside her assumed name of Urfried; "thou a the true Saxon report speaks thee! for even these accursed walls, where, as thou well guilt shrouds itself in inscrutable mystery, ever has the name of Cedric been sounded—and I, wr and degraded, have rejoiced to think that th breathed an avenger of our unhappy nation. have had my hours of vengeance—I have fo the quarrels of our foes, and heated drunken into murderous broil—I have seen their blood f have heard their dying groans! Look on me, —are there not still left on this foul and fade some traces of the features of Torquil!"

"Ask me not of them, Ulrica," replied Cedr tone of grief mixed with abhorrence; "these form such a resemblance as arises from the of the dead, when a fiend has animated the corpse."

"Be it so," answered Ulrica; "yet wore fiendish features the mask of a spirit of light they were able to set at variance the elder Fro Beuf and his son Reginald! The darkness should hide what followed, but revenge must l veil, and darkly intimate what it would raise th to speak aloud. Long had the smouldering discord glowed between the tyrant father a savage son—long had I nursed, in secret, the tural hatred—it blazed forth in an hour of dr wassail, and at his own board fell my oppres the hand of his own son—such are the secrets vaults conceal!—Read asunder, ye accursed ar she added, looking up towards the roof, "and in your fall all who are conscious of the h mystery!"

"And thou, creature of guilt and misery, Cedric, "what became thy lot on the death ravisher?"

"Guess it, but ask it not.—Here—here I dw age, premature age, has stamped its ghastly fe on my countenance—scorned and insulted w was once obeyed, and compelled to bound the r which had once such ample scope, to the eff petty malice of a discontented menial, or the unheeded curses of an impotent hag—condem hear from my lonely turret the sounds of rev which I once partook, or the shrieks and gr new victims of oppression."

"Ulrica," said Cedric, "with a heart which fear, regrets the lost reward of thy crimes, as as the deeds by which thou didst acquire that how didst thou dare to address thee to on wears this robe? Consider, unhappy woman could the sainted Edward himself do for the he here in bodily presence? The royal Co was endowed by Heaven with power to clear ulcers of the body, but only God himself can c leprosy of the soul."

"Yet, turn not from me, stern prophet of w she exclaimed, "but tell me, if thou canst, i shall terminate these new and awful feelin burst on my solitude.—Why do deeds, long done, rise before me in new and irresistible he What fate is prepared beyond the grave for whom God has assigned on earth a lot o unspeakable wretchedness? Better had I t Woden, Hertha, and Zernebock—to Mista, Skogula, the Gods of our yet unbaptized anc than endure the dreadful anticipations which l late haunted my waking and my sleeping hou

"I am no priest," said Cedric, turning with from this miserable picture of guilt, wretch and despair; "I am no priest, though I wear a garment."

"Priest or layman," answered Ulrica, "th the first I have seen for twenty years, by whic was feared or man regarded; and dost thou despair?"

"I bid thee repent," said Cedric. "Seek t and penance, and mayest thou find acceptanc I cannot, I will not, longer abide with thee."

"Pray yet a moment!" said Ulrica; "leave me now, son of my father's friend, lest the demon that has governed my life should tempt me to avenge myself of thy hard-hearted scorn. Thinkest thou, if Front-de-Bœuf found Cedric the Saxon in his castle, on such a disguise, that thy life would be a long one? Already his eye has been upon thee like a falcon on his prey."

"And be it so," said Cedric; "and let him tear me with beak and talons, ere my tongue say one word which my heart doth not warrant. I will die a Saxon—true in word, open in deed. I bid thee avaunt! touch me not, stay me not! The sight of Front-de-Bœuf himself is less odious to me than thou, degraded and degenerate as thou art."

"Be it so," said Ulrica, no longer interrupting him; "go thy way, and forget, in the insolence of thy superiority, that the wretch before thee is the daughter of thy father's friend. Go thy way—if I am separated from mankind by my sufferings—separated from those whose aid I might most justly expect—not less will I be separated from them in my revenge! No man shall aid me, but the ears of all men shall tingle to hear of the deed which I shall dare to do! Farewell!—thy scorn has burst the last tie which seemed yet to unite me to my kind—a thought that my woes might claim the compassion of my people."

"Ulrica," said Cedric, softened by this appeal, "hast thou borne up and endured to live through so much guilt and so much misery, and wilt thou now yield to despair when thine eyes are opened to thy crimes, and when repentance were thy fittest occupation?"

"Cedric," answered Ulrica, "thou little knowest the human heart. To act as I have acted, to think as I have thought, requires the maddening love of pleasure, mingled with the keen appetite of revenge, the proud consciousness of power; draughts too intoxicating for the human heart to bear, and... yet retain the power to prevent. Their force has long passed away. Age has no pleasures, wrinkles have no influence, revenge itself dies away in impotent curses. Then comes remorse, with all its vipers, mixed with vain regrets for the past, and despair for the future! —Then, when all other strong impulses have ceased, we become like the fiends in hell, who may feel remorse, but never repentance. But thy words have awakened a new soul within me—Well hast thou said, all is possible to those who dare to die! Thou hast shown me the means of revenge, and be assured I will embrace them. It has hitherto shared this wasted bosom with other and with rival passions—henceforward it shall possess me wholly, and thou thyself shall say, that, whatever was the life of Ulrica, her death well became the daughter of the noble Torquil. There is a force without beleaguering this accursed castle—hasten to lead them to the attack, and when thou shalt see a red flag wave from the turret on the eastern angle of the donjon, press the Normans hard—they will then have enough to do within, and you may win the wall in spite both of bow and mangonel.—Begone, I pray thee—follow thine own fate, and leave me to mine."

Cedric would have inquired farther into the purpose which she thus darkly announced, but the stern voice of Front-de-Bœuf was heard, exclaiming, "Where tarries this loitering priest? By the scallop-shell of Compostella, I will make a martyr of him, if he loiters here to hatch treason among my domestics!"

"What a true prophet," said Ulrica, "is an evil conscience! But heed him not—out and to thy people—Cry your Saxon onslaught, and let them sing their war-song of Rollo, if they will; vengeance shall bear a burden to it."

As she thus spoke, she vanished through a private door, and Reginald Front-de-Bœuf entered the apartment. Cedric, with some difficulty, compelled himself to make obeisance to the haughty Baron, who returned his courtesy with a slight inclination of the head.

"Thy penitents, father, have made a long shrift—it is the better for them, since it is the last they shall ever make. Hast thou prepared them for death?"

"I found them," said Cedric, in such French as he could command, "expecting the worst, from the moment they knew into whose power they had fallen."

"How now, Sir Friar," replied Front-de-Bœuf, "thy speech methinks, smacks of a Saxon tongue?"

"I was bred in the convent of St. Withold of Burton," answered Cedric.

"Ay!" said the Baron; "it had been better for thee to have been a Norman, and better for my purpose too; but need has no choice of messengers. That St. Withold's of Burton is a howlet's nest worth the harrying. The day will soon come that the frock shall protect the Saxon as little as the mail-coat."

"God's will be done," said Cedric, in a voice tremulous with passion, which Front-de-Bœuf imputed to fear.

"I see," said he, "thou dreamest already that our men-at-arms are in thy refectory and thy ale-vaults—But do me one cast of thy holy office, and, come what list of others, thou shalt sleep as safe in thy cell as a snail within his shell of proof."

"Speak your commands," said Cedric, with suppressed emotion.

"Follow me through this passage, then, that I may dismiss thee by the postern."

And as he strode on his way before the supposed friar, Front-de-Bœuf thus schooled him in the part which he desired he should act.

"Thou seest, Sir Friar, you herd of Saxon swine, who have dared to environ this castle of Torquilstone. Tell them whatever thou hast a mind of the weakness of this fortalice, or aught else that can detain them before it for twenty-four hours. Mean time bear thou this scroll.—But soft—canst read, Sir Priest?"

"Not a jot I," answered Cedric, "save on my breviary; and then I know the characters, because I have the holy service by heart, praised be Our Lady and St. Withold!"

"The fitter messenger for my purpose.—Carry thou this scroll to the castle of Philip de Malvoisin; say it cometh from me, and is written by the Templar Brian de Bois-Guilbert, and that I pray him to send it to York with all the speed man and horse can make. Mean while, tell him to doubt nothing, he shall find us whole and sound behind our battlement—Shame on it, that we should be compelled to hide thus by a pack of runagates, who are wont to fly even at the flash of our pennons and the tramp of our horses! I say to thee, priest, contrive some cast of thine art to keep the knaves where they are, until our friends bring up their lances. My vengeance is awake, and she is a falcon that slumbers not till she has been gorged."

"By my patron saint," said Cedric, with deeper energy than became his character, "and by every saint who has lived and died in England, your commands shall be obeyed! Not a Saxon shall stir from before these walls, if I have art and influence to detain them there."

"Ha!" said Front-de-Bœuf, "thou changest thy tone, Sir Priest, and speakest briefly and bold, as if thy heart were in the slaughter of the Saxon herd; and yet thou art thyself of kindred to the swine."

Cedric was no ready practiser of the art of dissimulation, and would at this moment have been much the better of a hint from Wamba's more fertile brain. But necessity, according to the ancient proverb, sharpens invention, and he muttered something under his cowl concerning the men in question being excommunicated outlaws both to church and to kingdom.

"Despardieux," answered Front-de-Bœuf, "thou hast spoken the very truth—I forgot that the knaves can strip a fat abbot, as well as if they had been born south of yonder salt channel. Was it not he of St. Ives whom they tied to an oak-tree, and compelled to sing a mass while they were rifling his mails and his wallets?—No, by our Lady—that jest was played by Gualtier of Middleton, one of our own companions-at-arms. But they were Saxons who robbed the chapel at St. Bees of cup, candlestick, and chalice, were they not?"

"They were godless men," answered Cedric.

"Ay, and they drank out all the good wine and ale that lay in store for many a secret carousal, while ye pretend ye are but busied with vigils and prime—Priest, thou art bound to revenge such sacrilege—"

"I am indeed bound to vengeance," murmured Cedric; "Saint Withold knows my heart."

Front-de-Bœuf, in the mean while, led the way to a postern, where, passing the moat on a single plank, they reached a small barbican, or exterior defence, which communicated with the open field by a well-fortified sally-port.

"Begone, then; and if thou wilt do mine errand, and if thou return hither when it is done, thou shalt see Saxon flesh cheap as ever was hog's in the shambles of Sheffield. And, hark thee, thou seemest to be a jolly confessor—come hither after the onslaught, and thou shalt have as much Malvoisie as would drench thy whole convent."

"Assuredly we shall meet again," answered Cedric.

"Something in hand the whilst," continued the Norman; and, as they parted at the postern door, he thrust into Cedric's reluctant hand a gold byzant, adding, "Remember, I will flay off both cowl and skin, if thou failest in thy purpose."

"And full leave will I give thee to do both," answered Cedric, leaving the postern, and striding forth over the free field with a joyful step, "if, when we meet next, I deserve not better at thine hand."—Turning then back towards the castle, he threw the piece of gold towards the donor, exclaiming at the same time, "False Norman, thy money perish with thee!"

Front-de-Bœuf heard the words imperfectly, but the action was suspicious. "Archers," he called to the warders on the outward battlements, "send me an arrow through you monk's frock!—yet stay," he said, as his retainers were bending their bows, "it avails not—we must thus far trust him since we have no better shift. I think he dares not betray me—at the worst I can but treat with these Saxon dogs whom I have safe in kennel.—Ho! Giles jailor, let them bring Cedric of Rotherwood before me, and the other churl, his companion—him I mean of Coningsburgh—Athelstane there, or what call they him? Their very names are an encumbrance to a Norman knight's mouth, and have, as it were, a flavour of bacon—Give me a stoup of wine, as jolly Prince John said, that I may wash away the relish—place it in the armory, and thither lead the prisoners."

His commands were obeyed; and, upon entering that Gothic armour, hung with many spoils won by his own valour and that of his father, he found a flagon of wine on the massive oaken table, and the two Saxon captives under the guard of four of his dependants. Front-de-Bœuf took a long draught of wine, and then addressed his prisoners; for the manner in which Wamba drew the cap over his face, the change of dress, the gloomy and broken light, and the Baron's imperfect acquaintance with the features of Cedric, (who avoided his Norman neighbours, and seldom stirred beyond his own domains,) prevented him from discovering that the most important of his captives had made his escape.

"Gallants of England," said Front-de-Bœuf, "how relish ye your entertainment at Torquilstone?—Are ye yet aware what your surquedy and *outrecuidance merit, for scoffing at the entertainment of a prince of the House of Anjou?—Have ye forgotten how ye requited the unmerited hospitality of the royal John? By God and St. Dennis, an ye pay not the richer ransom, I will hang ye up by the feet from the iron bars of these windows, till the kites and hooded crows have made skeletons of you!—Speak out, ye Saxon dogs—what bid ye for your worthless lives?—How say you, you of Rotherwood?"

"Not a doit I," answered poor Wamba—"and for hanging up by the feet, my brain has been topsy-turvy, they say, ever since the biggin was bound first round my head; so turning me upside down may peradventure restore it again."

"Saint Genevieve!" said Front-de-Bœuf, "what have we got here?"

And with the back of his hand he struck Cedric's cap from the head of the Jester, and throwing open his collar, discovered the fatal badge of servitude, the silver collar round his neck.

"Giles—Clement—dogs and varlets!" exclaimed the furious Norman, "what have you brought me here?"

"I think I can tell you," said De Bracy, who just entered the apartment. "This is Cedric's clown, who fought so manful a skirmish with Isaac of York, about a question of precedence."

"I shall settle it for them both," replied Front-de-Bœuf; "they shall hang on the same gallows, unless his master and this boar of Coningsburgh will pay well for their lives. Their wealth is the least they can surrender; they must also carry off with them the swarms that are besetting the castle, subscribe a surrender of their pretended immunities, and live under us as serfs and vassals; too happy if, in the new world that is about to begin, we leave them the breath of their nostrils.—Go," said he, to two of his attendants, "fetch me the right Cedric hither, and I pardon your error for once; the rather that you but mistook a fool for a Saxon franklin."

"Ay, but," said Wamba, "your chivalrous excellency will find there are more fools than franklins among us."

"What means the knave?" said Front-de-Bœuf, looking towards his followers, who, lingering and loath, faltered forth their belief, that if this were not Cedric who was there in presence, they knew not what was become of him.

"Saints of Heaven!" exclaimed De Bracy, "he must have escaped in the monk's garments!"

"Fiends of hell!" echoed Front-de-Bœuf, "it was then the boar of Rotherwood whom I ushered to the postern, and dismissed with my own hands!—And thou," he said to Wamba, "whose folly could over reach the wisdom of idiots yet more gross than thy self—I will give thee holy orders—I will shave thy crown for thee!—Here, let them tear the scalp from his head, and then pitch him headlong from the battlements—Thy trade is to jest, canst thou jest now?"

"You deal with me better than your word, noble knight," whimpered forth poor Wamba, whose habits of buffoonery were not to be overcome even by the immediate prospect of death; "if you give me the red cap you propose, out of a simple monk you will make a cardinal."

"The poor wretch," said De Bracy, "is resolved to die in his vocation.—Front-de-Bœuf you shall not slay him. Give him to me to make sport for my Free Companions.—How sayst thou, knave? Wilt thou take heart of grace, and go to the wars with me?"

"Ay, with my master's leave," said Wamba; "for, look you, I must not slip collar" (and he touched that which he wore) "without his permission."

"Oh, a Norman saw will soon cut a Saxon collar," said De Bracy.

"Ay, noble sir," said Wamba, "and thence goes the proverb—

> 'Norman saw on English oak,
> On English neck a Norman yoke;
> Norman spoon in English dish,
> And England ruled as Normans wish:
> Blithe world to England never will be more,
> Till England's rid of all the four.'"

"Thou dost well, De Bracy," said Front-de-Bœuf, "to stand there listening to a fool's jargon, when destruction is gaping for us! Seest thou not we are overreached, and that our proposed mode of communicating with our friends without has been disconcerted by this same motley gentleman thou art so fond to brother? What views have we to expect but instant storm?"

"To the battlements then," said De Bracy; "when didst thou ever see me the graver for the thoughts of battle? Call the Templar yonder, and let him fight but half so well for his life as he has done for his Order—Make thou to the walls thyself with thy huge body—Let me do my poor endeavour in my own way, and I tell thee the Saxon outlaws may as well attempt to scale the clouds, as the castle of Torquilstone; or, if you will treat with the banditti, why not employ the mediation of this worthy franklin, who seems in such deep contemplation of the wine-flagon?—Here, Saxon," he continued, addressing

* Surquedy and outrecuidance—insolence and presumption.

Athelstane, and handing the cup to him, "rinse thy throat with that noble liquor, and rouse up thy soul to say what thou wilt do for thy liberty."

"What a man of mould may," answered Athelstane, "providing it be what a man of manhood ought. -Dismiss me free, with my companions, and I will pay a ransom of a thousand marks."

"And wilt moreover assure us the retreat of that scum of mankind who are swarming around the castle, contrary to God's peace and the king's?" said Front-de-Bœuf.

"In so far as I can," answered Athelstane, "I will withdraw them; and I fear not but that my father Cedric will do his best to assist me."

"We are agreed then," said Front-de-Bœuf—"thou and they are to be set at freedom, and peace is to be on both sides, for payment of a thousand marks. It is a trifling ransom, Saxon, and thou wilt owe gratitude to the moderation which accepts of it in exchange of your persons. But mark, this extends not to the Jew Isaac."

"Nor to the Jew Isaac's daughter," said the Templar, who had now joined them.

"Neither," said Front-de-Bœuf, "belong to this Saxon's company."

"I were unworthy to be called Christian, if they did" replied Athelstane: "deal with the unbelievers as ye list."

"Neither does the ransom include the Lady Rowena," said De Bracy. "It shall never be said I was scared out of a fair prize without striking a blow for it."

"Neither," said Front-de-Bœuf, "does our treaty refer to this wretched Jester, whom I retain, that I may make him an example to every knave who turns jest into earnest."

"The Lady Rowena," answered Athelstane, with the most steady countenance, "is my affianced bride. I will be drawn by wild horses before I consent to part with her. The slave Wamba has this day saved the life of my father Cedric—I will lose mine ere a hair of his head be injured."

"Thy affianced bride?—The Lady Rowena the affianced bride of a vassal like thee?" said De Bracy; "Saxon, thou dreamest that the days of thy seven kingdoms are returned again. I tell thee, the Princes of the House of Anjou confer not their wards on men of such lineage as thine."

"My lineage, proud Norman," replied Athelstane, "is drawn from a source more pure and ancient than that of a beggarly Frenchman, whose living is won by selling the blood of the thieves whom he assembles under his paltry standard. Kings were my ancestors, strong in war and wise in council, who every day feasted in their hall more hundreds than thou canst number individual followers; whose names have been sung by minstrels, and their laws recorded by Witenagemotes; whose bones were interred amid the prayers of saints, and over whose tombs minsters have been builded."

"Thou hast it, De Bracy," said Front-de-Bœuf, well pleased with the rebuff which his companion had received; "the Saxon hath hit thee fairly."

"As fairly as a captive can strike," said De Bracy, with apparent carelessness; "for he whose hands are tied should have his tongue at freedom.—But thy glibness of reply, comrade," rejoined he, speaking to Athelstane, "will not win the freedom of the Lady Rowena."

To this Athelstane, who had already made a longer speech than was his custom to do on any topic, however interesting, returned no answer. The conversation was interrupted by the arrival of a menial, who announced that a monk demanded admittance at the postern gate.

"In the name of Saint Benno, the prince of these bull-beggars," said Front-de-Bœuf, "have we a real monk this time or another impostor? Search him, slaves—for an ye suffer a second impostor to be palmed upon you, I will have your eyes torn out, and hot coals put into the sockets."

"Let me endure the extremity of your anger, my lord," said Giles, "if this be not a real shaveling. Four squire Joscelyn knows him well, and will vouch him to be brother Ambrose, a monk in attendance upon the Prior of Jorvaulx."

"Admit him," said Front-de-Bœuf; "most likely he brings us news from his jovial master. Surely the devil keeps holiday, and the priests are relieved from duty, that they are strolling thus wildly through the country. Remove the captive prisoners; and, Saxon, thou shalt on what thou hast heard."

"I claim," said Athelstane, "an honourable imprisonment, with due care of my board and of my couch, as becomes my rank, and as is due to one who is in treaty for ransom. Moreover, I hold him that deems himself the best of you, bound to answer to me with his body for this aggression on my freedom. This defiance hath already been sent to thee by thy sewer; thou underliest it, and art bound to answer me—There lies my glove."

"I answer not the challenge of my prisoner," said Front-de-Bœuf; "nor shalt thou, Maurice de Bracy. Giles," he continued, "hang the franklin's glove upon the tine of yonder branched antlers: there shall it remain until he is a free man. Should he then presume to demand it, or to affirm he was unlawfully made my prisoner, by the belt of Saint Christopher, he will speak to one who hath never refused to meet a foe on foot or on horseback, alone or with his vassals at his back!"

The Saxon prisoners were accordingly removed, just as they introduced the monk Ambrose, who appeared to be in great perturbation.

"This is the real Deus robiscum," said Wamba, as he passed the reverend brother; "the others were but counterfeits."

"Holy Mother!" said the monk, as he addressed the assembled knights, "I am at last safe and in Christian keeping!"

"Safe thou art," replied De Bracy; "and for Christianity, here is the stout Baron Reginald Front-de-Bœuf, whose utter abomination is a Jew; and the good Knight Templar, Brian de Bois-Guilbert, whose trade is to slay Saracens—If these are not good marks of Christianity, I know no other which they bear about them."

"Ye are friends and allies of our reverend father in God, Aymer, Prior of Jorvaulx," said the monk, without noticing the tone of De Bracy's reply; "ye owe him aid both by knightly faith and holy charity; for what saith the blessed Saint Augustin, in his treatise De Civitate Dei"——

"What saith the devil!" interrupted Front-de-Bœuf; "or rather what dost thou say, Sir Priest? We have little time to hear texts from the holy fathers."

"Sancta Maria!" ejaculated Father Ambrose, "how prompt to ire are these unhallowed laymen!—But be it known to you, brave knights, that certain murderous caitiffs, casting behind them fear of God, and reverence of his church, and not regarding the bull of the holy see, Si quis, suadente Diabolo"——

"Brother priest," said the Templar, "all this we know or guess at—tell us plainly, is thy master, the Prior, made prisoner, and to whom?"

"Surely," said Ambrose, "he is in the hands of the men of Belial, infesters of these woods, and contemners of the holy text, 'Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets naught of evil.'"

"Here is a new argument for our swords, sirs," said Front-de-Bœuf, turning to his companions; "and so, instead of reaching us any assistance, the Prior of Jorvaulx requests aid at our hands? a man is well helped of these lazy churchmen when he hath most to do!—But speak out, priest, and say at once, what doth thy master expect from us?"

"So please you," said Ambrose, "violent hands having been imposed on my reverend superior, contrary to the holy ordinance which I did already quote, and the men of Belial having rifled his mails and budgets, and stripped him of two hundred marks of pure refined gold, they do yet demand of him a large sum beside, ere they will suffer him to depart from their uncircumcised hands. Wherefore the reverend father in God prays you, as his dear friends, to rescue him, either by paying down the ransom at which they hold him, or by force of arms, at your best discretion."

"The foul fiend quell the Prior!" said Front-de morning's draught has been a deep one. [illegible] of a Norman baron un- [illegible] to relieve a churchman, whose bags [illegible] as weighty as ours?—And how can we [illegible] labour to the [illegible], that are cooped up [illegible] our number, and expect an assault [illegible]?"

[illegible] was what I was about to tell you," said [illegible] had your business allowed me time. [illegible] and these foul onslaughts [illegible] brain. Nevertheless, it is of [illegible] a camp and raise a bank [illegible]."

[illegible] said De Bracy, "and let us [illegible];" and so saying, [illegible] window which led to a sort of [illegible] balcony, and immediately called to those in the apartment—"Saint Den[nis]! [the o]ld monk hath brought true tidings!—[they bring f]orward mantelets and pavisses,* and the [illegible] of the wood like a dark [illegible] storm."

[F]ront-de-Bœuf also looked out upon the [illegible] snatched his bugle; and, after [illegible] a loud blast, commanded his men on the walls.

[illegible] look to the eastern side, where the walls [illegible] Noble Bois-Guilbert, thy trade hath well [taught thee] how to attack and defend, look thou to [illegible]—I myself will take post at the bar[bican]—do not confine your exertions to any one [illegible] ends!—we must this day be every where, [and multiply] ourselves, were it possible, so as to carry [illegible] succour and relief wherever the attack [illegible]. Our numbers are few, but activity and [illegible] supply that defect, since we have only [to do with ra]scal clowns."

[illegible] knights," exclaimed Father Ambrose, [amidst the b]ustle and confusion occasioned by the [preparations] for defence, "will none of ye hear the [illegible] reverend father in God, Aymer, Prior of [Jorvaulx? I] beseech thee to hear me, noble Sir Re[ginald]!"

[illegible] thy petitions to heaven," said the fierce [illegible], "for we on earth have no time to listen to [them. What ho] there Anselm! see that seething pitch and [oil are ready] to pour on the heads of these audacious [traitors. Loo]k that the cross-bow-men lack not bolts.† [Fling abroa]d my banner with the old bull's head [illegible] shall soon find with whom they have to [deal]!"

[illegible] sir," continued the monk, persevering [in his endeav]ours to draw attention, "consider my [illegible], and let me discharge myself of my [illegible] errand."

[illegible] this prating dotard," said Front-de-[Bœuf, "lock] him up in the chapel, to tell his beads till [the broil be o]ver. It will be a new thing to the saints [illegible] to hear aves and paters; they have [not been so] honoured, I trow, since they were cut [illegible]."

[illegible] not the holy saints, Sir Reginald," [illegible] "we shall have need of their aid to-day [illegible]."

[illegible] hand," said Front-de-[Bœuf illegible] the battle[ments illegible] villains. There is a huge [illegible], sufficient to bear [illegible] earth."

[illegible] had in the mean time been looking [illegible] of the besiegers, with rather [illegible] than Front-de-Bœuf or his [illegible].

[illegible]" he said, "these men [illegible] than could [illegible], however they come by it. See ye [illegible] were temporary and moveable defences formed of [illegible] cover of which the assailants advanced to the [illegible] places of old. Pavisses were a species of [illegible] covering the whole person employed on the same [illegible].

† [illegible] the arrow peculiarly fitted to the cross-bow, as [that of the lon]g bow was called a shaft. Hence the English [illegible] either make a shaft or a bolt of it," signifying a [illegible] to make one use or other of the thing spoken of.

how dexterously they avail themselves of every cover which a tree or bush affords, and shun exposing themselves to the shot of our cross-bows? I spy neither banner nor pennon among them, and yet will I gage my golden chain, that they are led on by some noble knight or gentleman, skilful in the practice of wars."

"I espy him," said De Bracy; "I see the waving of a knight's crest, and the gleam of his armour. See yon tall man in the black mail, who is busied marshalling the farther troop of the rascaille yeomen—by Saint Dennis, I hold him to be the same whom we called Le Noir Fainéant, who overthrew thee, Front-de-Bœuf, in the lists at Ashby."

"So much the better," said Front-de-Bœuf, "that he comes here to give me my revenge. Some hilding fellow he must be, who dared not stay to assert his claim to the tourney prize which chance had assigned him. I should in vain have sought for him where knights and nobles seek their foes, and right glad am I he hath here shown himself among yon villain yeomanry."

The demonstrations of the enemy's immediate approach cut off all farther discourse. Each knight repaired to his post, and at the head of the few followers whom they were able to muster, and who were in numbers inadequate to defend the whole extent of the walls, they awaited with calm determination the threatened assault.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

This wandering race, sever'd from other men,
Boast yet their intercourse with human arts;
The seas, the woods, the deserts, which they haunt,
Find them acquainted with their secret treasures:
And unregarded herbs, and flowers, and blossoms,
Display undreamt-of powers when gather'd by them.

The Jew.

Our history must needs retrograde for the space of a few pages, to inform the reader of certain passages material to his understanding the rest of this important narrative. His own intelligence may indeed have easily anticipated that, when Ivanhoe sunk down, and seemed abandoned by all the world, it was the importunity of Rebecca which prevailed on her father to have the gallant young warrior transported from the lists to the house which for the time the Jews inhabited in the suburbs of Ashby.

It would not have been difficult to have persuaded Isaac to this step in any other circumstances, for his disposition was kind and grateful. But he had also the prejudices and scrupulous timidity of his persecuted people, and those were to be conquered.

"Holy Abraham!" he exclaimed, "he is a good youth, and my heart bleeds to see the gore trickle down his rich embroidered hacqueton, and his corslet of goodly price—but to carry him to our house!—damsel, hast thou well considered?—he is a Christian, and by our law we may not deal with the stranger and Gentile, save for the advantage of our commerce."

"Speak not so, my dear father," replied Rebecca; "we may not indeed mix with them in banquet and in jollity; but in wounds and in misery, the Gentile becometh the Jew's brother."

"I would I knew what the Rabbi Jacob Ben Tudela would opine on it," replied Isaac:—"nevertheless, the good youth must not bleed to death. Let Seth and Reuben bear him to Ashby."

"Nay, let them place him in my litter," said Rebecca; "I will mount one of the palfreys."

"That were to expose thee to the gaze of those dogs of Ishmael and of Edom," whispered Isaac, with a suspicious glance towards the crowd of knights and squires. But Rebecca was already busied in carrying her charitable purpose into effect, and listed not what he said, until Isaac, seizing the sleeve of her mantle, again exclaimed, in a hurried voice—"Beard of Aaron!—what if the youth perish! if he die in our custody, shall we not be held guilty of his blood, and be torn to pieces by the multitude?"

"He will not die, my father," said Rebecca, gently extricating herself from the grasp of Isaac—"he will not die, unless we abandon him; and if so, we are indeed answerable for his blood to God and to man."

"Nay," said Isaac, releasing his hold, "it grieveth me as much to see the drops of his blood, as if they were so many golden byzants from mine own purse; and I well know, that the lessons of Miriam, daughter of the Rabbi Manasses of Byzantium, whose soul is in Paradise, have made thee skilful in the art of healing, and that thou knowest the craft of herbs, and the force of elixirs. Therefore, do as thy mind giveth thee—thou art a good damsel, a blessing, and a crown, and a song of rejoicing unto me and unto my house; and unto the people of my fathers."

The apprehensions of Isaac, however, were not ill founded; and the generous and grateful benevolence of his daughter exposed her, on her return to Ashby, to the unallowed gaze of Brian de Bois-Guilbert. The Templar twice passed and repassed them on the road, fixing his bold and ardent look on the beautiful Jewess; and we have already seen the consequences of the admiration which her charms excited, when accident threw her into the power of that unprincipled voluptuary.

Rebecca lost no time in causing the patient to be transported to their temporary dwelling, and proceeded with her own hands to examine and to bind up his wounds. The youngest reader of romances and romantic ballads, must recollect how often the females, during the dark ages, as they are called, were initiated into the mysteries of surgery, and how frequently the gallant knight submitted the wounds of his person to her cure, whose eyes had yet more deeply penetrated his heart.

But the Jews, both male and female, possessed and practised the medical science in all its branches, and the monarchs and powerful barons of the time frequently committed themselves to the charge of some experienced sage among this despised people, when wounded or in sickness. The aid of the Jewish physicians was not the less eagerly sought after, though a general belief prevailed among the Christians, that the Jewish Rabbins were deeply acquainted with the occult sciences, and particularly with the cabalistical art, which had its name and origin in the studies of the sages of Israel. Neither did the Rabbins disown such acquaintance with supernatural arts, which added nothing (for what could add aught?) to the hatred with which their nation was regarded, while it diminished the contempt with which that malevolence was mingled. A Jewish magician might be the subject of equal abhorrence with a Jewish usurer, but he could not be equally despised. It is besides probable, considering the wonderful cures they are said to have performed, that the Jews possessed some secrets of the healing art peculiar to themselves, and which, with the exclusive spirit arising out of their condition, they took great care to conceal from the Christians amongst whom they dwelt.

The beautiful Rebecca had been dutifully brought up in all the knowledge proper to her nation, which her apt and powerful mind had retained, arranged, and enlarged, in the course of a progress beyond her years, her sex, and even the age in which she lived. Her knowledge of medicine and of the healing art had been acquired under an aged Jewess, the daughter of one of their most celebrated doctors, who loved Rebecca as her own child, and was believed to have communicated to her secrets, which had been left to herself by her sage father at the same time, and under the same circumstances. The fate of Miriam had indeed been to fall a sacrifice to the fanaticism of the times; but her secrets had survived in her apt pupil.

Rebecca, thus endowed with knowledge as with beauty, was universally revered and admired by her own tribe, who almost regarded her as one of those gifted women mentioned in the sacred history. Her father himself, out of reverence for her talents, which involuntarily mingled itself with his unbounded affection, permitted the maiden a greater liberty than was usually indulged to those of her sex by the habits of her people, and was, as we have just seen, frequently guided by her opinion, even in preference to his own.

When Ivanhoe reached the habitation of Isaac, he was still in a state of unconsciousness, owing to the profuse loss of blood which had taken place during his exertions in the lists. Rebecca examined the wound, and having applied to it such vulnerary remedies as her art prescribed, informed her father that if fever could be averted, of which the great bleeding rendered her little apprehensive, and if the healing balsam of Miriam retained its virtue, there was nothing to fear for his guest's life, and that he might with safety travel to York with them on the ensuing day. Isaac looked a little blank at this announcement. His charity would willingly have stopped short at Ashby, or at most would have left the wounded Christian to be tended in the house where he was residing at present, with an assurance to the Hebrew to whom it belonged, that all expenses should be duly discharged. To this, however, Rebecca opposed many reasons, of which we shall only mention two that had peculiar weight with Isaac. The one was, that she would on no account put the phial of precious balsam into the hands of another physician even of her own tribe, lest that valuable mystery should be discovered; the other, that this wounded knight, Wilfred of Ivanhoe, was an intimate favourite of Richard Cœur-de-Lion, and that, in case the monarch should return, Isaac, who had supplied his brother John with treasure to prosecute his rebellious purposes, would stand in no small need of a powerful protector who enjoyed Richard's favour.

"Thou art speaking but sooth, Rebecca," said Isaac, giving way to these weighty arguments—"it were an offending of Heaven to betray the secrets of the blessed Miriam; for the good which Heaven giveth, is not rashly to be squandered upon others, whether it be talents of gold and shekels of silver, or whether it be the secret mysteries of a wise physician—assuredly they should be preserved to those to whom Providence hath vouchsafed them. And him whom the Nazarenes of England call the Lion's Heart, assuredly it were better for me to fall into the hands of a strong lion of Idumea than into his, if he shall have got assurance of my dealing with his brother. Wherefore I will lend ear to thy counsel, and the youth shall journey with us unto York, and our house shall be as a home to him until his wounds shall be healed. And if he of the Lion Heart shall return to the land, as is now noised abroad, then shall this Wilfred of Ivanhoe be unto me as a wall of defence, when the king's displeasure shall burn high against thy father. And if he doth not return, this Wilfred may nathe less repay us our charges when he shall gain treasure by the strength of his spear and of his sword, even as he did yesterday and this day also. For the youth is a good youth, and keepeth the day which he appointeth, and restoreth that which he borroweth, and succoureth the Israelite, even the child of my father's house, when he is encompassed by strong thieves and sons of Belial."

It was not until evening was nearly closed that Ivanhoe was restored to consciousness of his situation. He awoke from a broken slumber, under the confused impressions which are naturally attendant on the recovery from a state of insensibility. He was unable for some time to recall exactly to memory the circumstances which had preceded his fall in the lists, or to make out any connected chain of the events in which he had been engaged upon the yesterday. A sense of wounds and injury, joined to great weakness and exhaustion, was mingled with the recollection of blows struck and received, of steeds rushing upon each other, overthrowing and overthrown—of shouts and clashing of arms, and all the heady tumult of a confused fight. An effort to draw aside the curtain of his couch was in some degree successful, although rendered difficult by the pain of his wound.

To his great surprise he found himself in a room magnificently furnished, but having cushions instead of chairs to rest upon, and in other respects partaking so much of Oriental costume, that he began to doubt whether he had not, during his sleep, been transported back again to the land of Palestine. The impression was increased, when, the tapestry being drawn aside, a female form, dressed in a rich habit which partook more of the Eastern taste than that of

ɔe, glided through the door which it concealed, 'as followed by a swarthy domestic.

the wounded knight was about to address this pparition, she imposed silence by placing her ɛr finger upon her ruby lips, while the attendant, aching him, proceeded to uncover Ivanhoe's ınd the lovely Jewess satisfied herself that the ge was in its place, and the wound doing well. erformed her task with a graceful and dignified city and modesty, which might, even in more ed days, have served to redeem it from whatnight seem repugnant to female delicacy. The f so young and beautiful a person engaged in lance on a sick-bed, or in dressing the wound of f a different sex, was melted away and lost t of a beneficent being contributing her effecid to relieve pain, and to avert the stroke of

Rebecca's few and brief directions were given Hebrew language to the old domestic; and he had been frequently her assistant in similar obeyed them without reply.

accents of an unknown tongue, however harsh night have sounded when uttered by another, coming from the beautiful Rebecca, the romand pleasing effect which fancy ascribes to the ns pronounced by some beneficent fairy, uninble, indeed, to the ear, but, from the sweetness earance, and benignity of aspect, which accomd them, touching and affecting to the heart. out making an attempt at further question, Ivansuffered them in silence to take the measures hought most proper for his recovery; and it was until those were completed, and this kind phyı about to retire, that his curiosity could no longer uppressed.—"Gentle maiden," he began in the ian tongue, with which his Eastern travels had red him familiar, and which he thought most to be understood by the turban'd and caftan'd el who stood before him—"I pray you gentle en, of your courtesy"——

here he was interrupted by his fair physician, le which she scarce could suppress dimpling for stant a face, whose general expression was that ntemplative melancholy. "I am of England, night, and speak the English tongue, although ress and my lineage belong to another climate." 'oble damsel," again the Knight of Ivanhoe ı; and again Rebecca hastened to interrupt estow not on me, Sir Knight," she said, "the t of noble. It is well you should speedily know your handmaiden is a poor Jewess, the daughter at Isaac of York, to whom you were so lately a and kind lord. It well becomes him, and those household, to render to you such careful tendas your present state necessarily demands."

now not whether the fair Rowena would have altogether satisfied with the species of emotion which her devoted knight had hitherto gazed on eautiful features, and fair form, and lustrous f the lovely Rebecca; eyes whose brilliancy was d, and, as it were, mellowed, by the fringe of ng silken eyelashes, and which a minstrel would compared to the evening star darting its rays gh a bower of jessamine. But Ivanhoe was too a Catholic to retain the same class of feelings ds a Jewess. This Rebecca had foreseen, and s very purpose she had hastened to mention her 's name and lineage; yet—for the fair and wise ter of Isaac was not without a touch of female ness—she could not but sigh internally when lance of respectful admiration, not altogether ed with tenderness, with which Ivanhoe had to regarded his unknown benefactress, was nged at once for a manner cold, composed, and ed, and fraught with no deeper feeling than which expressed a grateful sense of courtesy d from an unexpected quarter, and from one of erior race. It was not that Ivanhoe's former ge expressed more than that general devotional ge which youth always pays to beauty; yet it ortifying that one word should operate as a spell nove poor Rebecca, who could not be supposed ther ignorant of her title to such homage, into a degraded class, to whom it could not be honourably rendered.

But the gentleness and candour of Rebecca's nature imputed no fault to Ivanhoe for sharing in the universal prejudices of his age and religion. On the contrary the fair Jewess, though sensible her patient now regarded her as one of a race of reprobation, with whom it was disgraceful to hold any beyond the most necessary intercourse, ceased not to pay the same patient and devoted attention to his safety and convalescence. She informed him of the necessity they were under of removing to York, and of her father's resolution to transport him thither, and tend him in his own house until his health should be restored. Ivanhoe expressed great repugnance to this plan, which he grounded on unwillingness to give farther trouble to his benefactors.

"Was there not," he said, "in Ashby, or near it, some Saxon franklin, or even some wealthy peasant, who would endure the burden of a wounded countryman's residence with him until he should be again able to bear his armour?—Was there no convent of Saxon endowment, where he could be received?—Or could he not be transported as far as Burton, where he was sure to find hospitality with Waltheoff, the Abbott of St. Withold's, to whom he was related?"

"Any, the worst of these harbourages," said Rebecca, with a melancholy smile, "would unquestionably be more fitting for your residence than the abode of a despised Jew; yet, Sir Knight, unless you would dismiss your physician, you cannot change your lodging. Our nation, as you well know, can cure wounds, though we deal not in inflicting them; and in our own family, in particular, are secrets which have been handed down since the days of Solomon, and of which you have already experienced the advantages. No Nazarene—I crave your forgiveness, Sir Knight—no Christian leech, within the four seas of Britain, could enable you to bear your corslet within a month."

"And how soon wilt thou enable me to brook it?" said Ivanhoe, impatiently.

"Within eight days, if thou wilt be patient and conformable to my directions," replied Rebecca.

"By Our Blessed Lady," said Wilfred, "if it be not a sin to name her here, it is no time for me or any true knight to be bedridden; and if thou accomplish thy promise, maiden, I will pay thee with my casque full of crowns, come by them as I may."

"I will accomplish my promise," said Rebecca, "and thou shalt bear thine armour on the eighth day from hence, if thou wilt grant me but one boon in the stead of the silver thou dost promise me."

"If it be within my power, and such as a true Christian knight may yield to one of thy people," replied Ivanhoe, "I will grant thy boon blithely and thankfully."

"Nay," answered Rebecca, "I will but pray of thee to believe henceforward that a Jew may do good service to a Christian, without desiring other guerdon than the blessing of the Great Father who made both Jew and Gentile."

"It were sin to doubt it, maiden," replied Ivanhoe; "and I repose myself on thy skill without further scruple or question, well trusting you will enable me to bear my corslet on the eighth day. And now, my kind leech, let me inquire of the news abroad. What of the noble Saxon Cedric and his household?—what of the lovely Lady"—— He stopt, as if unwilling to speak Rowena's name in the house of a Jew—"Of her, I mean, who was named Queen of the tournament?"

"And who was selected by you, Sir Knight, to hold that dignity, with judgment which was admired as much as your valour," replied Rebecca.

The blood which Ivanhoe had lost did not prevent a flush from crossing his cheek, feeling that he had incautiously betrayed his deep interest in Rowena by the awkward attempt he had made to conceal it.

"It was less of her I would speak," said he, "than of Prince John; and I would fain know somewhat of a faithful squire, and why he now attends me not?"

"Let me use my authority as a leech," answered Rebecca, "and enjoin you to keep silence, and av[illegible] agitating reflections, whilst I app[illegible] you of w

you desire to know. Prince John hath broken off the tournament, and set forward in all haste towards York, with the nobles, knights, and churchmen of his party, after collecting such sums as they could wring, by fair means or foul, from those who are esteemed the wealthiest of the land. It is said he designs to usurp his brother's crown."

"Not while I can stand on my defence," said Ivanhoe, raising himself upon the couch, "if there were but one true subject in England! I will fight for Richard's title with the best of them—say one or two, more or less, quarrel!"

"But you may be able to do so," said Rebecca, laying his shoulder with her hand, "you must now observe my directions, and remain quiet."

"True, maiden," said Ivanhoe, "as quiet as these disordered pulses will permit.—And of Cedric and his house, old?"

"His steward came but brief while since," said the Jewess, "panting with haste, to ask my father for certain moneys, the price of wool the growth of Cedric's flocks, and from him I learned that Cedric and Athelstane of Coningsburgh had left Prince John's lodging in high displeasure, and were about to set forth on their return homeward."

"Went any lady with them to the banquet?" said Wilfred.

"The Lady Rowena," said Rebecca, answering the question with more precision than it had been asked —"The Lady Rowena went not to the Prince's feast, and, as the steward reported to us, she is now on her journey back to Rotherwood, with her guardian Cedric. And touching your faithful squire Gurth" —

"Ha!" exclaimed the knight, "knowest thou his name? But thou dost," he immediately added, "and well thou mayst, for it was from thy hand, and, as I am now convinced, from thine own generosity of spirit that he received but yesterday a hundred zecchins."

"Speak not of that," said Rebecca, blushing deeply; "I see how easy it is for the tongue to betray what the heart would gladly conceal."

"But this sum of gold," said Ivanhoe, gravely, "my honour is concerned in repaying it to your father."

"Let it be as thou wilt," said Rebecca, "when eight days have passed away; but think not, and speak not now, of aught that may retard thy recovery."

"Be it so, kind maiden," said Ivanhoe; "I were most ungrateful to dispute thy commands. But one word of the fate of poor Gurth, and I have done with questioning thee."

"I grieve to tell thee, Sir Knight," answered the Jewess, "that he is in custody by the order of Cedric." — And then observing the distress which her communication gave to Wilfred, she instantly added, "But the steward Oswald said, that if nothing occurred to renew his master's displeasure against him, he was sure that Cedric would pardon Gurth, a faithful serf, and one who stood high in favour, and who had but committed this error out of the love which he bore to Cedric's son. And he said, moreover, that he and his counsels, and especially Wamba the Jester, were resolved to warn Gurth to make his escape by the way, in case Cedric's ire against him could not be mitigated."

"Would to God they may keep their purpose!" said Ivanhoe; "but it seems as if I were destined to bring trouble upon whomsoever hath shown kindness to me. My king, by whom I was honoured and distinguished, knows not that the brother most indebted to him is in his arms to grasp his crown; my regard hath brought restraint and trouble on the fairest of her sex; —and now my father, in his mood may slay this poor bondsman, but for his love and loyal service to me! — Thou seest, maiden, what an ill-fated wretch thou dost labour to assist; be wise, and let me go, ere the misfortunes which track my footsteps like sleuth-hounds, shall involve thee also in their pursuit."

"Nay," said Rebecca, "thy weakness and thy grief, Sir Knight, make thee miscalculate the purposes of Heaven. Thou hast been restored to thy country when it most needed the assistance of a strong hand and a true heart, and thou ha the pride of thine enemies and those of thy their horn was most highly exalted; and which thou hast sustained, seest thou no ven has raised thee a help r and a phys among the most desired of the land?—T of good courage, and trust that thou art p some marvel wrought in the arm shall work to-ple. Vigour and moving taken the met I shall send thee by the hand of Re-nbe thyself again to rest, that thou mayst be th to order the journey on the succeeding d

Ivanhoe was convinced by the reas obeyed the directions of Rebecca. Th which Rowena administered was of a so narcotic quality, and secured the patient undisturbed slumbers. In the morning hi sician found him entirely free from feverish and fit to undergo the fatigue of a journey.

He was deposited in the horse-litter brought him from the lists, and every taken for his travelling with ease. In o stance only even the entreaties of Reb unable to secure sufficient attention to the dation of the wounded knight. Isaac, like th traveller of Juvenal's tenth satire, had ever robbery before his eyes, conscious that he alike accounted fair game by the marauding noble, and by the Saxon outlaw. He the neyed at a great rate, and made short shorter repasts, so that he passed by Cedric stane who had several hours the start who had been delayed by their protracted the convent of Saint Withold's. Yet su virtue of Miriam's balsam, or such the Ivanhoe's constitution, that he did not s the hurried journey that inconvenience kind physician had apprehended.

In another point of view, however, the J proved somewhat more than good speed. dity with which he insisted on travelling, l disputes between him and the party wh hired to attend him as a guard. These Saxons, and not free by any means from t love of ease and good living which the stigmatized as laziness and gluttony. Shylock's position, they had accepted th ment in hopes of feeding upon the wealth were very much displeased when they fo selves disappointed, by the rapidity with insisted on their proceeding. They remon upon the risk of damage to their horses by t marches. Finally, there arose betwixt Isa satellites a deadly feud, concerning the wine and ale to be allowed for consumpti meal. And thus it happened, that when th danger approached, and that which Isaac likely to come upon him, he was deserted contented mercenaries on whose protecti relied, without using the means necessary their attachment.

In this deplorable condition the Jew, with ter and her wounded patient, were found by has already been noticed, and soon after into the power of De Bracy and his co Little notice was at first taken of the horse it might have remained behind but for the De Bracy, who looked into it under the that it might contain the object of his ent Rowena had not unveiled herself. But I astonishment was considerable, when he that the litter contained a wounded man, covering himself to have fallen into the powe outlaws, with whom his name might be a for himself and his friends, frankly avowed he Wilfred of Ivanhoe.

The ideas of chivalrous honour, which, wildness and levity, never utterly abandon cy, prohibited him from doing the knight in his defenceless condition, and equally his betraying him to Front-de-Bœuf, who had no scruples to put to death under a stances, the rival claimant of the fief of Iv the other hand, to liberate a suitor prefe

as the events of the tournament, and
's previous banishment from his fa-iad made matter of notoriety, was a
: the flight of De Bracy's generosity,
e betwixt good and evil was all which lf capable of adopting, and he com-
f his own spares to keep close by the uffer no one to approach it. If glanre directed by their master to say, that
r of the Lady Rowena was employed n of their comrades who had been scuffle. On arriving at Torquilstone, ght Templar and the lord of that castle
it upon their own schemes, the one on ure, and the other on his daughter, De s conveyed Ivanhoe, still under the
ded comrade, to a distant apartment.
on was accordingly returned by these
-de-Bœuf, when he questioned them ot make for the battlements upon the companion!" he replied in great wrath

nt. "No wonder that churls and presumptuous as even to lay leaguer be-id that clowns and swineherds send obles, since men-at-arms have turned ses, and Free Companions are grown
g folk's curtains, when the castle is ailed.—To the battlements, ye loiter-
he exclaimed, raising his stentorian
ches around rung again, "to the bat-
will splinter your bones with this trun-

kily replied, "that they desired nothing
go to the battlements, providing Front-l hear them out with their master who sl them to tend the dying man."
man, knaves!" rejoined the Baron; "I e shall all be dying men an we stand more stoutly. But I will relieve the is caitiff companion of yours.—Here, fiend of a Saxon witch, bearest me
this bedridden fellow, since he must
d, whilst these knaves use their wea-
two arblasts, comrades, with wind-rells*—to the barbican with you, and ch bolt through a Saxon brain."
o, like most of their description, were se and detested inaction, went joyfully danger as they were commanded, and of Ivanhoe was transferred to Urfried,
she, whose brain was burning with
f injuries and with hopes of vengeance, duced to devolve upon Rebecca the
ent.

CHAPTER XXIX.

watch tower yonder, valiant soldier,
field, and say how goes the battle
SCHILLER: Maid of Orleans.

peril is often also a moment of open-ss and affection. We are thrown off
e general agitation of our feelings, and sity of those which, at more tranquil idence at least conceals, if it cannot press them. In finding herself once le of Ivanhoe, Rebecca was astonished sensation of pleasure which she experi-
a time when all around them both was despair. As she felt his pulse, and ins health, there was a softness in her ter accents implying a kinder interest
ld have flattered and pressed. Her voice faltered and her
, and it was only the cold question of t you, gentle maiden?" which recalled and reminded her of the sensations which not and could not be natural. A sigh was scarce audible; and the questions
sed the knight concerning his state of t in the tone of calm friendship. Ivan-

* a cross bow, the windlace the machine
that weapon, and the quarrel, so called from head shaped head, was the bolt adapted to it.

hoe answered her hastily that he was, in point of health, as well, and better than he could have expected—"Thanks," he said, "dear Rebecca, to thy helpful skill."

"He calls me dear Rebecca," said the maiden to herself, "but it is in the cold and careless tone which ill suits the word. His war-horse—his hunting hound, are dearer to him than the despised Jewess!"

"My mind, gentle maiden," continued Ivanhoe, "is more disturbed by anxiety, than my body with pain. From the speeches of these men who were my warders just now, I learn that I am a prisoner, and, if I judge aright of the loud hoarse voice which even now dispatched them hence on some military duty, I am in the castle of Front-de-Bœuf—If so, how will this end, or how can I protect Rowena and my father?"

"He names not the Jew or Jewess," said Rebecca internally; "yet what is our portion in him, and how justly am I punished by Heaven for letting my thoughts dwell upon him!" She hastened after this brief self-accusation to give Ivanhoe what information she could; but it amounted only to this, that the Templar Bois-Guilbert, and the Baron Front-de-Bœuf, were commanders within the castle; that it was beleaguered from without, but by whom she knew not. She added that there was a Christian priest within the castle who might be possessed of more information.

"A Christian priest!" said the knight, joyfully; "fetch him thither, Rebecca, if thou canst—say a sick man desires his ghostly counsel—say what thou wilt, but bring him—something I must do or attempt, but how can I determine until I know how matters stand without?"

Rebecca, in compliance with the wishes of Ivanhoe, made that attempt to bring Cedric into the wounded Knight's chamber, which was defeated as we have already seen by the interference of Urfried, who had been also on the watch to intercept the supposed monk. Rebecca retired to communicate to Ivanhoe the result of her errand.

They had not much leisure to regret the failure of this source of intelligence, or to contrive by what means it might be supplied; for the noise within the castle, occasioned by the defensive preparations which had been considerable for some time, now increased into tenfold bustle and clamour. The heavy, yet hasty step of the men-at-arms, traversed the battlements, or resounded on the narrow and winding passages and stairs which led to the various bartisans and points of defence. The voices of the knights were heard, animating their followers, or directing means of defence, while their commands were often drowned in the clashing of armour, or the clamorous shouts of those whom they addressed. Tremendous as these sounds were, and yet more terrible from the awful event which they presaged, there was a sublimity mixed with them, which Rebecca's high-toned mind could feel even in that moment of terror. Her eye kindled, although the blood fled from her cheeks; and there was a strong mixture of fear, and of a thrilling sense of the sublime, as she repeated, half whispering to herself, half speaking to her companion, the sacred text, "The quiver rattleth—the glittering spear and the shield—the noise of the captains and the shouting!"

But Ivanhoe was like the war-horse of that sublime passage, glowing with impatience at his inactivity, and with his ardent desire to mingle in the affray of which these sounds were the introduction. "If I could but drag myself," he said, "to yon ler window, then I might see how this brave game is like to go. If I had but bow to shoot a shaft, or battle-axe to strike were it but a single blow for our deliverance!—It is in vain—it is in vain—I am alike nerveless and weaponless!"

"Fret not thyself, noble knight," answered Rebecca, "the sounds have ceased of a sudden—it may be they join not battle."

"Thou knowest naught of it," said Wilfred, impatiently; "this dead pause only shows that the men are at their posts on the walls, and expecting an instant attack; what we have heard was but the instant muttering of the storm—it will burst anon in all its fury. Could I but reach yonder window!"

"Thou wilt but injure thyself by the attempt, noble knight," replied his attendant. Observing his extreme solicitude, she firmly added, "I myself will stand at the lattice, and describe to you as I can what passes without."

"You must not—you shall not!" exclaimed Ivanhoe; "each lattice, each aperture, will be soon a mark for the archers; some random shaft —"

"It shall be welcome!" murmured Rebecca, as with firm pace she ascended two or three steps, which led to the window of which they spoke.

"Rebecca, dear Rebecca," exclaimed Ivanhoe, "this is no maiden's pastime—do not expose thyself to wounds and death, and render me for ever miserable for having given the occasion; at least, cover thyself with yonder ancient buckler, and show as little of your person at the lattice as may be."

Following with wonderful promptitude the directions of Ivanhoe, and availing herself of the protection of the large ancient shield, which she placed against the lower part of the window, Rebecca, with tolerable security to herself, could witness part of what was passing without the castle, and report to Ivanhoe the preparations which the assailants were making for the storm. Indeed the situation which she thus obtained was peculiarly favourable for this purpose, because, being placed on an angle of the main building, Rebecca could not only see what passed beyond the precincts of the castle, but also commanded a view of the outwork likely to be the first object of the meditated assault. It was an exterior fortification of no great height or strength, intended to protect the postern-gate, through which Cedric had been recently dismissed by Front-de-Bœuf. The castle moat divided this species of barbican from the rest of the fortress, so that, in case of its being taken, it was easy to cut off the communication with the main building, by withdrawing the temporary bridge. In the outwork was a sallyport corresponding to the postern of the castle, and the whole was surrounded by a strong palisade. Rebecca could observe, from the number of men placed for the defence of this post, that the besieged entertained apprehensions for its safety; and from the mustering of the assailants in a direction nearly opposite to the outwork, it seemed no less plain that it had been selected as a vulnerable point of attack.

These appearances she hastily communicated to Ivanhoe, and added, "The skirts of the wood seem lined with archers, although only a few are advanced from its dark shadow."

"Under what banner?" asked Ivanhoe.

"Under no ensign of war which I can observe," answered Rebecca.

"A singular novelty," muttered the knight, "to advance to storm such a castle without pennon or banner displayed!—Seest thou who they be that act as leaders?"

"A knight, clad in sable armour, is the most conspicuous," said the Jewess; "he alone is armed from head to heel, and seems to assume the direction of all around him."

"What device does he bear on his shield?" replied Ivanhoe.

"Something resembling a bar of iron, and a padlock painted blue on the black shield."*

* The author has been here upbraided with false heraldry, as having charged metal upon metal. It should be remembered, however, that heraldry had only its first rude origin during the crusades, and that all the minutiæ of its fantastic science were the work of time, and introduced at a much later period. Those who think otherwise must suppose that the Goddess of Armoirerie, like the Goddess of Arms, sprung into the world completely equipped in all the gaudy trappings of the department she presides over.

In corroboration of what is above stated, it may be observed, that the arms, which were assumed by Godfrey of Boulogne himself, after the conquest of Jerusalem, was a cross counter patent cantoned with four little crosses or, upon a field azure, displaying thus metal upon metal. The heralds have tried to explain this undeniable fact in different modes, but Ferne gallantly contends, that a prince of Godfrey's qualities should not be bound by the ordinary rules. The Scottish Nisbet and the same Ferne, insist that the chief of the Crusade must have assigned to Godfrey this extraordinary and unwonted coat-of-arms, in order to induce those who should behold them to make inquiries; and hence to give them the name of arma inquirenda. But with reverence to these grave authorities, it seems unlikely

"A fetterlock and shacklebolt azure, hoe; "I know not who may bear the de I ween it might now be mine own. Ca see the motto?"

"Scarce the device itself at this dist Rebecca; "but when the sun glances shield, it shows as I tell you."

"Seem there no other leaders?" anxious inquirer.

"None of mark and distinction that from this station," said Rebecca; "b the other side of the castle is also as appear even now preparing to advance— protect us!—What a dreadful sight!—T vance first bear huge shields and def plank; the others follow, bending their come on.—They raise their bows!—God give the creatures thou hast made!"

Her description was here suddenly i the signal for assault, which was given of a shrill bugle, and at once answered of the Norman trumpets from the battle mingled with the deep and hollow e nakers, (a species of kettle-drum,) retorte defiance the challenge of the enemy. T both parties augmented the fearful din, t crying "Saint George for merry Englan Normans answering them with loud arant De Bracy!—Beau-seant! B Front-de-Bœuf à la rescousse!" acco war-cries of their different commanders

It was not, however, by clamour that was to be decided, and the desperate assailants were met by an equally vigo on the part of the besieged. The arche their woodland pastimes to the most e the long bow, shot, to use the appro of the time, so "wholly together," that which a defender could show the least p son, escaped their cloth-yard shafts. discharge, which continued as thick hail, while, notwithstanding, every arrow vidual aim, and flew by scores together, embrasure and opening in the parapets, every window where a defender either had post, or might be suspected to be s this sustained discharge, two or three of were slain, and several others wounded. dent in their armour of proof, and in the their situation afforded, the followers Bœuf and his allies, showed an obstina proportioned to the fury of the attack, an the discharge of their large cross-bow with their long bows, slings, and other pons, to the close and continued showe and, as the assailants were necessarily early protected, did considerably more they received at their hand. The whiz and of missiles, on both sides was only the shouts which arose when either si sustained some notable loss.

"And I must lie here like a bedridde claimed Ivanhoe, "while the game that dom or death is played out by the hand Look from the window once again, kin beware that you are not marked by th neath.—Look out once more, and tell m advance to the storm."

With patient courage, strengthened b which she had employed in mental devo again took post at the lattice, sheltering ever, so as not to be visible from beneat

"What dost thou see, Rebecca?" ag the wounded knight.

"Nothing but the cloud of arrows flyi to dazzle mine eyes, and to hide the shoot them."

"That cannot endure," said Ivanh that the assembled princes of Europe should Godfrey a coat armorial so much contrary to such rule had then existed; at any rate, it prove metal, now accounted a solecism in heraldry, other cases similar to that in the text. See Gentrie, p. 238. Edition 1586. Nisbet's Herald Second Edition.

ot right on to carry the castle by pure force of
he archery may avail but little against stone nd bulwarks. Look for the Knight of the ock, fair Rebecca, and see how he bears himor as the leader is, so will his followers be."
ee him not," said Rebecca.
ul craven!" exclaimed Ivanhoe; "does he
from the helm when the wind blows highest?"
blenches not! he blenches not!" said Rebecca,
him now; he leads a body of men close under er barrier of the barbican.* They pull down
s and palisades; they hew down the barriers
ns.- His high black plume floats abroad over ong, like a raven over the field of the slain. -
ave made a breach in the barriers—they rush are thrust back!—Front-de-Bœuf heads the s; I see his gigantic form above the press.
long again to the breach, and the pass is dis-land to hand, and man to man. God of Jacob!
e meeting of two fierce tides—the conflict of
ns moved by adverse winds!"
rned her head from the lattice, as if unable to endure a sight so terrible.
k forth again, Rebecca," said Ivanhoe, mis-
the cause of her retiring; "the archery must degree have ceased, since they are now fight-
d to hand.—Look again, there is now less
"

ca again looked forth, and almost immediexclaimed. "Holy prophets of the law! Front-and the Black Knight fight hand to hand on ach, amid the roar of their followers, who he progress of the strife—Heaven strike with se of the oppressed and of the captive!" She tered a loud shriek, and exclaimed, "He is
—he is down!"
o is down?" cried Ivanhoe; "for our dear
ake, tell me which has fallen?"
Black Knight," answered Rebecca, faintly;
stantly again shouted with joyful exultation
no—but no!—the name of the Lord of Hosts
ed!—he is on foot again, and fights as if the re-enty men's strength in his single arm. His broken—he snatches an axe from a yeoman sses Front-de-Bœuf with blow on blow.—The oops and totters like an oak under the steel of dsman—he falls—he falls!"
nt-de-Bœuf?" exclaimed Ivanhoe.
nt-de-Bœuf?" answered the Jewess; "his
h to the rescue, headed by the haughty
—their united force compels the champion to They drag Front-de-Bœuf within the walls."
assailants have won the barriers, have they aid Ivanhoe.
y have—they have!" exclaimed Rebecca—
ey press the besieged hard upon the outer me plant ladders, some swarm like bees, and ur to ascend upon the shoulders of each
own go stones, beams, and trunks of trees
ir heads, and as fast as they bear the wounded
ear, fresh men supply their places in the —Great God! hast thou given men thine own that it should be thus cruelly defaced by the f their brethren!"
nk not of that," said Ivanhoe; "this is no such thoughts—Who yield?—who push their

e ladders are thrown down," replied Rebecca,
ing; "the soldiers lie grovelling under them shed reptiles—The besieged have the better."
t George strike for us!" exclaimed the knight;
false yeomen give way!"
" exclaimed Rebecca, "they bear themselves
somanly—the Black knight approaches the
with his huge axe—the thundering blows
e deals, you may hear them above all the din outs of the battle—Stones and beams are down on the bold champion—he regards

* Gothic castle and city had, beyond the outer-walls, a on composed of palisades, called the barriers, which
e the scene of severe skirmishes, as these must necescarried before the walls themselves could be approach-y of those valiant feats of arms which adorn the chi-es of Froissart took place at the barriers of besieged them no more than if they were thistle-down or feathers!"

"By Saint John of Acre," said Ivanhoe, raising himself joyfully on his couch, "methought there was but one man in England that might do such a deed!"

"The postern gate shakes," continued Rebecca; "it crashes—it is splintered by his blows—they rush in—the outwork is won—Oh, God!—they hurl the defenders from the battlements—they throw them into the moat—O men, if ye be indeed men, spare them that can resist no longer!"

"The bridge—the bridge which communicates with the castle—have they won that pass?" exclaimed Ivanhoe.

"No," replied Rebecca, "The Templar has destroyed the plank on which they crossed—few of the defenders escaped with him into the castle—the shrieks and cries which you hear tell the fate of the others—Alas!—I see it is still more difficult to look upon victory than upon battle."

"What do they now, maiden?" said Ivanhoe; "look forth yet again—this is no time to faint at bloodshed."

"It is over for the time," answered Rebecca; "our friends strengthen themselves within the outwork which they have mastered, and it affords them so good a shelter from the foemen's shot, that the garrison only bestow a few bolts on it from interval to interval, as if rather to disquiet than effectually to injure them."

"Our friends," said Wilfred, "will surely not abandon an enterprise so gloriously begun and so happily attained.—O no! I will put my faith in the good knight whose axe hath rent heart-of-oak and bars of iron—Singular," he again muttered to himself, "if there be two who can do a deed of such *derring-do!—a fetterlock, and a shackle-bolt on a field sable—what may that mean?—scest thou naught else, Rebecca, by which the Black Knight may be distinguished?"

"Nothing," said the Jewess; "all about him is black as the wing of the night raven. Nothing can I spy that can mark him further—but having once seen him put forth his strength in battle, methinks I could know him again among a thousand warriors. He rushes to the fray as if he were summoned to a banquet. There is more than mere strength, there seems as if the whole soul and spirit of the champion were given to every blow which he deals upon his enemies. God assoilzie him of the sin of bloodshed! it is fearful, yet magnificent, to behold how the arm and heart of one man can triumph over hundreds."

"Rebecca," said Ivanhoe, "thou hast painted a hero; surely they rest but to refresh their force, or to provide the means of crossing the moat.—Under such a leader as thou hast spoken this knight to be, there are no craven fears, no cold-blooded delays, no yielding up a gallant emprize; since the difficulties which render it arduous render it also glorious. I swear by the honour of my house—I vow by the name of my bright lady-love, I would endure ten years' captivity to fight one day by that good knight's side in such a quarrel as this!"

"Alas," said Rebecca, leaving her station at the window, and approaching the couch of the wounded knight, "this impatient yearning after action—this struggling with and repining at your present weakness, will not fail to injure your returning health. How couldst thou hope to inflict wounds on others ere that be healed which thou thyself hast received?"

"Rebecca," he replied, "thou knowest not how impossible it is for one trained to actions of chivalry to remain passive as a priest, or a woman, when they are acting deeds of honour around him. The love of battle is the food upon which we live—the dust of the melée is the breath of our nostrils! We live not—we wish not to live—longer than while we are victorious and renowned—Such, maiden, are the laws of chivalry to which we are sworn, and to whom we offer all that we hold dear."

* Derring-do—desperate courage

"Alas!" said the fair Jewess, "and what is it, valiant knight, save an offering of sacrifice to a demon of vain glory, and a passing through the fire to Moloch?—What remains to you as the prize of all the blood you have spilled—of all the travail and pain you have endured—of all the tears which your deeds have caused, when death hath broken the strong man's spear, and overtaken the speed of his war-horse?"

"What remains?" cried Ivanhoe; "Glory, maiden, glory! which gilds our sepulchre and embalms our name."

"Glory?" continued Rebecca; "alas, is the rusted mail which hangs as a hatchment over the champion's dim and mouldering tomb- is the defaced sculpture of the inscription which the ignorant monk can hardly read to the inquiring pilgrim -are these sufficient rewards for the sacrifice of every kindly affection, for a life spent miserably that ye may make others miserable? Or is there such virtue in the rude rhymes of a wandering bard, that domestic love, kindly affection, peace and happiness, are so wildly bartered, to become the hero of those ballads which vagabond minstrels sing to drunken churls over their evening ale?"

"By the soul of Hereward!" replied the knight impatiently, "thou speakest, maiden, of thou knowest not what. Thou wouldst quench the pure light of chivalry, which alone distinguishes the noble from the base, the gentle knight from the churl and the savage; which rates our life far, far beneath the pitch of our honour; raises us victorious over pain, toil, and suffering, and teaches us to fear no evil but disgrace. Thou art no Christian, Rebecca; and to thee are unknown those high feelings which swell the bosom of a noble maiden when her lover hath done some deed of emprize which sanctions his flame. Chivalry!—why, maiden, she is the nurse of pure and high affection—the stay of the oppressed, the redresser of grievances, the curb of the power of the tyrant—Nobility were but an empty name without her, and liberty finds the best protection in her lance and her sword."

"I am, indeed," said Rebecca, "sprung from a race whose courage was distinguished in the defence of their own land, but who warred not, even while yet a nation, save at the command of the Deity, or in defending their country from oppression. The sound of the trumpet wakes Judah no longer, and her despised children are now but the unresisting victims of hostile and military oppression. Well hast thou spoken, Sir Knight,—until the God of Jacob shall raise up for his chosen people a second Gideon, or a new Maccabeus, it ill beseemeth the Jewish damsel to speak of battle or of war."

The high-minded maiden concluded the argument in a tone of sorrow, which deeply expressed her sense of the degradation of her people, embittered perhaps by the idea that Ivanhoe considered her as one not entitled to interfere in a case of honour, and incapable of entertaining or expressing sentiments of honour and generosity.

"How little he knows this bosom," she said, "to imagine that cowardice or meanness of soul must needs be its guests, because I have censured the fantastic chivalry of the Nazarenes! Would to heaven that the shedding of mine own blood, drop by drop, could redeem the captivity of Judah! Nay, would to God it could avail to set free my father, and thus his benefactor, from the chains of the oppressor! The proud Christian should then see whether the daughter of God's chosen people dared not to die as bravely as the vainest Nazarene maiden, that boasts her descent from some petty chieftain of the rude and frozen north!"

She then looked towards the couch of the wounded knight.

"He sleeps," she said; "nature exhausted by sufferance and the waste of spirits, his wearied frame embraces the first moment of temporary relaxation to sink into slumber. Alas! is it a crime that I should look upon him, when it may be for the last time?—When yet but a short space, and those fair features will be no longer animated by the bold and buoyant spirit which forsakes them not even in slee the nostril shall be distended, the mouth eyes fixed and bloodshot; and when the noble knight may be trodden on by the lo of this accursed castle, yet stir not when lifted up against him!—And my father father! evil is it with his daughter, wher hairs are not remembered because of the gr of youth!—What know I but that these ev nessengers of Jehovah's wrath to the child, who thinks of a stranger's captivi parent's? who forgets the desolation of J looks upon the comeliness of a Gentile an ger?—But I will tear this folly from my he every fibre bleed as I rend it away!"

She wrapped herself closely in her vei down at a distance from the couch of th knight, with her back turned towards it, or endeavouring to fortify her mind, not on the impending evils from without, but al those treacherous feelings which assailed within.

CHAPTER XXX.

Approach the chamber, look upon his bed.
His is the passing of no peaceful ghost,
Which, as the lark arises to the sky,
'Mid morning's sweetest breeze and softest dew
Is wing'd to heaven by good men's sighs and t
Anselm parts otherwise.

During the interval of quiet which fo first success of the besiegers, while the one preparing to pursue their advantage, and t strengthen their means of defence, the T De Bracy held brief council together in the castle.

"Where is Front-de-Bœuf?" said the had superintended the defence of the fortu other side; "men say he hath been slain.

"He lives," said the Templar, coolly, "b but had he worn the bull's head of whic the name, and ten plates of iron to fenc he must have gone down before yonder Yet a few hours, and Front-de-Bœuf is w thers—a powerful limb lopped off Prince terprise."

"And a brave addition to the kingdom said De Bracy; "this comes of reviling angels, and ordering images of holy thing men to be flung down on the heads of the yeomen."

"Go to—thou art a fool," said the Tem superstition is upon a level with Front-de-B of faith; neither of you can render a reas belief or unbelief."

"Benedicite, Sir Templar," replied De pray you to keep better rule with your tong am the theme of it. By the Mother of Be a better Christian man than thou and thy f for the brute goeth shrewly out, that the Order of the temple of Zion nurseth not s ties within its bosom, and that Sir Brian Guilbert is of the number."

"Care not thou for such reports," said th "but let us think of making good the ca fought these villain yeomen on thy side?"

"Like fiends incarnate," said De Brac swarmed close up the walls, headed, as the knave who won the prize at the arc knew his horn and baldric. And this is ob boasted policy, encouraging these malapert rebels against us! Had I not been armed i villain had marked me down seven tim little remorse as if I had been a buck in s told every rivet on my armour with a cloth that rapped against my ribs with as little ce as if my bones had been of iron—But th shirt of Spanish mail under my plate-coat, fairly sped."

"But you maintained your post?" said plar. "We lost the outwork on our part.

"That is a shrewd loss," said De Br knaves will find cover there to assault ve closely, and may, if not well watched, gain some guarded corner of a tower, or some forgotten win-, and so break in upon us. Our numbers are too for the defence of every point, and the men com- that they can nowhere show themselves, but y are the mark for as many arrows as a parish- t on a holyday even. Front-de-Bœuf is dying too, we shall receive no more aid from his bull's head and al strength. How think you, Sir Brian, were we better make a virtue of necessity, and compound h the rogues by delivering up our prisoners?"

"How?" exclaimed the Templar; "deliver up our oners, and stand an object alike of ridicule and eration, as the doughty warriors who dared by a ht-attack to possess themselves of the persons of rty of defenceless travellers, yet could not make d a strong castle against a vagabond troop of out- s, led by swineherds, jesters, and the very refuse mankind?—Shame on thy counsel, Maurice de cy!—The ruins of this castle shall bury both my y and my shame, ere I consent to such base and honourable composition."

Let us to the walls, then," said De Bracy, care- ly; "that man never breathed, be he Turk or nplar, who held life at lighter rate than I do. But ust there is no dishonour in wishing I had here e two scores of my gallant troop of Free Com- ions?—Oh, my brave lances! if ye knew but how d your captain were this day bested, how soon uld I see my banner at the head of your clump of ars! And how short while would these rabble vil- s stand to endure your encounter!"

"Wish for whom thou wilt," said the Templar, t let us make what defence we can with the sol- rs who remain—They are chiefly Front-de-Bœuf's lowers, hated by the English for a thousand acts insolence and oppression."

"The better," said De Bracy; "the rugged slaves l defend themselves to the last drop of their blood, they encounter the revenge of the peasants with- . Let us up and be doing, then, Brian de Bois- ilbert; and, live or die, thou shalt see Maurice De y bear himself this day as a gentleman of blood lineage."

"To the walls!" answered the Templar; and they ascended the battlements to do all that skill dictate, and manhood accomplish, in defence e place. They readily agreed that the point of t danger was that opposite to the outwork of the assailants had possessed themselves. The , indeed, was divided from that barbican by the , and it was impossible that the besiegers could the postern-door, with which the outwork cor- ded, without surmounting that obstacle; but the opinion both of the Templar and De Bracy, the besiegers, if governed by the same policy leader had already displayed, would endeavour, formidable assault, to draw the chief part of the ders' observation to this point, and take mea- to avail themselves of every negligence which take place in the defence elsewhere. To guard t such an evil, their numbers only permitted the to place sentinels from space to space along alls in communication with each other, who give the alarm whenever danger was threat- Mean while, they agreed that De Bracy should and the defence at the postern, and the Tem- should keep with him a score of men or there as a body of reserve, ready to hasten to any point which might be suddenly threatened. ess of the barbican had also this unfortunate that, notwithstanding the superior height of stle walls, the besieged could not see from with the same precision as before, the opera- of the enemy; for some straggling underwood ched so near the sallyport of the outwork, that ssailants might introduce into it whatever force ought proper, not only under cover, but even the knowledge of the defenders. Utterly un- , therefore, upon what point the storm was to De Bracy and his companion were under the ity of providing against every possible contin- and their followers, however brave, experi- the anxious dejection of mind incident to men enclosed by enemies, who possessed the power of choosing their time and mode of attack.

Mean while, the lord of the beleaguered and endangered castle lay upon a bed of bodily pain and mental agony. He had not the usual resource of bigots in that superstitious period, most of whom were wont to atone for the crimes they were guilty of by liberality to the church, stupifying by this means their terrors by the idea of atonement and forgiveness; and although the refuge which success thus purchased, was no more like to the peace of mind which follows on sincere repentance, than the turbid stupefaction procured by opium resembles healthy and natural slumbers, it was still a state of mind preferable to the agonies of awakened remorse. But among the vices of Front-de-Bœuf, a hard and griping man, avarice was predominant; and he preferred setting church and churchmen at defiance, to purchasing from them pardon and absolution at the price of treasure and of manors. Nor did the Templar, an infidel of another stamp, justly characterize his associate, when he said Front-de-Bœuf could assign no cause for his unbelief and contempt for the established faith; for the Baron would have alleged that the Church sold her wares too dear, that the spiritual freedom which she put up to sale was only to be bought like that of the chief captain of Jerusalem, "with a great sum," and Front-de-Bœuf preferred denying the virtue of the medicine, to paying the expense of the physician.

But the moment had now arrived when earth and all his treasures were gliding from before his eyes, and when the savage Baron's heart, though hard as a nether millstone, became appalled as he gazed forward into the waste darkness of futurity. The fever of his body aided the impatience and agony of his mind, and his death-bed exhibited a mixture of the newly awakened feelings of horror, combating with the fixed and inveterate obstinacy of his disposition;—a fearful state of mind, only to be equalled in those tremendous regions, where there are complaints without hope, remorse without repentance, a dreadful sense of present agony, and a presentiment that it cannot cease or be diminished!

"Where be these dog-priests now," growled the Baron, "who set such price on their ghostly mummery—where be all those unshod Carmelites, for whom old Front-de-Bœuf founded the convent of St. Anne, robbing his heir of many a fair rood of meadow, and many a fat field and close—where be the greedy hounds now? Swilling, I warrant me, at the ale, or playing their juggling tricks at the bedside of some miserly churl.—Me, the heir of their founder—me, whom their foundation binds them to pray for—me—ungrateful villains as they are!—they suffer to die like the houseless dog on yonder coumnon, unshriven and unhouseled!—Tell the Templar to come hither—he is a priest, and may do some thing—But no!—as well confess myself to the devil as to Brian de Bois-Guilbert, who reeks neither of heaven nor of hell.—I have heard old men talk of prayer—prayer by their own voice—such need not to court or to bribe the false priest—But I—I dare not!"

"Lives Reginald Front-de-Bœuf," said a broken and shrill voice close by his bedside, "to say there is that which he dares not!"

The evil conscience and the shaken nerves of Front-de-Bœuf heard, in this strange interruption to his soliloquy the voice of one of those demons, who, as the superstition of the times believed, beset the beds of dying men, to distract their thoughts, and turn them from the meditations which concerned their eternal welfare. He shuddered and drew himself together; but, instantly summoning up his wonted resolution, he exclaimed, "Who is there?—what art thou, that darest to echo my words in a tone like that of the night-raven?—Come before my couch that I may see thee."

"I am thine evil angel, Reginald Front-de-Bœuf," replied the voice.

"Let me behold thee then in thy bodily shape, if thou be'st indeed a fiend," replied the dying knight; "think not that I will blench from thee.—By the eternal dungeon, could I but grapple with these horrors that hover round me, as I have done with mortal dangers, heaven or hell should never say that I shrunk from the conflict!"

"Think on thy sins, Reginald Front-de-Bœuf," said the almost unearthly voice, "on rebellion, on rapine, on murder!—Who stirred up the licentious John to war against his gray-headed father—against his generous brother?"

"Be thou fiend, priest, or devil," replied Front-de-Bœuf, "thou liest in thy throat!—Not I stirred John to rebellion—not I alone—there were fifty knights and barons, the flower of the midland counties—better men never laid lance in rest—And must I answer for the fault done by fifty?—False fiend, I defy thee! Depart, and haunt my couch no more—let me die in peace if thou be mortal—if thou be a demon, thy time is not yet come."

"In peace thou shalt not die," repeated the voice; "even in death shalt thou think on thy murders—on the groans which this castle has echoed—on the blood that is engrained in its floors!"

"Thou canst not shake me by thy petty malice," answered Front-de-Bœuf, with a ghastly and constrained laugh. "The infidel Jew—it was merit with heaven to deal with him as I did, else wherefore are men canonized who dip their hands in the blood of Saracens?—The Saxon porkers, whom I have slain, they were the foes of my country, and of my lineage, and of my liege lord.—Ho! ho! thou seest there is no crevice in my coat of plate—Art thou fled?—art thou silenced?"

"No, foul parricide!" replied the voice; "think of thy father!—think of his death!—think of his banquet-room flooded with his gore, and that poured forth by the hand of a son!"

"Ha!" answered the Baron, after a long pause, "an thou knowest that, thou art indeed the author of evil, and as omniscient as the monks call thee!—That secret I deemed locked in my own breast, and in that of one besides—the temptress, the partaker of my guilt.—Go, leave me, fiend! and seek the Saxon witch Ulrica, who alone could tell thee what she and I alone witnessed.—Go, I say, to her, who washed the wounds, and straighted the corpse, and gave to the slain man the outward show of one parted in time and in the course of nature—Go to her, she was my temptress, the foul provoker, the more foul rewarder, of the deed—let her, as well as I, taste of the tortures which anticipate hell!"

"She already tastes them," said Ulrica, stepping before the couch of Front-de-Bœuf; "she hath long drunken of this cup, and its bitterness is now sweetened to see that thou dost partake it.—Grind not thy teeth, Front-de-Bœuf—roll not thine eyes—clench not thy hand, nor shake it at me with that gesture of menace!—The hand which, like that of thy renowned ancestor, who gained thy name, could have broken with one stroke the skull of a mountain-bull, is now unnerved and powerless as mine own!"

"Vile murderous hag!" replied Front-de-Bœuf: "detestable screech-owl! it is then thou who art come to exult over the ruins thou hast assisted to lay low?"

"Ay, Reginald Front-de-Bœuf," answered she, "it is Ulrica!—it is the daughter of the murdered Torquil Wolfganger!—it is the sister of his slaughtered sons!—it is she who demands of thee, and of thy father's house, father and kindred, name and fame—all that she has lost by the name of Front-de-Bœuf!—Think of my wrongs, Front-de-Bœuf, and answer me if I speak not truth. Thou hast been my evil angel, and I will be thine—I will dog thee till the very instant of dissolution!"

"Detestable fury!" exclaimed Front-de-Bœuf, "that moment shalt thou never witness—Ho! Giles, Clement, and Eustace! Saint Maur, and Stephen! seize this damned witch, and hurl her from the battlements headlong—she has betrayed us to the Saxon!—Ho! Saint Maur! Clement! false-hearted knaves, where tarry ye?"

"Call on them again, valiant Baron," said the hag, with a smile of grisly mockery; "summon thy vassals around thee, doom them that loiter to the scourge and the dungeon—But know, mighty chief," she continued suddenly changing her tone, "thou shalt have neither answer, nor aid, nor obedience at the —Listen to these horrid sounds," for the di recommenced assault and defence now rung loud from the battlements of the castle; "in cry is the downfall of thy house—The blood-c fabric of Front-de-Bœuf's power totters to dation, and before the foes he most despis Saxon, Reginald!—the scorned Saxon as walls!—Why liest thou here, like a worn- when the Saxon storms thy place of strengt

"Gods and fiends!" exclaimed the wounde "O, for one moment's strength, to drag mys mêlée, and perish as becomes my name!"

"Think not of it, valiant warrior!" repl "thou shalt die no soldier's death, but perish fox in his den, when the peasants have set f cover around it."

"Hateful hag! thou liest!" exclaimed F Bœuf; "my followers bear them bravely—t are strong and high- my comrades in arms whole host of Saxons, were they headed by and Horsa!—The war-cry of the Templar a Free Companions rises high over the conflic by mine honour, when we kindle the blazing for joy of our defence, it shall consume th and bones; and I shall live to hear thou from earthly fires to those of that hell, whi sent forth an incarnate fiend more utterly dia

"Hold thy belief," replied Ulrica, "till reach thee—But, no!" she said, interrupting "thou shalt know, even now, the doom, thy power, strength, and courage, is unable though it is prepared for thee by this feeb Markest thou the smouldering and suffocatin which already eddies in sable folds thro chamber?—Didst thou think it was but the ing of thy bursting eyes—the difficulty of bored breathing?—No! Front-de-Bœuf, the other cause—Remembrest thou the magazi that is stored beneath these apartments?"

"Woman!" he exclaimed with fury, "t not set fire to it?—By heaven thou hast, castle is in flames!"

"They are fast rising at least," said Ulr frightful composure; "and a signal shall s to warn the besiegers to press hard upon t would extinguish them.—Farewell, Front- —May Mista, Skogula, and Zernebock, go ancient Saxons—fiends, as the priests now —supply the place of comforters at your d which Ulrica now relinquishes!—But know, give thee comfort to know it, that Ulrica is the same dark coast with thyself, the comp thy punishment as the companion of thy gu now, parricide, farewell for ever!—May each this vaulted roof find a tongue to echo that thine ear!"

So saying, she left the apartment; and F Bœuf could hear the crash of the ponderou she locked and double-locked the door beh thus cutting off the most slender chance of In the extremity of agony he shouted upon vants and allies—"Stephen and Saint Maur ment and Giles!—I burn here unaided!—To t —to the rescue, brave Bois-Guilbert, valiant D —It is Front-de-Bœuf who calls!—It is your ye traitor squires!—Your ally—your brother ye perjured and faithless knights!—all the c to traitors upon your recreant heads, do you me to perish thus miserably!—They hear me they cannot hear me—my voice is lost in t battle.—The smoke rolls thicker and thicker has caught upon the floor below—O, for one of the air of heaven, were it to be purchas stant annihilation!" And in the mad fren spair, the wretch now shouted with the shou fighters, now muttered curses on himself kind, and on Heaven itself.—"The red fir through the thick smoke!" he exclaimed; mon marches against me under the banne own element—Foul spirit, avoid!—I go not without my comrades—all, all are thine, th son these walls—Thinkest thou Front-de-B be singled out to go alone?—No—the infidel

—the licentious De Bracy—Ulrica, the fatal maid—being attempted—the men who aided my enterprise—the dog Saxons and accursed Jews, who are my prisoners—all, all shall attend me—a goodly fellowship as ever took the downward road—Ha, ha, ha!" and he laughed in his frenzy till the vaulted roof rang again. "Who laughed there?" exclaimed Front-de-Bœuf, in altered mood, for the mere of the conflict did not prevent the echoes of his own mad laughter from returning upon his ear—"who laughed there?—Fiends, was it thou?—Speak, witch, and I forgive thee—for, only then or the fiend of hell himself could have laughed at such a moment. Avaunt!—avaunt!"——

But it were useless to trace any farther the picture of the blasphemer and parricide's death-bed.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Once more unto the breach, dear friends, once more,
Or close the wall up with our English dead.
——— And you, good yeomen,
Whose limbs were made in England, show us here
The mettle of your pasture—let us swear
That you are worth your breeding.

KING HENRY V.

Cedric, although not greatly confident in Ulrica's message, omitted not to communicate her promise to the Black Knight and Locksley. They were well pleased to find they had a friend within the place, who might, in the moment of need, be able to facilitate their entrance, and readily agreed with the Saxon that a storm, under whatever disadvantages, ought to be attempted, as the only means of liberating the prisoners now in the hands of the cruel Front-de-Bœuf.

"The royal blood of Alfred is endangered," said Cedric.

"The honour of a noble lady is in peril," said the Black Knight.

"And, by the Saint Christopher at my baldric," said the good yeoman, "were there no other cause than the safety of that poor faithful knave, Wamba, I would jeopard a joint ere a hair of his head were hurt."

"And so would I," said the Friar; "what, sirs! I was well that a fool—I mean, d'ye see me, sirs, a fool hat is free of his guild and master of his craft, and may give as much relish and flavour to a cup of wine s ever a flitch of bacon can—I say, brethren, such a ool shall never want a wise clerk to pray for or fight or him at a need, while I can say a mass or flourish quarterstaff."

And with that he made his heavy halberd to play round his head as a shepherd boy flourishes his light rush.

"True, Holy Clerk," said the Black Knight, "true s if Saint Dunstan himself had said it.—And now, ood Locksley, were it not well that noble Cedric ould assume the direction of this assault?"

"Not a jot I," returned Cedric; "I have never been ent to study either how to take or how to hold out astles of tyrannic power, which the Normans ave erected in this groaning land. I will fight among the foremost; but my honest neighbours well now I am not a trained soldier in the discipline of ars, or the attack of strongholds."

"Since it stands thus with noble Cedric," said ocksley, "I am most willing to take on me the direction of the archery; and ye shall hang me up on a green trysting-tree, an the defenders be permitted show themselves over the walls without being ick with as many shafts as there are cloves in a arnish of bacon at Christmas."

"Well said, stout yeoman," answered the Black night; "and if I be thought worthy to have a charge these matters, and can find among these brave men many as are willing to follow a true English knight, we as I may surely call myself, I am ready, with such ill as my experience has taught me, to lead them to e attack of these walls."

The parts being thus distributed to the leaders, they announced the first assault, of which the reader has already heard the issue.

When the barbican was carried, the Sable Knight ent notice of the happy event to Locksley, requesting him at the same time, to keep such a strict observation on the castle as might prevent the defenders from combining their forces for a sudden sally, and recovering the outwork which they had lost. This the knight was chiefly desirous of avoiding, conscious that the men whom he led, being hasty and untrained volunteers, imperfectly armed and unaccustomed to discipline, must, upon any sudden attack, fight at great disadvantage with the veteran soldiers of the Norman knights, who were well provided with arms both defensive and offensive; and who, to match the zeal and high spirit of the besiegers, had all the confidence which arises from perfect discipline and the habitual use of weapons.

The knight employed the interval in causing to be constructed a sort of floating bridge, or long raft, by means of which he hoped to cross the moat in despite of the resistance of the enemy. This was a work of some time, which the leaders the less regretted, as it gave Ulrica leisure to execute her plan of diversion in their favour, whatever that might be.

When the raft was completed, the Black Knight addressed the besiegers:—"It avails not waiting here longer, my friends; the sun is descending to the west—and I have that upon my hands which will not permit me to tarry with you another day. Besides, it will be a marvel if the horsemen come not upon us from York, unless we speedily accomplish our purpose. Wherefore, one of ye go to Locksley, and bid him commence a discharge of arrows on the opposite side of the castle, and move forward as if about to assault it; and you, true English hearts stand by me, and be ready to thrust the raft endlong over the moat whenever the postern on our side is thrown open. Follow me boldly across, and aid me to burst you sallyport in the main wall of the castle. As many of you as like not this service, or are but ill armed to meet it, do you man the top of the outwork, draw your bowstrings to your ears, and mind you quell with your shot whatever shall appear to man the rampart.—Noble Cedric, wilt thou take the direction of those which remain?"

"Not so, by the soul of Hereward!" said the Saxon; "lead I cannot; but may posterity curse me in my grave, if I follow one with the foremost whereover thou shalt point the way.—The quarrel is mine, and well it becomes me to be in the van of the battle."

"Yet, bethink thee, noble Saxon," said the knight, "thou hast neither hauberk, nor corslet, nor aught but that light helmet, target, and sword."

"The better!" answered Cedric; "I shall be the lighter to climb these walls. And,—forgive the boast, Sir Knight,—thou shalt this day see the naked breast of a Saxon as boldly presented to the battle as ever ye beheld the steel corset of a Norman."

"In the name of God, then," said the knight, "fling open the door, and launch the floating bridge."

The portal, which led from the inner-wall of the barbican to the moat, and which corresponded with a sallyport in the main wall of the castle, was now suddenly opened; the temporary bridge was then thrust forward, and soon flashed in the waters, extending its length between the castle and outwork, and forming a slippery and precarious passage for two men abreast to cross the moat. Well aware of the importance of taking the foe by surprise, the Black Knight, closely followed by Cedric, threw himself upon the bridge, and reached the opposite side. Here he began to thunder with his axe upon the gate of the castle, protected in part from the shot and stones cast by the defenders by the ruins of the former drawbridge, which the Templar had demolished in his retreat from the barbican, leaving the counterpoise still attached to the upper part of the portal. The followers of the knight had no such shelter; two were instantly shot with cross-bow bolts, and two more fell into the moat; the others retreated back into the barbican.

The situation of Cedric and of the Black Knight was now truly dangerous, and would have been still more so, but for the constancy of the archers in the barbican, who ceased not to shower their arrows upon the battlements, distracting the attention of those by whom they were manned, and thus affording a respite

[illegible] from his brief slumber by the noise of the [illegible] his attendant, who had, at his anxious [illegible] placed herself at the window to watch [illegible] to him the fate of the attack, was for some [illegible] by the increase [illegible] At length the [illegible] of smoke [illegible] or water [illegible] battle [illegible] progress [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible] Rebecca [illegible] "for [illegible]"

[illegible] not [illegible] Rebecca; [illegible] God! my [illegible] father [illegible] what will be his fate!"

[illegible] the apartment flew [illegible] the Templar [illegible] himself—a ghastly [illegible] his gilt [illegible] was broken and bloody, [illegible] partly burnt [illegible] "I have [illegible]" said he to [illegible] "thou shalt [illegible] I will keep my word to [illegible] and woe [illegible] There is but one path [illegible] I have [illegible] through fifty dangers to [illegible] the [illegible] follow me!"

[illegible]" answered Rebecca, "I will not follow [illegible] how [illegible] born of woman—if thou hast been [illegible] human charity in thee—if thy heart be not [illegible] thy breastplate—save my aged father—save [illegible] knight!"

[illegible]," answered the Templar, with his characteristic calmness, "a knight, Rebecca, must encounter his fate, whether it meet him in the shape of [illegible] flame—and who recks how or where a Jew [illegible] his?"

[illegible] warrior," said Rebecca, "rather will I [illegible] the flames than accept safety from thee!"

[illegible] shalt not choose, Rebecca—once didst thou [illegible] it never mortal did so twice."

[illegible], he seized on the terrified maiden, who [illegible] with her shrieks, and bore her out of the [illegible] arms in spite of her cries, and without regarding the menaces and defiance which Ivanhoe [illegible] against him. "Hound of the Temple—[illegible] Order—set free the damsel! Traitor of [illegible] it is Ivanhoe commands thee!—Villain, [illegible] thy heart's blood!"

[illegible] not found thee, Wilfred," said the Black [illegible] who at that instant entered the apartment, [illegible] shouts."

[illegible] best true knight," said Wilfred, "think [illegible]—pursue yon ravisher—save the Lady [illegible] look to the noble Cedric!"

[illegible] turn," answered he of the fetterlock, "but [illegible]."

[illegible] upon Ivanhoe, he bore him off with as [illegible] as the Templar had carried off Rebecca, [illegible] him to the postern, and having there [illegible] his burden to the care of two yeomen, he [illegible] the castle to assist in the rescue of the [illegible].

[illegible] was now in bright flames, which flashed [illegible] from window and shot-hole. But in [illegible] the great thickness of the walls and the [illegible] of the apartments resisted the progress [illegible], and there the rage of man still triumphed, [illegible] more dreadful element held mastery elsewhere [illegible] the besiegers [illegible] the defenders of the [illegible] chamber to chamber, and satiated in the [illegible] vengeance which had long animated them [illegible] soldiers of the tyrant Front-de-Bœuf. [illegible] garrison resisted to the uttermost—few of [illegible] quarter—none received it. The air was [illegible] groans and clashing of arms—the floors [illegible] with the blood of despairing and expiring [illegible].

[illegible] this scene of confusion, Cedric rushed in [illegible] Rowena, while the faithful Gurth, following [illegible] has some idea that this passage imitated from [illegible] of Philidaspes, before the divine Mandane, when [illegible] Babylon is on fire, and he proposes to carry her from [illegible] But the theft (if there be one) would be rather too [illegible] by the penance of searching for the original [illegible] through the interminable volumes of the Grand Cyrus.

him closely through the [illegible] his own safety while he strove to avert the blows that were aimed at his master [illegible]

[illegible] Hi[illegible] [illegible] Rebecca [illegible] Wamba [illegible]

When [illegible] was [illegible] with the [illegible] the [illegible] Ere [illegible]

A[illegible] that of this renown[illegible] last chance of safety [illegible] to them. The drawbridge had been lowered by his orders, but the [illegible] who had [illegible] among the [illegible] side by their missiles [illegible] saw the flames breaking out, and the bridge lowered, [illegible] to the entrance as well to prevent the escape of the garrison, as to secure [illegible] castle should be burnt down. On the other [illegible] party of the besiegers who had entered by the postern were now [illegible] the court-yard, and [illegible] with fury [illegible] thus assaulted on both [illegible]

Animated, however, [illegible] encouraged by the example of their [illegible] the remaining soldiers of the [illegible] with the utmost valour; and, being well [illegible] more than once in driving back the assailants, [illegible] inferior in numbers. Rebecca, placed on horseback before one of the Templar's Saracen slaves, was in the midst of the little party; and Bois-Guilbert, notwithstanding the confusion [illegible] every attention to her safety. Repeatedly [illegible] her side, and, neglecting his own defence, held before her the fence of his triangular [illegible] and anon starting from his position by her, he cried his war-cry, dashed forward, struck to earth the most forward of the assailants, and was on the same instant once more at her bridle rein.

Athelstane, who, as the reader knows, was slothful, but not cowardly, beheld the female form whom the Templar protected thus sedulously, and doubted not that it was Rowena whom the knight was carrying off, in despite of all resistance which could be offered.

"By the soul of Saint Edward," he said, "I will rescue her from yonder over-proud knight, and he shall die by my hand!"

"Think what you do!" cried Wamba; "hasty hand catches frog for fish—by my bauble, yonder is none of my Lady Rowena—see but her long dark locks! Nay, an ye will not know black from white, ye may be leader, but I will be no follower—no bones of mine shall be broken unless I know for whom. And you without armour too!—Bethink you, silk bonnet never kept out steel blade. Nay, then, if wilful will to water, wilful must drench. [illegible] most doughty Athelstane!"—he concluded, loosening the hold which he had hitherto kept upon the Saxon's limbs.

To snatch a mace from the pavement, on which it lay beside one whose dying grasp had just relinquished it—to rush on the Templar's band, and to strike in quick succession to the right and left, levelling a warrior at each blow, was, for Athelstane's great strength, now animated with unusual fury, but the work of a single moment; he was soon within two yards of Bois-Guilbert, whom he defied in his loudest tone.

"Turn, false-hearted Templar! let go her whom thou art unworthy to touch—turn, limb of a band of murdering and hypocritical robbers!"

"Dog!" said the Templar, grinding his teeth, "I will teach thee to blaspheme the holy Order of the Temple of Zion;" and with these words, half-wheeling his steed, and making a demi-volte towards the Saxon, and rising in the stirrups, so as to take full advantage of the descent of the weapon, he struck a fearful blow upon the head of Athelstane.

Well said Wamba, that silken bonnet keeps out no steel blade. So trenchant was the Templar's weapon, that it shore asunder, as it had been a willow twig, the tough and plaited handle of the mace, which the ill-fated Saxon reared to parry the blow, and, descending on his head, levelled him with the earth.

"Ha! Beau-seant!" exclaimed Bois-Guilbert, "thus be it to the maligners of the Temple-knights!" Taking advantage of the dismay which was spread by the fall of Athelstane, and calling aloud, "Those who would save themselves, follow me!" he pushed across the drawbridge, dispersing the archers who would have intercepted them. He was followed by his Saracens, and some five or six men-at-arms, who had mounted their horses. The Templar's retreat was rendered perilous by the numbers of arrows shot off at him and his party; but this did not prevent him from galloping round to the barbican, of which, according to his previous plan, he supposed it possible that De Bracy might have been in possession.

"De Bracy! De Bracy!" he shouted, "art thou there?"

"I am here," replied De Bracy, "but I am a prisoner."

"Can I rescue thee?" cried Bois-Guilbert.

"No," replied De Bracy; "I have rendered me, rescue or no rescue. I will be true prisoner. Save thyself—there are hawks abroad—put the seas betwixt you and England—I dare not say more."

"Well," answered the Templar, "an thou wilt tarry there, remember I have redeemed word and glove. Be the hawks where they will, methinks the walls of the Preceptory of Templestowe will be cover sufficient, and thither will I, like heron to her haunt."

Having thus spoken, he galloped off with his followers.

Those of the castle who had not gotten to horse, still continued to fight desperately with the besiegers, after the departure of the Templar, but rather in despair of quarter than that they entertained any hope of escape. The fire was spreading rapidly through all parts of the castle, when Ulrica, who had first kindled it, appeared on a turret, in the guise of one of the ancient furies, yelling forth a war-song, such as was of yore raised on the field of battle by the scalds of the yet heathen Saxons. Her long dishevelled grey hair flew back from her uncovered head; the inebriating delight of gratified vengeance contended in her eyes with the fire of insanity; and she brandished the distaff which she held in her hand, as if she had been one of the Fatal Sisters, who spin and abridge the thread of human life. Tradition has preserved some wild strophes of the barbarous hymn which she chanted wildly amid that scene of fire and slaughter:

1.

Whet the bright steel,
Sons of the White Dragon!
Kindle the torch,
Daughter of Hengist!
The steel glimmers not for the carving of the banquet,
It is hard, broad, and sharply pointed;
The torch goeth not to the bridal chamber,
It steams and glitters blue with sulphur.
Whet the steel, the raven croaks!
Light the torch, Zernebock is yelling!
Whet the steel, sons of the Dragon!
Kindle the torch, daughter of Hengist!

2.

The black cloud is low over the thane's castle;
The eagle screams—he rides on its bosom.
Scream not, grey rider of the sable cloud,
Thy banquet is prepared!
The maidens of Valhalla look forth,
The race of Hengist will send them guests.
Shake your black tresses, maidens of Valhalla!
And strike your loud timbrels for joy!
Many a haughty step bends to your halls,
Many a helmed head.

3.

Dark sits the evening upon the thane's castle,
The black clouds gather round;
Soon shall they be red as the blood of the valiant
The destroyer of forests shall shake his red c them.
He, the bright consumer of palaces,
Broad waves he his blazing banner,
Red, wide and dusky,
Over the strife of the valiant:
His joy is in the clashing swords and broken buc
He loves to lick the hissing blood as it bursts
the wound!

4.

All must perish!
The sword cleaveth the helmet;
The strong armour is pierced by the lance;
Fire devoureth the dwelling of princes,
Engines break down the fences of the battle.
All must perish!
The race of Hengist is gone—
The name of Horsa is no more!
Shrink not then from your doom, sons of the sw
Let your blades drink blood like wine;
Feast ye in the banquet of slaughter,
By the light of the blazing halls!
Strong be your swords while your blood is war
And spare neither for pity nor fear,
For vengeance hath but an hour;
Strong hate itself shall expire!
I also must perish!*

The towering flames had now surmoun obstruction, and rose to the evening skies and burning beacon seen far and wide th adjacent country. Tower after tower crash with blazing roof and rafter; and the co were driven from the court-yard. The va of whom very few remained, scattered an into the neighbouring wood. The victo bling in large bands, gazed with wonder mixed with fear, upon the flames, in which ranks and arms glanced dusky red. Th figure of the Saxon Ulrica was for a long ti on the lofty stand she had chosen, tossing abroad with wild exultation, as if she reigne of the conflagration which she had raised. with a terrific crash, the whole turret gave she perished in the flames which had con tyrant. An awful pause of horror silen murmur of the armed spectators, who, for of several minutes, stirred not a finger, sa the cross. The voice of Locksley was th "Shout, yeomen!—the den of tyrants is Let each bring his spoil to our chosen rendezvous at the Trysting-tree in the Hart for there at break of day will we make just among our own bands, together with our allies in this great deed of vengeance."

CHAPTER XXXII.

Trust me, each state must have its policies:
Kingdoms have edicts, cities have their ch
Even the wild outlaw, in his forest walk,
Keeps yet some touch of civil discipline;
For not since Adam wore his verdant apro
Hath man with man in social union dwelt,
But laws were made to draw that union clo

The daylight had dawned upon the gl oak forest. The green boughs glittered wi

* It will readily occur to the Antiquary, that the intended to imitate the antique poetry of the Scal strels of the old Scandinavians—the race, as the happily terms them,

"Stern to inflict, and stubborn to endure,
Who smiles in death."

The poetry of the Anglo-Saxons, after their civ conversion, was of a different and softer characte circumstances of Ulrica, she may not be unnaturally return to the wild strains which animated her during the time of Paganism and untamed ferocity

d w. The hind led her fawn from the co- g fern to the more open walks of the green- huntsman was there to watch or inter- tately hart, as he paced at the head of the erd.

laws were all assembled around the Tryst- the Harthill-walk, where they had spent in refreshing themselves after the fatigues ege, some with wine, some with slumber, hearing and recounting the events of the computing the heaps of plunder which their ad placed at the disposal of their Chief.

oils were indeed very large; for, notwith- that much was consumed, a great deal of rich armour, and splendid clothing, had been y the exertions of the dauntless outlaws, ld be appalled by no danger when such re- re in view. Yet so strict were the laws of ty, that no one ventured to appropriate any booty, which was brought into one com- s, to be at the disposal of their leader.

ce of rendezvous was an aged oak; not the same to which Locksley had conducted l Wamba in the earlier part of the story, but was the centre of a silvan amphitheatre, lf a mile of the demolished castle of Torquil- ere Locksley assumed his seat—a throne of t under the twisted branches of the huge oak, lvan followers were gathered around him. ed to the Black Knight a seat at his right to Cedric a place upon his left.

n my freedom, noble sirs," he said, "but in des I am monarch—they are my kingdom; e my wild subjects would reck but little of r, were I, within my own dominions, to yield mortal man.—Now, sirs, who hath seen our ? where is our curtal Friar? A mass amongst men best begins a busy morning."—No one the Clerk of Copmanhurst. "Over gods said the outlaw chief, "I trust the jolly hath but abidden by the wine-pot a thought too o saw him since the castle was taken?"

oth the Miller, "marked him busy about the cellar, swearing by each saint in the calen- ould taste the smack of Front-de-Bœuf's e wine."

the saints, as many as there be of them," Captain, "forfend, lest he has drunk too wine-butts, and perished by the fall of the Away, Miller!—take with you enow of men, lace where you last saw him—throw water moat on the scorching ruins—I will have oved stone by stone ere I lose my curtal mbers who hastened to execute this duty, g that an interesting division of spoil was ake place, showed how much the troop had the safety of their spiritual father.

while, let us proceed," said Locksley; "for bold deed shall be sounded abroad, the De Bracy, of Malvoisin, and other allies of Bœuf, will be in motion against us, and it for our safety that we retreat from the vici- ble Cedric," he said, turning to the Saxon, is divided into two portions; do thou make hat which best suits thee, to recompense thy were partakers with us in this adventure."

yeoman," said Cedric, "my heart is op- th sadness. The noble Athelstane of Con- is no more—the last sprout of the sainted ! Hopes have perished with him which can rn!—A spark hath been quenched by his ch no human breath can again rekindle! save the few who are now with me, do presence to transport his honoured re- heir last mansion. The Lady Rowena is o return to Rotherwood, and must be y a sufficient force. I should, therefore, ere left this place; and I waited—not to share or, so help me God and Saint Withold! as nor any of mine will touch the value of a aited but to render my thanks to thee and yeomen, for the life and honour ye have

"Nay, but," said the Chief Outlaw, "we did but half the work at most—take of the spoil what may reward your own neighbours and followers."

"I am rich enough to reward them from mine own wealth," answered Cedric.

"And some," said Wamba, "have been wise enough to reward themselves; they do not march off empty-handed altogether. We do not all wear motley."

"They are welcome," said Locksley; "our laws bind none but ourselves."

"But, thou, my poor knave," said Cedric, turning about and embracing his Jester, "how shall I reward thee, who feared not to give thy body to chains and death instead of mine!—All forsook me, when the poor fool was faithful!"

A tear stood in the eye of the rough thane as he spoke—a mark of feeling which even the death of Athelstane had not extracted; but there was something in the half-instinctive attachment of his clown, that waked his nature more keenly than even grief itself.

"Nay," said the Jester, extricating himself from his master's caress, "if you pay my service with the water of your eye, the Jester must weep for company, and then what becomes of his vocation?—But, uncle, if you would indeed pleasure me, I pray you to pardon my playfellow Gurth, who stole a week from your service to bestow it on your son."

"Pardon him!" exclaimed Cedric; "I will both pardon and reward him.—Kneel down, Gurth."—The swineherd was in an instant at his master's feet—"Theow and Esne* art thou no longer," said Cedric, touching him with a wand; "Folkfree and Sacless† art thou in town and from town, in the forest as in the field. A hide of land I give to thee in my steads of Walbrugham, from me and mine to thee and thine aye and for ever; and God's malison on his head who this gainsays!"

No longer a serf, but a freeman and a landholder, Gurth sprung upon his feet, and twice bounded aloft to almost his own height from the ground.

"A smith and a file," he cried, "to do away the collar from the neck of a freeman!—Noble master! doubled is my strength by your gift, and doubly will I fight for you!—There is a free spirit in my breast—I am a man changed to myself and all around.—Ha, Fangs!" he continued,—for that faithful cur, seeing his master thus transported, began to jump upon him, to express his sympathy,—"knowest thou thy master still?"

"Ay," said Wamba, "Fangs and I still know thee, Gurth, though we must needs abide by the collar; it is only thou art likely to forget both us and thyself."

"I shall forget myself indeed ere I forget thee, true comrade," said Gurth; "and were freedom fit for thee, Wamba, the master would not let thee want it."

"Nay," said Wamba, "never think I envy thee, brother Gurth; the serf sits by the hall-fire when the freeman must forth to the field of battle—And what saith Oldhelm of Malmsbury—Better a fool at a feast than a wise man at a fray."

The tramp of horses was now heard, and the Lady Rowena appeared, surrounded by several riders, and a much stronger party of footmen, who joyfully shook their pikes and clashed their brown-bills for joy at her freedom. She herself, richly attired, and mounted on a dark chestnut palfrey, had recovered all the dignity of her manner, and only an unwonted degree of paleness showed the sufferings she had undergone. Her lovely brow, though sorrowful, bore on it a cast of reviving hope for the future, as well as of grateful thankfulness for the past deliverance. She knew that Ivanhoe was safe, and she knew that Athelstane was dead. The former assurance filled her with the most sincere delight; and if she did not absolutely rejoice at the latter, she might be pardoned for feeling the full advantage of being freed from further persecution on the only subject in which she had ever been contradicted by her guardian Cedric.

As Rowena bent her steed towards Locksley's seat, that bold yeoman, with all his followers, rose to receive her, as if by a general instinct of courtesy. The blood rose to her cheeks, as, courteously waving

* Thrall and bondsman. † A lawful freeman.

[illegible]

Again bowing [illegible] Rowena [illegible] to depart; [illegible] was to attend her [illegible] De Bracy. He [illegible] his arms crossed [illegible] He looked up, however, and [illegible] flash of shame [illegible] his [illegible] countenance. He stood a moment [illegible] forward, took her palfrey by the rein, and [illegible] his knee before her.

"Will the Lady Rowena [illegible] cast an eye on a captive knight—on a dishonoured soldier?"

"Sir Knight," answered Rowena, "in enterprises such as yours, the real dishonour lies not in failure, but in success."

"Conquest, lady, should soften the heart," answered De Bracy; "let me but know that the Lady Rowena forgives the violence occasioned by an ill-fated passion, and she shall soon learn that De Bracy knows how to serve her in nobler ways."

"I forgive you, Sir Knight," said Rowena, "as a Christian."

"That means," said Wamba, "that she does not forgive him at all."

"But I can never forgive the misery and desolation your madness has occasioned," continued Rowena.

"Unloose your hold on the lady's rein," said Cedric, coming up. "By the bright sun above us, but it were shame, I would pin thee to the earth with my javelin—but be well assured, thou shalt smart, Maurice De Bracy, for thy share in this foul deed."

"He threatens safely who threatens a prisoner," said De Bracy; "but when had a Saxon any touch of courtesy?"

Then retiring two steps backward, he permitted the lady to move on.

Cedric, ere they departed, expressed his peculiar gratitude to the Black Champion, and earnestly intreated him to accompany him to Rotherwood.

"I know," he said, "that ye errant knights desire to carry your fortunes on the point of your lance, and reck not of land or goods; but war is a changeful mistress, and a home is sometimes desirable even to the [illegible] whose trade is wandering. Thou hast

[illegible]

[illegible] God speed him, and on they moved throug[h] [the] glades of the forest.

They had scarce departed, ere a sudden p[rocession] moved from under the greenwood branche[s] slowly round the sylvan amphitheatre, and [took the] same direction with Rowena and her followe[rs] priests of a neighbouring convent, in expect[ation of] the ample donation, or soul-scat, which Ce[dric] proposed, attended upon the car in which th[e body of] Athelstane was laid, and sang hymns as it [was sad] and slowly borne on the shoulders of his v[assals to] his castle of Coningsburgh, to be there dep[osited in] the grave of Hengist, from whom the dece[ased de]rived his long descent. Many of his vas[sals had] assembled at the news of his death, and foll[owed the] bier with all the external marks, at least, of [dejection] and sorrow. Again the outlaws arose, and [paid the] same rude and spontaneous homage to deat[h, that] they had so lately rendered to beauty—the sl[ow chant] and mournful step of the priests brought bac[k to their] remembrance such of their comrades as had [fallen in] the yesterday's affray. But such recollectio[ns dwell] not long with those who lead a life of dan[ger and] enterprise, and ere the sound of the death-h[ymn had] died on the wind, the outlaws were again b[usied in] the distribution of their spoil.

"Valiant knight," said Locksley to th[e Black] Champion, "without whose good heart an[d mighty] arm our enterprise must altogether have fa[iled, will] it please you to take from that mass of spo[il what]ever may best serve to pleasure you, and to [remind] you of this my Trysting-tree?"

"I accept the offer," said the Knight, "a[s frankly] as it is given; and I ask permission to dispo[se of Sir] Maurice de Bracy at my own pleasure."

"He is thine already," said Locksley, "[and well] for him! else the tyrant had graced the highe[st bough] of this oak, with as many of his Free-Compa[nions as] we could gather, hanging thick as acorns aro[und him.] But he is thy prisoner, and he is safe, th[ough he] had slain my father."

"De Bracy," said the Knight, "thou art f[ree—de]part. He whose prisoner thou art scorns [to take] mean revenge for what is past. But bewa[re of the] future, lest a worse thing befall thee.—Ma[urice de] Bracy, I say BEWARE!"

[illegible]

e breath occasioned by this incident was composed, the chief Outlaw took from his ... horn and baldric which he had recently ... at the strife of archery near Ashby.

Knight," he said to the Knight of the Fetterlock ... deign to grace by your acceptance a ... English yeoman has once worn, this ... you to keep as a memorial of your gallant ... and if ye have aught to be achieved, as happeneth ... a gallant Knight, ye chance to be hard ... in the forests between Trent and Tees, wind ... upon the horn thus, Wa-sa-hoa! and it ... chance ye shall find helpers and rescue."

gave breath to the call ... that which described ... the Knight ... the notes.

... for the gift, bold yeoman," said the ... no better help than thine and thy ... I never seek, were it at my utmost need." ... in his turn he winded the call till all the ... rang.

own and clearly," said the yeoman; "beshrew ... than thou knowest not as much of wood- ... warder ... thou hast been a striker of deer in ... warrant.—Comrades, mark these three ... the call of the Knight of the Fetterlock; ... who hears it, and hastens not to serve him at ... will have him scourged out of our band ... own bowstring."

... our leader!" shouted the yeoman, "and ... the Black Knight of the Fetterlock!—May ... our service, to prove how readily it will ...

... now proceeded to the distribution of the ... which he performed with the most laudable ... y. A tenth part of the whole was set apart ... urch, and for pious uses; a portion was ... ed to a sort of public treasury; a part was ... the widows and children of those who ... or to be expended in masses for the souls ... had left no surviving family. The rest ... d amongst the outlaws, according to their ... merit; and the judgment of the Chief, on ... doubtful questions as occurred, was delivered ... shrewdness, and received with absolute ... . The Black Knight was not a little sur- ... find that men, in a state so lawless, were ... s among themselves so regularly and equi- ... ned, and all that he observed added to his ... the justice and judgment of their leader.

... each had taken his own proportion of the ... while the treasurer, accompanied by four ... was transporting that belonging to the ... me place of concealment or of security, the ... oted to the church still remained unappro- ...

l," said the leader, "we could hear tidings ... us chaplain; he was never wont to be ab- ... meat was to be blessed, or spoil to be parted; ... s duty to take care of these the tithes of ... sful enterprise. It may be the office has ... over some of his canonical irregularities. ... a holy brother of his a prisoner at no ... ness, and I would fain have the Friar to ... deal with him in due sort. I greatly mis- ... afety of the bluff priest."

... right sorry for that," said the Knight of ... ock, "for I stand indebted to him for the ... itality of a merry night in his cell. Let us ... s of the castle; it may be we shall there ... tidings of him."

... ey thus spoke, a loud shout among the ... nounced the arrival of him for whom they ... they learned from the stentorian voice of ... himself, long before they saw his burly ...

... room, my merry men!" he exclaimed; ... your godly father and his prisoner. Cry ... once more.—I come, noble leader, like an ... my prey in my clutch."—And making his ... gh the ring, amidst the laughter of all ... around, he appeared in majestic triumph, his huge partisan in one hand, and in the other a halter, one end of which was fastened to the neck of the unfortunate Isaac of York, who, bent down by sorrow and terror, was dragged on by the victorious priest, who shouted aloud, "Where is Allan-a-Dale, to chronicle me in a ballad, or if it were but a lay?—By Saint Hermangild, the jingling crowder is ever out of the way where there is an apt theme for exalting valour!"

"Curtal Priest," said the Captain, "thou hast been at a wet mass this morning, as early as it is. In the name of Saint Nicholas, whom hast thou got here?"

"A captive to my sword and to my lance, noble Captain," replied the Clerk of Copmanhurst; "to my bow and to my halberd, I should rather say; and yet I have redeemed him by my divinity from a worse captivity. Speak, Jew—have I not ransomed thee from Sathanas?—have I not taught thee thy credo, thy pater, and thine Ave Maria?—Did I not spend the whole night in drinking to thee, and in expounding of mysteries?"

"For the love of God!" ejaculated the poor Jew, "will no one take me out of the keeping of this mad—I mean this holy man?"

"How's this, Jew?" said the Friar, with a menacing aspect; "dost thou recant, Jew?—Bethink thee, if thou dost relapse into thine infidelity, though thou art not so tender as a suckling pig—I would I had one to break my fast upon—thou art not too tough to be roasted! Be conformable, Isaac, and repeat the words after me. Ave Maria!"—

"Nay, we will have no profanation, mad Priest," said Locksley; "let us rather hear where you found this prisoner of thine."

"By Saint Dunstan," said the Friar, "I found him where I sought for better ware! I did step into the cellarage to see what might be rescued there; for though a cup of burnt wine, with spice, be an evening's draught for an emperor, it were waste, methought, to let so much good liquor be mulled at once; and I had caught up one runlet of sack, and was coming to call more aid among these lazy knaves, who are ever to seek when a good deed is to be done, when I was advised of a strong door—Aha! thought I, here is the choicest juice of all in this secret crypt; and the knave butler, being disturbed in his vocation, hath left the key in the door—In therefore I went, and found just nothing besides a commodity of rusted chains and this dog of a Jew, who presently rendered himself my prisoner, rescue or no rescue. I did but refresh myself after the fatigue of the action, with the unbeliever, with one humming cup of sack, and was proceeding to lead forth my captive, when, crash after crash, as with wild thunder-dint and levin-fire, down toppled the masonry of an outer tower, (marry beshrew their hands that built it not the firmer!) and blocked up the passage. The roar of one falling tower followed another—I gave up thought of life; and deeming it a dishonour to one of my profession to pass out of this world in company with a Jew, I heaved up my halberd to beat his brains out; but I took pity on his gray hairs, and judged it better to lay down the partisan, and take up my spiritual weapon for his conversion. And truly, by the blessing of Saint Dunstan, the seed has been sown in good soil; only that, with speaking to him of mysteries through the whole night, and being in a manner fasting, (for the few draughts of sack which I sharpened my wits with were not worth marking,) my head is well nigh dizzied, I trow.—But I was clean exhausted.—Gilbert and Wibbald know in what state they found me—quite and clean exhausted."

"We can bear witness," said Gilbert; "for when we had cleared away the ruin, and by Saint Dunstan's help lighted upon the dungeon stair, we found the runlet of sack half empty, the Jew half dead, and the Friar more than half—exhausted, as he calls it."

"Ye be knaves! ye lie!" retorted the offended Friar; "it was you and your gormandizing companions that drank up the sack, and called it your morning draught. I am a pagan, an I kept it not for the Captain's own throat. But what recks it? The Jew

* ... upon the bugle were anciently called mots, and ... shed in the old treatises on hunting, not by mu- ... ers, but by written words.

is converted, and understands all I have told him very nearly as well as myself."

"Jew," said the Captain, "is this true? hast thou renounced thine unbelief?"

"May I so find mercy in your eyes," said the Jew, "as I know not one word which the reverend prelate spake to me all this fearful night. Alas! I was so distraught with agony, and fear, and grief, that had our holy father Abraham come to preach to me, he had found but a deaf listener."

"Thou liest, Jew, and thou knowest thou dost," said the Friar; "I will remind thee but of one word of our conference—thou didst promise to give all thy substance to our holy Order."

"So help me the Promise, fair sirs," said Isaac, even more alarmed than before, "as no such sounds ever crossed my lips! Alas! I am an aged beggar'd man—I fear me a childless—have ruth on me, and let me go!"

"Nay," said the Friar, "if thou dost retract vows made in favour of holy Church, thou must do penance."

Accordingly, he raised his halberd, and would have laid the staff of it lustily on the Jew's shoulders, had not the Black Knight stopped the blow, and thereby transferred the Holy Clerk's resentment to himself.

"By Saint Thomas of Kent," said he, "an I buckle to my gear, I will teach thee, sir lazy lover, to mell with thine own matters, maugre thine iron case there!"

"Nay, be not wroth with me," said the Knight; "thou knowest I am thy sworn friend and comrade."

"I know no such thing," answered the Friar; "and defy thee for a meddling coxcomb!"

"Nay but," said the Knight, who seemed to take a pleasure in provoking his quondam host, "hast thou forgotten how, that for my sake (for I say nothing of the temptation of the flagon and the pasty) thou didst break thy vow of fast and vigil?"

"Truly, friend," said the Friar, clenching his huge fist, "I will bestow a buffet on thee."

"I accept of no such presents," said the Knight; "I am content to take thy cuff as a loan, but I will repay thee with usury as deep as ever thy prisoner there exacted in his traffic."

"I will prove that presently," said the Friar.

"Hola!" cried the Captain, "what art thou after, mad Friar? brawling beneath our Trysting-tree?"

"No brawling," said the Knight, "it is but a friendly interchange of courtesy.—Friar, strike an thou darest—I will stand thy blow, if thou wilt stand mine."

"Thou hast the advantage with that iron pot on thy head," said the churchman; "but have at thee—Down thou goest, an thou wert Goliath of Gath in his brazen helmet."

The Friar bared his brawny arm up to the elbow, and putting his full strength to the blow, gave the Knight a buffet that might have felled an ox. But his adversary stood firm as a rock. A loud shout was uttered by all the yeomen around; for the Clerk's cuff was proverbial amongst them, and there were few who, in jest or earnest, had not had occasion to know its vigour.

"Now, Priest," said the Knight, pulling off his gauntlet, "if I had vantage on my head, I will have none on my hand—stand fast as a true man."

"Genam meam dedi vapulatori—I have given my cheek to the smiter," said the Priest; "an thou canst stir me from the spot, fellow, I will freely bestow on thee the Jew's ransom."

So spoke the burly Priest, assuming, on his part, high defiance. But who may resist his fate? The buffet* of the Knight was given with such strength and good will, that the Friar rolled head over heels upon the plain, to the great amazement of all the spectators. But he arose neither angry nor crestfallen.

"Brother," said he to the Knight, "thou shouldst have used thy strength with more discretion. I had mumbled but a lame mass an thou hadst broken my jaw, for the piper plays ill that wants the nether chops. Nevertheless, there is my hand, in friendly witness, that I will exchange no more cuffs with thee, having been a loser by the barter. End now all unkindness. Let us put the Jew to ransom, since the leopard will not change his spots, and a Jew he will continue to be."

"The Priest," said Clement, "is not half so confident of the Jew's conversion, since he received that buffet on the ear."

"Go to, knave, what pratest thou of conversions?—what, is there no respect?—all masters and no men?—I tell thee, fellow, I was somewhat totty when I received the good Knight's blow, or I had kept my ground under it. But an thou gibest more of it, thou shalt learn I can give as well as take."

"Peace all!" said the Captain. "And thou, Jew, think of thy ransom; thou needest not to be told that thy race are held to be accursed in all Christian communities, and trust me that we cannot endure thy presence among us. Think, therefore, of an offer, while I examine a prisoner of another cast."

"Were many of Front-de-Bœuf's men taken?" demanded the Black Knight.

"None of note enough to be put to ransom," answered the Captain; "a set of hilding fellows there were, whom we dismissed to find them a new master—enough had been done for revenge and profit; the bunch of them were not worth a cardecu. The prisoner I speak of is better booty—a jolly monk riding to visit his leman, an I may judge by his horse-gear and wearing apparel.—Here cometh the worthy prelate, as pert as a pyet." And, between two yeomen, was brought before the silvan throne of the outlaw Chief, our old friend, Prior Aymer of Jorvaulx.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

> ... Flower of warriors,
> How is't with Titus Lartius?
> Marcius. As with a man busied about decrees,
> Condemning some to death and some to exile,
> Ransoming him or pitying, threat'ning the other.
>
> Coriolanus.

The captive Abbot's features and manners exhibited a whimsical mixture of offended pride, and deranged foppery and bodily terror.

"Why, how now, my masters?" said he, with a voice in which all the three emotions were blended. "What order is this among ye? Be ye Turks or Christians, that handle a churchman?—Know ye what it is, manus imponere in servos Domini? Ye have plundered my mails—torn my cope of curious cut lace, which might have served a cardinal! Another in my place would have been at his excommunicabo vos; but I am placable, and if ye order forth my palfreys, release my brethren, and restore my mails, tell down with all speed an hundred crowns to be expended in masses at the high altar of Jorvaulx Abbey, and make your vow to eat no venison until next Pentecost, it may be you shall hear little more of this mad frolic."

"Holy Father," said the chief Outlaw, "it grieves me to think that you have met with such usage from any of my followers, as calls for your fatherly reprehension."

"Usage!" echoed the priest, encouraged by the mild tone of the silvan leader; "it were usage fit for no hound of good race—much less for a Christian—far less for a priest—and least of all for the Prior of the holy community of Jorvaulx. Here is a profane and drunken minstrel, called Allan-a-Dale—nebulo quidam—who has menaced me with corporal punishment—nay, with death itself, an I pay not down four hundred crowns of ransom, to the boot of all the treasure he hath already robbed me of—gold chains and gymmal rings to an unknown value; besides

* The interchange of a cuff with the jolly priest is not entirely out of character with Richard I., if romances read him aright. In the very curious romance on the subject of his adventures in Palestine, and his return from thence, it is recorded how he exchanged a pugilistic favour of this nature, while a prisoner in Germany. His opponent was the son of his principal warder, and was so imprudent as to give the challenge to this barter of buffets. The King stood forth like a true man, and received a blow which staggered him. In requital, having previously waxed his hand, a practice unknown, I believe, to the gentlemen of the modern fancy, he returned the box on the ear with such interest as to kill his antagonist on the spot.—See, in Ellis's Specimens of English Romance, that of Cœur de Lion.

sen and spoil d among their rude hands, pounce-t-box and silver crisping-tongs" ossible that Allan-a-Dale can have thus it of your reverend bearing," replied the

as the gospel of Saint Nicodemus," said he swore with many a cruel north-coun- t he would hang me upon the highest reenwood."

so my very dead? Nay, then, reverend nk you had better comply with his de- Allan-a-Dale is the very man to abide by ien he has so pledged it."*

but jest with me," said the astounded forced laughter; "and I love a good jest heart. But, ha! ha! ha! when the mirth g livelong night, it is time to be grave in n as grave as a father confessor," replied ; "you must pay a round ransom, Sir ur convent is likely to be called to a new your old friends will know you no more."

Christians," said the Prior, "and hold to a churchman?"

s! we may, answer we, and have divinity brot," answered the Outlaw. "Let our lain stand forth, and expound to this er the texts which concern this matter." half-drunk, ... had huddled a over his green cassock, and now sum- ther wits ... scraps of learning he had rote in former days. "Holy father," said facias ... visitalem nostram— come to the greenwood."

ofane mummery is this?" said the Prior friend, I stand of the church, it were a a show ... how I may escape from these then to stand ducking and grinning orris dancer."

verend father," said the Friar, "I know in which thou mayst escape. This is day with us, we are taking our tithes." t the church, then, I trust, my good bro- he Prior

h and hay," said the Friar; "and there- or fac... de Mammone Make yourselves friends of the Mam- ght-ousness, for no other friendship ... your turn."

olly woodsman at heart," said the Prior, ning; "come, ye must not deal too hard now well of woodcraft, and can wind a ld lustily, and hollo till every oak rings. ye must not be too hard with me."

a horn," said the Outlaw; "we will the boasts of."

Aymer winded a blast accordingly. The k his head.

he said, "thou blowest a merry note, ransom ... we cannot afford, as the good knight's shield hath it, to set thee st. Moreover, I have found thee—thou ose, who, with new French graces and ttrib the ancient English bugle notes. ast flourish on the recheat hath added o thy ransom, for corrupting the true old of venerie."

nd," said the Abbot, peevishly, "thou se with thy woodcraft. I pray thee be nable in this matter of my ransom. At e I must needs, for once, hold a candle what ransom am I to pay for walking street, without having fifty men at my ot well," said the Lieutenant of the gang Captain, "that the Prior should name nsom, and the Jew name the Prior's?"

a mad knave," said the Captain, "but sounds! Here, Jew, step forth. Look Father Aymer, Prior of the rich Abbey of Jorvaulx, and tell us at what ransom we should hold him? -Thou knowest the income of his convent I warrant thee."

"O, assuredly," said Isaac. "I have trafficked with the good fathers, and bought wheat and barley, and fruits of the earth, and also much wool. O, it is a rich abbey-stede, and they do live upon the fat, and drink the sweet wines upon the lees, these good fathers of Jorvaulx. Ah, if an outcast like me had such a home to go to, and such incomings by the year and by the month, I would pay much gold and silver to redeem my captivity."

"Hound of a Jew!" exclaimed the Prior, "no one knows better than thy own cursed self, that our holy house of God is indebted for the finishing of our chancel"—

"And for the storing of your cellars in the last season with the due allowance of Gascon wine," interrupted the Jew; "but that—that is small matters."

"Hear the infidel dog!" said the churchman; "he jangles as if our holy community did come under debts for the wines we have a license to drink, propter necessitatem, et ad frigus depellendum. The circumcised villain blasphemeth the holy church, and Christian men listen and rebuke him not!"

"All this helps nothing," said the leader.—"Isaac pronounce what he may pay, without flaying both hide and hair."

"An six hundred crowns," said Isaac, "the good Prior might well pay to your honoured valours, and never sit less soft in his stall."

"Six hundred crowns," said the leader, gravely; "I am contented—thou hast well spoken, Isaac—six hundred crowns.—It is a sentence, Sir Prior."

"A sentence!—a sentence!" exclaimed the band; "Solomon had not done it better."

"Thou hearest thy doom, Prior," said the leader.

"Ye are mad, my masters," said the Prior; "where am I to find such a sum? If I sell the very pyx and candlesticks on the altar at Jorvaulx, I shall scarce raise the half; and it will be necessary for that purpose that I go to Jorvaulx myself; ye may retain as borrows* my two priests."

"That will be but blind trust," said the Outlaw; "we will retain thee, Prior, and send them to fetch thy ransom. Thou shalt not want a cup of wine and a collop of venison the while; and if thou lovest woodcraft, thou shalt see such as your north country never witnessed."

"Or, if so please you," said Isaac, willing to curry favour with the outlaws, "I can send to York for the six hundred crowns, out of certain moneys in my hands, if so be that the most reverend Prior present will grant me a quittance."

"He shall grant thee whatever thou dost list, Isaac," said the Captain; "and thou shalt lay down the redemption money for Prior Aymer as well as for thyself."

"For myself! ah, courageous sirs," said the Jew; "I am a broken and impoverished man; a beggar's staff must be my portion through life, supposing I were to pay you fifty crowns."

"The Prior shall judge of that matter," replied the Captain. "How say you, Father Aymer? Can the Jew afford a good ransom?"

"Can he afford a ransom?" answered the Prior. "Is he not Isaac of York, rich enough to redeem the captivity of the ten tribes of Israel, who were led into Assyrian bondage?—I have seen but little of him myself, but our cellarer and treasurer have dealt largely with him, and report says that his house at York is so full of gold and silver as is a shame in any Christian land. Marvel it is to all living Christian hearts that such gnawing adders should be suffered to eat into the bowels of the state, and even of the holy church herself, with foul usuries and extortions."

"Hold, father," said the Jew, "mitigate and assuage your choler. I pray of your reverence to remember that I force my moneys upon no one. But when churchman and layman, prince and prior, knight and priest, come knocking to Isaac's door, they borrow not his shekels with these uncivil terms. It is then try is said to have received similar consolation Commander in chief, to whom he complained fficer had used some open threat towards him xt.

* Borghs, or borrows, signifies pledges. Hence our word to borrow, because we pledge ourselves to restore what is lent.

"A sentence! a sentence!" exclaimed the chief Outlaw.

"A sentence!—a sentence!" shouted his assessors; "the Christian has shown his good nurture, and dealt with us more generously than the Jew."

"The God of my fathers help me!" said the Jew; "will ye bear to the ground an impoverished creature? I am this very childless, and will ye deprive me of the means of livelihood?"

"Thou wilt have the less to provide for, Jew, if thou art childless," said Aymer.

"Alas! my lord," said Isaac, "your law permits you not to know how the child of our bosom is entwined with the strings of our heart. O Rebecca! daughter of my beloved Rachel! were each leaf on that tree a zecchin, and each zecchin mine own, all that mass of wealth would I give to know whether thou art alive, and escaped the hands of the Nazarene!"

"Was not thy daughter dark-haired?" said one of the outlaws; "and wore she not a veil of twisted sendal, broidered with silver?"

"She did! she did!" said the old man, trembling with eagerness, as formerly with fear. "The blessing of Jacob be upon thee! canst thou tell me aught of her safety?"

"It was she, then," said the yeoman, "who was carried off by the proud Templar, when he broke through our ranks on yester-even. I had drawn my bow to send a shaft after him, but spared him even for the sake of the damsel, who I feared might take harm from the arrow."

"Oh!" answered the Jew, "I would to God thou hadst shot, though the arrow had pierced her bosom! Better the tomb of her fathers than the dishonourable couch of the licentious and savage Templar. Ichabod! Ichabod! the glory hath departed from my house!"

"Friends," said the Chief, looking round, "the old man is but a Jew, natheless his grief touches me. Deal we uprightly with us, Isaac—will paying this ransom of a thousand crowns leave thee altogether penniless?"

Isaac, recalled to think of his worldly goods, the love of which, by dint of inveterate habit, contended even with his parental affection, grew pale, stammered, could not deny there might be some small maiden, for she is of fair and comely countena[nce] beheld her in the lists of Ashby. Also Brian [de Bois-] Guilbert is one with whom I may do much—ask [of] thee how thou mayst deserve my good wo[rd with] him."

"Alas! alas!" said the Jew, "on every h[and the] spoilers arise against me—I am given as a p[rey unto] the Assyrian, and a prey unto him of Egypt."

"And what else should be the lot of thy [accursed] race?" answered the Prior; "for what sa[ith holy] writ, verbum Domini projecerunt, et sapie[ntia est] nulla in eis—they have cast forth the wor[d of the] Lord, and there is no wisdom in them; p[ropterea] dabo mulieres eorum exteris—I will give the[ir women] to strangers, that is to the Templar, as in the [present] matter; et thesauros eorum hæredibus alie[nis]—their treasures to others—as in the present [case to] these honest gentlemen."

Isaac groaned deeply, and began to wring hi[s hands,] and to relapse into his state of desolation and [despair.] But the leader of the yeomen led him aside.

"Advise thee well, Isaac," said Locksley, [" what] thou wilt do in this matter; my counsel to [thee is to] make a friend of this churchman. He is vai[n, Isaac,] and he is covetous; at least he needs money t[o supply] his profusion. Thou canst easily gratify hi[s greed;] for think not that I am blinded by thy pre[tended] poverty. I am intimately acquainted, Isaac, [with the] very iron chest in which thou dost keep thy [money-]bags. What! know I not the great stone ben[eath the] apple-tree, that leads into the vaulted chambe[r under] thy garden at York?" The Jew grew as [pale as] death. "But fear nothing from me," conti[nued the] yeoman, "for we are of old acquainted. D[ost thou] not remember the sick yeoman whom thy fai[r daugh]ter Rebecca redeemed from the gyves at Y[ork, and] kept him in thy house till his health was [restored,] when thou didst dismiss him recovered, and [with a] piece of money? Usurer as thou art, thou d[idst ne]ver place coin at better interest than that po[or silver] mark, for it has this day saved thee five [hundred] crowns."

"And thou art he whom we called Dicco[n Bend-]the-Bow?" said Isaac; "I thought ever I k[new the] accent of thy voice."

"I am Bend-the-Bow," said the Captain, [" and] Locksley, and have a good name besides all t[hese."]

"In God's name, Diccon, an thou canst aid me to recover the child of my bosom!"

"Do not thou interrupt me with thine ill-timed grief," said the Outlaw, "and I will deal with him in thy behalf."

He then turned from the Jew, who followed him [illegible]

"Prior Aymer," said the Outlaw, [illegible] Mean say, thou dost love wine, and a lady's smile, better than beseems thy order, Sir Priest; but with that I have naught to do. [illegible] thou lovest also a brace of good gazehounds, [illegible] rings which are costly, [illegible] purse of gold. But I have never heard that thou lovest oppression or cruelty. Now, here is Isaac willing to give thee the means of pleasure and pastime in a bag containing one hundred marks of silver, if thy intercession with thine ally the Templar shall avail to procure the freedom of his daughter."

"In safety and honour, as when taken from me," said the Jew, "otherwise it is no bargain."

"Peace, Isaac," said the Outlaw, "or I give up thine interest. What say you to this my purpose, Prior Aymer?"

"The matter," quoth the Prior, "is of a mixed condition; for, if I do a good deed on the one hand, yet, on the other, it goeth to the vantage of a Jew, and in so much is against my conscience. Yet, if the Israelite will advantage the Church by giving me somewhat over to the building of our dortour,* I will take it on my conscience to aid him in the matter of his daughter."

"For a score of marks to the dortour," said the Outlaw,—"Be still, I say, Isaac!—or for a brace of silver candlesticks to the altar, we will not stand with you."

"Nay, but, good Diccon Bend-the-Bow"—said Isaac, endeavouring to interpose.

"Good Jew—good beast—good earthworm!" said the yeoman, losing patience; "an thou dost go on to put thy filthy lucre in the balance with thy daughter's life and honour, by Heaven, I will strip thee of every maravedi thou hast in the world, before three days are out!"

Isaac shrunk together, and was silent.

"And what pledge am I to have for all this?" said the Prior.

"When Isaac returns successful through your mediation," said the Outlaw, "I swear by Saint Hubert I will see that he pays thee the money in good silver, or I will reckon with him for it [illegible] better have [illegible] twenty [illegible]."

"Well [illegible] Jew," said Aymer, [illegible] meddle in this matter [illegible] borrowing [illegible] [illegible] I would fast for two [illegible] and [illegible] till I find one."

"If you [illegible] with using the Jew's talents [illegible]" said the yeoman; [illegible] a wild-goose [illegible] over their heads, the advance-guard of a phalanx of his tribe, which were winging their way to the distant and solitary fens of Holderness. The bird came fluttering down, transfixed with the arrow.

"There, Prior," said the Outlaw, [illegible]

[illegible]

The Prior [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] Knight [illegible] do [illegible]

"Well, Prior," said the Outlaw, "I will detain thee no longer here than to [illegible] Jew [illegible] six hundred crowns at which thy ransom is fixed—I accept of him for thy pay-master; and if I hear that ye boggle at allowing him in his accompts the sum so paid by him, Saint Mary, [illegible] an I burn not the abbey over thine head, though I hang [illegible] years the sooner!"

With a much worse grace [illegible] Prior Aymer [illegible] Jew of York [illegible]

"And now," said Prior Aymer, [illegible]

[illegible]

"Touching your [illegible] Sir Prior," said Locksley, "[illegible] shall also be restored [illegible] may enable you to [illegible] York [illegible] to deprive you of the means of [illegible] But as concerning rings, jewels, chains, and what else, you must understand that we are men of tender consciences, and will not yield to a venerable man like yourself, who should be dead to the vanities of this life, the strong temptation to break the rule of his foundation, by wearing rings, chains, or other vain gauds."

"Think what you do, my masters," said the Prior, "ere you put your hand on the Church's patrimony. These things are inter res sacras, and I wot not what judgment might ensue were they to be handled by laical hands."

"I will take care of that, reverend Prior," said the Hermit of Copmanhurst; "for I will wear them myself."

"Friend, or brother," said the Prior, in answer to this solution of his doubts, "if thou hast really taken religious orders, I pray thee to look how thou wilt answer to thine official for the share thou hast taken in this day's work."

"Friend Prior," returned the Hermit, "you are to know that I belong to a little diocese, where I am my own diocesan, and care as little for the Bishop of York as I do for the Abbot of Jorvaulx, the Prior, and all the convent."

"Thou art utterly irregular," said the Prior; "one of those [illegible] who, taking on them the sacred character without due cause, profane the holy [illegible] souls of those who [illegible]

"Nay," said the Prior, [illegible]

[illegible]

"Thou be[illegible]" said the Prior, in great wrath, [illegible]

"[illegible]" said the Friar, [illegible] I will [illegible] break your [illegible]

* Dortour, or dormitory.

[illegible] Jorvaulx [illegible] with torn [illegible] and manuscripts, altogether put together for the occasion.

"H[illegible] C[illegible] [illegible] the reverend [illegible] King [illegible] Prior [illegible] H[illegible] [illegible] as [illegible]"

The [illegible] the mirth of [illegible] who [illegible] Prior [illegible] H[illegible] [illegible] O[illegible] [illegible] with [illegible] a much more [illegible] all [illegible] charters were [illegible]

[illegible] the Jew [illegible] H[illegible] [illegible] York [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] to the note.

"[illegible] said [illegible] deeply [illegible]"

"[illegible]" whispered Locksley.

"[illegible] Heaven [illegible]" said [illegible] my one [illegible]

"[illegible] with me," said the Outlaw, "so that [illegible] But what [illegible] Isaac [illegible] put [illegible]"

The Jew [illegible] "Nay, D[illegible] I [illegible]"

"[illegible] Isaac [illegible] Be [illegible] of the [illegible] the purse for thy [illegible] that the [illegible] down the [illegible]"

[illegible] set forth [illegible]

The Black Knight [illegible] was [illegible] now took his [illegible] of the [illegible] Jews.

"[illegible] Sir Knight [illegible]" said [illegible] "will [illegible] and [illegible] who [illegible] and [illegible] such [illegible]"

"[illegible]" said the Knight, "I am [illegible]"

"Sir Knight," said the Outlaw, "we have each our [illegible] to form your judgment of [illegible] you [illegible] but [illegible] to be admitted into [illegible] that I preserve my own."

"I [illegible] Outlaw," said the Knight, "[illegible] M[illegible]"

"[illegible]" said Locksley, "and I was [illegible] a true Englishman, though an outlaw for the present."

"[illegible] a turn," said the Knight, "and I hold it honoured [illegible] with yours. For he that does good, having the unlimited power to do evil, deserves praise not only for the good which he performs, but for the evil which he forbears. Fare [illegible] O[illegible]"

[illegible] fellowship; and H[illegible] of the [illegible] and [illegible] strongly war [illegible] forest.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

> K[illegible] what my friend,
> [illegible] w[illegible]:
> A[illegible] road or [illegible] tread, > [illegible] King John.

There was brave feasting in the Castle of York, [illegible] Prince John had [illegible] those [illegible] by whose assistance he hoped to [illegible] projects upon his brother's throne. Waldemar Fitzurse, his able and politic [illegible] among them, tempering all [illegible] which was necessary [illegible] of their purpose. But [illegible] the absence of more [illegible] The stubborn [illegible] of Front-de-Bœuf, [illegible] bold bearing of De Bracy, [illegible] renowned valour of Brian de Bois-Guilbert, were important to the success of their conspiracy, and while [illegible] secret [illegible] John [illegible] with [illegible] Jew [illegible] making [illegible] for which Prince John had contracted [illegible] This notice may [illegible] emergency so recent.

It was on the morning after the fall of Torquilstone [illegible] to spread abroad in the [illegible] York that De B[illegible] Bois-Guilbert with [illegible] Front-de-B[illegible] had been taken or slain. Waldemar [illegible] the rumour to Prince John, [illegible] truth [illegible] for [illegible] at [illegible] the Saxon Cedric [illegible] Prince would have treated this deed of violence as a good jest; but now that it interfered with and impeded his own plans, [illegible] the [illegible] which might have [illegible] King [illegible]

"[illegible]" he said—"were I ever [illegible] of England, I would hang such transgressors over the drawbridges of their own castles."

"But to become monarch of England," said his Ah[illegible] [illegible] necessary not only that your Grace should [illegible] transgressions of these un[illegible] after [illegible] real [illegible] We [illegible] the chief Saxons [illegible] have [illegible] your Grace's [illegible] of converting [illegible] and [illegible] to whom such an imagination [illegible] Your Grace [illegible] it will be [illegible] Front-de-Bœuf, De Bracy, [illegible] and yet we have gone too far to [illegible] safety."

Prince John struck his forehead with impatience [illegible] down the apartment.

"The villains," he said, "the base, treacherous [illegible] to desert me at this pinch!"

"[illegible] madmen," said Waldemar, "who [illegible] with [illegible] was [illegible]"

"What is to be done?" said the Prince, [illegible] short before Waldemar.

"I know nothing which can be done," answered his counsellor, "save that which I have already taken order for. I came not to bewail this evil chance with your Grace, until I had done my best to remedy it."

"Thou art ever my better angel, Waldemar," said the Prince; "and when I have such a chancellor to advise withal, the reign of John will be renowned in our annals. What hast thou commanded?"

"I have ordered Louis Winkelbrand, De Bracy's

lieutenant, to cause his trumpet sound to horse, and to display his banner, and to set presently forth towards the castle of Front-de-Bœuf, to do what yet may be done for the succour of our friends."

Prince John's face flushed with the pride of a spoilt child, who has undergone what it conceives to be an insult. "By the face of God!" he said, "Waldemar Fitzurse, much hast thou taken upon thee! and over malapert thou wert to cause trumpet to blow, or banner to be raised, in a town where ourselves were in presence, without our express command."

"I crave your Grace's pardon," said Fitzurse, internally cursing the idle vanity of his patron; "but when the time presses, and even the loss of minutes might be fatal, I judged it better to take this much on myself, than to lose precious time in waiting for your Grace's commands, in a matter of such importance to your Grace's service."

"Thou art pardoned, Fitzurse," said the Prince, gravely; "thy intention hath atoned for thy rash haste. But whom have we here?—De Bracy himself, by the rood!—and in strange guise doth he come before us."

It was indeed De Bracy—"bloody with spurring, fiery red with speed." His armour bore all the marks of the late obstinate fray, being broken, defaced, and stained with blood in many places, and covered with clay and dust from the crest to the spur. Undoing his helmet, he placed it on the table, and stood a moment as if to collect himself before he told his news.

"De Bracy," said Prince John, "what means this?—Speak, I charge thee!—Are the Saxons in rebellion?"

"Speak, De Bracy," said Fitzurse, almost in the same moment with his master, "thou wert wont to be a man—Where is the Templar?—where Front-de-Bœuf?"

"The Templar is fled," said De Bracy; "Front-de-Bœuf you will never see more. He has found a red grave among the blazing rafters of his own castle, and I alone am escaped to tell you."

"Cold news," said Waldemar, "to us, though you speak of fire and conflagration."

"The worst news is not yet said," answered De Bracy; and, coming up to Prince John, he uttered in a low and emphatic tone—"Richard is in England—I have seen and spoken with him."

Prince John turned pale, tottered, and caught at the back of an oaken bench to support himself—much like to a man who receives an arrow in his bosom.

"Thou ravest, De Bracy," said Fitzurse, "it cannot be."

"It is as true as truth itself," said De Bracy; "I was his prisoner, and spoke with him."

"With Richard Plantagenet, sayest thou?" continued Fitzurse.

"With Richard Plantagenet," replied De Bracy, "with Richard Cœur-de-Lion—with Richard of England."

"And thou wert his prisoner?" said Waldemar; "he is then at the head of a power?"

"No—only a few outlawed yeomen were around him, and to these his person is unknown. I heard him say he was about to depart from them. He joined them only to assist at the storming of Torquilstone."

"Ay," said Fitzurse, "such is indeed the fashion of Richard—a true knight-errant he, and will wander in wild adventure, trusting the prowess of his single arm, like any Sir Guy or Sir Bevis, while the weighty affairs of his kingdom slumber, and his own safety is endangered.—What dost thou propose to do, De Bracy?"

"I?—I offered Richard the service of my Free Lances, and he refused them—I will lead them to Hull, seize on shipping, and embark for Flanders; thanks to the bustling times, a man of action will always find employment. And thou, Waldemar, wilt thou take lance and shield, and lay down thy policies, and wend along with me, and share the fate which God sends us?"

"I am too old, Maurice, and I have a daughter," answered Waldemar.

"Give her to me, Fitzurse, and I will maintain her as fits her rank, with the help of lance and stirrup," said De Bracy.

"Not so," answered Fitzurse; "I will take sanctuary in this church of Saint Peter—the Archbishop is my sworn brother."

During this discourse, Prince John had gradually awakened from the stupor into which he had been thrown by the unexpected intelligence, and had been attending to the conversation which passed betwixt his followers. "They fall off from me," he said to himself, "they hold no more by me than a withered leaf by the bough when a breeze blows on it! Hell and fiends! can I shape no means for myself when I am deserted by these cravens?"—He paused, and there was an expression of diabolical passion in the constrained laugh with which he at length broke in on their conversation.

"Ha, ha, ha! my good lords, by the light of Our Lady's brow, I held ye sage men, bold men, ready-witted men; yet ye throw down wealth, honour, pleasure, all that our noble game promised you, at the moment it might be won by one bold cast!"

"I understand you not," said De Bracy. "As soon as Richard's return is blown abroad, he will be at the head of an army, and all is then over with us. I would counsel you, my lord, either to fly to France or take the protection of the Queen Mother."

"I seek no safety for myself," said Prince John, haughtily; "that I could secure by a word spoken to my brother. But although you, De Bracy, and you, Waldemar Fitzurse, are so ready to abandon me, I should not greatly delight to see your heads blackening on Clifford's gate yonder. Thinkest thou, Waldemar, that the wily Archbishop will not suffer thee to be taken from the very horns of the altar, would it make his peace with King Richard? And forgettest thou, De Bracy, that Robert Estoteville lies betwixt thee and Hull with all his forces, and that the Earl of Essex is gathering his followers? If we had reason to fear these levies even before Richard's return, trowest thou there is any doubt now which party their leaders will take? Trust me, Estoteville alone has strength enough to drive all thy Free Lances into the Humber." Waldemar Fitzurse and De Bracy looked in each other's faces with blank dismay. "There is but one road to safety," continued the Prince, and his brow grew black as midnight; "this object of our terror journeys alone—He must be met withal."

"Not by me," said De Bracy, hastily; "I was his prisoner, and he took me to mercy. I will not harm a feather in his crest."

"Who spoke of harming him?" said Prince John, with a hardened laugh; "the knave will say next that I meant he should slay him!—No—a prison were better; and whether in Britain or Austria, what matters it? Things will be but as they were when we commenced our enterprise—It was founded on the hope that Richard would remain a captive in Germany—Our uncle Robert lived and died in the castle of Cardiff."

"Ay, but," said Waldemar, "your sire Henry sate more firm in his seat than your Grace can. I say the best prison is that which is made by the sexton—no dungeon like a church vault! I have said my say."

"Prison or tomb," said De Bracy, "I wash my hands of the whole matter."

"Villain!" said Prince John, "thou wouldst not bewray our counsel?"

"Counsel was never bewrayed by me," said De Bracy, haughtily, "nor must the name of villain be coupled with mine!"

"Peace, Sir Knight!" said Waldemar; "and you, good my lord, forgive the scruples of valiant De Bracy; I trust I shall soon remove them."

"That passes your eloquence, Fitzurse," replied the Knight.

"Why, good Sir Maurice," rejoined the wily politician, "start not aside like a scared steed, without, at least, considering the object of your terror. This Richard—but a day since, and it would have been thy dearest wish to have met him hand to hand in the ranks of battle—a hundred times I have heard thee wish it."

"Ay, say," said De Bracy, "but that was as thou sayest, hand to hand, and in the ranks of battle! Thou never heardest me breathe a thought of assaulting him alone, and in a forest."

"Thou art no good knight if thou dost scruple at it," said Waldemar. "Was it in battle that Lancelot de Lac and Sir Tristram won renown? or was it not by encountering gigantic knights under the shade of deep and unknown forests?"

"Ay, but I promise you," said De Bracy, "that neither Tristram nor Lancelot would have been match, hand to hand, for Richard Plantagenet, and I think it was not their wont to take odds against a single man."

"Thou art mad, De Bracy—what is it we propose to thee, a hired and retained captain of Free Companions, whose swords are purchased for Prince John's service? Thou art apprized of our enemy, and then thou scruplest, though thy patron's fortunes, those of thy comrades, thine own, and the life and honour of every one amongst us, be at stake!"

"I tell you," said De Bracy, sullenly, "that he gave me my life. True, he sent me from his presence, and refused my homage—so far I owe him neither favour nor allegiance—but I will not lift hand against him."

"It needs not—send Louis Winkelbrand and a score of thy lances."

"Ye have sufficient ruffians of your own," said De Bracy; "not one of mine shall budge on such an errand."

"Art thou so obstinate, De Bracy?" said Prince John; "and wilt thou forsake me, after so many protestations of zeal for my service?"

"I mean it not," said De Bracy; "I will abide by you in aught that becomes a knight, whether in the lists or in the camp; but this highway practice comes not within my vow."

"Come hither, Waldemar," said Prince John. "An unhappy prince am I. My father, King Henry, had faithful servants—He had but to say that he was plagued with a factious priest, and the blood of Thomas-a-Becket, saint though he was, stained the steps of his own altar.—Tracy, Morville, Brito,* loyal and daring subjects, your names, your spirit, are extinct! and although Reginald Fitzurse hath left a son, he hath fallen off from his father's fidelity and courage."

"He has fallen off from neither," said Waldemar Fitzurse; "and since it may no better be, I will take on me the conduct of this perilous enterprise. Dearly, however, did my father purchase the praise of a zealous friend; and yet did his proof of loyalty to Henry fall far short of what I am about to afford; for rather would I assail a whole calendar of saints, than put spear in rest against Cœur-de-Lion.—De Bracy, to thee I must trust to keep up the spirits of the doubtful, and to guard Prince John's person. If you receive such news as I trust to send you, our enterprise will no longer wear a doubtful aspect.—Page," he said, "hie to my lodgings, and tell my armourer to be there in readiness; and bid Stephen Wetheral, Broad Thoresby, and the Three Spears of Spyinghow, come to me instantly; and let the scout-master, Hugh Bardon, attend me also.—Adieu, my Prince, till better times." Thus speaking, he left the apartment.

"He goes to make my brother prisoner," said Prince John to De Bracy, "with as little touch of compunction, as if it but concerned the liberty of a Saxon franklin. I trust he will observe our orders, and use our dear Richard's person with all due respect."

De Bracy only answered by a smile.

"By the light of Our Lady's brow," said Prince John, "our orders to him were most precise—though it may be you heard them not, as we stood together in the oriel window—Most clear and positive was our charge that Richard's safety should be cared for, and woe to Waldemar's head if he transgress it!"

"I had better pass to his lodgings," said De Bracy, "and make him fully aware of your Grace's pleasure; for, as it quite escaped my ear, it may not perchance have reached that of Waldemar."

"Nay, nay," said Prince John, impatiently, "I promise thee he heard me; and, besides, I have farther occupation for thee. Maurice, come hither; let me lean on thy shoulder."

They walked a turn through the hall in this familiar posture, and Prince John, with an air of the most confidential intimacy, proceeded to say, "What thinkest thou of this Waldemar Fitzurse, my De Bracy?—He trusts to be our Chancellor. Surely we will pause ere we give an office so high to one who shows evidently how little he reverences our blood, by his so readily undertaking this enterprise against Richard. Thou dost think, I warrant, that thou hast lost somewhat of our regard, by thy boldly declining this unpleasing task. But no, Maurice! I rather honour thee for thy virtuous constancy. There are things most necessary to be done, the perpetrator of which we neither love nor honour; and there may be refusals to serve us, which shall rather exalt in our estimation those who deny our request. The arrest of my unfortunate brother forms no such good title to the high office of Chancellor, as thy chivalrous and courageous denial establishes thine to the truncheon of High Marshal. Think of this, De Bracy, and begone to thy charge."

"Fickle tyrant!" muttered De Bracy, as he left the presence of the Prince; "evil luck have they who trust thee. Thy Chancellor, indeed!—He who hath the keeping of thy conscience shall have an easy charge, I trow. But High Marshal of England! that," he said, extending his arm, as if to grasp the baton of office, and assuming a loftier stride along the antechamber, "that is indeed a prize worth playing for!"

De Bracy had no sooner left the apartment than Prince John summoned an attendant.

"Bid Hugh Bardon, our scout-master, come hither, as soon as he shall have spoken with Waldemar Fitzurse."

The scout-master arrived after a brief delay, during which John traversed the apartment with unequal and disordered steps.

"Bardon," said he, "what did Waldemar desire of thee?"

"Two resolute men, well acquainted with these northern wilds, and skilful in tracking the tread of man and horse."

"And thou hast fitted him?"

"Let your grace never trust me else," answered the master of the spies. "One is from Hexamshire; he is wont to trace the Tynedale and Teviotdale thieves, as a bloodhound follows the slot of a hurt deer. The other is Yorkshire bred, and has twanged his bowstring right oft in merry Sherwood; he knows each glade and dingle, copse and high-wood, betwixt this and Richmond."

"'Tis well," said the Prince.—"Goes Waldemar forth with them?"

"Instantly," said Bardon.

"With what attendance?" asked John, carelessly.

"Broad Thoresby goes with him, and Wetheral, whom they call, for his cruelty, Stephen Steel-heart; and three northern men-at-arms that belonged to Ralph Middleton's gang—they are called the Spears of Spyinghow."

"'Tis well," said Prince John; then added, after a moment's pause, "Bardon, it imports our service that thou keep a strict watch on Maurice De Bracy—so that he shall not observe it, however—And let us know of his motions from time to time—with whom he converses, what he proposeth. Fail not in this, as thou wilt be answerable."

Hugh Bardon bowed, and retired.

"If Maurice betrays me," said Prince John—"if he betrays me, as his bearing leads me to fear, I will have his head, were Richard thundering at the gates of York."

CHAPTER XXXV.

Arouse the tiger of Hyrcanian deserts,
Strive with the half-starved lion for his prey;
Lesser the risk, than rouse the slumbering fire
Of wild Fanaticism.

Anonymous.

Our tale now returns to Isaac of York.—Mounted upon a mule, the gift of the Outlaw, with two act as his guard and guides, the Jew had set out for the Preceptory of Templestowe, for the purpose of negotiating his daughter's redemption. The Preceptory was but a day's journey from the demolished castle of Torquilstone, and the Jew had hoped to reach it before nightfall; accordingly, having dismissed his guides at the verge of the forest, and rewarded them with a piece of silver, he began to press forward with such speed as his weariness permitted. But his strength failed him totally ere he had reached within four miles of the Temple-court; racking pains shot along his back and through his limbs, and the excessive anguish which he felt at heart being now augmented by bodily suffering, he was rendered altogether incapable of proceeding farther than a small market-town, where dwelt a Jewish Rabbi of his tribe, eminent in the medical profession, and to whom Isaac was well known. Nathan Ben Israel received his suffering countryman with that kindness which the law prescribed, and which the Jews practised to each other. He insisted on his betaking himself to repose, and used such remedies as were then in most repute to check the progress of the fever, which terror, fatigue, ill-usage, and sorrow, had brought upon the poor old Jew.

* Reginald Fitzurse, William de Tracy, Hugh de Morville, and Richard Brito, were the gentlemen of Henry the Second's household, who, instigated by some passionate expressions of their sovereign, slew the celebrated Thomas-a-Becket.

On the morrow, when Isaac proposed to arise and pursue his journey, Nathan remonstrated against his purpose, both as his host and as his physician. It might cost him, he said, his life. But Isaac replied, that more than life and death depended upon his going that morning to Templestowe.

"To Templestowe!" said his host with surprise; again felt his pulse, and then muttered to himself, "His fever is abated, yet seems his mind somewhat alienated and disturbed."

"And why not to Templestowe?" answered his patient. "I grant thee, Nathan, that it is a dwelling-place of those to whom the despised Children of the Promise are a stumbling-block and an abomination; yet thou knowest that pressing affairs of traffic sometimes carry us among these bloodthirsty Nazarene soldiers, and that we visit the Preceptories of the Templars, as well as the Commanderies of the Knights Hospitallers, as they are called."*

"I know it well," said Nathan; "but wottest thou that Lucas de Beaumanoir, the chief of their Order, and whom they term Grand Master, is now himself at Templestowe?"

"I know it not," said Isaac; "our last letters from our brethren at Paris advised us that he was at that city, beseeching Philip for aid against the Sultan Saladine."

"He hath since come to England, unexpected by his brethren," said Ben Israel; "and he cometh among them with a strong and outstretched arm to correct and to punish. His countenance is kindled in anger against those who have departed from the vow which they have made, and great is the fear of those sons of Belial. Thou must have heard of his name?"

"It is well known unto me," said Isaac; "the Gentiles deliver this Lucas Beaumanoir as a man zealous to slaying for every point of the Nazarene law; and our brethren have termed him a fierce destroyer of the Saracens, and a cruel tyrant to the Children of the Promise."

"And truly have they termed him," said the physician. "Other Templars may be moved from the purpose of their heart by pleasure, or bribed by promise of gold and silver; but Beaumanoir is of a different stamp—hating sensuality, despising treasure, and pressing forward to that which they call the crown of martyrdom—The God of Jacob speedily send it unto him and unto them all! Specially hath this proud man extended his glove over the children of Judah, as holy David over Edom, holding the murder of a Jew to be an offering of as sweet savour as the death of a Saracen. Impious and false things has he said even of the virtues of our medicines, as if they were the devices of Satan—The Lord rebuke him!"

"Nevertheless," said Isaac, "I must present myself at Templestowe, though he hath made his face like unto a fiery furnace seven times heated."

He then explained to Nathan the pressing cause of his journey. The Rabbi listened with interest, and testified his sympathy after the fashion of his people, rending his clothes, and saying, "Ah, my daughter! ah, my daughter! Alas! for the beauty of Zion! Alas! for the captivity of Israel!"

"Thou seest," said Isaac, "how it stands with me, and that I may not tarry. Peradventure, the presence of this Lucas Beaumanoir, being the chief man over them, may turn Brian de Bois-Guilbert from the ill which he doth meditate, and that he may deliver to me my beloved daughter Rebecca."

"Go thou," said Nathan Ben Israel, "and be wise, for wisdom availed Daniel in the den of lions into which he was cast; and may it go well with thee, even as thine heart wisheth. Yet, if thou canst, keep thee from the presence of the Grand Master, for to do foul scorn to our people is his morning and evening delight. It may be if thou couldst speak with Bois-Guilbert in private, thou shalt the better prevail with him; for men say that these accursed Nazarenes are not of one mind in the Preceptory—May their counsels be confounded and brought to shame! But do thou, brother, return to me as if it were to the house of thy father, and bring me word how it has sped with thee; and well do I hope thou wilt bring with thee Rebecca, even the scholar of the wise Miriam, whose cures the Gentiles slandered as if they had been wrought by necromancy."

Isaac accordingly bade his friend farewell, and about an hour's riding brought him before the Preceptory of Templestowe.

This establishment of the Templars was seated amidst fair meadows and pastures, which the devotion of the former Preceptor had bestowed upon their Order. It was strong and well fortified, a point never neglected by these knights, and which the disordered state of England rendered peculiarly necessary. Two halberdiers, clad in black, guarded the drawbridge, and others in the same sad livery, glided to and fro upon the walls with a funereal pace, resembling spectres more than soldiers. The inferior officers of the Order were thus dressed, ever since their use of white garments, similar to those of the knights and esquires, had given rise to a combination of certain false brethren in the mountains of Palestine, terming themselves Templars, and bringing great dishonour on the Order. A knight was now and then seen to cross the court in his long white cloak, his head depressed on his breast, and his arms folded. They passed each other, if they chanced to meet, with a slow, solemn, and mute greeting; for such was the rule of their Order, quoting thereupon the holy texts, "In many words thou shalt not avoid sin," and "Life and death are in the power of the tongue." In a word, the stern ascetic rigour of the Temple discipline, which had been so long exchanged for prodigal and licentious indulgence, seemed at once to have revived at Templestowe under the severe eye of Lucas Beaumanoir.

Isaac paused at the gate, to consider how he might seek entrance in the manner most likely to bespeak favour; for he was well aware, that to his unhappy race the reviving fanatic spirit of the Order was not less dangerous than their unprincipled licentiousness; and that his religion would be the object of hate and persecution in the one case, as his wealth would have exposed him in the other to the extortions of unrelenting oppression.

Meantime Lucas Beaumanoir walked in a small garden belonging to the Preceptory, included within the precincts of its exterior fortification, and held sad and confidential communication with a brother of his Order, who had come in his company from Palestine.

The Grand Master was a man advanced in age, as was testified by his long gray beard, and the shaggy gray eyebrows overhanging eyes, of which, however years had been unable to quench the fire. A formida ble warrior, his thin and severe features retained the soldier's fierceness of expression; an ascetic bigot, they were no less marked by the emaciation of abstinence, and the spiritual pride of the self-satisfied devotee. Yet with these severer traits of physiognomy, there was mixed somewhat striking and noble, arising, doubtless, from the great part which his high office called upon him to act among monarchs and princes, and from the habitual exercise of supreme authority over the valiant and high-born knights, who were united by the rules of the Order. His stature was tall, and his gait, undepressed by age and toil, was erect and stately. His white mantle was shaped with severe regularity, according to the rule of Saint Bernard himself, being composed of what was then called Burrel cloth, exactly fitted to the size of the wearer, and bearing on the left shoulder the octangular cross peculiar to the Order, formed of red cloth. No vair or ermine decked this garment; but in respect of his age, the Grand Master, as permitted by the rules, wore his doublet lined and trimmed with the softest lambskin, dressed with the wool outwards, which was the nearest approach he could regularly make to the use of fur, then the greatest luxury of dress. In his hand he bore that singular abacus, or staff of office, with which Templars are usually represented, having at the upper end a round plate, on which was engraved the cross of the Order, inscribed within a circle or orle, as heralds term it. His companion, who attended on this great personage, had nearly the same dress in all respects, but his extreme deference towards his Superior showed that no other equality subsisted between them. The Preceptor, for such he was in rank, walked not in a line with the Grand Master, but just so far behind that Beaumanoir could speak to him without turning round his head.

* The establishments of the Knight Templars were called Preceptories, and the title of those who presided in the Order was Preceptor; as the principal Knights of Saint John were termed Commanders, and their houses Commanderies. But these terms were sometimes, it would seem, used indiscriminately.

"Conrade," said the Grand Master, "dear companion of my battles and my toils, to thy faithful bosom alone I can confide my sorrows. To thee alone can I tell how oft, since I came to this kingdom, I have desired to be dissolved and to be with the just. Not one object in England hath met mine eye which it could rest upon with pleasure, save the tombs of our brethren, beneath the massive roof of our Temple Church in yonder proud capital. O, valiant Robert de Ros! did I exclaim internally, as I gazed upon these good soldiers of the cross, where they lie sculptured on their sepulchres,—O, worthy William de Mareschal! open your marble cells, and take in your repose a weary brother, who would rather strive with a hundred thousand pagans than witness the decay of our Holy Order!"

"It is but true," answered Conrade Mont-Fitchet; "it is but too true; and the irregularities of our brethren in England are even more gross than those in France."

"Because they are more wealthy," answered the Grand Master. "Bear with me, brother, although I should something vaunt myself. Thou knowest the life I have led, keeping each point of my Order, striving with devils embodied and disembodied, striking down the roaring lion, who goeth about seeking whom he may devour, like a good knight and devout priest, wheresoever I met with him—even as blessed Saint Bernard hath prescribed to us in the forty-fifth capital of our rule, Ut Leo semper feriatur.* But by the Holy Temple! the zeal which hath devoured my substance and my life, yea the very nerves and marrow of my bones; by that very Holy Temple I swear to thee, that save thyself and some few that still retain the ancient severity of our Order, I look upon no brethren whom I can bring my soul to embrace under that holy name. What say our statutes, and how do our brethren observe them? They should wear no vain or worldly ornament, no crest upon their helmet, no gold upon stirrup or bridle-bit; yet who now go pranked out so proudly and so gaily as the poor soldiers of the Temple? They are forbidden by our statutes to take one bird by means of another,

* In the ordinances of the Knights of the Temple, this phrase is repeated in a variety of forms, and occurs in almost every chapter, as if it were the signal-word of the Order; which may account for its being so frequently put in the Grand Master's mouth.

to shoot beasts with bow or arblast, to hallo
hunting-horn, or to spur the horse after game
Now, at hunting and hawking, and each idl
of wood and river, who so prompt as the Te in all these fond vanities? They are forbid read, save what their Superior permitted, or to what is read, save such holy things as m recited aloud during the hours of refection;
their ears are at the command of idle minstr
their eyes study empty romaunts. They wer manded to extirpate magic and heresy. Lo are charged with studying the accursed caba secrets of the Jews, and the magic of the P Saracens. Simpleness of diet was prescri them, roots, pottage, gruels, eating flesh but
a-week, because the accustomed feeding on fl a dishonourable corruption of the body; and b their tables groan under delicate fare! Thei was to be water, and now, to drink like a Te is the boast of each jolly boon companion! Th garden, filled as it is with curious herbs and tre
from the Eastern climes, better becomes the
of an unbelieving Emir, than the plot which Ch Monks should devote to raise their homely pot-
—And O, Conrade! well it were that the rela
of discipline stopped even here!—Well thou kn
that we were forbidden to receive those d
women, who at the beginning were associat sisters of our Order, because, saith the forty chapter, the Ancient Enemy hath, by female s withdrawn many from the right path to pa
Nay, in the last capital, being, as it were, the stone which our blessed founder placed on th
and undefiled doctrine which he had enjoin
are prohibited from offering, even to our sist
our mothers, the kiss of affection—ut omnium
rum fugiantur oscula.—I shame to speak—I to think—of the corruptions which have rushed i us even like a flood. The souls of our pure fo
the spirits of Hugh de Payen and Godfrey de Omer, and of the blessed Seven who first jo dedicating their lives to the service of the Te are disturbed even in the enjoyment of paradis
I have seen them, Conrade, in the visions night—their sainted eyes shed tears for the si
follies of their brethren, and for the foul and s ful luxury in which they wallow. Beaumanoi say, thou slumberest—awake! There is a stai fabric of the Temple, deep and foul as that left streaks of leprosy on the walls of the infected h
of old.* The soldiers of the Cross, who shoul
the glance of a woman as the eye of a basilisk,
open sin, not with the females of their own ra
but with the daughters of the accursed heathen more accursed Jew. Beaumanoir, thou sle up, and avenge our cause!—Slay the sinners, ma
female!—Take to thee the brand of Phineas!
vision fled, Conrade, but as I awaked I cou
hear the clank of their mail, and see the wa
their white mantles.—And I will do according t word. I WILL purify the fabric of the Temple the unclean stones in which the plague is, I remove and cast out of the building."

"Yet bethink thee, reverend father," said M Fitchet, "the stain hath become ingrained by and consuetude; let thy reformation be cautio
it is just and wise."

"No, Mont-Fitchet," answered the stern ol
"it must be sharp and sudden—the Order is o crisis of its fate. The sobriety, self-devotion piety of our predecessors, made us powerful fri
our presumption, our wealth, our luxury, have up against us mighty enemies.—We must cast
those riches, which are a temptation to prince must lay down that presumption, which is an o
to them—we must reform that license of m
which is a scandal to the whole Christian wor
—mark my words—the Order of the Temple w utterly demolished—and the place thereof sh
more be known among the nations."

"Now may God avert such a calamity!" sa Preceptor.

"Amen," said the Grand Master, with sol

* See the 13th chapter of Leviticus.

must deserve his aid. I tell thee, Conrade, er the powers in Heaven, nor the powers on ll longer endure the wickedness of this —My intelligence is sure—the ground on fabric is reared is already undermined, and tion we make to the structure of our great- only sink it the sooner in the abyss. We ice our steps, and show ourselves the faith- pions of the Cross, sacrificing to our calling, our blood and our lives—not alone our lusts ings—but our ease, our comforts, and our ffections, and act as men convinced that leasure which may be lawful to others, is to the vowed soldier of the Temple."

moment a squire, clothed in a threadbare (for the aspirants after this holy Order wore ir noviciat: the cast-off garments of the entered the garden, and, bowing profoundly Grand Master, stood silent, awaiting his n er he presumed to tell his errand.

ot more seemly," said the Grand Master, his Damian, clothed in the garments of humility, thus appear with reverend fore his superior, than but two days since, fond fool was decked in a painted coat, ing as pert and as proud as any popinjay? Damian, we permit thee—What is thine

r stands without the gate, noble and reve- er," said the Squire, "who prays to speak her Brian de Bois-Guilbert."

wert right to give me knowledge of it," said d Master; "in our presence a Preceptor is ommon compeer of our Order, who may not ording to his own will, but to that of his Mas- according to the text, 'In the hearing of the th obeyed me.'—It imports us especially to th's Bois-Guilbert's proceedings," said he, his companion.

t speaks him brave and valiant," said Con-truly is he so spoken of," said the Grand "in our valour only we are not degenerated predecessors, the heroes of the Cross. But rian came into our Order a moody and dis- man, stirred, I doubt me, to take our vows nounce the world, not in sincerity of soul, e whom some touch of light discontent had o penitence. Since then, he hath become an l earnest agitator, a murmurer, and a ma- and a leader amongst those who impugn rity; not considering that the rule is given aster even by the symbol of the staff and the staff to support the infirmities of the e rod to correct the faults of delinquents.— he continued, "lead the Jew to our pre-ire departed with a profound reverence, and minutes returned, marshalling in Isaac of naked slave, ushered into the presence of ghty prince, could approach his judgment- more profound reverence and terror than which the Jew drew near to the presence rand Master. When he had approached e distance of three yards, Beaumanoir made th his staff that he should come no farther, kneeled down on the earth, which he kissed of reverence; then rising, stood before the his hands folded on his bosom, his head his breast, in all the submission of Oriental an," said the Grand Master, "retire, and ward ready to await our sudden call; and one to enter the garden until we shall leave squire bowed and retreated.—"Jew," con- e haughty old man, "mark me. It suits not tion to hold with thee long communication, waste words or time upon any one. Where- brief in thy answers to what questions I thee, and let thy words be of truth; for if e doubles with me, I will have it torn from lieving jaws."

w was about to reply, but the Grand Master

"Peace, unbeliever!—not a word in our presence, save in answer to our questions.—What is thy business with our brother Brian de Bois-Guilbert?"

Isaac gasped with terror and uncertainty. To tell his tale might be interpreted into scandalizing the Order; yet, unless he told it, what hope could he have of achieving his daughter's deliverance? Beaumanoir saw his mortal apprehension, and condescended to give him some assurance.

"Fear nothing," he said, "for thy wretched person, Jew, so thou dealest uprightly in this matter. I demand again to know from thee thy business with Brian de Bois-Guilbert?"

"I am bearer of a letter," stammered out the Jew, "so please your reverend valour, to that good knight, from Prior Aymer of the Abbey of Jorvaux."

"Said I not these were evil times, Conrade?" said the Master. "A Cistertian Prior sends a letter to a soldier of the Temple, and can find no more fitting messenger than an unbelieving Jew.—Give me the letter."

The Jew, with trembling hands, undid the folds of his Armenian cap, in which he had deposited the Prior's tablets for the greater security, and was about to approach, with hand extended and body crouched, to place it within the reach of his grim interrogator.

"Back, dog!" said the Grand Master; "I touch not misbelievers, save with the sword.—Conrade, take thou the letter from the Jew, and give it to me."

Beaumanoir, being thus possessed of the tablets, inspected the outside carefully, and then proceeded to undo the packthread which secured its folds. "Reverend father," said Conrade, interposing, though with much deference, "wilt thou break the seal?"

"And will I not?" said Beaumanoir, with a frown. "Is it not written in the forty-second capitul, De Lectione Literarum, that a Templar shall not receive a letter, no not from his father, without communicating the same to the Grand Master, and reading it in his presence?"

He then perused the letter in haste, with an expression of surprise and horror; read it over again more slowly; then holding it out to Conrade with one hand, and slightly striking it with the other, exclaimed—"Here is goodly stuff for one Christian man to write to another, and both members, and no inconsiderable members, of religious professions! When," said he solemnly, and looking upward, "wilt thou come with thy fanners to purge the threshing-floor?"

Mont-Fitchet took the letter from his Superior, and was about to peruse it. "Read it aloud, Conrade," said the Grand Master,—"and do thou" (to Isaac) "attend to the purport of it, for we will question thee concerning it."

Conrade read the letter, which was in these words; "Aymer, by divine grace, Prior of the Cistertian house of Saint Mary's of Jorvaulx, to Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert, a Knight of the holy Order of the Temple, wisheth health, with the blessings of King Bacchus and of my Lady Venus. Touching our present condition, dear Brother, we are a captive in the hands of certain lawless and godless men, who have not feared to detain our person, and put us to ransom; whereby we have also learned of Front-de-Bœuf's misfortune, and that thou hast escaped with that fair Jewish sorceress, whose black eyes have bewitched thee. We are heartily rejoiced of thy safety; nevertheless, we pray thee to be on thy guard in the matter of this second Witch of Endor; for we are privately assured that your Great Master, who careth not a bean for cherry cheeks and black eyes, comes from Normandy to diminish your mirth, and mend your misdoings. Wherefore we pray you heartily to beware, and to be found watching, even as the Holy Text hath it, Invenientur vigilantes. And the wealthy Jew her father, Isaac of York, having prayed of me letters in his behalf, I gave him these, earnestly advising, and in a sort entreating, that we do hold the damsel to ransom, seeing he will pay you from his bags as much as may find fifty damsels upon safer terms, whereof I trust to have my part when we make merry together, as true brothers, not forgetting the wine-cup. For what saith the text, Vinum lætificat eor hominis; and again, Rex delectabitur pulchritudine tua.

"Till which merry meeting, we wish you farewell. Given from this den of thieves, about the hour of matins, "Aymer Pr. S. M. Jorvolciences.

"Postscriptum. Truly your golden chain hath not long abidden with me, and will now sustain, around the neck of an outlaw deer-stealer, the whistle wherewith he calleth on his hounds."

"What sayest thou to this, Conrade?" said the Grand Master. "Den of thieves! and a fit residence is a den of thieves for such a Prior. No wonder that the hand of God is upon us, and that in the Holy Land we lose place by place, foot by foot, before the infidels, when we have such churchmen as this Aymer. And what ransoneth he, I trow, by this second Witen of Ender?" said he to his confidant, something apart.

Conrad was better acquainted (perhaps by practice) with the arcana of gallantry, than was his Superior; and he even took the passage which embarrassed the Grand Master, to be a sort of language used by worldly men towards those whom they loved par amours; but the explanation did not satisfy the bigoted Beaumanoir.

"There is more in it than thou dost guess, Conrade; thy simplicity is no match for this deep abyss of wickedness. This Rebecca of York was a pupil of that Miriam of whom thou hast heard. Thou shalt hear the Jew own it even now." Then turning to Isaac, he said aloud, "Thy daughter, then, is prisoner with Brian de Bois-Guilbert?"

"Ay, reverend, valorous sir," stammered poor Isaac, "and whatsoever ransom a poor man may pay for her deliverance" ——

"Peace!" said the Grand Master. "This thy daughter hath practised the art of healing, hath she not?"

"Ay, gracious sir," answered the Jew, with more confidence; "and knight and yeoman, squire and vassal, may bless the goodly gift which Heaven hath assigned to her. Many a one can testify that she hath recovered them by her art, when every other human aid hath proved vain; but the blessing of the God of Jacob was upon her."

Beaumanoir turned to Mont-Fitchet with a grim smile. "See, brother," he said, "the deceptions of the devouring Enemy! Behold the baits with which he fishes for souls, giving a poor space of earthly life in exchange for eternal happiness hereafter. Well said our blessed rule, Semper percutiatur leo vorans. —Up on the lion! Down with the destroyer!" said he, shaking aloft his mystic abacus, as if in defiance of the powers of darkness—"Thy daughter worketh the cures, I doubt not," thus he went on to address the Jew, "by words and sigils, and periapts, and other cabalistical mysteries."

"Nay, reverend and brave Knight," answered Isaac, "but in chief measure by a balsam of marvellous virtue."

"Where had she that secret?" said Beaumanoir.

"It was delivered to her," answered Isaac, reluctantly, "by Miriam, a sage matron of our tribe."

"Ah, false Jew!" said the Grand Master; "was it not from that same witch Miriam, the abomination of whose enchantments have been heard of throughout every Christian land?" exclaimed the Grand Master, crossing himself. "Her body was burnt at a stake, and her ashes were scattered to the four winds; and so be it with me and mine Order, if I do not as much to her pupil, and more also! I will teach her to throw spell and incantation over the soldiers of the blessed Temple.—There, Damian, spurn this Jew from the gate—shoot him dead if he oppose or turn again. With his daughter we will deal as the Christian law and our own high office warrant."

Poor Isaac was hurried off accordingly, and expelled from the precentory; all his entreaties, and even his offers, unheard and disregarded. He could do no better than return to the house of the Rabbi, and endeavour, through his means, to learn how his daughter was to be disposed of. He had hitherto feared for her honour, he was now to tremble for her life. Mean while, the Grand Master ordered to his presence the Preceptor of Templestowe.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

> Say not my heart is fraud—all live by seeming.
> The beggar begs with it, and the gay courtier
> Gains land and title, rank and rule, by seeming;
> The clergy seem it not, and the bold soldier
> Will oke with it his service—All admit it,
> All practise it; and he who is content
> With showing what he is, shall have small credit
> In church, or camp, or state—So wags the world.
>
> Old Play.

Albert Malvoisin, President, or, in the language of the Order, Preceptor of the establishment of Templestowe, was brother to that Philip Malvoisin who has been already occasionally mentioned in this history, and was, like that baron, in close league with Brian de Bois-Guilbert.

Amongst dissolute and unprincipled men of whom the Temple Order included but too many, Albert of Templestowe might be distinguished; but with this difference from the audacious Bois-Guilbert, that he knew how to throw over his vices and his ambition the veil of hypocrisy, and to assume in his exterior the fanaticism which he internally despised. Had not the arrival of the Grand Master been so unexpectedly sudden, he would have seen nothing at Templestowe which might have appeared to argue any relaxation of discipline. And, even although surprised, and, to a certain extent, detected, Albert Malvoisin listened with such respect and apparent contrition to the rebuke of his Superior, and made such haste to reform the particulars he censured,—succeeded, in fine, so well in giving an air of recent devotion to a family which had been lately devoted to license and pleasure, that Lucas Beaumanoir began to entertain a higher opinion of the Preceptor's morals than the first appearance of the establishment had inclined him to adopt.

But these favourable sentiments on the part of the Grand Master were greatly shaken by the intelligence that Albert had received within a house of religion the Jewish captive, and, as was to be feared, the paramour of a brother of the Order; and when Albert appeared before him, he was regarded with unwonted sternness.

"There is in this mansion, dedicated to the purposes of the holy Order of the Temple," said the Grand Master, in a severe tone, "a Jewish woman, brought hither by a brother of religion, by your connivance, Sir Preceptor."

Albert Malvoisin was overwhelmed with confusion; for the unfortunate Rebecca had been confined in a remote and secret part of the building, and every precaution used to prevent her residence there from being known. He read in the looks of Beaumanoir ruin to Bois-Guilbert and to himself, unless he should be able to avert the impending storm.

"Why are you mute?" continued the Grand Master.

"Is it permitted to me to reply?" answered the Preceptor, in a tone of the deepest humility, although by the question he only meant to gain an instant's space for arranging his ideas.

"Speak, you are permitted," said the Grand Master—"speak, and say, knowest thou the capital of our holy rule,—De commilitonibus Templi in sanctitate, qui cum miserrimus mulieribus versantur, propter oblectationem carnis?"*

"Surely, most reverend father," answered the Preceptor, "I have not risen to this office in the Order, being ignorant of one of its most important prohibitions."

"How comes it, then, I demand of thee once more, that thou hast suffered a brother to bring a paramour, and that paramour a Jewish sorceress, into this holy place, to the stain and pollution thereof?"

"A Jewish sorceress!" echoed Albert Malvoisin; "good angels guard us!"

"Ay, brother, a Jewish sorceress!" said the Grand Master sternly. "I have said it. Darest thou deny that this Rebecca, the daughter of that wretched usurer Isaac of York, and the pupil of the foul witch Miriam, is now—shame to be thought or spoken!—lodged within this thy Preceptory?"

"Your wisdom, reverend father," answered the

* The edict which he quotes, is against communion with women of light character.

ith rolled away the darkness from my
. Much did I wonder that so good a n de Bois-Guilbert seemed so fondly
e charms of this female, whom I res house merely to place a bar betwixt intimacy, which else might have been e expense of the fall of our valiant and er."

ing, then, as yet passed betwixt them
s vow?" demanded the Grand Master.
nder this roof?" said the Preceptor.
elf; "Saint Magdalene and the ten ins forbid!—No! if I have sinned in here, it was in the erring thought that reak off our brother's besotted devotion
, which seemed to me so wild and un-
could not but ascribe it to some touch
ore to be cured by pity than reproof.
reverend wisdom hath discovered this to be a sorceress, perchance it may ac-
his enamoured folly."

t doth!" said Beaumanoir. "See, bro-
the peril of yielding to the first devices ents of Satan! We look upon woman the lust of the eye, and to take pleasure
ll her beauty; and the Ancient Enemy, Lion, obtains power over us, to com-
ran and spell, a work which was begun
d folly. It may be that our brother does in this matter deserve rather pity nastisement; rather the support of the strokes of the rod; and that our admoayers may turn him from his folly, and his brethern."

ep pity," said Conrade Mont-Fitchet, Order one of its best lances, when the
nity most requires the aid of its sons.
d Saracens hath this Brian de Bois-
with his own hand."

these accursed dogs," said the Grand
be a sweet and acceptable offering to angels whom they despise and blasvith their aid will we counteract the ms with which our brother is entwined
le shall burst the bands of this Delilah, arst the two new cords with which the l bound him, and shall slaughter the eaps upon heaps. But concerning this o hath flung her enchantments over a Holy Temple, assuredly she shall die

ws of England,"—said the Preceptor, delighted that the Grand Master's res fortunately averted from himself and had taken another direction, began
was carrying it too far.

of England," interrupted Beaumanoir,
enioin each judge to execute justice
n jurisdiction. The most petty baron
, and condemn a witch found within in And shall that power be denied to ster of the Temple within a preceptory
—No!—we will judge and condemn.
ll be taken out of the land, and the ercof shall be forgiven. Prepare the
the trial of the sorceress."

oisin bowed and retired,—not to give preparing the hall, but to seek out Brian rt, and communicate to him how mat-
; to terminate. It was not long ere he ming with indignation at a repulse he ained from the fair Jewess. "The unsaid, "the ungrateful, to scorn him lood and flames, would have saved her of his own! By Heaven, Malvoisin!
roof and rafters crackled and crashed
I was the butt of a hundred arrows;
mine armour like hailstones against a ent, and the only use I made of my her protection. This did I endure for the self-willed girl upbraids me that I her to perish, and refuses me not only proof of gratitude, but even the most hat ever she will be brought to grant

any. The devil, that possessed her race with nacy, has concentrated its full force in her person!"

"The devil," said the Preceptor, "I think, sessed you both. How oft have I preached caution, if not continence? Did I not tell you there were enough willing Christian damsels met with, who would think it sin to refuse so br knight le don d'amoureux merci, and you must anchor your affection on a wilful, obstinate Jew
By the mass, I think old Lucas Beaumanoir gu right, when he maintains she hath cast a spell
you."

"Lucas Beaumanoir!"—said Bois-Guilber
proachfully—"Are these your precautions, Malv Hast thou suffered the dotard to learn that Re
is in the Preceptory!"

"How could I help it?" said the Preceptor. "I lected nothing that could keep secret your mis
but it is betrayed, and whether by the devil or n devil only can tell. But I have turned the mat
I could; you are safe if you renounce Rebecca.
are pitied the victim of magical delusion. Sh sorceress, and must suffer as such."

"She shall not, by Heaven!" said Bois-Guil

"By Heaven, she must and will!" said Malv
"Neither you nor any one else can save her. I Beaumanoir hath settled that the death of a Je will be a sin-offering sufficient to atone for a amorous indulgences of the Knights Templars
thou knowest he hath both the power and will t
cute so reasonable and pious a purpose."

"Will future ages believe that such stupid bi ever existed!" said Bois-Guilbert, striding up down the apartment.

"What they may believe, I know not," said voisin, calmly; "but I know well, that on thi day, clergy and laymen, take ninety-nine to the dred, will cry amen to the Grand Master's sente

"I have it," said Bois-Guilbert. "Albert, th
my friend. Thou must connive at her escape, voisin, and I will transport her to some pla greater security and secrecy."

"I cannot, if I would," replied the Preceptor;
mansion is filled with the attendants of the Master, and others who are devoted to him. A be frank with you, brother, I would not embark you in this matter, even if I could hope to brir
bark to haven. I have risked enough alread your sake. I have no mind to encounter a sen of degradation, or even to lose my Preceptory, f sake of a painted piece of Jewish flesh and
And you, if you will be guided by my counsel, wil up this wild-goose chase, and fly your hawk at other game. Think, Bois-Guilbert,—thy present thy future honours, all depend on thy place i Order. Shouldst thou adhere perversely to th
sion for this Rebecca, thou wilt give Beaumanc
power of expelling thee, and he will not negl
He is jealous of the truncheon which he holds trembling gripe, and he knows thou stretche bold hand towards it. Doubt not he will ruin
if thou affordest him a pretext so fair as thy p
tion of a Jewish sorceress. Give him his sc
this matter, for thou canst not control him.
the staff is in thine own firm grasp, thou n
caress the daughters of Judah, or burn them, a best suit thine own humour."

"Malvoisin," said Bois-Guilbert, "thou art blooded"——

"Friend," said the Preceptor, hastening to the blank, in which Bois-Guilbert would pr
have placed a worse word,—"a cold-blooded f
am, and therefore more fit to give thee advice.
thee once more, that thou canst not save Rebe
tell thee once more, thou canst but perish wit Go hie thee to the Grand Master—throw thy his feet and tell him"——

"Not at his feet, by Heaven! but to the de very beard will I say"——

"Say to him, then, to his beard," continued
voisin, coolly, "that you love this captive Jew distraction; and the more thou dost enlarge passion, the greater will be his haste to end

death of the fair enchantress; while thou, taken in flagrant delict by the avowal of a crime contrary to thine oath, canst hope no aid of thy brethren, and must exchange all thy brilliant visions of ambition and power, to lift perhaps a mercenary spear in some of the petty quarrels between Flanders and Burgundy."

"Thou speakest the truth, Malvoisin," said Brian de Bois-Guilbert, after a moment's reflection. "I will give the hoary bigot no advantage over me; and for Rebecca, she hath not merited at my hand that I should expose rank and honour for her sake. I will cast her off—yes, I will leave her to her fate unless"—

"Qualify not thy wise and necessary resolution," said Malvoisin; "women are but the toys which amuse our lighter hours—ambition is the serious business of life. Perish a thousand such fond brotchets as this Jewess, before thy manly step pause in the brilliant career that lies stretched before thee! For the present we part, nor must we be seen to hold close conversation. I must order the hall for his judgment-seat."

"What!" said Bois-Guilbert, "so soon?"

"Ay," replied the Preceptor, "trial moves rapidly on when the judge has determined the sentence beforehand."

"Rebecca," said Bois-Guilbert, when he was left alone, "thou art like to cost me dear—Why cannot I abandon thee to thy fate, as this calm hypocrite recommends?—One effort will I make to save thee—but beware of ingratitude! for if I am again repulsed, my vengeance shall equal my love. The life and honour of Bois-Guilbert must not be hazarded, where contempt and reproaches are his only reward."

The Preceptor had hardly given the necessary orders which he was joined by Conrade Mont-Fitchet, who acquainted him with the Grand Master's resolution to bring the Jewess to instant trial for sorcery.

"It is surely a dream," said the Preceptor; "we have many Jewish physicians, and we call them not wizards though they work wonderful cures."

"The Grand Master thinks otherwise," said Mont-Fitchet; "and, Albert, I will be upright with thee—wizard or not, it were better that this miserable damsel die, than that Brian de Bois-Guilbert should be lost to the Order, or the Order divided by internal dissension. Thou knowest his high rank, his fame in arms—thou knowest the zeal with which many of our brethren regard him—but all this will not avail him with our Grand Master, should he consider Brian as the accomplice, not the victim, of this Jewess. Were the souls of the twelve tribes in her single body, it were better she suffered alone, than that Bois-Guilbert were partner in her destruction."

"I have been working him even now to abandon her," said Malvoisin; "but still, are there grounds enough to condemn this Rebecca for sorcery?—Will not the Grand Master change his mind when he sees that the proofs are so weak?"

"They must be strengthened, Albert," replied Mont-Fitchet, "they must be strengthened. Dost thou understand me?"

"I do," said the Preceptor, "nor do I scruple to do aught for advancement of the Order—but there is little time to find engines fitting."

"Malvoisin, they must be found," said Conrade; "well will it advantage both the Order and thee. This Temple-towe is a poor Preceptory—that of Maison-Dieu is worth double its value—thou knowest my interest with our old Chief—find those who can carry this matter through, and thou art Preceptor of Maison-Dieu in the fertile Kent—How sayst thou?"

"There is," replied Malvoisin, "among those who came hither with Bois-Guilbert, two fellows whom I well know; servants they were to my brother Philip de Malvoisin, and passed from his service to that of Front-de-Bœuf. It may be they know something of the witcheries of this woman."

"Away, seek them out instantly—and hark thee, if a byzant or two will sharpen their memory, let them not be wanting."

"They would swear the mother that bore them a sorceress for a zecchin," said the Preceptor.

"Away, then," said Mont-Fitchet: "at noon the affair will proceed. I have not seen our senior in such earnest preparation since he condemned to the stake Hamet Alhagi, a convert who relapsed to the Moslem faith."

The ponderous castle-bell had tolled the point of noon, when Rebecca heard a trampling of feet upon the private stair which led to her place of confinement. The noise announced the arrival of several persons, and the circumstance rather gave her joy; for she was more afraid of the solitary visits of the fierce and passionate Bois-Guilbert than of any evil that could befall her besides. The door of the chamber was unlocked, and Conrade and the Preceptor Malvoisin entered, attended by four warders clothed in black, and bearing halberds.

"Daughter of an accursed race!" said the Preceptor, "arise and follow us."

"Whither," said Rebecca, "and for what purpose?"

"Damsel," answered Conrade, "it is not for thee to question, but to obey. Nevertheless, be it known to thee, that thou art to be brought before the tribunal of the Grand Master of our holy Order, there to answer for thine offences."

"May the God of Abraham be praised!" said Rebecca, folding her hands devoutly; "the name of a judge, though an enemy to my people, is to me as the name of a protector. Most willingly do I follow thee—permit me only to wrap my veil around my head."

They descended the stair with slow and solemn step, traversed a long gallery, and, by a pair of folding doors placed at the end, entered the great hall in which the Grand Master had for the time established his court of justice.

The lower part of this ample apartment was filled with squires and yeomen, who made way not without some difficulty for Rebecca, attended by the Preceptor and Mont-Fitchet, and followed by the guard of halberdiers, to move forward to the seat appointed for her. As she passed through the crowd, her arms folded and her head depressed, a scrap of paper was thrust into her hand, which she received almost unconsciously, and continued to hold without examining its contents. The assurance that she possessed some friend in this awful assembly gave her courage to look around, and to mark into whose presence she had been conducted. She gazed, accordingly, upon the scene, which we shall endeavour to describe in the next chapter.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Stern was the law which bade its votaries leave
At human woes with human hearts to grieve;
Stern was the law, which at the winning wile
Of frank and harmless mirth forbade to smile;
But sterner still, when high the iron rod
Of tyrant power she shook, and call'd that power of God.
The Monk Lyo.

THE tribunal, erected for the trial of the innocent and unhappy Rebecca, occupied the dais or elevated part of the upper end of the great hall—a platform, which we have already described as the place of honour, destined to be occupied by the most distinguished inhabitants or guests of an ancient mansion.

On an elevated seat, directly before the accused, sat the Grand Master of the Temple, in full and ample robes of flowing white, holding in his hand the mystic staff, which bore the symbol of the Order. At his feet was placed a table, occupied by two scribes, chaplains of the order, whose duty it was to reduce to formal record the proceedings of the day. The black dresses, bare scalps, and demure looks of these churchmen, formed a strong contrast to the warlike appearance of the knights who attended, either residing in the Preceptory, or as come thither to attend upon their Grand Master. The Preceptors, of whom there were four present, occupied seats lower in height, and somewhat drawn back behind that of their superior; and the knights, who enjoyed such rank in the Order, were placed on benches still lower, and preserving the same distance from

s as these from the Grand Master. Behind still upon the dais or elevated portion of the l the esquires of the Order, in white dresses nor quality.

ole assembly wore an aspect of the most gravity; and in the faces of the knights perceived traces of military daring, united solemn carriage becoming men of a reli- ession, and which, in the presence of their ster, failed not to sit upon every brow.

naining and lower part of the hall was filled ds, holding partisans, and with other at- whom curiosity had drawn thither, to see Grand Master and a Jewish sorceress. By ater part of those inferior persons were, in or other, connected with the Order, and rdingly distinguished by their black dresses. nts from the neighbouring country were not dmittance; for it was the pride of Beau- render the edifying spectacle of the justice administered as public as possible. His eyes seemed to expand as he gazed around bly, and his countenance appeared elated scious dignity, and imaginary merit, of the h he was about to perform. A psalm, which f accompanied with a deep mellow voice, had not deprived of its powers, commenced edings of the day; and the solemn sounds, ultemus Domino, so often sung by the before engaging with earthly adversaries, d by Lucas most appropriate to introduce aching triumph, for such he deemed it, over rs of darkness. The deep prolonged notes, a hundred masculine voices accustomed e in the choral chant, arose to the vaulted e hall, and rolled on amongst its arches pleasing yet solemn sound of the rushing waters.

ne sounds ceased, the Grand Master glanced owly around the circle, and observed that ion of the Preceptors was vacant. Brian uilbert, by whom it had been occupied, had ace, and was now standing near the ex- ner of one of the benches occupied by the Companions of the Temple, one hand ex- s long mantle, so as in some degree to hide while the other held his cross-handled th the point of which, sheathed as it was, owly drawing lines upon the oaken floor.

ppy man!" said the Grand Master, after him with a glance of compassion. "Thou ral... how this holy work distresses him. an the light look of woman, aided by the the Powers of this world, bring a valiant ly knight!—Seest thou he cannot look up- cannot look upon her; and who knows mpulse from his tormentor his hand forms ... on the floor? It may be our afety are thus aimed at; but we spit at and ul enemy. Semper Leo percutiatur!"

as communicated apart to his confidential Conrade Mont-Fitchet. The Grand Master l his voice, and addressed the assembly.

end and valiant men, Knights, Preceptors, panions of this Holy Order, my brethren and n!—you also, well-born and pious Esquires, e to wear this holy Cross!—and you also, brethren, of every degree!—Be it known to it is not defect of power in us which hath l the assembling of this congregation; for, nworthy in our person, yet to us is commit- his batoon, full power to judge and to try all rds the weal of this our Holy Order. Holy nard, in the rule of our knightly and religious , hath said, in the fifty-ninth capital,* that not that brethren be called together in coun- t the will and command of the Master; free to us, as to those more worthy fathers preceded us in this our office, to judge, as occasion as of the time and place in which a chapter of the whole Order, or of any part thereof, may be convoked. Also, in all such chapters, it is our duty to hear the advice of our brethren, and to proceed according to our own pleasure. But when the raging wolf hath made an inroad upon the flock, and carried off one member thereof, it is the duty of the kind shepherd to call his comrades together, that with bows and slings they may quell the invader, according to our well-known rule, that the lion is ever to be beaten down. We have therefore summoned to our presence a Jewish woman, by name Rebecca, daughter of Isaac of York—a woman infamous for sortileges and for witcheries; whereby she hath maddened the blood, and besotted the brain, not of a churl, but of a Knight—not of a secular Knight, but of one devoted to the service of the Holy Temple—not of a Knight Companion, but of a Preceptor of our Order, first in honour as in place. Our brother, Brian de Bois-Guilbert, is well known to ourselves, and to all degrees who now hear me, as a true and zealous champion of the Cross, by whose arm many deeds of valour have been wrought in the Holy Land, and the holy places purified from pollution by the blood of those infidels who defiled them. Neither have our brother's sagacity and prudence been less in repute among his brethren than his valour and discipline; in so much, that knights, both in eastern and western lands, have named De Bois-Guilbert as one who may well be put in nomination as successor to this batoon, when it shall please Heaven to release us from the toil of bearing it. If we were told that such a man, so honoured, and so honourable, suddenly casting away regard for his character, his vows, his brethren, and his prospects, had associated to himself a Jewish damsel, wandered in this lewd company through solitary places, defended her person in preference to his own, and, finally, was so utterly blinded and besotted by his folly, as to bring her even to one of our own Preceptories, what should we say but that the noble knight was possessed by some evil demon, or influenced by some wicked spell? If we could suppose it otherwise, think not rank, valour, high repute, or any earthly consideration, should prevent us from visiting him with punishment, that the evil thing might be removed, even according to the text, Auferte malum ex vobis. For various and heinous are the acts of transgression against the rule of our blessed Order in this lamentable history.—1st, He hath walked according to his proper will, contrary to capital 33, Quod nullus juxta propriam voluntatem incedat.—2d, He hath held communication with an excommunicated person, capital 57, Ut fratres non participent cum excommunicatis, and therefore hath a portion in Anathema Maranatha. 3d, He hath conversed with strange women, contrary to the capital, Ut fratres non conversantur cum extraneis mulieribus.—4th, He hath not avoided, nay, he hath, it is to be feared, solicited the kiss of woman; by which, saith the last rule of our renowned Order, Ut fugiantur oscula, the soldiers of the Cross are brought into a snare. For which heinous and multiplied guilt, Brian de Bois-Guilbert should be cut off and cast out from our congregation, were he the right hand and right eye thereof."

He paused. A low murmur went through the assembly. Some of the younger part, who had been inclined to smile at the statute De osculis fugiendis, became now grave enough, and anxiously waited what the Grand Master was next to propose.

"Such," he said, "and so great should indeed be the punishment of a Knight Templar, who wilfully offended against the rules of his Order in such weighty points. But if, by means of charms and of spells, Satan had obtained dominion over the Knight, perchance because he cast his eyes too lightly upon a damsel's beauty, we are then rather to lament than chastise his backsliding; and, imposing on him only such penance as may purify him from his iniquity, we are to turn the full edge of our indignation upon the accursed instrument, which had so wellnigh occasioned his utter falling away.—Stand forth, therefore, and bear witness, ye who have witnessed these unhappy doings, that we may judge of the sum and bearing thereof; and judge whether our justice may be satisfied with the punishment of this infidel woman.

* ...tor is again referred to the Rules of the Poor Mil- ...hood of the Temple, which occur in the Works of St. ... T.

or if we must go on, with a bleeding heart, to the further proceeding against our brother."

Several witnesses were called upon to prove the risks to which Bois-Guilbert exposed himself in endeavouring to save Rebecca from the blazing castle, and his neglect of his personal defence in attending to her safety. The men gave these details with the exaggerations common to vulgar minds which have been strongly excited by any remarkable event, and their natural disposition to the marvellous was greatly increased by the satisfaction which their evidence seemed to afford to the eminent person for whose information it had been delivered. Thus the dangers which Bois-Guilbert surmounted, in themselves sufficiently great, became portentous in their narrative. The devotion of the Knight to Rebecca's deliverance was exaggerated beyond the bounds, not only of decency, but even of the most hardy excess of chivalrous zeal; and his deference to what she said, even although her language was often severe and upbraiding, was pushed as carried to an excess, which, in a man of his haughty temper, seemed almost preternatural.

The Preceptor of Templestowe was then called on to describe the manner in which Bois-Guilbert and the Jewess arrived at the Preceptory. The evidence of Malvoisin was skilfully guarded. But while he apparently studied to spare the feelings of Bois-Guilbert, he threw in, from time to time, such hints, as seemed to infer that he laboured under some temporary alienation of mind, so deeply did he appear to be enamoured of the damsel whom he brought along with him. With sighs of penitence, the Preceptor avowed his own contrition for having admitted Rebecca and her lover within the walls of the Preceptory – "But my defence," he concluded, "has been made in my confession to our most reverend father the Grand Master; he knows my motives were not evil, though my conduct may have been irregular. Joyfully will I submit to any penance he shall assign me."

"Thou hast spoken well, Brother Albert," said Beaumanoir; "thy motives were good, since thou didst judge it right to arrest thine erring brother in his career of precipitate folly. But thy conduct was wrong; as he that would stop a runaway steed, and seizing by the stirrup instead of the bridle, receiveth injury himself, instead of accomplishing his purpose. Thirteen pater-nosters are assigned by our pious founder for matins, and nine for vespers; be those services doubled by thee. Thrice a-week are Templars permitted the use of flesh; but do thou keep fast for all the seven days. This do for six weeks to come, and thy penance is accomplished."

With a hypocritical look of the deepest submission, the Preceptor of Templestowe bowed to the ground before his Superior, and resumed his seat.

"Were it not well, brethren," said the Grand Master, "that we examine something into the former life and conversation of this woman, specially that we may discover whether she be one likely to use magical charms and spells, since the truths which we have heard may well incline us to suppose, that in this unhappy course our erring brother has been acted upon by some infernal enticement and delusion?"

Herman of Goodalricke was the Fourth Preceptor present; the other three were Conrade, Malvoisin, and Bois-Guilbert himself. Herman was an ancient warrior, whose face was marked with scars inflicted by the sabre of the Moslemah, and had great rank and consideration among his brethren. He arose and bowed to the Grand Master, who instantly granted him license of speech. "I would crave to know, most Reverend Father, of our valiant brother, Brian de Bois-Guilbert, what he says to these wondrous accusations, and with what eye he himself regards his unhappy intercourse with this Jewish maiden?"

"Brian de Bois-Guilbert," said the Grand Master, "thou hearest the question which our Brother of Goodalricke desireth thou shouldst answer. I command thee to reply to him."

Bois-Guilbert turned his head towards the Grand Master when thus addressed, and remained silent.

"He is possessed by a dumb devil," said the Grand Master. "Avoid thee, Sathanas!—Socak, Brian de Bois-Guilbert, I conjure thee, by this symbol of our Holy Order."

Bois-Guilbert made an effort to suppress his rising scorn and indignation, the expression of which he was well aware, would have little availed him. "Brian de Bois-Guilbert," he answered, "replies not, most Reverend Father, to such wild and vague charges. If his honour be unattacked, he will defend it with his body, and with that sword which has often fought for Christendom."

"We forgive thee, Brother Brian," said the Grand Master; "though that thou hast boasted thy warlike achievements before us, is a glorifying of thine own deeds, and cometh of the Enemy, who tempteth us to exalt our own worship. But thou hast our pardon, judging thou speakest less of thine own suggestion than from the impulse of him whom, by Heaven's leave, we will quell and drive forth from our assembly." A glance of disdain flashed from the dark fierce eyes of Bois-Guilbert, but he made no reply – "And now," pursued the Grand Master, "since our Brother of Goodalricke's question has been thus imperfectly answered, pursue we our quest, brethren, and with our patron's assistance, we will search to the bottom this mystery of iniquity.—Let those who have aught to witness of the life and conversation of this Jewish woman, stand forth before us." There was a bustle in the lower part of the hall, and when the Grand Master inquired the reason, it was replied, there was in the crowd a bedridden man, whom the prisoner had restored to the perfect use of his limbs, by a miraculous balsam.

The poor peasant, a Saxon by birth, was dragged forward to the bar, terrified at the penal consequences which he might have incurred by the guilt of having been cured of the palsy by a Jewish damsel. Perfectly cured he certainly was not, for he supported himself forward on crutches to give evidence. Most unwilling was his testimony, and given with many tears; but he admitted that two years since, when residing at York, he was suddenly afflicted with a sore disease, while labouring for Isaac the rich Jew, in his vocation of a joiner; that he had been unable to stir from his bed until the remedies applied by Rebecca's directions, and especially a warming and spicy-smelling balsam, had in some degree restored him to the use of his limbs. Moreover, he said, she had given him a pot of that precious ointment, and furnished him with a piece of money withal, to return to the house of his father, near to Templestowe. "And may it please your gracious Reverence," said the man, "I cannot think the damsel meant harm by me, though she hath the ill hap to be a Jewess; for even when I used her remedy, I said the Pater and the Creed, and it never operated a whit less kindly."

"Peace, slave," said the Grand Master, "and begone! It well suits brutes like thee to be tampering and trinketing with hellish cures, and to be giving your labour to the sons of mischief. I tell thee, the fiend can impose diseases for the very purpose of removing them, in order to bring into credit some diabolical fashion of cure. Hast thou that unguent of which thou speakest?"

The peasant, fumbling in his bosom with a trembling hand, produced a small box, bearing some Hebrew characters on the lid, which was, with most of the audience, a sure proof that the devil had stood apothecary. Beaumanoir, after crossing himself, took the box into his hand, and learned in most of the Eastern tongues, read with ease the motto on the lid,—The Lion of the Tribe of Judah hath conquered. "Strange powers of Sathanas," said he, "which can convert Scripture into blasphemy, mingling poison with our necessary food!—Is there no leech here who can tell us the ingredients of this mystic unguent?"

Two medicines, as they called themselves, the one a monk, the other a barber, appeared, and avouched they knew nothing of the materials, excepting that they savoured of myrrh and camphire, which they took to be Oriental herbs. But with the true professional hatred to a successful practitioner of their art, they insinuated that since the medicine was beyond their own knowledge, it must necessarily have been compounded from an unlawful and magical pharma-

nce they themselves, though no conjurors, rstood every branch of their art, so far as it exercis'd with the good faith of a Christian. s medical research was ended, the Saxon esired humbly to have back the medicine had found so salutary; but the Grand Mas- ed severely at the request. "What is thy ow?" said he to the cripple.

the son of Snell," answered the peasant.

Hugg, son of Snell," said the Grand Master, e it is better to be beholden, than to accept t of mid-wivers' medicine that thou mayest walk; better to despoil infidels of their y the strong hand, than to accept of them r gifts, or do them service for wages. Go do as I have said."

," said the peasant, "an it shall not dis- ir Reverence, the lesson comes too late for am but a maimed man; but I will tell my ren, who serve the rich Rabbi Nathan Ben hat your mastership says it is more lawful than to render him faithful service."

ith the prating villain!" said Beaumanoir, not prepared to refute this practical applica- general maxim.

he son of Snell, withdrew into the crowd, sted in the fate of his benefactress, lingered hould learn her doom, even at the risk of ountering the frown of that severe judge, the vhich withered his very heart within him.

period of the trial, the Grand Master com- Rebecca to unveil herself. Opening her lips rst time, she replied patiently, but with dig- That it was not the wont of the daughters of e to uncover their faces when alone in an of strangers." The sweet tones of her voice, oftness of her reply, impressed on the audi- ntiment of pity and sympathy. But Beau- whose mind the suppression of each feeling ity which could interfere with his imagined a virtue of itself, repeated his commands ictim should be unveiled. The guards were emove her veil accordingly, when she stood the Grand Master and said, "Nay, but for f your own daughters—Alas," she said, re- herself, "ye have no daughters!—yet for mbrance of your mothers—for the love of rs, and of female decency, let me not be thus your presence; it suits not a maiden to be y such rude grooms. I will obey you," she ith an expression of patient sorrow in her ich had almost melted the heart of Beau- mself; "ye are elders among your people, ur command I will show the features of an aid it."

:hdrew her veil, and looked on them with a ce in which bashfulness contended with Her exceeding beauty excited a murmur of nd the younger knights told each other with , in silent correspondence, that Brian's best vas in the power of her real charms, rather r imaginary witchcraft. But Hugg, the son felt most deeply the effect produced by the he countenance of his benefactress. "Let rth," he said to the waiders at the door of —"let me go forth! To look at her again e, for I have had a share in murdering her."

, poor man," said Rebecca, when she heard mation; "thou hast done me no harm by the truth: thou canst not aid me by thy com- lamentations. Peace, I pray thee—go home thyself."

as about to be thrust out by the compassion rders, who were apprehensive lest his clamo- should draw upon them reprehension, and rself punishment. But he promised to be d was permitted to remain. The two men- with whom Albert Malvoisin had not failed unicate upon the import of their testimony, v called forward. Though both were hard- inflexible villains, the sight of the captive as well as her excelling beauty, at first ap- stagger them; but an expressive glance Preceptor of Templestowe restored them to their dogged composure; and they delivered, with a precision which would have seemed suspicious to more impartial judges, circumstances either altogether fictitious or trivial, and natural in themselves, but rendered pregnant with suspicion by the exaggerated manner in which they were told, and the sinister commentary which the witnesses added to the facts. The circumstances of their evidence would have been in modern days, divided into two classes—those which were immaterial, and those which were actually and physically impossible. But both were, in those ignorant and superstitious times, easily credited as proofs of guilt. The first class set forth, that Rebecca was heard to mutter to herself in an unknown tongue that the songs she sung by fits were of a strangely sweet sound, which made the ears of the hearer tingle, and his heart throb—that she spoke at times to herself, and seemed to look upward for a reply—that her garments were of a strange and mystic form, unlike those of women of good repute—that she had rings impressed with cabalistical devices, and that strange characters were brodered on her veil.

All these circumstances, so natural and so trivial, were gravely listened to as proofs, or, at least, as affording strong suspicions that Rebecca had unlawful correspondence with mystical powers.

But there was less equivocal testimony, which the credulity of the assembly, or of the greater part, greedily swallowed, however incredible. One of the soldiers had seen her work a cure upon a wounded man, brought with them to the castle of Torquilstone. She did, he said, make certain signs upon the wound, and repeated certain mysterious words, which he blessed God he understood not, when the iron head of a square cross-bow bolt disengaged itself from the wound, the bleeding was stanched, the wound was closed, and the dying man was, within the quarter of an hour, walking upon the ramparts, and assisting the witness in managing a mangonel, or machine for hurling stones. This legend was probably founded upon the fact, that Rebecca had attended on the wounded Ivanhoe when in the castle of Torquilstone. But it was the more difficult to dispute the accuracy of the witness, as, in order to produce real evidence in support of his verbal testimony, he drew from his pouch the very bolt-head, which, according to his story, had been miraculously extracted from the wound; and as the iron weighed a full ounce, it completely confirmed the tale, however marvellous.

His comrade had been a witness from a neighbouring battlement of the scene betwixt Rebecca and Bois-Guilbert, when she was upon the point of precipitating herself from the top of the tower. Not to be behind his companion, this fellow stated, that he had seen Rebecca perch herself upon the parapet of the turret, and there take the form of a milk-white swan, under which appearance she flitted three times round the castle of Torquilstone; then again settle on the turret, and once more assume the female form.

Less than one half of this weighty evidence would have been sufficient to convict any old woman, poor and ugly, even though she had not been a Jewess. United with that fatal circumstance, the body of proof was too weighty for Rebecca's youth, though combined with the most exquisite beauty.

The Grand Master had collected the suffrages, and now in a solemn tone demanded of Rebecca what she had to say against the sentence of condemnation, which he was about to pronounce.

"To invoke your pity," said the lovely Jewess, with a voice somewhat tremulous with emotion, "would, I am aware, be as useless as I should hold it mean. To state that, to relieve the sick and wounded of another religion, cannot be displeasing to the acknowledged Founder of both our faiths, were also unavailing; to plead that many things which these men (whom may heaven pardon!) have spoken against me are impossible, would avail me but little, since you believe in their possibility; and still less would it advantage me to explain, that the peculiarities of my dress, language, and manners, are those of my people—I had well nigh said of my country, but alas! we have no country. Nor will I even vindicate myself at the expense of my oppressor, who stands there listening to the fictions and surmises which seem to convert the tyrant into the victim.—God be judge between him and me! but rather would I submit to such deaths as your pleasure may denounce against me, than listen to the suit which that man of Belial has urged upon me friendless, defenceless, and his prisoner. But he is of your own faith, and his lightest affirmance would weigh down the most solemn protestations of the distressed Jewess. I will not therefore return to him evil the charge brought against me—but to himself! Yes, Brian de Bois-Guilbert, to thyself I appeal, whether these accusations are not false! as monstrous and calumnious as they are deadly!"

There was a pause; all eyes turned to Brian de Bois-Guilbert. He was silent.

"Speak," she said, "if thou art a man—if thou art a Christian, speak! I conjure thee, by the habit which thou dost wear, by the name thou dost inherit—by the knighthood thou dost vaunt—by the honour of thy mother—by the tomb and the bones of thy father—I conjure thee to say, are these things true?"

"Answer her brother," said the Grand Master, "if the Enemy with whom thou dost wrestle will give thee power."

In fact, Bois-Guilbert seemed agitated by contending passions, which almost convulsed his features, and it was with a constrained voice that at last he replied, looking to Rebecca, "The scroll!—the scroll!"

"Ay," said Beaumanoir, "this is indeed testimony! The victim of her witcheries can only name the fatal scroll, the spell inscribed on which is, doubtless, the cause of his silence."

But Rebecca put another interpretation on the words extorted as it were from Bois-Guilbert, and glancing her eye upon the slip of parchment which she continued to hold in her hand, she read written thereupon in the Arabian character, Demand a Champion! The murmuring commentary which ran through the assembly at the strange reply of Bois-Guilbert, gave Rebecca leisure to examine and instantly to destroy the scroll unobserved. When the whisper had ceased, the Grand Master spoke.

"Rebecca, thou canst derive no benefit from the evidence of this unhappy knight, for whom, as we well perceive, the Enemy is yet too powerful. Hast thou aught else to say?"

"There is yet one chance of life left to me," said Rebecca, "even by your own fierce laws. Life has been miserable—miserable, at least, of late—but I will not cast away the gift of God, while he affords me the means of defending it. I deny this charge—I maintain my innocence, and I declare the falsehood of this accusation—I challenge the privilege of trial by combat, and will appear by my champion."

"And who, Rebecca," replied the Grand Master, "will lay lance in rest for a sorceress? who will be the champion of a Jewess?"

"God will raise me up a champion," said Rebecca—"It cannot be that in merry England—the hospitable, the generous, the free, where so many are ready to peril their lives for honour, there will not be found one to fight for justice. But it is enough that I challenge the trial by combat—there lies my gage."

She took her embroidered glove from her hand, and flung it down before the Grand Master with an air of mingled simplicity and dignity, which excited universal surprise and admiration.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

> ——— There I throw my gage,
> To prove it on thee to the extremest point
> Of mortal daring.
>
> Richard II.

Even Lucas Beaumanoir himself was affected by the mien and appearance of Rebecca. He was not originally a cruel or even a severe man; but with passions by nature cold, and with a high, though mistaken sense of duty, his heart had been gradually hardened by the ascetic life which he pursued, the supreme power which he enjoyed, and the supposed necessity of subduing infidelity and eradicating heresy, which he conceived peculiarly incumbent on him. His features relaxed in their usual severity as he gazed upon the beautiful creature before him, alone, unfriended, and defending herself with so much spirit and courage. He crossed himself twice, as doubting whence arose the unwonted softening of a heart, which on such occasions used to resemble in hardness the steel of his sword. At length he spoke.

"Damsel," he said, "if the pity I feel for thee arise from any practice thine evil arts have made on me, great is thy guilt. But I rather judge it the kinder feelings of nature, which grieves that so goodly a form should be a vessel of perdition. Repent, my daughter—confess thy witchcrafts—turn thee from thine evil faith—embrace this holy emblem, and all shall yet be well with thee here and hereafter. In some sisterhood of the strictest order, shalt thou have time for prayer and fitting penance, and that repentance not to be repented of. This do and live—what has the law of Moses done for thee that thou shouldst die for it?"

"It was the law of my fathers," said Rebecca; "it was delivered in thunders and in storms upon the mountain of Sinai, in cloud and in fire. This, if ye are Christians, ye believe—it is, you say, recalled; but so my teachers have not taught me."

"Let our chaplain," said Beaumanoir, "stand forth, and tell this obstinate infidel"——

"Forgive the interruption," said Rebecca, meekly; "I am a maiden, unskilled to dispute for my religion, but I can die for it, if it be God's will.—Let me pray your answer to my demand of a champion."

"Give me her glove," said Beaumanoir. "This is indeed," he continued, as he looked at the flimsy texture and slender fingers, "a slight and frail gage for a purpose so deadly!—Seest thou, Rebecca, as this thin and light glove of thine is to one of our heavy steel gauntlets, so is thy cause to that of the Temple, for it is our Order which thou hast defied."

"Cast my innocence into the scale," answered Rebecca, "and the glove of silk shall outweigh the glove of iron."

"Then dost thou persist in thy refusal to confess thy guilt, and in that bold challenge which thou hast made?"

"I do persist, noble sir," answered Rebecca.

"So be it then, in the name of Heaven," said the Grand Master; "and may God show the right!"

"Amen," replied the Preceptors around him, and the word was deeply echoed by the whole assembly.

"Brethren," said Beaumanoir, "you are aware that we might well have refused to this woman the benefit of the trial by combat—but though a Jewess, and an unbeliever, she is also a stranger and defenceless, and God forbid that she should ask the benefit of our mild laws, and that it should be refused to her. Moreover, we are knights and soldiers as well as men of religion, and shame it were to us upon any pretence, to refuse proffered combat. Thus, therefore, stands the case. Rebecca, the daughter of Isaac of York, is, by many frequent and suspicious circumstances, defamed of sorcery, practised on the person of a noble knight of our holy Order, and hath challenged the combat in proof of her innocence. To whom, reverend brethren, is it your opinion that we should deliver the gage of battle, naming him, at the same time, to be our champion on the field?"

"To Brian de Bois-Guilbert, whom it chiefly concerns," said the Preceptor of Goodalricke, "and who, moreover, best knows how the truth stands in the matter."

"But if," said the Grand Master, "our brother Brian be under the influence of a charm or a spell—we speak but for the sake of precaution, for to the arm of none of our holy Order would we more willingly confide this or a more weighty cause."

"Reverend father," answered the Preceptor of Goodalricke, "no spell can affect the champion who comes forward to fight for the judgment of God."

"Thou sayest right, brother," said the Grand Master. "Albert Malvoisin, give this gage of battle to Brian de Bois-Guilbert.—It is our charge to thee, brother," he continued, addressing himself to Bois-Guilbert, "that thou do thy battle manfully, nothing doubting that the good cause shall triumph.—And

ecca, attend, that we assign thee the third
he present to find a champion."
s but brief space," answered Rebecca, "for
, who is also of another faith, to find one lo battle, wagering life and honour for her inst a knight who is called an approved sol-

ay not extend it,' answered the Grand
the field must be fought on in our own pre-
l divers weighty causes call us on the fr on hence."
will be done!" said Rebecca; "I put my n, to whom an instant is as effectual to whole age."
ast spoken well, damsel," said the Grand
but well know we who can array himself zel of light. It remains but to name a fit-of combat, and if it so hap, also of execu-
ere is the Preceptor of this house?"
Malvoisin, still holding Rebecca's glove in was speaking to Bois-Guilbert very ear-
in a low voice.
' said the Grand Master, "will he not gage?"
ll—he doth, most Reverend Father," said
slipping the glove under his own mantle.
the place of combat. I hold the fittest to be Saint George belonging to this Preceptory,
y us for military exercise."
ell," said the Grand Master.—"Rebecca,
ists shalt thou produce thy champion; and
est to do so, or if thy champion shall be dis-
by the judgment of God, thou shalt then ath of a sorceress, according to doom.—Let udgment be recorded, and our record read
t no one may pretend ignorance."
the chaplains, who acted as clerks to the mediately engrossed the order in a huge hich contained the proceedings of the Temhts when solemnly assembled on such
; and when he had finished writing, the aloud the sentence of the Grand Master, en translated from the Norman-French in
as couched, was expressed as follows:—
a, a Jewess, daughter of Isaac of York, inted of sorcery, seduction, and other practices, practised on a Knight of the Order of the Temple of Zion, doth deny
; and saith that the testimony delivered
r this day, is false, wicked, and disloyal;
by lawful *essoine of her body as being combat in her own behalf, she doth offer, pion instead thereof, to avouch her cause, he
; his loyal devoir in all knightly sort, with
as to gage of battle do fully appertain, and peril and cost. And therewith she prof-
age. And the gage having been delivered le Lord and Knight, Brian de Bois-Guil-Holy Order of the Temple of Zion, he was to do this battle, in behalf of his Order and injured and impaired by the practices of
unt. Wherefore the most Reverend Father
unt Lord, Lucas Marquis of Beaumanoir,
of the said challenge, and of the said es-
e appellant's body, and assigned the third said combat, the place being the enclo-
the lists of Saint George, near to the Pre-Templestowe. And the Grand Master
he appellant to appear there by her cham-
in of doom, as a person convicted of soruction; and also the defendant so to appear,
enalty of being held and adjudged recreant
default; and the noble Lord and most Father aforesaid appointed the battle to be
s own presence, and according to all that idable and profitable in such a case. And aid the just cause!"
!" said the Grand Master; and the word
d by all around. Rebecca spoke not, but up to heaven, and, folding her hands, rea minute without change of attitude. She then modestly reminded the Grand Master, that she ought to be permitted some opportunity of free communication with her friends, for the purpose of making her condition known to them, and procuring, if possible, some champion to fight in her behalf.

"It is just and lawful," said the Grand Master; "choose what messenger thou shalt trust, and he shall have free communication with thee in thy prison-chamber."

"Is there," said Rebecca, "any one here, who, either for love of a good cause, or for ample hire, will do the errand of a distressed being?"

All were silent; for none thought it safe, in the presence of the Grand Master, to avow any interest in the calumniated prisoner, lest he should be suspected of leaning towards Judaism. Not even the prospect of reward, far less any feelings of compassion alone, could surmount this apprehension.

Rebecca stood for a few moments in indescribable anxiety, and then exclaimed, "Is it really thus?—And in English land, am I to be deprived of the poor chance of safety which remains to me, for want of an act of charity which would not be refused to the worst criminal?"

Higg, the son of Snell, at length replied, "I am but a maimed man, but that I can at all stir or move was owing to her charitable assistance.—I will do thine errand," he added, addressing Rebecca, "as well as a crippled object can, and happy were my limbs fleet enough to repair the mischief done by my tongue. Alas! when I boasted of thy charity, I little thought I was leading thee into danger!"

"God," said Rebecca, "is the disposer of all. He can turn back the captivity of Judah, even by the weakest instrument. To execute his message the snail is as sure a messenger as the falcon. Seek out Isaac of York—here is that will pay for horse and man—let him have this scroll.—I know not if it be of Heaven the spirit which inspires me, but most truly do I judge that I am not to die this death, and that a champion will be raised up for me. Farewell!—Life and death are in thy haste."

The peasant took the scroll, which contained only a few lines in Hebrew. Many of the crowd would have dissuaded him from touching a document so suspicious; but Higg was resolute in the service of his benefactress. She had saved his body, he said, and he was confident she did not mean to peril his soul.

"I will get me," he said, "my neighbour Buthan's good capul,* and I will be at York within as brief space as man and beast may."

But as it fortuned, he had no occasion to go so far, for within a quarter of a mile from the gate of the Preceptory he met with two riders, whom, by their dress and their huge yellow caps, he knew to be Jews; and, on approaching more nearly, discovered that one of them was his ancient employer, Isaac of York. The other was the Rabbi Ben Samuel; and both had approached as near to the Preceptory as they dared, on hearing that the Grand Master had summoned a chapter for the trial of a sorceress.

"Brother Ben Samuel," said Isaac, "my soul is disquieted, and I wot not why. This charge of necromancy is right often used for cloaking evil practices on our people."

"Be of good comfort, brother," said the physician; "thou canst deal with the Nazarenes as one possessing the mammon of unrighteousness, and canst therefore purchase immunity at their hands—it rules the savage minds of those ungodly men, even as the signet of the mighty Solomon was said to command the evil genii.—But what poor wretch comes hither upon his crutches, desiring, as I think, some speech of me?—Friend," continued the physician, addressing Higg, the son of Snell, "I refuse thee not the aid of mine art, but I relieve not with one asper those who beg for alms upon the highway. Out upon thee!—Hast thou the palsy in thy legs? then let thy hands work for thy livelihood; for, albeit thou be'st unfit for a speedy post, or for a careful shepherd, or for the warfare, or for the service of a lusty master, yet there be occupations—How now, brother?" said he, inter-

* Essoine excuse, and here relates to the appellant's appearing by her champion, in excuse of her own sex.

* Capul, i. e. horse; in a more limited sense we say horse.

rupting his harangue to look towards Isaac, who had but glanced at the scroll which Higg offered, when, uttering a deep groan, he fell from his mule like a dying man, and lay for a minute insensible.

The Rabbi now dismounted in great alarm, and hastily applied the remedies which his art suggested for the recovery of his companion. He had even taken from his pocket a cupping apparatus, and was about to proceed to phlebotomy, when the object of his anxious solicitude suddenly revived; but it was to dash his cap from his head, and to throw dust on his gray hairs. The physician was at first inclined to ascribe this sudden and violent emotion to the effects of insanity; and, adhering to his original purpose, began once again to handle his implements. But Isaac soon convinced him of his error.

"Child of my sorrow," he said, "well shouldst thou be called Benoni, instead of Rebecca! Why should thy death bring down my gray hairs to the grave, till, in the bitterness of my heart, I curse God and die!"

"Brother," said the Rabbi, in great surprise, "art thou a father in Israel, and dost thou utter words like unto these?—I trust that the child of thy house yet liveth?"

"She liveth," answered Isaac; "but it is as Daniel, who was called Beltheshazzar, even when within the den of the lions. She is captive unto those men of Belial, and they will wreak their cruelty upon her, sparing neither for her youth nor her comely favour. O! she was as a crown of green palms to my gray locks; and she must wither in a night, like the gourd of Jonah! Child of my love! child of my old age!—oh, Rebecca, daughter of Rachel! the darkness of the shadow of death hath encompassed thee."

"Yet read the scroll," said the Rabbi; "peradventure it may be that we may yet find out a way of deliverance."

"Do thou read, brother," answered Isaac, "for mine eyes are as a fountain of water."

The physician read, but in their native language, the following words:—

"To Isaac, the son of Adonikam, whom the Gentiles call Isaac of York, peace and the blessing of the promise be multiplied unto thee!—My father, I am as one doomed to die for that which my soul knoweth not—even for the crime of witchcraft. My father, if a strong man can be found to do battle for my cause with sword and spear, according to the customs of the Nazarenes, and that within the lists of Templestowe, on the third day from this time, peradventure our fathers' God will give him strength to defend the innocent, and her who hath none to help her. But if this may not be, let the virgins of our people mourn for me as for one cast off, and for the hart that is stricken by the hunter, and for the flower which is cut down by the scythe of the mower. Wherefore look now what thou doest, and whether there be any rescue. One Nazarene warrior might indeed bear arms in my behalf, even Wilfred, son of Cedric, whom the Gentiles call Ivanhoe. But he may not wear the weight of his armour. Nevertheless, and the tidings unto him, my father; for he hath ...ar among the strong men of his people, and as he was our companion in the house of bondage, he may find some one to do battle for my sake. And say unto him, even unto him, even unto Wilfred, the son of Cedric, that if Rebecca live, or if Rebecca die, she liveth or dieth wholly free of the guilt she is charged withal. And if it be the will of God that thou shalt be deprived of thy daughter, do not thou tarry, old man, in this land of bloodshed and cruelty; but betake thyself to Cordova, where thy brother liveth in safety, under the shadow of the throne, even of the throne of Boabdil the Saracen; for less cruel are the cruelties of the Moors unto the race of Jacob, than the cruelties of the Nazarenes of England."

Isaac listened with tolerable composure while Ben Samuel read the letter, and then again resumed the gestures and exclamations of Oriental sorrow, tearing his garments, besprinkling his head with dust, and ejaculating, "My daughter! my daughter! flesh of my flesh, and bone of my bone!"

"Yet," said the Rabbi, "take courage, for this grief availeth nothing. Gird up thy loins, and seek Wilfred, the son of Cedric. It may be he will thee with counsel or with strength; for he hath favour in the eyes of Richard, called of the nations Cœur-de-Lion, and the tidings that he returned are constant in the land. It may be we may obtain his letter, and his signet, commanding these men of blood, who take their name from Temple to the dishonour thereof, that they do not in their purposed wickedness."

"I will seek him out," said Isaac, "for he is a good youth and hath compassion for the children of Jacob. But he cannot bear his armour, neither shall any other Christian shall do battle for the oppressed of Zion?"

"Nay, but," said the Rabbi, "thou speakest like one that knoweth not the Gentiles. With them thou buy their valour, even as with gold they will purchase their own safety. Be of good courage, and arise, and set forward to find out this Wilfred of Ivanhoe. I will also up and be doing, for great sin it were to leave thee in thy calamity. I will hie me to the city of York, where many warriors and strong men are assembled, and doubt not I will find among them some one who will do battle for thy daughter for gold is their god, and for riches will they peril their lives as well as their lands. Thou wilt vow unto thy brother, such promise as I may make unto thee in thy name?"

"Assuredly, brother," said Isaac, "and He who hath praised that raised me up a comforter in my distress. Howbeit, grant them not their full demand, for thou shalt find it the quality of this accursed people that they will ask pounds, and peradventure accept of ounces. Nevertheless, be it as thou wilt, for I am distracted in this thing, and what will my gold avail me if the child of my love perish!"

"Farewell," said the physician, "and may all thy fears be as thy heart desireth."

They embraced accordingly, and departed on their several roads. The crippled peasant remained for some time looking after them.

"These dog-Jews!" said he; "to take no notice of a free guild-brother, than if I were a slave or a Turk, or a circumcised Hebrew like themselves! They might have flung me a manche, however. I was not obliged to bring their unbelieving scrawls, and run the risk of being bewitched by such folks than one told me. And what care I for the piece of gold that the wench gave me, if I am to come to harm from the priest next Easter at confession? I shall be obliged to give him twice as much to make it right with him, and be called the Jew's flying post into the bargain? I think I am bewitched in earnest when I was beside the Jew. But it was always so with Jew or Gentile, whatever came near her none could stay when she had an errand to go—and still, whatever I think, I would give shop and tools to save her life."

CHAPTER XXXIX.

O maid, unrelenting and cold as thou art,
My bosom is proud as thine own.

It was in the twilight of the day when the ... it could be called such, had taken place, that a knock was heard at the door of Rebecca's chamber. It disturbed not the inmate, then engaged in the evening prayer recommended her religion, and which concluded with a ... have ventured thus to translate into English

When Israel, of the Lord beloved,
Out of the land of bondage came,
Her father's God before her moved,
An awful guide, in smoke and flame.
By day, along the astonish'd lands
The cloudy pillar glided slow;
By night, Arabia's crimson'd sands
Return'd the fiery column's glow.

There rose the choral hymn of praise,
And trump and timbrel answer'd keen,
And Zion's daughters pour'd their lays,
With priest's and warrior's voice between

No portents now our foes amaze,
Forsaken Israel wonders lone;
Our fathers would not know THY ways,
And THOU hast left them to their own.

But, present still, though now unseen,
When brightly shines the prosperous day,
Be thoughts of THEE a cloudy screen
To temper the deceitful ray.
And oh, when stoops on Judah's path
In shade and storm the night of fear,
Bright THOU, long suffering, slow to wrath,
A burning, and a shining light!

Our harps we left by Babel's streams,
The tyrant's jest, the Gentile's scorn;
No censer round our altar beams,
And mute our timbrel, trump, and horn.
But THOU hast said, the blood of goat,
The flesh of rams, I will not prize;
A contrite heart, and humble thought,
Are mine accepted sacrifice.

hen the sounds of Rebecca's devotional hymn died away in silence, the low knock at the door again renewed. "Enter," she said, "if thou art end; and if a foe, I have not the means of re- g thy entrance."

am," said Brian de Bois-Guilbert, entering the nment, "friend or foe, Rebecca, as the event of interview shall make me."

rmed at the sight of this man, whose licentious on she considered as the root of her misfortunes, cca drew backward with a cautious and alarmed, ot a timorous demeanour, into the farthest cor- f the apartment, as if determined to retreat as s she could, but to stand her ground when retreat me no longer possible. She drew herself into an ade not of defiance, but of resolution, as one that ld avoid provoking assault, yet was resolute to it, being offered, to the utmost of her power.

"You have no reason to fear me, Rebecca," said Templar; "or if I must so qualify my speech, have at least now no reason to fear me."

fear you not, Sir Knight," replied Rebecca, al- gh her short-drawn breath seemed to belie the sm of her accents; "my trust is strong, and I thee not."

"You have no cause," answered Bois-Guilbert, ely; "my former frantic attempts you have not to dread. Within your call are guards, over m I have no authority. They are designed to uet you to death, Rebecca, yet would not suffer to be insulted by any one, even by me, were my y—for frenzy it is—to urge me so far."

May Heaven be praised!" said the Jewess; th is the least of my apprehensions in this den il."

ly," replied the Templar, "the idea of death is r received by the courageous mind, when the to it is sudden and open. A thrust with a lance, ike with a sword, were to me little—To you, a g from a dizzy battlement, a stroke with a sharp rd, has no terrors, compared with what either s disgrace. Mark me—I say this perhaps mine sentiments of honour are not less fantastic, Re- a, than those are; but we know alike how to die em."

Unhappy man," said the Jewess; "and art thou mned to expose thy life for principles, of which ober judgment does not acknowledge the solid-

Surely this is a parting with your treasure for which is not bread—but dream not so of me. Thy inion may fluctuate on the wild and change ful ns of human opinion, but mine is anchored on lock of Ages."

Silence, maiden," answered the Templar; "such urse now avails but little. Thou art condemned e not a sudden and easy death, such as misery ses, and dear air welcomes, but a slow, wretched, acted course of torture, suited to what the dia- bigotry of these men calls thy crime."

And to whom—if such my fate—to whom do I this?" said Rebecca; "surely only to him, who, most selfish and brutal cause, dragged me , and who now, for some unknown purpose of wn, strives to exaggerate the wretched fate to h he exposed me."

Think not," said the Templar, "that I have so exposed thee; I would have buckled thee against such danger with my own bosom, as freely as ever I exposed it to the shafts which had otherwise reached thy life."

"Had thy purpose been the honourable protection of the innocent," said Rebecca, "I had thanked thee for thy care—as it is, thou hast claimed merit for it so often, that I tell thee life is worth nothing to me, preserved at the price which thou wouldst exact for it."

"Truce with thine upbraidings, Rebecca," said the Templar; "I have my own cause of grief, and brook not that thy reproaches should add to it."

"What is thy purpose, then, Sir Knight?" said the Jewess; "speak it briefly.—If thou hast aught to do, save to witness the misery thou hast caused, let me know it; and then, if so it please you, leave me to myself—the step between time and eternity is short but terrible—and I have few moments to prepare for it."

"I perceive, Rebecca," said Bois-Guilbert, "that thou dost continue to burden me with the charge of distresses, which most fain would I have prevented."

"Sir Knight," said Rebecca, "I would avoid reproaches. But what is more certain than that I owe my death to thine unbridled passion?"

"You err—you err,"—said the Templar, hastily, "if you impute what I could neither foresee nor prevent to my purpose or agency.—Could I guess the unexpected arrival of yon dotard, whom some flashes of frantic valour, and the praises yielded by fools to the stupid self-torments of an ascetic, have raised for the present above his own merits, above common sense, above me, and above the hundreds of our Order, who think and feel as men free from such silly and fantastic prejudices as are the grounds of his opinions and actions?"

"Yet," said Rebecca, "you sate a judge upon me, innocent—most innocent—as you knew me to be—you concurred in my condemnation, and, if I aright understood, are yourself to appear in arms to assert my guilt, and assure my punishment."

"Thy patience, maiden," replied the Templar.—"No race knows so well as thine own tribes how to submit to the time, and so to trim their bark as to make advantage even of an adverse wind."

"Lamented be the hour," said Rebecca, "that has taught such art to the House of Israel! but adversity bends the heart as fire bends the stubborn steel, and those who are no longer their own governors, and the denizens of their own free independent state, must crouch before strangers. It is our curse, Sir Knight, deserved, doubtless, by our own misdeeds and those of our fathers; but you—you who boast your freedom as your birthright, how much deeper is your disgrace when you stoop to soothe the prejudices of others, and that against your own conviction?"

"Your words are bitter, Rebecca," said Bois-Guilbert, pacing the apartment with impatience, "but I came not hither to bandy reproaches with you.—Know that Bois-Guilbert yields not to created man, although circumstances may for a time induce him to alter his plan. His will is the mountain stream, which may indeed be turned for a little space aside by the rock, but fails not to find its course to the ocean. That scroll which warned thee to demand a champion, from whom couldst thou think it came, if not from Bois-Guilbert? In whom else couldst thou have excited such interest?"

"A brief respite from instant death," said Rebecca, "which will little avail me—was this all thou couldst do for one, on whose head thou hast heaped sorrow, and whom thou hast brought near even to the verge of the tomb?"

"No, maiden," said Bois-Guilbert, "this was not all that I purposed. Had it not been for the accursed interference of yon fanatical dotard, and the fool of Goodalricke, who, being a Templar, affects to think and judge according to the ordinary rules of humanity, the office of the Champion Defender had devolved, not on a Preceptor, but on a Companion of the Order. Then I myself—such was my purpose—had, on the sounding of the trumpet, appeared in the lists as thy champion disguised indeed in the fashion of a roving life of a Jewish maiden."

"Speak," said Rebecca; "I understand thee not."

"Well, then," said Bois-Guilbert, "I will speak as freely as ever did doting penitent to his ghostly father, when placed in the tricky confessional.—Rebecca, if I appear not in these lists I lose fame and rank—lose that which is the breath of my nostrils, the esteem, I mean, in which I am held by my brethren, and the hopes I have of succeeding to that mighty authority, which is now wielded by the bigoted dotard Lucas de Beaumanoir, but of which I should make a far different use. Such is my certain doom, except I appear in arms against thy cause. Accursed be he of Goodalricke, who baited this trap for me! and doubly accursed Albert de Malvoisin, who withheld me from the resolution I had formed, of hurling back the glove at the face of the superstitious and superannuated fool, who listened to a charge so absurd, and against a creature so high in mind, and so lovely in form as thou art!"

"And what now avails rant or flattery?" answered Rebecca. "Thou hast made thy choice between causing to be shed the blood of an innocent woman, or of endangering thine own earthly state and earthly hopes—What avails it to reckon together?—thy choice is made."

"No, Rebecca," said the knight, in a softer tone, and drawing nearer towards her; "my choice is not made—nay, mark, it is thine to make the election. If I appear in the lists, I must maintain my name in arms; and if I do so, champioued or unchampioned, thou diest by the stake and fagot, for there lives not the knight who hath coped with me in arms on equal issue, or on terms of vantage, save Richard Cœur-de-Lion, and his minion of Ivanhoe. Ivanhoe, as thou well knowest, is unable to bear his corslet, and Richard is in a foreign prison. If I appear, then thou diest, even although thy charms should instigate some hotheaded youth to enter the lists in thy defence."

"And what avails repeating this so often?" said Rebecca.

"Much," replied the Templar; "for thou must learn to look at thy fate on every side."

"Well, then, turn the tapestry," said the Jewess, "and let me see the other side."

"If I appear," said Bois-Guilbert, "in the fatal lists, thou diest by a slow and cruel death, in pain such as thy sake, and we will escape in compan

me, Rebecca," he said, again softeni
"England,—Europe,—is not the world
spheres in which we may act, ample en
my ambition. We will go to Palestine rade, Marquis of Montserrat, is my frie
free as myself from the doting scruples
our free-born reason—rather with Sal
league ours lves, than endure the scorn whom we contemn.—I will form new p
ness," he continued, again traversing t
hasty strides—"Europe shall hear the lo
she has driven from her sons!—Not whom her crusaders send to slaught much to defend Palestine—not the thousands and ten thousands of Sara their way so deep into that land for whi striving, as the strength and policy of brethren, who, in despite of yonder o adhere to me in good and evil. Thou sh Rebecca—on Mount Carmel shall we pi which my valour will gain for you, a change my long-desired batoon for a sc
"A dream," said Rebecca; "an empty
night, which, were it a waking reality, a Enough, that the power which thou mig
I will never share; nor hold I so light religious faith, as to esteem him who barter these ties, and cast away the Order of which he is a sworn membe
gratify an unruly passion for the daugh
people.—Put not a price on my del
Knight—sell not a deed of generosity
oppressed for the sake of charity, and n advantage—Go to the throne of Engl
will listen to my appeal from these cruel
"Never, Rebecca!" said the Temp
"If I renounce my Order, for thee alo
nounce it—Ambition shall remain
refuse my love; I will not be fooled o Stoop my crest to Richard?—ask a b heart of pride? Never, Rebecca, will Order of the Temple at his feet in my pe forsake the Order, I never will degrade
"Now God be gracious to me," said R
the succour of man is well nigh hopeless

naturally fearful of danger, and impa-
yet, when we enter those fatal lists,
nd I to suffer, I feel the strong assur-
, that my courage shall mount higher arewell—I waste no more words on that remains on earth to the daughter be otherwise spent—she must seek the may hide his face from his people, but his ear to the cry of those who seek and in truth."

en thus?" said the Templar, after a would to Heaven that we had never u hadst been noble in birth and Chris-Nay, by Heaven! when I gaze on thee,
and how we are next to meet, I could lf one of thine own degraded nation;
esant with ingots and shekels, instead
ld; my head bent down before each
my look only terrible to the shivering lebtor - this could I wish, Rebecca, to in life, and to escape the fearful share
thy death."

spoken the Jew," said Rebecca, "as
of such as thou art has made him.
as driven him from his country, but ened to him the only road to power
e, which oppression has left unbarred.
ut history of the people of God, and tell whom Jehovah wrought such mar-
nations, were then a people of misers
—And know, proud knight, we numngst us to which your boasted northern h ground compared with the cedar—end far back to those high times when sence shook the mercy-seat between nd which derive their splendour from ice, but from the awful Voice, which ers be nearest of the congregation to ch were the princes of the House of lour rose as she boasted the ancient race, but faded as she added, with a re the princes of Judah, now such no

re trampled down like the shorn grass,
the mire of the ways. Yet are there em who shame not such high descent,
all be the daughter of Isaac the son of 'arewell! -I envy not thy blood-won vy not thy barbarous descent from ens—I envy thee not thy faith, which is uth, but never in thy heart nor in thy spell on me, by Heaven!" said Boisalmost think you besotted skeleton

d that the reluctance with which I part something in it more than is natural.
!" he said, approaching near her, but ect,—"so young, so beautiful, so fear-
nd yet doomed to die, and with infamy
Who would not weep for thee?—The
been a stranger to these eyelids for moistens them as I gaze on thee. But thing may now save thy life. Thou he blind instruments of some irresisti-
it hurries us along, like goodly vessels
the storm, which are dashed against l so perish. Forgive me, then, and let t as friends part. I have assailed thy ain, and mine own is fixed as the ada-
s of fate."

l Rebecca, "do men throw on fate the vn wild passions. But I do forgive thee, though the author of my early death.
e things which cross over thy powerful
s the garden of the sluggard, and the shed up, and conspired to choke the fair
e blossom."

the Templar, "I am, Rebecca, as thou
e, untaught, untamed—and proud, that,
l of empty fools and crafty bigots, I
he pre-eminent fortitude that places me
I have been a child of battle from my high in my views, steady and inflexible em. Such must I remain—proud, inflexible, and unchanging; and of this the world shall have proof.—But thou forgivest me, Rebecca?"

"As freely as ever victim forgave her executioner."

"Farewell, then," said the Templar, and left the apartment.

The Preceptor Albert waited impatiently in an adjacent chamber the return of Bois-Guilbert.

"Thou hast tarried long," he said: "I have been as if stretched on red-hot iron with very impatience. What if the Grand Master, or his spy Conrade, had come hither? I had paid dear for my complaisance.—But what ails thee, brother?—Thy step totters, thy brow is as black as night. Art thou well, Bois-Guilbert?"

"Ay," answered the Templar, "as well as the wretch who is doomed to die within an hour.—Nay, by the rood, not half so well - for there be those in such state, who can lay down life like a cast-off garment. By Heaven, Malvoisin, yonder girl hath well-nigh unmanned me. I am half resolved to go to the Grand Master, abjure the Order to his very teeth, and refuse to act the brutality which his tyranny has imposed on me."

"Thou art mad," answered Malvoisin; "thou mayst thus indeed utterly ruin thyself, but canst not even find a chance thereby to save the life of this Jewess, which seems so precious in thine eyes. Beaumanoir will name another of the Order to defend his judgment in thy place, and the accused will as assuredly perish as if thou hadst taken the duty imposed on thee."

"'Tis false—I will myself take arms in her behalf," answered the Templar, haughtily; "and, should I do so, I think, Malvoisin, that thou knowest not one of the Order, who will keep his saddle before the point of my lance."

"Ay, but thou forgettest," said the wily adviser, "thou wilt have neither leisure nor opportunity to execute this mad project. Go to Lucas Beaumanoir, and say thou hast renounced thy vow of obedience, and see how long the despotic old man will leave thee in personal freedom. The words shall scarce have left thy lips, ere thou wilt either be a hundred feet under ground, in the dungeon of the Preceptory, to abide trial as a recreant knight; or, if his opinion holds concerning thy possession, thou wilt be enjoying straw, darkness, and chains, in some distant convent cell, stunned with exorcisms, and drenched with holy water, to expel the foul fiend which hath obtained dominion over thee. Thou must to the lists, Brian, or thou art a lost and dishonoured man."

"I will break forth and fly," said Bois-Guilbert—"fly to some distant land, to which folly and fanaticism have not yet found their way. No drop of the blood of this most excellent creature shall be spilled by my sanction."

"Thou canst not fly," said the Preceptor; "thy ravings have excited suspicion, and thou wilt not be permitted to leave the Preceptory. Go and make the essay—present thyself before the gate, and command the bridge to be lowered, and mark what answer thou shalt receive.—Thou art surprised and offended: but is it not the better for thee? Wert thou to fly, what would ensue but the reversal of thy arms, the dishonour of thine ancestry, the degradation of thy rank?—Think on it. Where shall thine old companions in arms hide their heads when Brian de Bois-Guilbert, the best lance of the Templars, is proclaimed recreant, amid the hisses of the assembled people? What grief will be at the Court of France! With what joy will the haughty Richard hear the news, that the knight that set him hard in Palestine, and well nigh darkened his renown, has lost fame and honour for a Jewish girl, whom he could not even save by a costly sacrifice!"

"Malvoisin," said the Knight, "I thank thee—thou hast touched the string at which my heart most readily thrills!—Come of it what may, recreant shall never be added to the name of Bois-Guilbert. Would to God, Richard, or any of his vaunting minions of England, would appear in these lists! But they will be empty—no one will risk to break a lance for the innocent, the forlorn."

"The better for thee, if it prove so," said the Preceptor; "if no champion appears, it is not by means that this unlucky damsel shall die, but by the doom of the Grand Master, with whom rests all the blame, and who will count that blame for praise and commendation."

"True," said Bois-Guilbert; "if no champion appears, I am but a part of the pageant, sitting indeed on horseback in the lists, but having no part in what is to follow."

"None whatever," said Malvoisin; "no more than the armed image of Saint George when it makes part of a procession."

"Well, I will resume my resolution," replied the haughty Templar. "She has despised me—repulsed me—reviled me. And wherefore should I offer up for her whatever of estimation I have in the opinion of others? Malvoisin, I will appear in the lists."

He left the apartment hastily as he uttered these words, and the Preceptor followed, to watch and confirm him in his resolution; for in Bois-Guilbert's fame he had hints of a strong interest, expecting much advantage from his being one day at the head of the Order, not to mention the preferment of which Mont-Fitchet had given him hopes, on condition he would forward the condemnation of the unfortunate Rebecca. Yet although, in combating his friend's better feelings, he possessed all the advantage which a wily, composed, selfish disposition has over a man agitated by strong and contending passions, it required all Malvoisin's art to keep Bois-Guilbert steady to the purpose he had prevailed on him to adopt. He was obliged to watch him closely to prevent his resuming his purpose of flight, to intercept his communication with the Grand Master, lest he should come to an open rupture with his Superior, and to renew, from time to time, the various arguments by which he endeavoured to show, that, in appearing as champion on this occasion, Bois-Guilbert, without either accelerating or ensuring the fate of Rebecca, would follow the only course by which he could save himself from degradation and disgrace.

CHAPTER XL.

Conscience avaunt!—Richard's himself again.
Richard III.

When the Black Knight—for it becomes necessary to resume the train of his adventures—left the Trysting-tree of the generous Outlaw, he held his way straight to a neighbouring religious house, of small extent and revenue, called the Priory of Saint Botolph, to which the wounded Ivanhoe had been removed when the castle was taken, under the guidance of the faithful Gurth, and the magnanimous Wamba. It is unnecessary at present to mention what took place in the interim betwixt Wilfred and his deliverer; suffice it to say, that after long and grave communication, messengers were dispatched by the Prior in several directions, and that on the succeeding morning the Black Knight was about to set forth on his journey, accompanied by the jester Wamba, who attended as his guide.

"We will meet," he said to Ivanhoe, "at Coningsburgh, the castle of the deceased Athelstane, since there thy father Cedric holds the funeral feast for his noble relation. I would see your Saxon kindred together, Sir Wilfred, and become better acquainted with them than heretofore. Thou also wilt meet me; and it shall be my task to reconcile thee to thy father."

So saying he took an affectionate farewell of Ivanhoe, who expressed an anxious desire to attend upon his deliverer. But the Black Knight would not listen to the proposal.

"Rest this day; thou wilt have scarce strength enough to travel on the next. I will have no guide with me but honest Wamba, who can play priest or fool as I shall be most in the humour."

"And I," said Wamba, "will attend you with all my heart. I would fain see the feasting at the funeral of Athelstane; for, if it be not full and frequent, he will rise from the dead to rebuke cook, sewer, and cup-bearer; and that were a sight worth seeing. Always, Sir Knight, I will trust your valour with making my excuse to my master Cedric, in case mine own wit should fail."

"And how should my poor valour succeed, ter, when thy light wit halts?—resolve me t

"Wit, Sir Knight," replied the Jester, much. He is a quick, apprehensive knave, his neighbour's blind side, and knows ho the lee-gage when his passions are blow But valour is a sturdy fellow, that makes He rows against both wind and tide, and m notwithstanding; and, therefore, good Sir while I take advantage of the fair weather i ble master's temper, I will expect you to be self when it grows rough."

"Sir Knight of the Fetterlock, since it is sure so to be distinguished," said Ivanho me you have chosen a talkative and a tro fool to be your guide. But he knows every alley in the woods as well as e'er a hunter quents them; and the poor knave, as thou h seen, is as faithful as steel."

"Nay," said the knight, "an he have t showing my road, I shall not grumble with he desires to make it pleasant.—Fare thee w Wilfred—I charge thee not to attempt to t to-morrow at earliest."

So saying, he extended his hand to Ivanh pressed it to his lips, took leave of the Prior, his horse, and departed, with Wamba for hi nion. Ivanhoe followed them with his ey they were lost in the shades of the surrounds and then returned into the convent.

But shortly after matin-song, he request the Prior. The old man came in haste, and anxiously after the state of his health.

"It is better," he said, "than my fondest h have anticipated; either my wound has bee than the effusion of blood led me to suppos balsam hath wrought a wonderful cure upon already as if I could bear my corslet; and the better, for thoughts pass in my mind wh der me unwilling to remain here longer in in

"Now, the saints forbid," said the Prior, son of the Saxon Cedric should leave our co his wounds were healed! It were shame to fession were we to suffer it."

"Nor would I desire to leave your hospit venerable father," said Ivanhoe, "did I not self able to endure the journey, and con undertake it."

"And what can have urged you to so departure?" said the Prior.

"Have you never, holy father," answ Knight, "felt an apprehension of approac for which you in vain attempted to assign —Have you never found your mind dark the sunny landscape, by the sudden clou augurs a coming tempest?—And thinkest that such impulses are deserving of attention the hints of our guardian spirits, that dang pending?"

"I may not deny," said the Prior, crossing "that such things have been, and have been ven; but then such communications have h bly useful scope and tendency. But thou, as thou art, what avails it thou shouldst f steps of him whom thou couldst not aid, w be assaulted?"

"Prior," said Ivanhoe, "thou dost mistu stout enough to exchange buffets with any challenge me to such a traffic—But were it may I not aid him were he in danger, by oth than by force of arms? It is but too we that the Saxons love not the Norman race knows what may be the issue, if he breal them when their hearts are irritated by th Athelstane, and their heads heated by the c which they will indulge themselves? I entrance among them at such a moment r one, and I am resolved to share or avert th which, that I may the better do, I would thee the use of some palfrey whose pace ma than that of my destrier."*

"Surely," said the worthy churchman; " have mine own ambling jennet, and I wou

* Destrier—war-horse.

asy for your sake as that of the Abbot of
ans. Yet this will I say for Malkin, for so , that unless you were to borrow a ride on r's steed that paces a hornpipe amongst the
could not go a journey on a creature so gen-smooth-paced. I have composed many a i her back, to the edification of my brethren
ivent, and many poor Christian souls." / you, reverend father," said Ivanhoe, "let e got ready instantly, and bid Gurth attend
mine arms."
but fair sir," said the Prior, "I pray you to r that Malkin hath as little skill in arms as er, and that I warrant not her enduring the weight of your full panoply. O, Malkin, I
'ou, is a beast of judgment, and will contend my undue weight—I did but borrow the 'emporium from the priest of Saint Bees, and you she would not stir from the gate until I anged the huge volume for my little bre-

me, holy father," said Ivanhoe, "I will not
.er with too much weight; and if she calls a rith me, it is odds but she has the worst."
ply was made while Gurth was buckling on it's heels a pair of large gilded spurs, capable ieing any restive horse that his best safety
ng conformable to the will of his rider.
ep and sharp rowels with which Ivanhoe's
'e now armed, began to make the worthy
ent of his courtesy, and ejaculate,—"Nay,
sir, now I bethink me, my Malkin abideth spur—Better it were that you tarry for the our maneuple down at the Grange, which ıad in little more than an hour, and cannot actable, in respect that she draweth much of r fire-wood, and eateth no corn."
nk you, reverend father, but will abide by offer, as I see Malkin is already led forth to Gurth shall carry mine armour; and for rely on it, that as I will not overload Mal-
k, she shall not overcome my patience.
, farewell!"
e now descended the stairs more hastily
y than his wound promised, and threw him-
the jennet, eager to escape the importunity
ior, who stuck as closely to his side as his fatness would permit, now singing the f Malkin, now recommending caution to ıt in managing her.
s at the most dangerous period for maidens
s mares," said the old man, laughing at his
"being barely in her fifteenth year."
e who had other web to weave than to stand ig a palfrey's paces with its owner, lent but
r to the Prior's grave advices and facetious
having leapt on his mare, and commanded (for such Gurth now called himself) to keep ıis side, he followed the track of the Black ıto the forest, while the Prior stood at the e convent looking after him, and ejaculating.
Mary! how prompt and fiery be these men
I would I had not trusted Malkin to his for, crippled as I am with the cold rheum, I ıe if aught but good befalls her. And yet," recollecting himself, "as I would not spare old and disabled limbs in the good cause of ınd, so Malkin must e'en run her hazard on venture; and it may be they will think our ıe worthy of some munificent guerdon—or,
, they will send the old Prior a pacing nag.
y do none of these, as great men will forget
ı's service, truly I shall hold me well reaving done that which is right. And it is nigh the fitting time to summon the bretheakfast in the refectory!—Ah! I doubt they call more cheerily than the bells for primes
is."
Prior of Saint Botolph's hobbled back again efectory, to preside over the stockfish and ı was just serving out for the friars' break-sy and important, he sat him down at the many a dark word he threw out of bene-expected to the convent, and high deeds of service done by himself, which, at another season, would have attracted observation. But as the stockfish was highly salted, and the ale reasonably powerful, the jaws of the brethren were too anxiously employed to admit of their making much use of their ears; nor do we read of any of the fraternity, who was tempted to speculate upon the mysterious hints of their Superior, except Father Diggory, who was severely afflicted by the toothach, so that he could only eat on one side of his jaws.

In the mean time, the Black Champion and his guide were pacing at their leisure through the recesses of the forest; the good Knight whiles humming to himself the lay of some enamoured troubadour, sometimes encouraging by questions the prating disposition of his attendant, so that their dialogue formed a whimsical mixture of song and jest, of which we would fain give our readers some idea. You are then to imagine this knight, such as we have already described him, strong of person, tall, broad-shouldered, and large of bone, mounted on his mighty black charger, which seemed made on purpose to bear his weight, so easily he paced forward under it, having the visor of his helmet raised, in order to admit freedom of breath, yet keeping the beaver, or under part, closed, so that his features could be but imperfectly distinguished. But his ruddy embrowned cheek-bones could be plainly seen, and the large and bright blue eyes, that flashed from under the dark shade of the raised visor; and the whole gesture and look of the champion expressed careless gayety and fearless confidence—a mind which was unapt to apprehend danger, and prompt to defy it when most imminent—yet with whom danger was a familiar thought, as with one whose trade was war and adventure.

The Jester wore his usual fantastic habit, but late accidents had led him to adopt a good cutting falchion, instead of his wooden sword, with a large to match it; of both which weapons he had, notwithstanding his profession, shown himself a skilful master during the storming of Torquilstone. Indeed, the infirmity of Wamba's brain consisted chiefly in a kind of impatient irritability, which suffered him not long to remain quiet in any posture, or adhere to any certain train of ideas, although he was for a few minutes alert enough in performing any immediate task, or in apprehending any immediate topic. On horseback, therefore, he was perpetually swinging himself backwards and forwards, now on the horse's ears, then anon on the very rump of the animal,—now hanging both his legs on one side, and now sitting with his face to the tail, moping, mowing, and making a thousand apish gestures, until his palfrey took his freaks so much to heart, as fairly to lay him at his length on the green grass—an incident which greatly amused the Knight, but compelled his companion to ride more steadily thereafter.

At the point of their journey at which we take them up, this joyous pair were engaged in singing a virelai, as it was called, in which the clown bore a mellow burden, to the better instructed Knight of the Fetterlock. And thus run the ditty:—

Anna Marie, love, up is the sun,
Anna Marie, love, morn is begun,
Mists are dispersing, love, birds singing free,
Up in the morning, love, Anna-Marie.
Anna-Marie, love, up in the morn,
The hunter is winding blithe sounds on his horn,
The echo rings merry from rock and from tree
'Tis time to arouse thee, love, Anna-Marie.

WAMBA.

O Tybalt, love, Tybalt, awake me not yet,
Around my soft pillow while softer dreams flit,
For what are the joys that in waking we prove,
Compared with these visions, O, Tybalt, my love?
Let the birds to the rise of the matin carol shrill,
Let the hunter blow out his loud horn on the hill,
Softer sounds, softer pleasures, in slumber I prove,—
But think not I dreamt of thee, Tybalt, my love.

"A dainty song," said Wamba, when they had finished their carol, "and I swear by my bauble, a pretty moral!—I used to sing it with Gurth, once my playfellow, and now, by the grace of God and his master, no less than a freeman; and we once came by the cudgel for being so entranced by the melody, that we lay in bed two hours after sunrise, singing the ditty betwixt sleeping and waking—my bones ache at thinking of the tune ever since. Nevertheless, I have played the part of Anna-Marie, to please you, fair sir."

The Jester next struck into another carol, a sort of comic ditty, to which the Knight, catching up the tune, replied in the like manner.

KNIGHT and WAMBA.

There came three merry men from south, west, and north,
Ever more sing the roundelay;
To win the Widow of Wycombe forth,
And where was the widow might say them nay?

The first was a knight, and from Tynedale he came,
Ever more sing the roundelay;
And his fathers, God save us, were men of great fame,
And where was the widow might say them him nay?

Of his father the laird, of his uncle the squire,
He boasted in rhyme and in roundelay;
She bade him go back by his sea-coal fire,
For she was the widow would say him nay.

WAMBA.

The next that came forth, swore by blood and by nails,
Merrily sing the roundelay;
Hur's a gentleman, God wot, and hur's lineage was of Wales,
And where was the widow might say him nay?

Sir David ap Morgan ap Griffith ap Hugh
Ap Tudor ap Rhice, quoth his roundelay;
She said that one widow for so many was too few,
And she bade the Welshman wend his way.

But then next came a yeoman, a yeoman of Kent,
Jollily singing his roundelay,
He spoke to the widow of living and rent,
And where was the widow could say him nay?

BOTH.

So the knight and the squire were both left in the mire,
There for to sing their roundelay;
For a yeoman of Kent, with his yearly rent,
There never was a widow could say him nay.

"I would, Wamba," said the Knight, "that our host of the Trysting-tree, or the jolly Friar his chaplain, heard this thy ditty in praise of our bluff yeoman."

"So would not I," said Wamba—"but for the horn that hangs at your baldric."

"Ay," said the Knight,—"this is a pledge of Locksley's good-will, though I am not like to need it. Three mots on this bugle will, I am assured, bring round, at our need, a jolly band of yonder honest yeomen."

"I would say, Heaven forefend," said the Jester, "were it not that that fair gift is a pledge they would let us pass peaceably."

"Why, what meanest thou?" said the Knight; "thinkest thou that but for this pledge of fellowship they would assault us?"

"Nay, for me I say nothing," said Wamba; "for green trees have ears as well as stone walls. But canst thou construe me this, Sir Knight—When is thy wine-pitcher and thy purse better empty than full?"

"Why, never, I think," replied the Knight.

"Thou never deservest to have a full one in thy hand, for so simple an answer! Thou hadst best empty thy pitcher ere thou pass it to a Saxon, and leave thy money at home ere thou walk in the greenwood."

"You hold our friends for robbers, then?" said the Knight of the Fetterlock.

"You hear me not say so, fair sir," said Wamba; "it may relieve a man's steed to take off his mail when he hath a long journey to make; and, certes, it may do good to the rider's soul to ease him of that which is the root of evil; therefore will I give no hard names to those who do such services. Only I would wish my mail at home, and my purse in my chamber, when I meet with these good fellows, because it might save them some trouble."

"We are bound to pray for them, my friend, notwithstanding the fair character thou dost afford them."

"Pray for them with all my heart," said Wamba; 'but in the town, not in the greenwood, like the Abbot of Saint Bees, whom they caused to say mass with an old hollow oak tree for his stall."

"Say as thou list, Wamba," replied the Knight, "these yeomen did thy master Cedric yeomanly service at Torquilstone."

"Ay, truly," answered Wamba; "but that was in the fashion of their trade with Heaven."

"Their trade, Wamba! how mean you by that?" replied his companion.

"Marry, thus," said the Jester. "They make up a balanced account with Heaven, as our old cellarer used to call his ciphering, as fair as Isaac the Jew keeps with his debtors, and, like him, give out a very little, and take large credit for doing so; reckoning, doubtless, on their own behalf the seven-fold usury which the blessed text hath promised to charitable loans."

"Give me an example of your meaning, Wamba,—I know nothing of ciphers or rates of usage," answered the Knight.

"Why," said Wamba, "an your valour be so dull, you will please to learn that those honest fellows balance a good deed with one not quite so laudable; as a crown given to a begging friar with a hundred byzants taken from a fat abbot or a wench kissed in the greenwood with the relief of a poor widow."

"Which of these was the good deed, which was the felony?" interrupted the Knight.

"A good gibe! a good gibe!" said Wamba; "keeping witty company sharpeneth the apprehension. You said nothing so well, Sir Knight, I will be sworn, when you held drunken vespers with the bluff Hermit.—But to go on. The merry-men of the forest set off the building of a cottage with the burning of a carle,—the thatching of a choir against the robbing of a church,—the setting free a poor prisoner against the murder of a proud sheriff; or, to come nearer to our point, the deliverance of a Saxon franklin against the burning alive of a Norman baron. Gentle thieves they are, in short, and courteous robbers; but it is ever the luckiest to meet with them when they are at the worst."

"How so, Wamba?" said the Knight.

"Why, then they have some compunction, and use for making up matters with Heaven. But when they have struck an even balance, Heaven help them with whom they next open the account! The travellers who first met them after their good service at Torquilstone would have a woful flaying.—And yet," said Wamba, coming close up to the Knight's side, "there be companions who are far more dangerous for true-tellers to meet than yonder outlaws."

"And who may they be, for you have neither bears nor wolves, I trow?" said the Knight.

"Marry, sir, but we have Malvoisin's men-at-arms," said Wamba; and let me tell you, that, in time of civil war, a half-score of these is worth a band of wolves at any time. They are now expecting their harvest, and are reinforced with the soldiers that escaped from Torquilstone. So that, should we meet with a band of them, we are like to pay for our feats of arms.—Now, I pray you, Sir Knight, what would you do if we meet two of them?"

"Pin the villains to earth with my lance, Wamba, if they offered us any impediment."

"But what if there were four of them?"

"They should drink of the same cup," answered the Knight.

"What if six," continued Wamba, "and we as we now are, barely two—would you not remember Locksley's horn?"

"What! sound for aid," exclaimed the Knight, "against a score of such canaille as these, whom one good knight could drive before him, as the wind drives the withered leaves?"

"Nay, then," said Wamba, "I will pray you for a close sight of that same horn that hath so powerful a breath."

The Knight undid the clasp of the baldric, and indulged his fellow-traveller, who immediately hung the bugle round his own neck.

"Tru-lira-la," said he, whistling the notes; "nay, I know my gamut as well as another."

"How mean you, knave?" said the Knight; "restore me the bugle."

"Content you, Sir Knight, it is in safe keeping. When Valour and Folly travel, Folly should bear the horn, because she can blow the best."

"Nay but, rogue," said the Black Knight, 'this is

d-th thy license—Beware ye tamper not with my ience."
Urge me not with violence, Sir Knight," said the ar, keeping at a distance from the impatient chamn, "or Folly will show a clean pair of heels, and e Valour to find out his way through the wood as he may."
Nay, thou hast hit me there," said the knight;
id, sooth to say, I have little time to jangle with
. Keep the horn an thou wilt, but let us proceed
our journey."
You will not harm me, then?" said Wamba.
I tell thee no, thou knave!"
Ay, but pledge me your knightly word for it," con-
ued Wamba, as he approached with great caution.
My knightly word I pledge; only come on with foolish self."
Nay, then, Valour and Folly are once more boon
panions," said the Jester, coming up frankly to Knight's side; "but in truth, I love not such ats as that you bestowed on the burly Friar, when holiness rolled on the green like a king of the mea-
. And now that Folly wears the horn, let Valour
e himself, and shake his mane; for, if I mistake
there are company in yonder brake that are on look-out for us."
What makes thee judge so?" said the Knight.
Because I have twice or thrice noticed the glance
a morrion from amongst the green leaves. Had been honest men, they had kept the path. But der thicket is a choice chapel for the Clerks of nt Nicholas."
By my faith," said the Knight, closing his visor,
think thou hast in the right on't."
nd in good time did he close it, for three arrows
e at the same instant from the suspected spot inst his head and breast, one of which would have strated to the brain, had it not been turned aside
he steel visor. The other two were averted by gorget, and by the shield which hung around his
.
Thanks, trusty armour," said the Knight.—
amba, let us close with them," said he rode ight to the thicket. He was met by six or seven
-at-arms, who ran against him with their lances
all career. Three of the weapons struck against
, and splintered with as little effect as if they had driven against a tower of steel. The Black ght's eyes seemed to flash fire even through the ture of his visor. He raised himself in his stir-with an air of inexpressible dignity, and exclaim-
"What means this, my masters?" The men le no other reply than by drawing their swords
attacking him on every side, crying, "Die,
nt!"
Ha! Saint Edward! Ha! Saint George!" said Black Knight, striking down a man at every cation; "have we traitors here?"
is opponents, desperate as they were, bore back an arm which carried death in every blow, and med as if the terror of his single strength was ut to gain the battle against such odds, when a ht, in blue armour, who had hitherto kept him-behind the other assailants, spurred forward with lance, and taking aim, not at the rider but at the d, wounded the noble animal mortally.
That was a felon stroke!" exclaimed the Black ght, as the steed fell to the earth, bearing his rider
g with him.
nd at this moment, Wamba winded the bugle, for whole had passed so speedily, that he had not e to do so sooner. The sudden sound made the derers bear back once more, and Wamba, though mperfectly weaponed, did not hesitate to rush in assist the Black Knight to rise.
Shame on ye, false cowards!" exclaimed he in blue harness, who seemed to lead the assailants, ye fly from the empty blast of a horn blown by a
er?"
nimated by his words, they attacked the Black ght anew, whose best refuge was now to place back against an oak, and defend himself with his
rd. The felon knight, who had taken another
r, watching the moment when his formidable antagonist was most closely pressed, galloped against him in hopes to nail him with his lance against the tree, when his purpose was again intercepted by Wamba. The Jester, making up by agility the want of strength, and little noticed by the men-at-arms,
who were busied in their more important object,
hovered on the skirts of the fight, and effectually
checked the fatal career of the Blue Knight, by ham-stringing his horse with a stroke of his sword. Horse and man went to the ground; yet the situation of the Knight of the Fetterlock continued very precarious,
as he was pressed close by several men completely armed, and began to be fatigued by the violent exertions necessary to defend himself on so many points
at nearly the same moment, when a gray-goose shaft suddenly stretched on the earth one of the most formidable of his assailants, and a band of yeomen broke forth from the glade, headed by Locksley and the jovial Friar, who, taking ready and effectual part in the fray, soon disposed of the ruffians, all of whom lay on the spot dead or mortally wounded. The Black Knight thanked his deliverers with a dignity
they had not observed in his former bearing, which hitherto had seemed rather that of a blunt bold soldier, than of a person of exalted rank.
"It concerns me much," he said, "even before I express my full gratitude to my ready friends, to discover, if I may, who have been my unprovoked enemies.—Open the visor of that Blue Knight, Wamba,
who seems the chief of these villains."
The Jester instantly made up to the leader of the assassins, who, bruised by his fall, and entangled under the wounded steed, lay incapable either of flight
or resistance.
"Come, valiant sir," said Wamba, "I must be your armourer as well as your quarry.—I have dismounted
you, and now I will unhelm you."
So saying, with no very gentle hand he undid the helmet of the Blue Knight, which, rolling to a distance
on the grass, displayed to the Knight of the Fetterlock grizzled locks, and a countenance he did not expect to have seen under such circumstances.
"Waldemar Fitzurse!" he said in astonishment;
"what could urge one of thy rank and seeming worth to so foul an undertaking?"
"Richard," said the captive Knight, looking up to him, "thou knowest little of mankind, if thou know-est not to what ambition and revenge can lead every child of Adam."
"Revenge?" answered the Black Knight; "I never wronged thee.—On me thou hast naught to revenge."
"My daughter, Richard, whose alliance thou didst
scorn—was that no injury to a Norman, whose blood is noble as thine own?"
"Thy daughter?" replied the Black Knight; "a proper cause of enmity, and followed up to a bloody issue!—Stand back, my masters, I would speak to him alone.—And now, Waldemar Fitzurse, say me
the truth—confess who set thee on this traitorous deed."
"Thy father's son," answered Waldemar, "who,
in so doing, did but avenge on thee thy disobedience
to thy father."
Richard's eyes sparkled with indignation, but his better nature overcame it. He pressed his hand against his brow, and remained an instant gazing on the face of the humbled baron, in whose features pride
was contending with shame.
"Thou dost not ask thy life, Waldemar," said the King.
"He that is in the lion's clutch," answered Fitzurse,
"knows it were needless."
"Take it, then, unasked," said Richard; "the lion
preys not on prostrate carcasses.—Take thy life, but with this condition, that in three days thou shalt leave England, and go to hide thine infamy in thy Norman castle, and that thou wilt never mention the name of John of Anjou as connected with thy felony. If thou art found on English ground after the space I have allotted thee, thou diest—or if thou breathest aught
that can attaint the honour of my house, by Saint George! not the altar itself shall be a sanctuary. I will hang thee out to feed the ravens, from the very pinnacle of thine own castle.—Let this knight have a steed, Locksley, for I see your yeomen have caught those which were running loose, and let him depart unharmed."

"But that I judge I listen to a voice whose behests must not be disputed," answered the yeoman, "I would send a shaft after the skulking villain that should spare him the labour of a long journey."

"Thou hearest an English heart, Locksley," said the Black Knight, "and well dost judge thou art the more bound to obey my behest—I am Richard of England!"

At these words, pronounced in a tone of majesty suited to the high rank, and no less distinguished character of Cœur-de-Lion, the yeomen at once kneeled down before him, and at the same time tendered their allegiance, and implored pardon for their offences.

"Rise, my friends," said Richard, in a gracious tone, looking on them with a countenance in which his habitual good-humour had already conquered the blaze of hasty resentment, and whose features retained no mark of the late desperate conflict, excepting the flush arising from exertion,—"Arise," he said, "my friends!—Your misdemeanors, whether in forest or field, have been atoned by the loyal services you rendered my distressed subjects before the walls of Torquilstone, and the rescue you have this day afforded to your sovereign. Arise, my liegemen, and be good subjects in future.—And thou, brave Locksley"——

"Call me no longer Locksley, my Liege, but know me under the name, which, I fear, fame hath blown too widely not to have reached even your royal ears—I am Robin Hood of Sherwood Forest."*

"King of Outlaws, and Prince of good fellows!" said the King, "who hath not heard of a name that has been borne as far as Palestine? But be assured, brave Outlaw, that no deed done in our absence, and in the turbulent times to which it hath given rise, shall be remembered to thy disadvantage."

"True says the proverb," said Wamba, interposing his word, but with some abatement of his usual petulance,—

"'When the cat is away,
The mice will play.'"

"What, Wamba, art thou there?" said Richard; "I have been so long of hearing thy voice, I thought thou hadst taken flight."

"I take flight!" said Wamba; "when do you ever find Folly separated from Valour? There lies the trophy of my sword, that good gray gelding, whom I heartily wish upon his legs again, conditioning his master lay there houghed in his place. It is true, I gave a little ground at first, for a motley jacket does not brook lance-heads, as a steel doublet will. But if I fought not at sword's point, you will grant me that I sounded the onset."

"And to good purpose, honest Wamba," replied the King. "Thy good service shall not be forgotten."

"Confiteor! Confiteor!"—exclaimed, in a submissive tone, a voice near the King's side—"my Latin will carry me no farther—but I confess my deadly treason, and pray leave to have absolution before I am led to execution!"

Richard looked around, and beheld the jovial Friar on his knees, telling his rosary, while his quarter-staff, which had not been idle during the skirmish, lay on the grass beside him. His countenance was gathered so as he thought might best express the most profound contrition, his eyes being turned up, and the corners of his mouth drawn down, as Wamba expressed it, like the tassels at the mouth of a purse. Yet this demure affectation of extreme penitence was whimsically belied by a ludicrous meaning which lurked in his huge features, and seemed to pronounce his fear and repentance alike hypocritical.

"For what art thou cast down, mad Priest?" said Richard; "art thou afraid thy diocesan should learn how truly thou dost serve Our Lady and Saint Dunstan?—Tush, man! fear it not; Richard o betrays no secrets that pass over the flagon

"Nay, most gracious sovereign," ans Hermit, (well known to the curious in pe ries of Robin Hood, by the name of Friar is not the crosier I fear, but the sceptre.— my sacrilegious fist should ever have been the ear of the Lord's anointed!"

"Ha! ha!" said Richard, "sits the win In truth I had forgotten the buffet, though sung after it for a whole day. But if th fairly given, I will be judged by the good m if it was not as well repaid—or, if thou thin owe thee aught, and will stand forth fc counterbuff"——

"By no means," replied Friar Tuck, "I own returned, and with usury—may you ever pay your debts as fully!"

"If I could do so with cuffs," said the k creditors should have little reason to comp empty exchequer."

"And yet," said the Friar, resuming h hypocritical countenance, "I know not ance I ought to perform for that most s blow!"——

"Speak no more of it, brother," said "after having stood so many cuffs from Pa misbelievers, I were void of reason to qu the buffet of a clerk so holy as he of Cop Yet, mine honest Friar, I think it would b for the church and thyself, that I should license to unfrock thee, and retain thee as of our guard, serving in care of our pers merly in attendance upon the altar of Saint

"My Liege," said the Friar, "I humbly pardon; and you would readily grant my e you but know how the sin of laziness has Saint Dunstan - may he be gracious to u quiet in his niche, though I should forget i in killing a fat buck—I stay out of my cell a night, doing I wot not what—Saint Dun complains—a quiet master he is, and a p ever was made of wood.—But to be a attendance on my sovereign the King—th great, doubtless—yet, if I were but to ste comfort a widow in one corner, or to kil another, it would be, 'where is the dog Pri one. 'Who has seen the accursed Tuck ther. 'The unfrocked villain destroys mo than half the country besides,' says one kee is hunting after every shy doe in the count a second.—In fine, good my Liege, I pray y me as you found me; or, if in aught you de tend your benevolence to me, that I may ered as the poor Clerk of Saint Dunsta Copmanhurst, to whom any small donati most thankfully acceptable."

"I understand thee," said the King, "an Clerk shall have a grant of vert and venis woods of Warneliffe. Mark, however, I w sign thee three bucks every season; but if t prove an apology for thy slaying thirty, Christian knight nor true king."

"Your Grace may be well assured," said "that, with the grace of Saint Dunstan, I the way of multiplying your most bounteou

"I nothing doubt it, good brother," said "and as venison is but dry food, our cell have orders to deliver to thee a butt of sack of Malvoisie, and three hogsheads of ale o strike, yearly—If that will not quench thy th must come to court, and become acquainted butler."

"But for Saint Dunstan?" said the Friar

"A cope, a stole, and an altar-cloth shalt have," continued the King, crossing himse we may not turn our game into earnest lest (ish us for thinking more on our follies tha honour and worship."

"I will answer for my patron," said the P ously.

"Answer for thyself, Friar," said King something sternly; but immediately stretc his hand to the Hermit, the latter, somewhat

* From the ballads of Robin Hood, we learn that this celebrated outlaw, when in disguise, sometimes assumed the name of Locksley, from a village where he was born, but where situated we are not distinctly told nt his knee, and saluted it. "Thou dost less hour to my extended palm than to my clenched fist," id the Monarch; "thou didst only kneel to one, d to the other didst prostrate thyself."

But the Friar, afraid perhaps of again giving offence continuing the conversation in too jocose a style—false step to be particularly guarded against by those to converse with monarchs—bowed profoundly, and l into the rear.

At the same time, two additional personages apared on the scene.

CHAPTER XLI.

All hail to the lordlings of high degree,
Who live not more lordly, though greater than we!
Our pastimes to see,
Under every green tree,
In all the gay woodland, right welcome ye be.
MACDONALD.

HE new comers were Wilfred of Ivanhoe, on the or of Botolph's palfrey, and Gurth, who attended , on the Knight's own war-horse. The astonishnt of Ivanhoe was beyond bounds, when he saw master besprinkled with blood, and six or seven d bodies lying around in the little glade in which battle had taken place. Nor was he less surprised ee Richard surrounded by so many silvan attends, the outlaws, as they seemed to be, of the forest, a perilous retinue therefore for a prince. He itated whether to address the King as the Black ight-errant, or in what other manner to demean mself towards him. Richard saw his embarrassnt.

'Fear not, Wilfred," he said, "to address Richard ntagenet as himself, since thou seest him in the mpany of true English hearts, although it may be y have been urged a few steps aside by warm glish blood."

Sir Wilfred of Ivanhoe," said the gallant Outlaw, oping forward, "my assurances can add nothing hose of our sovereign; yet, let me say somewhat udly, that of men who have suffered much, he hath truer subjects than those who now stand around ."

'I cannot doubt it, brave man," said Wilfred, ince thou art of the number—But what mean these rks of death and danger? these slain men, and the ody armour of my Prince?"

'Treason hath been with us, Ivanhoe," said the g; "but, thanks to these brave men, treason hath t its meed—But, now I bethink me, thou too art aitor," said Richard, smiling; "a most disobedient itor; for were not our orders positive, that thou uldst repose thyself at Saint Botolph's until thy und was healed?"

'It is healed," said Ivanhoe; "it is not of more sequence than the scratch of a bodkin. But why, why, noble Prince, will you thus vex the hearts of r faithful servants, and expose your life by lonely meys and rash adventures, as if it were of no more ue than that of a mere knight-errant, who has no rest on earth but what lance and sword may proe him?"

'And Richard Plantagenet," said the King, "does no more fame than his good lance and sword y acquire him—and Richard Plantagenet is prouder chieving an adventure, with only his good sword, his good arm to speed, than if he led to battle a t of a hundred thousand armed men."

But your kingdom, my Liege," said Ivanhoe, ur kingdom is threatened with dissolution and l war—your subjects menaced with every species vil, if deprived of their sovereign in some of those gers which it is your daily pleasure to incur, and n which you have but this moment narrowly aped."

Ho! ho! my kingdom and my subjects?" anred Richard, impatiently; "I tell thee, Sir Wil, the best of them are most willing to repay my es in kind—For example, my very faithful ser, Wilfred of Ivanhoe, will not obey my positive mands, and yet reads his king a homily, because oes not walk exactly by his advice. Which of us most reason to upbraid the other?—Yet, forgive me, my faithful Wilfred. The time I have spent, and am yet to spend in concealment, is, as I explained to thee at Saint Botolph's, necessary to give my friends and faithful nobles time to assemble their forces, that when Richard's return is announced, he should be at the head of such a force as enemies shall tremble to face, and thus subdue the meditated treason, without even unsheathing a sword. Estoteville and Bohun will not be strong enough to move forward to York for twenty-four hours. I must have news of Salisbury from the south; and of Beauchamp, in Warwickshire; and of Multon and Percy in the north. The Chancellor must make sure of London. Too sudden an appearance would subject me to dangers, other than my lance and sword, though backed by the bow of bold Robin, or the quarter-staff of Friar Tuck, and the horn of the sage Wamba, may be able to rescue me from."

Wilfred bowed in submission, well knowing how vain it was to contend with the wild spirit of chivalry which so often impelled his master upon dangers which he might easily have avoided, or rather, which it was unpardonable in him to have sought out. The young knight sighed, therefore, and held his peace; while Richard, rejoiced at having silenced his counsellor, though his heart acknowledged the justice of the charge he had brought against him, went on in conversation with Robin Hood.—"King of Outlaws," he said, "have you no refreshment to offer to your brother sovereign? for these dead knaves have found me both in exercise and appetite."

"In troth," replied the Outlaw, "for I scorn to lie to your Grace, our larder is chiefly supplied with"—— He stopped, and was somewhat embarrassed.

"With venison, I suppose?" said Richard, gayly; "better food at need there can be none—and truly, if a king will not remain at home and slay his own game, methinks he should not brawl too loud if he finds it killed to his hand."

"If your Grace, then," said Robin, "will again honour with your presence one of Robin Hood's places of rendezvous, the venison shall not be lacking; and a stoup of ale, and it may be a cup of reasonably good wine, to relish it withal."

The Outlaw accordingly led the way, followed by the buxom Monarch, more happy, probably, in this chance meeting with Robin Hood and his foresters, than he would have been in again assuming his royal state, and presiding over a splendid circle of peers and nobles. Novelty in society and adventure were the zest of life to Richard Cœur-de-Lion, and it had its highest relish when enhanced by dangers encountered and surmounted. In the lion-hearted King, the brilliant, but useless character, of a knight of romance, was in a great measure realized and revived; and the personal glory which he acquired by his own deeds of arms, was far more dear to his excited imagination, than that which a course of policy and wisdom would have spread around his government. Accordingly, his reign was like the course of a brilliant and rapid meteor, which shoots along the face of heaven, shedding around an unnecessary and portentous light, which is instantly swallowed up by universal darkness; his feats of chivalry furnishing themes for bards and minstrels, but affording none of those solid benefits to his country on which history loves to pause, and hold up as an example to posterity. But in his present company Richard showed to the greatest imaginable advantage. He was gay, good-humoured, and fond of manhood in every rank of life.

Beneath a huge oak-tree the silvan repast was hastily prepared for the King of England, surrounded by men outlaws to his government, but who now formed his court and his guard. As the flagon went round, the rough foresters soon lost their awe for the presence of Majesty. The song and the jest were exchanged—the stories of former deeds were told with advantage; and at length, and while boasting of their successful infraction of the laws, no one recollected they were speaking in presence of their natural guardian. The merry King, nothing heeding his dignity any more than his company, laughed, quaffed, and jested among the jolly band. The name-

ral and rough sense of Robin Hood led him to be desirous that the scene should be closed ere any thing should occur to disturb its harmony, the more especially that he observed Ivanhoe's brow clouded with anxiety. "We are honoured," he said to Ivanhoe, apart, "by the presence of our gallant Sovereign; yet I would not that he dallied with time, which the circumstances of his kingdom may render precious."

"It is well and wisely spoken, brave Robin Hood," said Wilfred, apart; "and know, moreover, that they who jest with Majesty even in its gayest mood, are but toying with the lion's whelps, which, on slight provocation, uses both fangs and claws."

"You have touched me very cause of my fear," said the Outlaw; "my men are rough by practice and nature, the King is hasty as well as good-humoured; nor know I how soon cause of offence may arise, or how warmly it may be received: it is time this revel were broken off."

"It must be by your management then, gallant yeoman," said Ivanhoe; "for each hint I have essayed to give him serves only to induce him to prolong it."

"Must I so soon risk the pardon and favour of my Sovereign?" said Robin Hood, pausing for an instant; "but by Saint Christopher, it shall be so. I were undeserving his grace did I not peril it for his good.—Here, Scathlock, get thee behind yonder thicket, and wind me a Norman blast on thy bugle, and without an instant's delay, on peril of your life."

Scathlock obeyed his captain, and in less than five minutes the revellers were startled by the sound of his horn.

"It is the bugle of Malvoisin," said the Miller, starting to his feet, and seizing his bow. The Friar dropped his flagon, and grasped his quarter-staff. Wamba stopt short in the midst of a jest, and betook himself to sword and target. All the others stood to their weapons.

Men of their precarious course of life change readily from the banquet to the battle; and, to Richard, the exchange seemed but a succession of pleasure. He called for his helmet and the most cumbrous parts of his armour, which he had laid aside; and while Gurth was putting them on, he laid his strict injunctions on Wilfred, under pain of his highest displeasure, not to engage in the skirmish which he supposed was approaching.

"Thou hast fought for me a hundred times, Wilfred,—and I have seen it. Thou shalt this day look on, and see how Richard will fight for his friend and liegeman."

In the mean time, Robin Hood had sent off several of his followers in different directions, as if to reconnoitre the enemy; and when he saw the company effectually broken up, he approached Richard, who was now completely armed, and, kneeling down on one knee, craved pardon of his Sovereign.

"For what, good yeoman?" said Richard, somewhat impatiently. "Have we not already granted thee a full pardon for all transgressions? Thinkest thou our word is a feather, to be blown backward and forward between us? Thou canst not have had time to commit any new offence since that time?"

"Ay, but I have though," answered the yeoman, "if it be an offence to deceive my prince for his own advantage. The bugle you have heard was none of Malvoisin's, but blown by my direction, to break off the banquet, lest it trenched upon hours of dearer import than to be thus dallied with."

He then rose from his knee, folded his arms on his bosom, and in a manner rather respectful than submissive, awaited the answer of the King,—like one who is conscious he may have given offence, yet is confident in the rectitude of his motive. The blood rushed in anger to the countenance of Richard; but it was the first transient emotion, and his sense of justice instantly subdued it.

"The King of Sherwood," he said, "grudges his venison and his wine-flask to the King of England? It is well, bold Robin!—but when you come to see me in merry London, I trust to be a less niggard host. Thou art right, however good fellow. Let us therefore to horse and away—Wilfred has been impatient this hour. Tell me, bold Robin, hast thou never a friend in thy band, who, not content with advising, will needs direct thy motions, and look miserable when thou dost presume to act for thyself?"

"Such a one," said Robin, "is my Lieutenant, Little John, who is even now absent on an expedition as far as the borders of Scotland; and I will own to your Majesty, that I am sometimes displeased by the freedom of his counsels—but, when I think twice, I cannot be long angry with one who can have no motive for his anxiety save zeal for his master's service."

"Thou art right, good yeoman," answered Richard; "and if I had Ivanhoe on the one hand, to give grave advice, and recommend it by the sad gravity of his brow, and thee, on the other, to trick me into what thou think'st my own good, I should have as little the freedom of mine own will as any king in Christendom or Heathendesse.—But come, sirs, let us merrily on to Coningsburgh, and think no more on't."

Robin Hood assured them that he had detached a party in the direction of the road they were to pass, who would not fail to discover and appraise them of any secret ambuscade; and that he had little doubt they would find the ways secure, or, if otherwise, would receive such timely notice of the danger as would enable them to fall back on a strong troop of archers, with which he himself proposed to follow on the same route.

The wise and attentive precautions adopted for his safety touched Richard's feelings, and removed any slight grudge which he might retain on account of the deception the Outlaw Captain had practised upon him. He once more extended his hand to Robin Hood, assured him of his full pardon and future favour, as well as his firm resolution to restrain the tyrannical exercise of the forest rights and other oppressive laws, by which so many English yeomen were driven into a state of rebellion. Yet Richard's good intentions towards the bold Outlaw were frustrated by the King's untimely death; and the Charter of the Forest was extorted from the unwilling hands of King John when he succeeded to his heroic brother. As for the rest of Robin Hood's career, as well as the tale of his treacherous death, they are to be found in those black-letter garlands, once sold at the low and easy rate of one halfpenny,

"Now cheaply purchased at their weight in gold."

The Outlaw's opinion proved true; and the King, attended by Ivanhoe, Gurth, and Wamba, arrived, without any interruption, within view of the Castle of Coningsburgh, while the sun was yet in the horizon.

There are few more beautiful or striking scenes in England, than are presented by the vicinity of this ancient Saxon fortress. The soft and gentle river Don sweeps through an amphitheatre, in which cultivation is richly blended with woodland, and on a mount, ascending from the river, well defended by walls and ditches, rises this ancient edifice, which, as its Saxon name implies, was, previous to the Conquest, a royal residence of the kings of England. The outer walls have probably been added by the Normans, but the inner keep bears token of very great antiquity. It is situated on a mount at one angle of the inner court, and forms a complete circle of perhaps twenty-five feet in diameter. The wall is of immense thickness, and is propped or defended by six huge external buttresses which project from the circle, and rise up against the sides of the tower as if to strengthen or to support it. These massive buttresses are solid when they arise from the foundation, and a good way higher up; but are hollowed out towards the top, and terminate in a sort of turrets communicating with the interior of the keep itself. The distant appearance of this huge building, with these singular accompaniments, is as interesting to the lovers of the picturesque, as the interior of the castle is to the eager antiquary, whose imagination it carries back to the days of the heptarchy. A barrow, in the vicinity of the castle, is pointed out as the tomb of the memorable Hengist; and various monuments, of great uity and curiosity, are shown in the neighbouring

chyard.*

h as Cœur-de-Lion and his retinue approached rude yet stately building, it was not, as at present, unded by external fortifications. The Saxon itect had exhausted his art in rendering the main defensible, and there was no other circumvallathan a rude barrier of palisades.

huge black banner, which floated from the top e tower, announced that the obsequies of the late owner were still in the act of being solemnized. It bore no emblem of the deceased's birth or quality, for armorial bearings were then a novelty among the Norman chivalry themselves, and were totally unknown to the Saxons. But above the gate was another banner, on which the figure of a white horse, rudely painted, indicated the nation and rank of the deceased, by the well-known symbol of Hengist and his Saxon warriors.

All around the castle was a scene of busy com-

When I last saw this interesting ruin of ancient days, one very few remaining examples of Saxon fortification, I strongly impressed with the desire of tracing out a sort of y on the subject, which, from some recent acquaintance the architecture of the ancient Scandinavians, seemed to peculiarly interesting. I was, however, obliged by circumstances to proceed on my journey, without leisure to take more a transient view of Coningsburgh. Yet the idea dwells so gly in my mind, that I feel considerably tempted to write or two in detail in at least the outline of my hypothesis, g better antiquaries to correct or refute conclusions which rhaps too hastily drawn.

se who have visited the Zetland Islands, are familiar with scription of castles called by the inhabitants Burghs; and Highlanders—for they are also to be found both in the ern Isles and on the mainland—Duns. Pennant has en- f a view of the famous Dun Dornadilla in Glenelg; and are many others, all of them built after a peculiar mode of ecture, which argues a people in the most primitive state iety. The most perfect specimen is that upon the island ousa, near to the mainland of Zetland, which is probably same state as when inhabited.

a single round tower, the wall curving in slightly, and urning outward again in the form of a dice box, so that efenders on the top might the better protect the base. It med of rough stones, selected with care, and laid in courses cles, with much compactness, but without cement of any The tower has never, to appearance, had roofing of any a fire was made in the centre of the space which it ens, and originally the building was probably little more than ll drawn as a sort of screen around the great council fire of ribe. But, although the means or ingenuity of the builders not extend so far as to provide a roof, they supplied the by constructing apartments in the interior of the walls of ower itself. The circumvallation formed a double enclothe inner side of which was, in fact, two feet or three feet from the other, and connected by a concentric range of flat stones, thus forming a series of concentric rings or s of various heights, rising to the top of the tower. Each se stories or galleries has four windows, facing directly to oints of the compass, and rising of course regularly above other. These four perpendicular ranges of windows ad d air, and, the fire being kindled, heat, or smoke at least, ch of the galleries. The access from gallery to gallery is ly primitive. A path, on the principle of an inclined plane, round and round the building like a screw, and gives ac- o the different stories, intersecting each of them in its turn, thus gradually rising to the top of the wall of the tower. e outside there are no windows; and I may add, that an sure of a square or sometimes a round form gave the inants of the Burgh an opportunity to secure any sheep or s which they might possess.

ch is the general architecture of that very early period the Northmen swept the seas, and brought to their rude es, such as I have described them, the plunder of polished ns. In Zetland there are several scores of these Burghs, pying in every case, capes, headlands, islets, and similar s of advantage singularly well chosen. I remember the ins of one upon an island in a small lake near Lerwick, h at high tide communicates with the sea, the access to h is very ingenious, by means of a causeway or dike, about or four inches under the surface of the water. This causemakes a sharp angle in its approach to the Burgh. The bitants, doubtless, were well acquainted with this, but ngers, who might approach in a hostile manner, and were rant of the curve of the causeway, would probably plunge the lake, which is six or seven feet in depth at the least. must have been the device of some Vauban or Cohorn of e early times.

e style of these buildings evinces that the architect posd neither the art of using lime or cement of any kind, nor skill to throw an arch, construct a roof, or erect a stair; and with all this ignorance, showed great ingenuity in selecting situation of Burghs, and regulating the access to them, as as neatness and regularity in the erection, since the build- themselves show a style of advance in the arts scarcely sistent with the ignorance of so many of the principal ches of architectural knowledge.

ave always thought, that one of the most curious and valuaobjects of antiquaries has been to trace the progress of iety, by the efforts made in early ages to improve the rudeof their first expedients, until they either approach excel- , or, as is most frequently the case, are supplied by new and fundamental discoveries, which supersede both the earlier and r system, and the improvements which have been ingrafted n it. For example, if we conceive the recent discovery of to be so much improved and adapted to domestic use, as to ersede all other modes of producing domestic light; we can ady suppose, some centuries afterwards, the heads of a ole Society of Antiquaries half turned by the discovery of a of patent snuffers, and by the learned theories which would brought forward to account for the form and purpose of so ular an implement.

Following some such principle, I am inclined to regard the singular Castle of Coningsburgh—I mean the Saxon part of it—as a step in advance from the rude architecture, if it deserve the name, which must have been common to the Saxons as to other Northmen. The builders had attained the art of using cement, and of roofing a building,—great improvements on the original burgh. But in the round keep, a shape only seen in the most ancient castles—the chambers excavated in the thickness of the walls and buttresses—the difficulty by which access is gained from one story to those above it, Coningsburgh still retains the simplicity of its origin, and shows by what slow degrees man proceeded from occupying such rude and inconvenient lodgings, as were afforded by the galleries of the Castle of Mousa, to the more splendid accommodations of the Norman castles, with all their stern and Gothic graces.

I am ignorant if these remarks are new, or if they will be confirmed by closer examination; but I think, that, on a hasty observation, Coningsburgh offers means of curious study to those who may wish to trace the history of architecture back to the times preceding the Norman Conquest.

It would be highly desirable that a cork model should be taken of the Castle of Mousa, as it cannot be well understood by a plan.

The Castle of Coningsburgh is thus described:—

"The castle is large, the outer walls standing on a pleasant ascent from the river, but much overtopt by a high hill, on which the town stands, situated at the head of a rich and magnificent vale, formed by an amphitheatre of woody hills, in which flows the gentle Don. Near the castle is a barrow, said to be Hengist's tomb. The entrance is flanked to the left by a round tower, with a sloping base, and there are several similar in the outer wall; the entrance has piers of a gate, and on the east side the ditch and bank are double and very steep. On the top of the churchyard wall is a tombstone, on which are cut in high relief, two ravens, or such like birds. On the south side of the churchyard lies an ancient stone, ridged like a coffin, on which is carved a man on horseback; and another man with a shield encountering a vast winged serpent, and a man bearing a shield behind him. It was probably one of the rude crosses not uncommon in churchyards in this county. The name of Coningsburgh, by which this castle goes in the old editions of the Britannia, would lead one to suppose it the residence of the Saxon kings. It afterwards belonged to King Harold. The Conqueror bestowed it on William de Warren, with all its privileges and jurisdiction, which are said to have extended over twenty-eight towns. At the corner of the area, which is of an irregular form, stands the great tower, or keep, placed on a small hill of its own dimensions, on which lie six vast projecting buttresses, ascending in a steep direction to prop and support the building, and continued upwards up the side as turrets. The tower within forms a complete circle, twenty-one feet in diameter, the walls fourteen feet thick. The ascent into the tower is by an exceeding deep flight of steep steps, four feet and a half wide, on the south side leading to a low doorway, over which is a circular arch crossed by a great transom stone. Within this door is the staircase which ascends straight through the thickness of the wall, not communicating with the room on the first floor, in whose centre is the opening to the dungeon. Neither of these lower rooms is lighted except from a hole in the floor of the third story; the room in which, as well as in that above it, is finished with compact smooth stonework, both having chimney pieces, with an arch resting on triple clustered pillars. In the third story, or guard-chamber, is a small recess with a loophole, probably a bedchamber, and in that floor above a niche for a saint or holy-water pot. Mr. King imagines this a Saxon castle of the first ages of the Heptarchy. Mr. Watson thus describes it. From the first floor to the second story, (third from the ground,) is a way by a stair in the wall five feet wide. The next staircase is approached by a ladder, and ends at the fourth story from the ground. Two yards from the door, at the head of this stair, is an opening nearly east, accessible by treading on the ledge of the wall, which diminishes eight inches each story; and this last opening leads into a room or chapel ten feet by twelve, and fifteen or sixteen high, arched with freestone, and supported by small circular columns of the same, the capitals and arches Saxon. It has an east window, and on each side in the wall, about four feet from the ground, a stone basin, with a hole and iron pipe to convey the water into or through the wall. This chapel is one of the buttresses, but no sign of it without, for even the window, though large within, is only a long narrow loop-hole, scarcely to be seen without. On the left side of this chapel is a small oratory, eight by six in the thickness of the wall, with a niche in the wall, and enlightened by a like loop-hole. The fourth stair from the ground, ten feet west from the chapel door, leads to the top of the tower through the thickness of the wall, which at top is but three yards. Each story is about fifteen feet high, so that the tower will be seventy-five feet from the ground. The inside forms a circle, whose diameter may be about twelve feet. The well at the bottom of the dungeon is piled with stones."—Gough's Edition of Camden's Britannia. Second Edition, vol. iii. p. 267.

motion; for such funeral banquets were times of general and profuse hospitality, which not only every one who could claim the most distant connexion with the deceased, but all passengers whatsoever, were invited to partake. The wealth and consequence of the deceased Athelstane, occasioned this custom to be observed in the fullest extent.

Numerous parties, therefore, were seen ascending and descending the hill on which the castle was situated; and when the King and his attendants entered the open and unguarded gates of the external barrier, the space within presented a scene not easily reconciled with the cause of the assemblage. In one place cooks were toiling to roast huge oxen, and fat sheep; in another, hogsheads of ale were set abroach, to be drained at the freedom of all comers. Groups of every description were to be seen devouring the food and swallowing the liquor thus abandoned to their discretion. The naked Saxon serf was drowning the sense of his half-year's hunger and thirst, in one day of gluttony and drunkenness—the more pampered burgess and guild-brother was eating his morsel with gust, or curiously criticising the quantity of the malt and the skill of the brewer. Some few of the poorer Norman gentry might also be seen, distinguished by their shaven chins and short cloaks, and not less so by their keeping together, and looking with great scorn on the whole solemnity, even while condescending to avail themselves of the good cheer which was so liberally supplied.

Mendicants were of course assembled by the score, together with strolling soldiers returned from Palestine, (according to their own account at least,) pedlars were displaying their wares, travelling mechanics were inquiring after employment, and wandering palmers, hedge-priests, Saxon minstrels, and Welsh bards, were muttering prayers, and extracting mistuned dirges from their harps, crowds, and rotes.* One sent forth the praises of Athelstane in a doleful panegyric; another, in a Saxon genealogical poem, rehearsed the uncouth and harsh names of his noble ancestry. Jesters and jugglers were not awanting, nor was the occasion of the assembly supposed to render the exercise of their profession indecorous or improper. Indeed the ideas of the Saxons on these occasions were as natural as they were rude. If sorrow was thirsty, there was drink—if hungry, there was food—if it sunk down upon and saddened the heart, here were the means supplied of mirth, or at least of amusement. Nor did the assistants scorn to avail themselves of those means of consolation, although, every now and then, as if suddenly recollecting the cause which had brought them together, the men groaned in unison, while the females, of whom many were present, raised up their voices and shrieked for very wo.

Such was the scene in the castle-yard at Coningsburgh when it was entered by Richard and his followers. The seneschal or steward deigned not to take notice of the groups of inferior guests who were perpetually entering and withdrawing, unless so far as was necessary to preserve order; nevertheless he was struck by the good mien of the Monarch and Ivanhoe, more especially as he imagined the features of the latter were familiar to him. Besides, the approach of two knights, for such their dress bespoke them, was a rare event at a Saxon solemnity, and could not but be regarded as a sort of honour to the deceased and his family. And in his sable dress, and holding in his hand his white wand of office, this important personage made way through the miscellaneous assemblage of guests, thus conducting Richard and Ivanhoe to the entrance of the tower. Gurth and Wamba speedily found acquaintances in the court-yard, nor presumed to intrude themselves any farther until their presence should be required.

* The crowth, or crowd, was a species of violin. The rote a sort of guitar, or rather hurdy-gurdy, the strings of which were managed by a wheel, from which the instrument took its name.

CHAPTER XLII.

I found them winding of Marcellus' corpse.
And there was such a solemn melody,
'Twixt doleful sobs, tears, and sad elegies,—
Such as old grandames, watching by the dead,
Are wont to outwear the night with.

Old Play.

The mode of entering the great tower of Coningsburgh Castle is very peculiar, and partakes of the rude simplicity of the early times in which it was erected. A flight of steps so deep and narrow as to be almost precipitous, leads up to a low portal on the south side of the tower, by which the adventurous antiquary may still, or at least could a few years since, gain access to a small stair within the thickness of the main wall of the tower, which leads up to the third story of the building, the two lower being dungeons or vaults, which neither receive air nor light, save by a square hole in the third story, with which they seem to have communicated by a ladder. The access to the upper apartments in the tower, which consist in all of four stories, is given by stairs which are carried up through the external buttresses.

By this difficult and complicated entrance, the good King Richard, followed by his faithful Ivanhoe, was ushered into the round apartment which occupies the whole of the third story from the ground. Wilfred by the difficulties of the ascent, gained time to muffle his face in his mantle, as it had been held expedient that he should not present himself to his father until the King should give him the signal.

There were assembled in this apartment, around a large oaken table, about a dozen of the most distinguished representatives of the Saxon families in the adjacent counties. These were all old, or, at least, elderly men; for the younger race, to the great displeasure of the seniors, had, like Ivanhoe, broken down many of the barriers which separated a century the Norman victors from the vanquished Saxons. The downcast and sorrowful looks of these venerable men, their silence and their mournful posture, formed a strong contrast to the levity of the revellers on the outside of the castle. Their gray locks and long full beards, together with their antique tunics and loose black mantles, suited well with the singular and rude apartment in which they were seated, and gave the appearance of a band of ancient worshippers of Woden, recalled to life to mourn over the decay of their national glory.

Cedric, seated in equal rank among his countrymen, seemed yet, by common consent, to act as chief of the assembly. Upon the entrance of Richard (only known to him as the valorous Knight of the Fetterlock) he arose gravely, and gave him welcome by the ordinary salutation, Wass hael, raising at the same time a goblet to his head. The King, no stranger to the customs of his English subjects, returned the greeting with the appropriate words, Drinc Hael, and partook of a cup which was handed to him by the sewer. The same courtesy was offered to Ivanhoe, who pledged his father in silence, supplying the usual speech by an inclination of his head, lest his voice should have been recognised.

When this introductory ceremony was performed, Cedric arose, and, extending his hand to Richard, conducted him into a small and very rude chapel, which was excavated, as it were, out of one of the external buttresses. As there was no opening, saving a very narrow loop-hole, the place would have been nearly quite dark but for two flambeaux or torches, which showed, by a red and smoky light, the arched roof and naked walls, the rude altar of stone, and the crucifix of the same material.

Before this altar was placed a bier, and on each side of this bier kneeled three priests, who told their beads, and muttered their prayers, with the greatest signs of external devotion. For this service a splendid soul-scat was paid to the convent of Saint Edmund's by the mother of the deceased; and, that it might be fully deserved, the whole brethren, saving the lame Sacristan, had transferred themselves to Coningsburgh, where, while six of their number were

.v on guard in the performance of divine
he bier of Athelstane, the others failed not to r share of the refreshments and amusements vent on at the castle. In maintaining this tch and ward, the good monks were particueful not to interrupt their hymns for an inst Zernebock, the ancient Saxon Apollyon,
ay his clutches on the departed Athelstane.
e they less careful to prevent any unhallowed
rom touching the pall, which, having been l at the funeral of Saint Edmund, was liable secrated, if handled by the profane. If, in se attentions could be of any use to the de-ie had some right to expect them at the
the brethren of Saint Edmund's, since, be-undred marcuses of gold paid down as the om, the mother of Athelstane had announced
tion of endowing that foundation with the rt of the lands of the deceased, in order to perpetual prayers for his soul, and that of ted husband.

d and Wilfred followed the Saxon Cedric
apartment of death, where, as their guide
vith solemn air to the untimely bier of Atheley followed his example in devoutly crossing es, and muttering a brief prayer for the weal parted soul.

ct of pious charity performed, Cedric again
l them to follow him, gliding over the stone
h a noiseless tread; and, after ascending a s, opened with great caution the door of a story, which adjoined to the chapel. It was ht feet square, hollowed, like the chapel itself,
ie thickness of the wall; and the loop-hole,
lightened it, being to the west, and widening ably as it sloped inward, a beam of the setfound its way into its dark recess, and female of a dignified mien, and whose coun-retained the marked remains of majestic
Her long mourning robes, and her flowing
f black cypress, enhanced the whiteness of
, and the beauty of her light-coloured and tresses, which time had neither thinned nor with silver. Her countenance expressed the orrow that is consistent with resignation. On table before her stood a crucifix of ivory,
hich was laid a missal, having its pages
minated, and its boards adorned with clasps nd bosses of the same precious metal.

e Edith," said Cedric, after having stood a silent, as if to give Richard and Wilfred time
pon the lady of the mansion, "these are wor-gers, come to take part in thy sorrows. And special, is the valiant Knight who fought so or the deliverance of him for whom we this rn."

ravery has my thanks," returned the lady;
gh it be the will of Heaven that it should be l in vain. I thank, too, his courtesy, and his companion, which hath brought them behold the widow of Adeling, the mother of e, in her deep hour of sorrow and lamenta-
your care, kind kinsman, I intrust them, that they will want no hospitality which
l walls can yet afford."

ests bowed deeply to the mourning parent,
drew with their hospitable guide.

r winding stair conducted them to an apart-
the same size with that which they had first occupying indeed the story immediately
rom this room, ere yet the door was opened,
l a low and melancholy strain of vocal mu-en they entered, they found themselves in nce of about twenty matrons and maidens uished Saxon lineage. Four maidens, Roding the choir, raised a hymn for the soul of sed, of which we have only been able to deo or three stanzas:—

Dust unto dust,
To this all must;
The tenant hath resign'd
The faded form
To waste and worm—
Corruption claims her kind.

Through paths unknown
Thy soul hath flown,
To seek the realms of woe
Where fiery pain
Shall purge the stain
Of actions done below.

In that sad place,
By Mary's grace,
Brief may thy dwelling be!
Till prayers and alms,
And holy psalms,
Shall set the captive free.

While this dirge was sung, in a low and melancholy tone, by the female choristers, the others were divided into two bands, of which one was engaged in bedecking, with such embroidery as their skill and taste could compass, a large silken pall, destined to cover the bier of Athelstane, while the others busied themselves in selecting, from baskets of flowers placed before them, garlands, which they intended for the same mournful purpose. The behaviour of the maidens was decorous, if not marked with deep affliction; but now and then a whisper or a smile called forth the rebuke of the severer matrons, and here and there might be seen a damsel more interested in endeavouring to find out how her mourning-robe became her, than in the dismal ceremony for which they were preparing. Neither was this propensity (if we must needs confess the truth) at all diminished by the appearance of two strange knights, which occasioned some looking up, peeping, and whispering. Rowena alone, too proud to be vain, paid her greeting to her deliverer with a graceful courtesy. Her demeanour was serious, but not dejected; and it may be doubted whether thoughts of Ivanhoe, and of the uncertainty of his fate, did not claim as great a share in her gravity as the death of her kinsman.

To Cedric, however, who, as we have observed, was not remarkably clear-sighted on such occasions, the sorrow of his ward seemed so much deeper than any of the other maidens, that he deemed it proper to whisper the explanation—"She was the affianced bride of the noble Athelstane."—It may be doubted whether this communication went a far way to increase Wilfred's disposition to sympathize with the mourners of Coningsburgh.

Having thus formally introduced the guests to the different chambers in which the obsequies of Athelstane were celebrated under different forms, Cedric conducted them into a small room, destined, as he informed them, for the exclusive accommodation of honourable guests, whose more slight connexion with the deceased might render them unwilling to join those who were immediately affected by the unhappy event. He assured them of every accommodation, and was about to withdraw when the Black Knight took his hand.

"I crave to remind you noble Thane," he said, "that when we last parted, you promised, for the service I had the fortune to render you, to grant me a boon."

"It is granted ere named, noble Knight," said Cedric; "yet, at this sad moment"——

"Of that also," said the King, "I have bethought me—but my time is brief—neither does it seem to me unfit, that, when closing the grave on the noble Athelstane, we should deposit therein certain prejudices and hasty opinions."

"Sir Knight of the Fetterlock," said Cedric, colouring, and interrupting the King in his turn, "I trust your boon regards yourself and no other; for in that which concerns the honour of my house, it is scarce fitting that a stranger should mingle."

"Nor do I wish to mingle," said the King, mildly, "unless in so far as you will admit me to have an interest. As yet you have known me but as the Black Knight of the Fetterlock—Know me now as Richard Plantagenet."

"Richard of Anjou!" exclaimed Cedric, stepping backward with the utmost astonishment.

"No, noble Cedric—Richard of England!—whose deepest interest—whose deepest wish, is to see her sons united with each other.—And, how now, worthy Thane! hast thou no knee for thy prince?"

"To Norman blood," said Cedric, "it hath never bended."

"Reserve thine homage then" said the Monarch.

"until I shall prove my right to it by my equal protection of Normans and English."

"Prince," answerd Cedric, "I have ever done justice to thy bravery and thy worth—Nor am I ignorant of thy claim to the crown through thy descent from Matilda, niece to Edgar Atheling, and daughter to Malcolm of Scotland. But Matilda, though of the royal Saxon blood, was not the heir to the monarchy."

"I will not dispute my title with thee, noble Thane," said Richard, calmly; "but I will bid thee look around thee, and see where thou wilt find another to be put into the scale against it."

"And hast thou wandered hither, Prince, to tell me so?" said Cedric—"To upbraid me with the ruin of my race, ere the grave has closed o'er the last scion of Saxon royalty?"—His countenance darkened as he spoke.—"It was boldly—it was rashly done!"

"Not so, by the holy rood!" replied the King; "it was done in the frank confidence which one brave man may repose in another, without a shadow of danger."

"Thou sayest well, Sir King—for King I own thou art, and wilt be, despite of my feeble opposition.—I dare not take the only mode to prevent it, though thou hast placed the strong temptation within my reach!"

"And now to my boon," said the King, "which I ask not with one jot the less confidence, that thou hast refused to acknowledge my lawful sovereignty. I require of thee, as a man of thy word, on pain of being held faithless, man-sworn, and nidering,* to forgive and receive to thy paternal affection the good knight, Wilfred of Ivanhoe. In this reconciliation thou wilt own I have an interest—the happiness of my friend, and the quelling of dissension among my faithful people."

"And this is Wilfred!" said Cedric, pointing to his son.

"My father!—my father!" said Ivanhoe, prostrating himself at Cedric's feet, "grant me thy forgiveness!"

"Thou hast it, my son," said Cedric, raising him up. "The son of Hereward knows how to keep his word, even when it has been passed to a Norman. But let me see thee use the dress and costume of thy English ancestry—no short cloaks, no gay bonnets, no fantastic plumage in my decent household. He that would be the son of Cedric, must show himself of English ancestry.—Thou art about to speak," he added, sternly, "and I guess the topic. The Lady Rowena must complete two years' mourning, as for a betrothed husband—all our Saxon ancestors would disown us were we to treat of a new union for her ere the grave of him she should have wedded—him, so much the most worthy of her hand by birth and ancestry—is yet closed. The ghost of Athelstane himself would burst his bloody cerements, and stand before us to forbid such dishonour to his memory."

It seemed as if Cedric's words had raised a spectre; for, scarce had he uttered them ere the door flew open, and Athelstane, arrayed in the garments of the grave, stood before them, pale, haggard, and like something arisen from the dead!†

The effect of this apparition on the persons present was utterly appalling. Cedric started back as far as the wall of the apartment would permit, and, leaning against it as one unable to support himself, gazed on the figure of his friend with eyes that seemed fixed, and a mouth which he appeared incapable of shutting. Ivanhoe crossed himself, repeating prayers in Saxon, Latin, or Norman-French, as they occurred to his memory, while Richard alternately said Benedicite, and swore, Mort de ma vie!

In the mean time, a horrible noise was heard below stairs, some crying, "Secure the treacherous monks!"—others, "Down with them into the dungeon!"—others, "Pitch them from the highest battlements!"

"In the name of God!" said Cedric, addressing what seemed the spectre of his departed friend, "if thou art mortal, speak!—if a departed spirit, say for what cause thou dost revisit us, or if I can do aught that can set thy spirit at repose.—Living or dead, noble Athelstane, speak to Cedric!"

"I will," said the spectre, very composedly, "when I have collected breath, and when you give me time—Alive, saidst thou?—I am as much alive as he can be who has fed on bred and water for three days, which seem three ages—Yes, bread and water, Father Cedric! By Heaven and all saints in it, better food hath not passed my weasand for three liveloug days, and by God's providence it is that I am now here to tell it."

"Why, noble Athelstane," said the Black Knight, "I myself saw you struck down by the fierce Templar towards the end of the storm at Torquilstone, and as I thought, and Wamba reported, your skull was cloven through the teeth."

"You thought amiss, Sir Knight," said Athelstane, "and Wamba lied. My teeth are in good order, and that my supper shall presently find—No thanks to the Templar though, whose sword turned in his hand, so that the blade struck me flatlings, being averted by the handle of the good mace with which I warded the blow; had my steel-cap been on, I had not valued it a rush, and had dealt him such a counter-buff as would have spoilt his retreat. But as it was, down I went, stunned, indeed, but unwounded. Others, of both sides, were beaten down and slaughtered above me, so that I never recovered my senses until I found myself in a coffin (an open one, by good luck), placed before the altar of the church of Saint Edmund's. I sneezed repeatedly—groaned—awakened, and would have arisen, when the Sacristan and Abbot, full of terror came running at the noise, surprised, doubtless, and no way pleased to find the man alive, whose heirs they had proposed themselves to be. I asked for wine—they gave me some, but it must have been highly medicated, for I slept yet more deeply than before, and wakened not for many hours. I found my arms swathed down—my feet tied so fast that mine ankles ache at the very remembrance—the place was utterly dark—the oubliette, as I suppose, of their accursed convent, and from the close, stifled damp smell, I conceive it is also used for a place of sepulture. I had strange thoughts of what had befallen me, when the door of my dungeon creaked, and two villain monks entered. They would have persuaded me I was in purgatory, but I knew too well the pursy short-breathed voice of the Father Abbot.—Saint Jeremy! how different from that tone with which he used to ask me for another slice of the haunch!—the dog has feasted with me from Christmas to Twelfth-night."

"Have patience, noble Athelstane," said the King, "take breath—tell your story at leisure—beshrew me but such a tale is as well worth listening to as a romance."

"Ay but, by the rood of Bromeholm, there was no romance in the matter!" said Athelstane.—"A barley loaf and a pitcher of water—that they gave me, the niggardly traitors, whom my father, and I myself, had enriched, when their best resources were the flitches of bacon and measures of corn, out of which they wheedled poor serfs and bondsmen, in exchange for their prayers—the nest of foul ungrateful vipers—barley bread and ditch water to such a patron as I had been! I will smoke them out of their nest, though I be excommunicated!"

"But, in the name of Our Lady, noble Athelstane," said Cedric, grasping the hand of his friend, "how didst thou escape this imminent danger?—did their hearts relent?"

"Did their hearts relent!" echoed Athelstane—"Do rocks melt with the sun? I should have been there still, had not some stir in the Convent, which I find was their procession hitherward to eat my funeral feast, when they well knew how and where I had been buried alive, summoned the swarm out of their hive. I heard them droning out their death-psalms, little judging they were sung in respect for my soul by those who were thus famishing my body. They went, however, and I waited long for food—no wonder—the gouty Sacristan was even too busy with his own pro-

infamous.

The resuscitation of Athelstane has been much criticised, as too violent a breach of probability, even for a work of such fantastic character. It was a tour-de-force, to which the author was compelled to have recourse, by the vehement entreaties of his friend and printer, who was inconsolable on the Saxon being conveyed to the tomb.

under to mind mine. At length down he came, with an unstable step and a strong flavour of wine and spices about his person. Good cheer had opened his heart, for he left me a nook of pasty and a flask of wine, instead of my former fare. I ate, drank, and was invigorated; when, to add to my good luck, the Sacristan, too totty to discharge his duty of turnkey itly, locked the door beside the staple, so that it fell ajar. The light, the food, the wine, set my invention to work. The staple to which my chains were fixed, was more rusted than I or the villain Abbot had supposed. Even iron could not remain without consuming in the damps of that infernal dungeon."

"Take breath, noble Athelstane," said Richard, "and partake of some refreshment, ere you proceed with a tale so dreadful."

"Partake!" quoth Athelstane; "I have been partaking five times to-day—and yet a morsel of that savoury ham were not altogether foreign to the matter; and I pray you, fair sir, to do me reason in a cup of wine."

The guests, though still agape with astonishment, pledged their resuscitated landlord, who thus proceeded in his story:—He had indeed now many more auditors than those to whom it was commenced, for Edith, having given certain necessary orders for arranging matters within the Castle, had followed the dead alive up to the stranger's apartment, attended by as many of the guests, male and female, as could squeeze into the small room, while others, crowding the staircase, caught up an erroneous edition of the story, and transmitted it still more inaccurately to those beneath, who again sent it forth to the vulgar without, in a fashion totally irreconcilable to the real fact. Athelstane, however, went on as follows, with the history of his escape:—

"Finding myself freed from the staple, I dragged myself up stairs as well as a man loaded with shackles, and emaciated with fasting, might; and after much groping about, I was at length directed, by the sound of a jolly roundelay, to the apartment where the worthy Sacristan, an it so please ye, was holding devil's mass with a huge beetle-browed, broad-shouldered brother of the gray-frock and cowl, who looked much more like a thief than a clergyman. I burst in upon them, and the fashion of my grave-clothes, as well as the clanking of my chains, made a more resemble an inhabitant of the other world than of this. Both stood aghast; but when I knocked down the Sacristan with my fist, the other fellow, a pot-companion, fetched a blow at me with a huge quarter-staff."

"This must be our Friar Tuck, for a count's ransom," said Richard, looking at Ivanhoe.

"He may be the devil, an he will," said Athelstane. "Fortunately he missed the aim; and on my approaching to grapple with him, took to his heels and fled for it. I failed not to set my own heels at liberty by means of the fetter-key, which hung amongst others at the sexton's belt; and I had thoughts of beating out the knave's brains with a bunch of keys, but gratitude for the nook of pasty and the flask of wine which the rascal had imparted to my captivity, came over my heart; so, with a brace of hearty kicks, I left him on the floor, pouched some baked meat, and a leathern bottle of wine, with which the two venerable brethren had been regaling, went to the stable, and found in a private stall, mine own best palfrey, which, doubtless, had been set apart for the holy Father Abbot's particular use. Hither I came with all the speed the beast could compass—man and mother's son flying before me wherever I came, taking me for a spectre, the more especially as, to prevent my being recognised, I threw the corpse-hood over my face. I had not dared admittance into my castle, had I not been supposed to be the attendant of a juggler who is making the people in the castle-yard very merry, considering they are assembled to celebrate their lord's funeral—by the sewer thought I was dressed to bear a part in the tregetour's mummery, and so I got admission, and did but disclose myself to my mother, and eat a single morsel, ere I came in quest of you, my noble friend."

"And you have found me," said Cedric, "ready to resume our brave projects of honour and liberty. I tell thee, never will dawn a morrow so auspicious as the next, for the deliverance of the noble Saxon race."

"Talk not to me of delivering any one," said Athelstane; "it is well I am delivered myself. I am more intent on punishing that villain Abbot. He shall hang on the top of this castle of Coningsburgh, in his cope and stole; and if the stairs be too strait to admit his fat carcass, I will have him craned up from without."

"But, my son," said Edith, "consider his sacred office."

"Consider my three days' fast," replied Athelstane, "I will have their blood every one of them. Front-de-Bœuf was burnt alive for a less matter, for he kept a good table for his prisoners, only put too much garlic in his last dish of pottage. But these hypocritical, ungrateful slaves, so often the self-invited flatterers at my board, who gave me neither pottage nor garlic, more or less, they die, by the soul of Hengist!"

"But the Pope, my noble friend,"—said Cedric——

"But the devil, my noble friend,"—answered Athelstane; "they die, and no more of them. Were they the best monks upon earth, the world would go on without them."

"For shame, noble Athelstane," said Cedric; "forget such wretches in the career of glory which lies open before thee. Tell this Norman prince, Richard of Anjou, that, lion-hearted as he is, he shall not hold undisputed the throne of Alfred, while a male descendant of the Holy Confessor lives to dispute it."

"How!" said Athelstane, "is this the noble King Richard?"

"It is Richard Plantagenet himself," said Cedric; "yet I need not remind thee that, coming hither a guest of free-will, he may neither be injured nor detained prisoner—thou well knowest thy duty to him as his host."

"Ay, by my faith!" said Athelstane; "and my duty as a subject besides, for I here tender him my allegiance, heart and hand."

"My son," said Edith, "think on thy royal rights!"

"Think on the freedom of England, degenerate Prince!" said Cedric.

"Mother and friend," said Athelstane, "a truce to your upbraidings—bread and water and a dungeon are marvellous mortifiers of ambition, and I rise from the tomb a wiser man than I descended into it. One half of those vain follies were puffed into mine ear by that perfidious Abbot Wolfram, and you may now judge if he is a counsellor to be trusted. Since these plots were set in agitation, I have had nothing but hurried journeys, indigestions, blows and bruises, imprisonments and starvation; besides that they can only end in the murder of some thousands of quiet folk. I tell you, I will be king in my own domains, and nowhere else; and my first act of dominion shall be to hang the Abbot."

"And my ward Rowena," said Cedric—"I trust you intend not to desert her?"

"Father Cedric," said Athelstane, "be reasonable. The Lady Rowena cares not for me—she loves the little finger of my kinsman Wilfred's glove better than my whole person. There she stands to avouch it—Nay, blush not, kinswoman, there is no shame in loving a courtly knight better than a country franklin—and do not laugh neither, Rowena, for grave-clothes and a thin visage are, God knows, no matter of merriment—Nay, an thou wilt needs laugh, I will find thee a better jest—Give me thy hand, or rather lend it me, for I but ask it in the way of friendship.—Here, cousin Wilfred of Ivanhoe, in thy favour I renounce and abjure——Hey! by Saint Dunstan, our cousin Wilfred hath vanished!—Yet, unless my eyes are stiff dazzled with the fasting I have undergone, I saw him stand there but even now."

All now looked around and inquired for Ivanhoe, but he had vanished. It was at length discovered that a Jew had been to seek him; and that, after very brief conference, he had called for Gurth and his armour, and had left the castle.

"Fair cousin," said Athelstane to Rowena, "could I think that this sudden disappearance of Ivanhoe was occasioned by other than the weightiest reason, I would myself resume"——

But he had no sooner let go her hand, on first observing that Ivanhoe had disappeared, than Rowena, who had found her situation extremely embarrassing, had taken the first opportunity to escape from the apartment.

"Certainly," quoth Athelstane, "women are the least to be trusted of all animals, monks and abbots excepted. I am an infidel, if I expected not thanks from her, and perhaps a kiss to boot. These cursed grave-clothes have surely a spell on them, every one flies from me. To you I turn, noble King Richard, with the vows of allegiance, which, as a liege-subject"——

But King Richard was gone also, and no one knew whither. At length it was learned that he had hastened to the court-yard, summoned to his presence the Jew who had spoken with Ivanhoe, and after a moment's speech with him, had called vehemently to horse, thrown himself upon a steed, compelled the Jew to mount another, and set off at a rate, which, according to Wamba, rendered the old Jew's neck not worth a penny's purchase.

"By my halidome!" said Athelstane, "it is certain that Zernebock hath possessed himself of my castle in my absence. I return in my grave-clothes, a pledge restored from the very sepulchre, and every one I speak to vanishes as soon as they hear my voice!—But it skills not talking of it. Come, my friends—such of you as are left, follow me to the banquet-hall, lest any more of us disappear—it is, I trust, as yet tolerably furnished, as becomes the obsequies of an ancient Saxon noble; and should we tarry any longer, who knows but the devil may fly off with the supper?"

CHAPTER XLIII.

> Be Mowbray's sins so heavy in his bosom,
> That they may break his foaming courser's back,
> And throw the rider headlong in the lists,
> A caitiff recreant!
>
> Richard II.

Our scene now returns to the exterior of the Castle, or Preceptory, of Templestowe, about the hour when the bloody die was to be cast for the life or death of Rebecca. It was a scene of bustle and life, as if the whole vicinity had poured forth its inhabitants to a village wake, or rural feast. But the earnest desire to look on blood and death, is not peculiar to those dark ages; though in the gladiatorial exercise of single combat and general tourney, they were habituated to the bloody spectacle of brave men falling by each other's hands. Even in our own days, when morals are better understood, an execution, a bruising match, a riot, or a meeting of radical reformers, collects, at considerable hazard to themselves, immense crowds of spectators, otherwise little interested, except to see how matters are to be conducted, or whether the heroes of the day are, in the heroic language of insurgent tailors, flints or dunghills.

The eyes, therefore, of a very considerable multitude, were bent on the gate of the Preceptory of Templestowe, with the purpose of witnessing the procession; while still greater numbers had already surrounded the tilt-yard belonging to that establishment. This enclosure was formed on a piece of level ground adjoining to the Preceptory, which had been levelled with care, for the exercise of military and chivalrous sports. It occupied the brow of a soft and gentle commence, was carefully palisaded around, and, as the Templars willingly invited spectators to be witnesses of their skill in feats of chivalry, was amply supplied with galleries and benches for their use.

On the present occasion, a throne was erected for the Grand Master at the east end, surrounded with seats of distinction for the Preceptors and Knights of the Order. Over these floated the sacred standard, called Le Beau-seant, which was the ensign, as its name was the battle-cry, of the Templars.

At the opposite end of the lists was a pile of faggots, so arranged around a stake, deeply fixed in the ground, as to leave a space for the victim whom they were destined to consume, to enter within the fatal circle itself or her to be chained to the stake by the fetters which hung ready for that purpose. Beside this deadly apparatus stood four black slaves, whose colour and African features, then so little known in England, appalled the multitude, who gazed on them as on demons employed about their own diabolical exercises. These men stirred not, excepting now and then, under the direction of one who seemed their chief, to shift and replace the ready fuel. They looked not on the multitude. In fact, they seemed insensible of their presence, and of every thing save the charge of their own horrible duty. And when a speech with each other, they expanded their sable lips, and showed their white fangs, as if they grinned at the thoughts of the expected tragedy, the startled commons could scarcely help believing that they were actually the familiar spirits with whom the witch had communed, and who, her time being out, stood ready to assist in her dreadful punishment. They whispered to each other, and communicated all the feats which Satan had performed during that long and unhappy period, not failing, of course, to give the devil rather more than his due.

"Have you not heard, Father Dennet," quoth one boor to another advanced in years, "that the devil has carried away bodily the great Saxon Thane, Athelstane of Coningsburgh?"

"Ay, but he brought him back though, by the blessing of God and Saint Dunstan."

"How's that?" said a brisk young fellow, dressed in a green cassock embroidered with gold, and having at his heels a stout lad bearing a harp upon his back, which betrayed his vocation. The minstrel seemed of no vulgar rank; for, besides the splendour of his gayly broidered doublet, he wore around his neck a silver chain, by which hung the wrest, or key, with which he tuned his harp. On his right arm was a silver plate, which, instead of bearing, as usual, the cognizance or badge of the baron to whose family he belonged, had barely the word SHERWOOD engraved upon it.—"How mean you by that?" said the gay Minstrel, mingling in the conversation of the peasants; "I came to seek one subject for my rhymes, and by'r Lady, I were glad to find two."

"It is well avouched," said the elder peasant, "that after Athelstane of Coningsburgh had been dead four weeks"——

"That is impossible," said the Minstrel; "I saw him in life at the Passage of Arms at Ashby-de-la-Zouche."

"Dead, however, he was, or else translated," said the younger peasant; "for I heard the Monks of Saint Edmund's singing the death's hymn for him; and moreover, there was a rich death-meal and doles at the Castle of Coningsburgh, as right was; and that's how I gone, but for Mabel Parkins, who"——

"Ay, dead was Athelstane," said the old man, shaking his head, "and the more pity it was, for the old Saxon blood"——

"But, your story, my masters—your story," said the Minstrel, somewhat impatiently.

"Ay, ay—construe us the story," said a burly Friar, who stood beside them, leaning on a pole that exhibited an appearance between a pilgrim's staff and a quarter-staff, and probably acted as either when occasion served, "Your story," said the stalwart churchman; "burn not daylight about it—we have short time to spare,"——

"An please your reverence," said Dennet, "a drunken priest came to visit the Sacristan at Saint Edmund's"——

"It does not please my reverence," answered the churchman, "that there should be such an animal as a drunken priest, or, if there were, that a layman should so speak him. Be mannerly, my friend, and conclude the holy man only wrapt in meditation which makes the head dizzy and foot unsteady, or the stomach were filled with new wine—I have tried it myself."

"Well, then," answered Father Dennet, "a holy brother came to visit the Sacristan at Saint Edmund's—a sort of hedge-priest is the visiter, and half the deer that are stolen in the forest, who love the tinkling of a pint-pot better than the sacring-bell, and deems a flitch of bacon worth ten of his breviary

the rest, a good fellow and a merry, who will ish a quarter-staff, draw a bow, and dance a shire round, with e'er a man in Yorkshire."
That last part of thy speech, Dennet," said the strel, "has saved thee a rib or twain."
Tush, man, I fear him not," said Dennet; "I am ewhat old and stiff, but when I fought for the
and ram at Doncaster" ——
But the story—the story, my friend," again said Minstrel.
Why, the tale is but this—Athelstane of Coningsgh was buried at Saint Edmund's."
That's a lie, and a loud one," said the Friar, "for
w him borne to his own Castle of Coningsburgh." Nay, then, e'en tell the story yourself, my mas-" said Dennet, turning sulky at these repeated tradictions; and it was with some difficulty that boor could be prevailed on, by the request of his rade and the minstrel, to renew his tale.—"These sober friars," said he at length, "since this reve-l man will needs have them such, had continued
king good ale, and wine, and what not, for the part of a summer's day, when they were aroused deep groan, and a clanking of chains, and the re of the deceased Athelstane entered the apart-t, saying, 'Ye evil shepherds!'" ——
It is false," said the Friar, hastily, "he never te a word."
So ho! Friar Tuck," said the Minstrel, drawing apart from the rustics; "we have started a new
, I find."
I tell thee, Allan-a-Dale," said the Hermit, "I Athelstane of Coningsburgh as much as bodily s ever saw a living man. He had his shroud on, all about him smelt of the sepulchre—A butt of
k will not wash it out of my memory."
Pshaw!" answered the Minstrel; "thou dost but with me!"
Never believe me," said the Friar, "an I fetched
a knock at him with my quarter-staff that would felled an ox, and it glided through his body as it
ht through a pillar of smoke!"
By Saint Hubert," said the Minstrel, "but it is a drous tale, and fit to be put in metre to the an-t tune, 'Sorrow came to the old Friar.'" Laugh, if ye list," said Friar Tuck; "but an ye h me singing on such a theme, may the next u or devil carry me off with him headlong! No,
I instantly formed the purpose of assisting at e good work, such as the burning of a witch, a ial combat, or the like matter of godly service,
therefore am I here."
they thus conversed, the heavy bell of the church aint Michael of Templestowe, a venerable build-situated in a hamlet at some distance from the eptory, broke short their argument. One by one ullen sounds fell successively on the ear, leaving sufficient space for each to die away in distant ere the air was again filled by repetition of the knell. These sounds, the signal of the approach-eremony, chilled with awe the hearts of the as-led multitude, whose eyes were now turned to Preceptory, expecting the approach of the Grand er, the champion, and the criminal.
length the drawbridge fell, the gates opened, and ght, bearing the great standard of the Order, sal-from the castle, preceded by six trumpets, and wed by the Knights Preceptors, two and two, the d Master coming last, mounted on a stately , whose furniture was of the simplest kind. Be-him came Brian-de-Bois-Guilbert, armed cap-a-bright armour, but without his lance, shield, and
d, which were borne by his two esquires behind

His face, though partly hidden by a long plume
h floated down from his barret-cap, bore a strong mingled expression of passion, in which pride ed to contend with irresolution. He looked ly pale, as if he had not slept for several nights,
ained his pawing war-horse with the habitual
and grace proper to the best lance of the Order
e Temple. His general appearance was grand commanding; but, looking at him with attention men read that in his dark features, from which willingly withdrew their eyes.

On either side rode Conrade of Mont-Fitchet, and Albert de Malvoisin, who acted as godfathers to the champion. They were in their robes of peace, the white dress of the Order. Behind them followed other Companions of the Temple, with a long train of esquires and pages clad in black, aspirants to the honour of being one day Knights of the Order. After these neophytes came a guard of warders on foot, in the same sable livery, amidst whose partisans might be seen the pale form of the accused, moving with a slow but undismayed step towards the scene of her fate. She was stript of all her ornaments, lest per-chance there should be among them some of those amulets which Satan was supposed to bestow upon his victims, to deprive them of the power of confes-sion even when under the torture. A coarse white dress, of the simplest form, had been substituted for her Oriental garments; yet there was such an exqui-site mixture of courage and resignation in her look,
that even in this garb, and with no other ornament
than her long black tresses, each eye wept that looked upon her, and the most hardened bigot regretted the fate that had converted a creature so goodly into a vessel of wrath, and a waged slave of the devil.

A crowd of inferior personages belonging to the Preceptory followed the victim, all moving with the utmost order, with arms folded, and looks bent upon the ground.

This slow procession moved up the gentle emi-nence, on the summit of which was the tiltyard, and,
entering the lists, marched once around them from right to left, and when they had completed the circle,
made a halt. There was then a momentary bustle, while the Grand Master and all his attendants, ex-cepting the champion and his godfathers, dismounted from their horses, which were immediately removed out of the lists by the esquires, who were in attend-ance for that purpose.

The unfortunate Rebecca was conducted to the black chair placed near the pile. On her first glance at the terrible spot where preparations were making for a death alike dismaying to the mind and pain-ful to the body, she was observed to shudder and shut her eyes, praying internally doubtless, for her lips moved though no speech was heard. In the space of a minute she opened her eyes, looked fix-edly on the pile as if to familiarize her mind with the object, and then slowly and naturally turned away her head.

Mean while, the Grand Master had assumed his seat; and when the chivalry of his order was placed around and behind him, each in his due rank, a loud
and long flourish of the trumpets announced that the Court were seated for judgment. Malvoisin, then, acting as godfather of the champion, stepped for-ward, and laid the glove of the Jewess, which was the pledge of battle, at the feet of the Grand Master.

"Valorous Lord, and reverend Father," said he,
"here standeth the good Knight, Brian de Bois-Guil-bert, Knight Preceptor of the Order of the Temple,
who, by accepting the pledge of battle which I now
lay at your reverence's feet, hath become bound to do his devoir in combat this day, to maintain that this Jewish maiden, by name Rebecca, hath justly de-served the doom passed upon her in a Chapter of this most Holy Order of the Temple of Zion, condemning her to die as a sorceress;—here, I say, he standeth, such battle to do, knightly and honourable, if such be your noble and sanctified pleasure."

"Hath he made oath," said the Grand Master,
"that his quarrel is just and honourable? Bring forward the Crucifix and the Te igitur."

"Sir, and most reverend father," answered Mal-voisin, readily, "our brother here present hath al-ready sworn to the truth of his accusation in the hand of the good Knight Conrade de Mont-Fitchet;
and otherwise he ought not to be sworn, seeing that his adversary is an unbeliever, and may take no oath."

This explanation was satisfactory, to Albert's great joy; for the wily knight had foreseen the great diffi-culty, or rather impossibility, of prevailing upon Brian de Bois-Guilbert to take such an oath before the as-sembly, and had invented this excuse to escape the necessity of his doing so.

The Grand Master, having allowed the apology of Albert Malvoisin, commanded the herald to stand forth and do his devoir. The trumpets then again flourished, and a herald, stepping forward, proclaimed aloud,—"Oyez, oyez, oyez,—Here standeth the good Knight, Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert, ready to do battle with any knight of free blood, who will sustain the quarrel allowed and allotted to the Jewess Rebecca, to try by champion, in respect of lawful essoine of her own body; and to such champion the reverend and valorous Grand Master here present allows a fair field, and equal partition of sun and wind, and whatever else appertains to a fair combat." The trumpets again sounded, and there was a dead pause of many minutes.

"No champion appears for the appellant," said the Grand Master. "Go, herald, and ask her whether she expects any one to do battle for her in this her cause." The herald went to the chair in which Rebecca was seated, and Bois-Guilbert suddenly turning his horse's head toward that end of the lists, in spite of hints on either side from Malvoisin and Mont-Fitchet, was by the side of Rebecca's chair as soon as the herald.

"Is the [illegible]rgular, and according to the law of combat?" said Malvoisin, looking to the Grand Master.

"Albert de Malvoisin, it is," answered Beaumanoir; "for in this appeal to the judgment of God, we may not prohibit parties from having that communication with each other, which may best tend to bring forth the truth of the quarrel."

In the mean time, the herald spoke to Rebecca in these terms:—"Damsel, the Honourable and Reverend the Grand Master demands of thee, if thou art prepared with a champion to do battle this day in thy behalf, or if thou dost yield thee as one justly condemned to a deserved doom?"

"Say to the Grand Master," replied Rebecca, "that I maintain my innocence, and do not yield me as justly condemned, lest I become guilty of mine own blood. Say to him, that I challenge such delay as his forms will permit, to see if God, whose opportunity is in man's extremity, will raise me up a deliverer; and when such uttermost space is passed, may His holy will be done!" The herald retired to carry this answer to the Grand Master.

"God forbid," said Lucas Beaumanoir, "that Jew or Pagan should impeach us of injustice!—Until the shadows be cast from the west to the eastward, will we wait to see if a champion shall appear for this unfortunate woman. When the day is so far passed, let her prepare for death."

The herald communicated the words of the Grand Master to Rebecca, who bowed her head submissively, folded her arms, and, looking up towards heaven, seemed to expect that aid from above which she could scarce promise herself from man. During this awful pause, the voice of Bois-Guilbert broke upon her ear- it was but a whisper, yet it startled her more than the summons of the herald had appeared to do.

"Rebecca," said the Templar, "dost thou hear me?"

"I have no portion in thee, cruel, hard-hearted man," said the unfortunate maiden.

"Ay, but dost thou understand my words?" said the Templar; "for the sound of my voice is frightful in mine own ears. I scarce know on what ground we stand, or for what purpose they have brought us hither.—This listed space—that chair—these faggots —I know their purpose, and yet it appears to me like something unreal—the fearful picture of a vision, which appals my sense with hideous fantasies, but convinces not my reason."

"My mind and senses keep touch and time," answered Rebecca, "and tell me alike that these faggots are destined to consume my earthly body, and open a painful but a brief passage to a better world."

"Dreams, Rebecca,—dreams," answered the Templar; "idle visions, rejected by the wisdom of your own wiser Sadducees. Hear me, Rebecca," he said, proceeding with animation; "a better chance hast thou for life and liberty than yonder knaves and dotard dream of. Mount thee behind me on my steed —on Zamor, the gallant horse that never failed his rider. I won him in single fight from the Tr[illegible]bzond— mount, I say, behind me—in hour is pursuit and inquiry far behind—a of pleasure opens to thee— to me a new cure Let them speak the doom which I despise the name of Bois-Guilbert from their list tic slaves! I will wash out with blood wh they may dare to cast on my scutcheon."

"Tempter," said Rebecca, "begone!—] last extremity canst thou move me one hair from my resting place— surrounded as I a I hold thee as my worst and most dreadf avoid thee, in the name of God!"

Albert Malvoisin, alarmed and impati duration of their conference, now advance rupt it.

"Hath the maiden acknowledged her demanded of Bois-Guilbert; "or is she her denial?"

"She is indeed resolute," said Bois-Guilb

"Then," said Malvoisin, "must thou, nob resume thy place to attend the issue—The changing on the circle of the dial—Come, b Guilbert—come, thou hope of our holy Order to be its head."

As he spoke in this soothing tone, he laid on the knight's bridle, as if to lead him to station.

"False villain! what meanest thou by th my rein?" said Sir Brian, angrily. And s his companion's grasp, he rode back to the of the lists.

"There is yet spirit in him," said Malvois Mont-Fitchet, "were it well directed—bu Greek fire, it burns whatever approaches it

The Judges had now been two hours in awaiting in vain the appearance of a cham

"And reason good," said Friar Tuck, "s is a Jewess—and yet, by mine Order, it is so young and beautiful a creature should perish one blow being struck in her behalf! We times a witch, provided she were but the le Christian, my quarter-staff should ring no steel cap of yonder fierce Templar, ere he c matter off thus."

It was, however, the general belief that no or would appear for a Jewess, accused o and the knights, instigated by Malvoisin, to each other, that it was time to declare t of Rebecca forfeited. At this instant a knig his horse to speed, appeared on the plain t towards the lists. A hundred voices excla champion! a champion!" And despite th sessions and prejudices of the multitude, the unanimously as the knight rode into the tilty second glance, however, served to destroy that his timely arrival had excited. His ho for many miles to its utmost speed, appear from fatigue, and the rider, however undau presented himself in the lists, either from w weariness, or both, seemed scarce able to himself in the saddle.

To the summons of the herald, who dem rank, his name, and purpose, the strang answered readily and boldly, "I am a go and noble, come hither to sustain with sword the just and lawful quarrel of this d[illegible] becca, daughter of Isaac of York; to t doom pronounced against her to be false less, and to defy Sir Brian de Bois-Guil traitor, murderer, and liar; as I will prove i with my body against his by the aid of G Lady, and of Monseigneur Saint George knight."

"The stranger must first show," said "that he is good knight, and of honourab The Temple sendeth not forth her champio nameless men."

"My name," said the Knight, raising h "is better known, my lineage more pure, than thine own. I am Wilfred of Ivanhoe

"I will not fight with thee at present, Templar, in a changed and hollow voice. wounds healed, purvey thee a better horse,

will hold it worth my while to scourge out of thee
ovish spirit of bravade."
fa! proud Templar," said Ivanhoe, "hast thou tten that twice dist thou fall before this lance?
ember the lists of Acre—remember the Passage
ms at Ashby—remember thy proud vaunt in the
of Rotherwood, and the gage of your gold chain
st my reliquary, that thou wouldst do battle with ed of Ivanhoe, and recover the honour thou lost! By that reliquary, and the holy relic it ains, I will proclaim thee, Templar, a coward in court in Europe—in every Preceptory of thine
—unless thou do battle without farther delay."
s-Guilbert turned his countenance irresolutely rds Rebecca, and then exclaimed, looking ly at Ivanhoe, "Dog of a Saxon! take thy lance,
repare for the death thou hast drawn upon
!"
loes the Grand Master allow me the combat?"
Ivanhoe.
may not deny what thou hast challenged," said Grand Master, "provided the maiden accepts as her champion. Yet I would thou wert in r plight to do battle. An enemy of our Order hast ever been, yet would I have thee honourably met
"
thus—thus as I am, and not otherwise," said
noe; "it is the judgment of God—to his keeping mmend myself.—Rebecca," said he riding up
e fatal chair, "dost thou accept of me for thy pion?"
do," she said—"I do," fluttered by an emotion
h the fear of death had been unable to produce,
o accept thee as the champion whom Heaven
sent me. Yet, no—no—thy wounds are unl—Meet not that proud man—why shouldst thou also?"
Ivanhoe was already at his post, and had his visor, and assumed his lance. Bois-Guilbert
e same; and his esquire remarked, as he clasped
sor, that his face, which had, notwithstanding variety of emotions by which he had been ed, continued during the whole morning of an aleness, was now become suddenly very much
d.
herald, then, seeing each champion in his uplifted his voice, repeating thrice—*Faites vos
rs, preux chevaliers!* After the third cry, he rew to one side of the lists, and again pro-ed, that none, on peril of instant death, should
by word, cry, or action, to interfere with or dis-
this fair field of combat. The Grand Master,
eld in his hand the gage of battle, Rebecca's
now threw it into the lists, and pronounced the ignal words, Laissez aller.
trumpets sounded, and the knights charged other in full career. The wearied horse of oe, and its no less exhausted rider, went down,
had expected, before the well-aimed lance and ns sword of the Templar. This issue of the
at all had foreseen; but although the spear of oe did but, in comparison, touch the shield of Guilbert, that champion, to the astonishment who beheld it, reeled in his saddle, lost his
s, and fell in the lists.
nhoe, extricating himself from his fallen horse,
on on foot, hastening to mend his fortune with ord; but his antagonist arose not. Wilfred,
g his foot on his breast, and the sword's point throat, commanded him to yield him, or die on
ot. Bois-Guilbert returned no answer.
lay him not, Sir Knight," cried the Grand
r, "unshriven and unabsolved—kill not body soul! We allow him vanquished."
descended into the lists, and commanded them help the conquered champion. His eyes were l—the dark red flush was still on his brow. As looked on him in astonishment, the eyes opened they were fixed and glazed. The flush passed his brow, and gave way to the pallid hue of . Unscathed by the lance of his enemy, he had victim to the violence of his own contending ns.
his is indeed the judgment of God," said the Grand Master, looking upwards—"Fiat voluntas tua!"

CHAPTER XLIV.

So now 'tis ended, like an old wife's story.
WEBSTER.

When the first moments of surprise were over, Wilfred of Ivanhoe demanded of the Grand Master, as judge of the field, if he had manfully and rightfully done his duty in the combat?

"Manfully and rightfully hath it been done," said the Grand Master; "I pronounce the maiden free and guiltless—The arms and the body of the deceased knight are at the will of the victor."

"I will not despoil him of his weapons," said the Knight of Ivanhoe, "nor condemn his corpse to shame—he hath fought for Christendom—God's arm, no human hand, hath this day struck him down. But let his obsequies be private, as becomes those of a man who died in an unjust quarrel.—And for the maiden"——

He was interrupted by a clattering of horses' feet, advancing in such numbers, and so rapidly, as to shake the ground before them; and the Black Knight galloped into the lists. He was followed by a numerous band of men-at-arms, and several knights in complete armour.

"I am too late," he said, looking around him. "I had doomed Bois-Guilbert for mine own property.—Ivanhoe, was this well, to take on thee such a venture, and thou scarce able to keep thy saddle?"

"Heaven, my Liege," answered Ivanhoe, "hath taken this proud man for his victim. He was not to be honoured in dying as your will had designed."

"Peace be with him," said Richard, looking steadfastly on the corpse, "if it may be so—he was a gallant knight, and has died in his steel harness full knightly. But we must waste no time—Bohun, do thine office!"

A knight stept forward from the King's attendants, and, laying his hand on the shoulder of Albert de Malvoisin, said, "I arrest thee of High Treason."

The Grand Master had hitherto stood astonished at the appearance of so many warriors,—He now spoke.

"Who dares to arrest a Knight of the Temple of Zion, within the girth of his own Preceptory, and in the presence of the Grand Master? by whose authority is this bold outrage offered?"

"I make the arrest," replied the Knight—"I, Henry Bohun, Earl of Essex, Lord High Constable of England."

"And he arrests Malvoisin," said the King, raising his visor, "by the order of Richard Plantagenet, here present.—Conrade Mont-Fitchet, it is well for thee thou art born no subject of mine.—But for thee, Malvoisin, thou diest with thy brother Philip, ere the world be a week older."

"I will resist thy doom," said the Grand Master.

"Proud Templar," said the King, "thou canst not—look up, and behold the Royal Standard of England floats over thy towers instead of thy Temple banner!—Be wise, Beaumanoir, and make no bootless opposition—Thy hand is in the lion's mouth."

"I will appeal to Rome against thee," said the Grand Master, "for usurpation on the immunities and privileges of our Order."

"Be it so," said the King; "but for thine own sake tax me not with usurpation now. Dissolve thy Chapter, and depart with thy followers to thy next Preceptory, (if thou canst find one,) which has not been made the scene of treasonable conspiracy against the King of England—Or, if thou wilt, remain, to share our hospitality, and behold our justice."

"To be a guest in the house where I should command?" said the Templar; "never!—Chaplains, raise the Psalm, Quare fremuerunt Gentes?—Knights, squires, and followers of the Holy Temple, prepare to follow the banner of Beau-seant!"

The Grand Master spoke with a dignity which confronted even that of England's king himself, and inspired courage into his surprised and dismayed followers. They gathered around him like the sheep around the watch-dog, when they hear the baying of the wolf. But they evinced not the timidity of the scared flock—there were dark brows of defiance, and looks which menaced the hostility they dared not to proffer in words. They drew together in a dark line of spears, from which the white cloaks of the knights were visible among the dusky garments of their retainers, like the lighter coloured edges of a sable cloud. The multitude, who had raised a clamorous shout of reprobation, paused and gazed in silence on the formidable and experienced body to which they had unwarily bade defiance, and shrunk back from their front.

The Earl of Essex, when he beheld them pause in their assembled force, dashed the rowels into his charger's sides, and galloped backwards and forwards to array his followers, in opposition to a band so formidable. Richard alone, as if he loved the danger his presence had provoked, rode slowly along the front of the Templars, calling aloud, "What, sirs! Among so many gallant knights, will none dare splinter a spear with Richard?—Sirs of the Temple! your ladies are but sun-burned, if they are not worth the shiver of a broken lance?"

"The brethren of the Temple," said the Grand Master, riding forward in advance of their body, "fight not on such idle and profane quarrel—and not with thee, Richard of England, shall a Templar cross lance in my presence. The Pope and Princes of Europe shall judge our quarrel, and whether a Christian prince has done well in bucklering the cause which thou hast to-day adopted. If unassailed, we depart assailing no one. To thine honour we refer the armour and household goods of the Order which we leave behind us, and on thy conscience we lay the scandal and offence thou hast this day given to Christendom."

With these words, and without waiting a reply, the Grand Master gave the signal of departure. Their trumpets sounded a wild march, of an Oriental character, which formed the usual signal for the Templars to advance. They changed their array from a line to a column of march, and moved off as slowly as their horses could step, as if to show it was only the will of their Grand Master, and no fear of the opposing and superior force, which compelled them to withdraw.

"By the splendour of Our Lady's brow!" said King Richard, "it is pity of their lives, that these Templars are not so trusty as they are disciplined and valiant."

The multitude, like a timid cur which waits to bark till the object of its challenge has turned his back, raised a feeble shout as the rear of the squadron left the ground.

During the tumult which attended the retreat of the Templars, Rebecca saw and heard nothing—she was locked in the arms of her aged father, giddy, and almost senseless, with the rapid change of circumstances around her. But one word from Isaac at length recalled her scattered feelings.

"Let us go," he said, "my dear daughter, my recovered treasure—let us go to throw ourselves at the feet of the good youth."

"Not so," said Rebecca, "O no—no—no—I must not at this moment dare to speak to him—Alas! I should say more than——No, my father, let us instantly leave this evil place."

"But, my daughter," said Isaac, "to leave him who hath come forth like a strong man with his spear and shield, holding his life as nothing, so he might redeem thy captivity; and thou, too, the daughter of a people strange unto him and his—this is service to be thankfully acknowledged."

"It is—it is—most thankfully—most devoutly acknowledged," said Rebecca—"it shall be still more so—but not now—for the sake of thy beloved Rachel, father, grant my request—not now!"

"Nay, but," said Isaac, insisting, "they will deem us more thankless than mere dogs!"

"But thou seest, my dear father, that King Richard is in presence, and that"——

"True, my best—my wisest Rebecca!—Let us hence—let us hence!—Money he will lack, for he has just returned from Palestine, and, as they say, from prison—and pretext for exacting it, should any, may arise out of my simple traffic with ther John. Away, away, let us hence!"

And hurrying his daughter in his turn, he c her from the lists, and by means of conveyar he had provided, transported her safely to t of the Rabbi Nathan.

The Jewess, whose fortunes had formed t pal interest of the day, having now retired un the attention of the populace was transferr Black Knight. They now filled the air wit life to Richard with the Lion's Heart, and d the usurping Templars!"

"Notwithstanding all this lip-loyalty," said to the Earl of Essex, "it was well the King precaution to bring thee with him, noble Ea many of thy trusty followers."

The Earl smiled and shook his head.

"Gallant Ivanhoe," said Essex, "dost th our Master so well, and yet suspect him of wise a precaution! I was drawing towar having heard that Prince John was mak there, when I met King Richard, like a tru errant, galloping hither to achieve in his ow this adventure of the Templar and the Jew his own single arm. I accompanied him band, almost maugre his consent."

"And what news from York, brave Ea Ivanhoe; "will the rebels bide us there?"

"No more than December's snow will bi sun," said the Earl; "they are dispersing; should come posting to bring us the ne himself!"

"The traitor! the ungrateful insolent trait Ivanhoe; "did not Richard order him into ment?"

"O! he received him," answered the Ea they had met after a hunting party; and, pe me and our men-at-arms, said, 'Thou seest I have some angry men with me—thou wer to our mother, carry her my duteous affec abide with her until men's minds are pacifie

"And this was all he said?" inquired I "would not any one say that this Prince inv to treason by his clemency?"

"Just," replied the Earl, "as the man ma to invite death, who undertakes to fight a having a dangerous wound unhealed."

"I forgive thee the jest, Lord Earl," said I "but, remember, I hazarded but my own life—the welfare of his kingdom."

"Those," replied Essex, "who are specia less of their own welfare, are seldom remar tentive to that of others—But let us haste to tle, for Richard meditates punishing som subordinate members of the conspiracy, th has pardoned their principal."

From the judicial investigations which f on this occasion, and which are given at leng Wardour Manuscript, it appears that Maurice escaped beyond seas, and went into the se Philip of France; while Philip de Malvoisin, brother Albert, the Preceptor of Templestow executed, although Waldemar Fitzurse, the the conspiracy, escaped with banishment; an John, for whose behoof it was undertaken, even censured by his good-natured brother. however, pitied the fate of the two Malvois only suffered the death which they had both served, by many acts of falsehood, cruelty, pression.

Briefly after the judicial combat, Cedric th was summoned to the court of Richard, w the purpose of quieting the counties that h disturbed by the ambition of his brother, v held at York. Cedric hushed and pshawed n once at the message—but he refused not o In fact, the return of Richard had quench hope that he had entertained of restoring dynasty in England; for, whatever head the might have made in the event of a civil wa plain that nothing could be done under the un dominion of Richard, popular as he was by sonal good qualities and military fame, alth

tion was wilfully careless, now too indul-ow allied to despotism.
cover, it could not escape even Cedric's re-ervation, that his project for an absolute ng the Saxons, by the marriage of Rowena itane, was now completely at an end, by dissent of both parties concerned. This l, an event which, in his ardour for the se, he could not have anticipated, and even disinclination of both was broadly and ifested, he could scarce bring himself to t two Saxons of royal descent should scru-onal grounds, at an alliance so necessary lic weal of the nation. But it was not the : Rowena had always expressed her re-
o Athelstane, and now Athelstane was no
nd positive in proclaiming his resolution
ursue his addresses to the Lady Rowena.
natural obstinacy of Cedric sunk beneath
cles, where he, remaining on the point of ad the task of dragging a reluctant pair up ith each hand. He made, however, a last ttack on Athelstane, and he found that l sprout of Saxon royalty engaged, like ires of our own day, in a furious war with that, after all his deadly menaces against of Saint Edmund's, Athelstane's spirit of hat between the natural indolent kindness disposition, what through the prayers of Edith, attached, like most ladies, (of the

he clerical order, had terminated in his Abbot and his monks in the dungeons of rgh for three days on a meager diet. For y the Abbot menaced him with excommund made out a dreadful list of complaints els and stomach, suffered by himself and in consequence of the tyrannical and unsonment they had sustained. With this , and with the means he had adopted to this clerical persecution, Cedric found the s friend Athelstane so fully occupied, that oom for another idea. And when Rowena's mentioned, the noble Athelstane prayed aff a full goblet to her health, and that she be the bride of his kinsman Wilfred. It erate case therefore. There was obviously o be made of Athelstane; or, as Wamba
t, in a phrase which has descended from es to ours, he was a cock that would not

mained betwixt Cedric and the determinathe lovers desired to come to, only two his own obstinacy, and his dislike of the nasty. The former feeling gradually gave the endearments of his ward, and the
he could not help nourishing in the fame
. Besides, he was not insensible to the llying his own line to that of Alfred, when r claims of the descendant of Edward the were abandoned for ever. Cedric's avere Norman race of kings was also much
l,—first, by consideration of the impossiding England of the new dynasty, a feeling far to create loyalty in the subject to the
to; and, secondly, by the personal attention
chard, who delighted in the blunt humour
and, to use the language of the Wardour
t, so dealt with the noble Saxon, that, ere n a guest at court for seven days, he had onsent to the marriage of his ward Row-
a son Wilfred of Ivanhoe.
ials of our hero, thus formally approved by
were celebrated in the most august of tem-oble Minster of York. The king himself and from the countenance which he af-
his and other occasions to the distressed o degraded Saxons, gave them a safer and in prospect of attaining their just rights,
could reasonably hope from the precarious
a civil war. The Church gave her full , graced with all the splendour which she knows how to apply with such brilliant

Gurth, gallantly apparelled, attended as esquire upon his young master whom he had served so faithfully, and the magnanimous Wamba, decorated with a new cap and a most gorgeous set of silver bells. Sharers of Wilfred's dangers and adversity, they remained, as they had a right to expect, the partakers of his most prosperous career.

But besides this domestic retinue, these distinguished nuptials were celebrated by the attendance of the high-born Normans, as well as Saxons, joined with the universal jubilee of the lower orders, that marked the marriage of two individuals as a pledge of the future peace and harmony betwixt two races, which, since that period, have been so completely mingled, that the distinction has become wholly invisible. Cedric lived to see this union approximate towards its completion; for as the two nations mixed in society and formed intermarriages with each other, the Normans abated their scorn, and the Saxons were refined from their rusticity. But it was not until the reign of Edward the Third that the mixed language, now termed English, was spoken at the court of London, and that the hostile distinction of Norman and Saxon seems entirely to have disappeared.

It was upon the second morning after this happy bridal, that the Lady Rowena was made acquainted by her handmaid Elgitha, that a damsel desired admission to her presence, and solicited that their parley might be without witness. Rowena wondered, hesitated, became curious, and ended by commanding the damsel to be admitted, and her attendants to withdraw.

She entered—a noble and commanding figure, the long white veil in which she was shrouded, overshadowing rather than concealing the elegance and majesty of her shape. Her demeanour was that of respect, unmingled by the least shade either of fear, or of a wish to propitiate favour. Rowena was ever ready to acknowledge the claims, and attend to the feelings, of others. She arose, and would have conducted her lovely visiter to a seat; but the stranger looked at Elgitha, and again intimated a wish to discourse with the Lady Rowena alone. Elgitha had no sooner retired with unwilling steps, than, to the surprise of the Lady of Ivanhoe, her fair visitant kneeled on one knee, pressed her hands to her forehead, and bending her head to the ground, in spite of Rowena's resistance, kissed the embroidered hem of her tunic.

"What means this, lady?" said the surprised bride; "or why do you offer to me a deference so unusual?"

"Because to you, Lady of Ivanhoe," said Rebecca, rising up and resuming the usual quiet dignity of her manner, "I may lawfully, and without rebuke, pay the debt of gratitude which I owe to Wilfred of Ivanhoe. I am—forgive the boldness which has offered to you the homage of my country—I am the unhappy Jewess, for whom your husband hazarded his life against such fearful odds in the tiltyard of Templestowe."

"Damsel," said Rowena, "Wilfred of Ivanhoe on that day rendered back but in slight measure your unceasing charity towards him in his wounds and misfortunes. Speak, is there aught remains in which he or I can serve thee?"

"Nothing," said Rebecca, calmly, "unless you will transmit to him my grateful farewell."

"You leave England, then?" said Rowena, scarce recovering the surprise of this extraordinary visit.

"I leave it, lady, ere this moon again changes. My father hath a brother high in favour with Mohammed Boabdil, King of Grenada—thither we go, secure of peace and protection, for the payment of such ransom as the Moslem exact from our people."

"And are you not then as well protected in England?" said Rowena. "My husband has favour with the King—the King himself is just and generous."

"Lady," said Rebecca, "I doubt it not—but the people of England are a fierce race, quarrelling ever with their neighbours or among themselves, and ready to plunge the sword into the bowels of each other Such is no safe abode for the children of my people. Ephraim is a heartless dove—Issachar an overlaboured drudge, which stoops between two burdens

Not in a land of war and blood, surrounded by hostile neighbours, and distracted by internal factions, can Israel hope to rest during her wanderings."

"But you, maiden," said Rowena—"you surely can have nothing to fear. She who nursed the sick-bed of Ivanhoe," she continued, rising with enthusiasm—"she can have nothing to fear in England, where Saxon and Norman will contend who shall most do her honour."

"Thy speech is fair, lady," said Rebecca, "and thy purpose fairer; but it may not be—there is a gulf betwixt us. Our breeding, our faith, alike forbid either to pass over it. Farewell—yet, ere I go, indulge me one request. The bridal-veil hangs over thy face; deign to raise it, and let me see the features of which fame speaks so highly."

"They are scarce worthy of being looked upon," said Rowena; "but, expecting the same from my visitant, I remove the veil."

She took it off accordingly; and, partly from the consciousness of beauty, partly from bashfulness, she blushed so intensely, that cheek, brow, neck, and bosom, were suffused with crimson. Rebecca blushed also, but it was a momentary feeling; and, mastered by higher emotions, past slowly from her features like the crimson cloud, which changes colour when the sun sinks beneath the horizon.

"Lady," she said, "the countenance you have deigned to show me will long dwell in my remembrance. There reigns in it gentleness and goodness; and if a tinge of the world's pride or vanities may mix with an expression so lovely, how should we chide that which is of earth for bearing some colour of its original? Long, long will I remember your features, and bless God that I leave my noble deliverer united with"——

She stopped short—her eyes filled with tears. She hastily wiped them, and answered to the anxious inquiries of Rowena—"I am well, lady—well. But my heart swells when I think of Torquilstone and the lists of Templestowe.—Farewell. One, the most trifling part of my duty, remains undischarged. Accept this casket—startle not at its contents."

Rowena opened the small silver-chased casket, and perceived a carcanet or necklace, with ear-jewels, of diamonds, which were obviously of immense value.

"It is impossible," she said, tendering back the casket. "I dare not accept a gift of such consequence."

"Yet keep it, lady," returned Rebecca.—"You have power, rank, command, influence; we have wealth, the source both of our strength and weakness; the value of these toys, ten times multiplied, would not influence half so much as your slightest wish. To you, therefore, the gift is of little value,—and to me, what I part with is of much less. Let me not think you deem so wretchedly ill of my nation as your commons believe. Think ye that I prize these sparkling fragments of stone above my liberty? or that my father values them in comparison to the honour of his only child? Accept them, lady—to me they are valueless I will never wear jewels more."

"You are then unhappy!" said Rowena, struck with the manner in which Rebecca uttered the last word "O remain with us—the counsel of holy men will wean you from your erring law, and I will be a sister to you."

"No, lady," answered Rebecca, the same calm melancholy reigning in her soft voice and beautiful features—"that may not be. I may not change the faith of my fathers like a garment unsuited to the climate in which I seek to dwell, and unhappy, lady, I will not be. He, to whom I dedicate my future life, will be my comforter, if I do His will."

"Have you then convents, to one of which you mean to retire?" asked Rowena.

"No, lady," said the Jewess; "but among our people, since the time of Abraham downwards, have been women who have devoted their thoughts to Heaven, and their actions to works of kindness to men, tending the sick, feeding the hungry, and relieving the distressed. Among these will Rebecca be numbered. Say this to thy lord, should he chance to inquire after the fate of her whose life he saved."

There was an involuntary tremour on Rebecca's voice, and a tenderness of accent, which perhaps betrayed more than she would willingly have expressed. She hastened to bid Rowena adieu.

"Farewell," she said. "May He, who made both Jew and Christian, shower down on you his choicest blessings! The bark that wafts us hence will be under weigh ere we can reach the port."

She glided from the apartment, leaving Rowena surprised as if a vision had passed before her. The fair Saxon related the singular conference to her husband, on whose mind it made a deep impression. He lived long and happily with Rowena, for they were attached to each other by the bonds of early affection, and they loved each other the more, from the recollection of the obstacles which had impeded their union. Yet it would be inquiring too curiously to ask, whether the recollection of Rebecca's beauty and magnanimity did not recur to his mind more frequently than the fair descendant of Alfred might altogether have approved.

Ivanhoe distinguished himself in the service of Richard, and was graced with farther marks of the royal favour. He might have risen still higher, but for the premature death of the heroic Cœur-de-Lion before the Castle of Chaluz, near Limoges. With the life of a generous, but rash and romantic monarch perished all the projects which his ambition and his generosity had formed; to whom may be applied, with a slight alteration, the lines composed by Johnson for Charles of Sweden—

> His fate was destined to a foreign strand,
> A petty fortress and an "humble" hand;
> He left the name at which the world grew pale,
> To point a moral, or adorn a TALE.

THE END OF IVANHOE.

THE MONASTERY.

INTRODUCTION TO THE MONASTERY.

---

ould be difficult to assign any good reason why the au- Ivanhoe, after using, in that work, all the art he pos- to remove the personages, action, and manners of the a distance from his own country, should choose for the f his next attempt the celebrated ruins of Melrose, in mediate neighbourhood of his own residence. But the or caprice, which dictated his change of system, has escaped his recollection, nor is it worth while to attempt g what must be a matter of very little consequence.

general plan of the story was, to conjoin two characters bustling and contentious age, who, thrown into situa- hich gave them different views on the subject of the Re- on, should, with the same sincerity and purity of inten- dicate themselves, the one to the support of the sinking of the Catholic Church, the other to the establishment Reformed doctrines. It was supposed that some inter- subjects for narrative might be derived from opposing h enthusiasts to each other in the path of life, and con- the real worth of both with their passions and preju- The localities of Melrose suited well the scenery of the d story; the ruins themselves form a splendid theatre tragic incident which might be brought forward: joined vicinity of the fine river, with all its tributary streams, through a country which has been the scene of so much ighting, and is rich with so many recollections of former and lying almost under the immediate eye of the author, as they were to be used in composition.

situation possessed farther recommendations. On the bank of the Tweed might be seen the remains of an- nclosures, surrounded by sycamores and ash-trees of arable size. These had once formed the crofts or arable of a village, now reduced to a single hut, the abode of man, who also manages a ferry. The cottages, even the which once existed there, have sunk into vestiges hardly aced without visiting the spot, the inhabitants having lly withdrawn to the more prosperous town of Gala- which has risen into consideration, within two miles of ighbourhood. Superstitious eld, however, has tenanted erted groves with aerial beings, to supply the want of rtal tenants who have deserted it. The ruined and ned churchyard of Boldside has been long believed to ted by the Fairies, and the deep broad current of the , wheeling in moonlight round the foot of the steep with the number of trees originally planted for shelter the fields of the cottagers, but now presenting the effect tered and detached groves, fill up the idea which one form in imagination for a scene that Oberon and Queen ight love to revel in. There are evenings when the or might believe, with Father Chaucer, that the > ——"Queen of Faery,

> With harp, and pipe, and symphony,
> Were dwelling in the place."

her, and even a more familiar refuge of the elfin race, lition is to be trusted,) is the glen of the river, or rather named the Allen, which falls into the Tweed from the ard, about a quarter of a mile above the present bridge. streamlet finds its way behind Lord Sommerville's hunt- t, called the Pavilion, its valley has been popularly term- Fairy Dean, or rather the Nameless Dean, because of the d ill luck attached by the popular faith of ancient times, one who might name or allude to the race, whom our distinguished as the Good Neighbours, and the High- called Daoine Shie, or Men of Peace; rather by way diment, than on account of any particular idea of friend- pacific relation which either Highlander or Borderer ned towards the irritable beings whom they thus dis- ed, or supposed them to bear to humanity.*

dence of the actual operations of the fairy people even ime, little pieces of calcareous matter are found in the er a flood, which either the labours of those tiny artists, ddies of the brook among the stones, have formed into a c resemblance of cups, saucers, basins, and the like, in hildren who gather them pretend to discern fairy utensils es these circumstances of romantic locality, mea paro- ea (as Captain Dalgetty denominates his territory of warke) are bounded by a small but deep lake, from eyes that yet look on the light are said to have seen the ll ascend, and shake the hills with his roar.

d, the country around Melrose, if possessing less of ro- beauty than some other scenes in Scotland, is connected many associations of a fanciful nature, in which the ation takes delight, as might well induce one even less d to the spot than the author, to accommodate, after a manner, the imaginary scenes he was framing to the lo- to which he was partial. But it would be a misappre- to suppose, that, because Melrose may in general pass naquhair, or because it agrees with scenes of the Mon- n the circumstances of the drawbridge, the mill-dam, er points of resemblance, that therefore an accurate or local similitude is to be found in all the particulars of ure. It was not the purpose of the author to present a pe copied from nature, but a piece of composition, in real scene, with which he is familiar, had afforded him some leading outlines. Thus the resemblance of the im- aginary Glendearg with the real vale of the Allen, is far from being minute, nor did the author aim at identifying them. This must appear plain to all who know the actual character of the Glen of Allen, and have taken the trouble to read the account of the imaginary Glendearg. The stream in the latter case is described as wandering down a romantic little valley, shifting itself, after the fashion of such a brook, from one side to the other, as it can most easily find its passage, and touching nothing in its progress that gives token of cultivation. It rises near a solitary tower, the abode of a supposed church vassal, and the scene of several incidents in the Romance.

The real Allen, on the contrary, after traversing the roman- tic ravine called the Nameless Dean, thrown off from side to side alternately, like a billiard ball repelled by the sides of the table on which it has been played, and in that part of its course resembling the stream which pours down Glendearg, may be traced upwards into a more open country, where the banks re- treat further from each other and the vale exhibits a good deal of dry ground, which has not been neglected by the active cul- tivators of the district. It arrives, too, at a sort of termina- tion, striking in itself, but totally irreconcilable with the narra- tive of the Romance. Instead of a single peel-house, or border tower of defence, such as Dame Glendinning is supposed to have inhabited, the head of the Allen, about five miles above its junction with the Tweed, shows three ruins of Border houses, belonging to different proprietors, and each, from the desire of mutual support so natural to troublesome times, situated at the extremity of the property of which it is the principal messuage. One of those is the ruinous mansion-house of Hillslap, for- merly the property of the Cairncrosses, and now of Mr. Innes of Stow; a second, the tower of Colmslie, an ancient inheri- tance of the Borthwick family, as is testified by their crest, the Goat's Head, which exists on the ruin; a third, the house of Langshaw, also ruinous, but near which the proprietor, Mr. Baillie of Jerviswood and Mellerstain, has built a small shoot- ing box.

All these ruins, so strangely huddled together in a very soli- tary spot, have recollections and traditions of their own, but none of them bear the most distant resemblance to the de- scriptions in the Romance of the Monastery; and as the au- thor could hardly have erred so grossly regarding a spot within a morning's ride of his own house, the inference is, that no resemblance was intended. Hillslap is remembered by the humours of the last inhabitants, two or three elderly ladies, of the class of Miss Raynalds, in the Old Manor House, though less important by birth and fortune. Colmslie is commemora- ted in song:—

> Colmslie stands on Colmslie hill,
> The water it flows round Colmslie mill;
> The mill and the kiln gang bonnily,
> And it's up with the whippers of Colmslie.

Langshaw, although larger than the other mansions assem- bled at the head of the supposed Glendearg, has nothing about it more remarkable than the inscription of the present proprie- tor over his shooting lodge—Utinam hanc etiam viris impleam amicis: a modest wish, which I know no one more capable of attaining upon an extended scale, than the gentleman who has expressed it upon a limited one.

Having thus shown that I could say something of these de- solated towers, which the desire of social intercourse, or the facility of mutual defence, had drawn together at the head of this Glen, I need not add any further reason to show, that there is no resemblance between them and the solitary habitation of Dame Elspeth Glendinning. Beyond these dwellings are some remains of natural wood, and a considerable portion of morass and bog; but I would not advise any who may be curious in localities, to spend time in looking for the fountain and holly- tree of the White Lady.

While I am on the subject I may add, that Captain Clutter- buck, the imaginary editor of the Monastery, has no real pro- totype in the village of Melrose or neighbourhood, that ever I saw or heard of. To give some individuality to this person- age, he is described as a character which sometimes occurs in actual society—a person who, having spent his life within the necessary duties of a technical profession, from which he has been at length emancipated, finds himself without any occupa- tion whatever, and is apt to become the prey of ennui, until he discerns some petty subject of investigation commensurate to his talents, the study of which gives him employment in so- litude; while the conscious possession of information peculiar to himself, adds to his consequence in society. I have often observed, that the lighter and trivial branches of antiquarian study are singularly useful in relieving vacuity of such a kind, and have known them serve many a Captain Clutterbuck to re- treat upon; I was therefore a good deal surprised, when I found the antiquarian Captain identified with a neighbour and friend of my own, who could never have been confounded with him by any one who had read the book, and seen the party alluded to. This erroneous identification occurs in a work entitled, "Illustrations of the Author of Waverley, being Notices and Anecdotes of real Characters, Scenes, and Incidents, supposed to be described in his works, by Robert Chambers." This work ... any one of the ...

* See Rob Ro[y] ...

must be, whatever may be the ingenuity of the author, which takes the task of explaining what can be only known to another person. Mistakes of place or inanimate things referred to, are of very little moment; but the ingenious author ought to have been more cautious of attaching real names to fictitious characters. I think it is in the Spectator we read of a rustic wag, who, in a copy of "The Whole Duty of Man," wrote opposite to every vice the name of some individual in the neighbourhood, and thus converted that excellent work into a libel on a whole parish.

The scenery being thus ready at the author's hand, the reminiscences of the country were equally favourable. In a land where the horses remained almost constantly saddled, and the sword seldom quitted the warrior's side—where war was the natural and constant state of the inhabitants, and peace only existed in the shape of brief and feverish truces—there could be no want of the means to complicate and extricate the incidents of his narrative at pleasure. There was a disadvantage, notwithstanding, in treading this Border district, for it had been already ransacked by the author himself, as well as others; and unless presented under a new light, was likely to afford ground to the objection of Crambe bis cocta.

To attain the indispensable quality of novelty, something, it was thought, might be gained by contrasting the character of the vassals of the church with those of the dependants of the lay barons, by whom they were surrounded. But much advantage could not be derived from this. There were, indeed, differences betwixt the two classes, but, like tribes in the mineral and vegetable world, which, resembling each other to common eyes, can be sufficiently well discriminated by naturalists, they were yet too similar, upon the whole, to be placed in marked contrast with each other.

Machinery remained—the introduction of the supernatural and marvellous; the resort of distressed authors since the days of Horace, but whose privileges as a sanctuary have been disputed in the present age, and wellnigh exploded. The popular belief no longer allows the possibility of existence to the race of mysterious beings which hovered betwixt this world and that which is invisible. The fairies have abandoned their moonlight turf; the witch no longer holds her black orgies in the hemlock dell; and > "Even the last lingering phantom of the brain,

> The churchyard ghost, is now at rest again."

From the discredit attached to the vulgar and more common modes in which the Scottish superstition displays itself, the author was induced to have recourse to the beautiful, though almost forgotten, theory of astral spirits, or creatures of the elements, surpassing human beings in knowledge and power, but inferior to them, as being subject, after a certain space of years, to a death which is to them annihilation, as they have no share in the promise made to the sons of Adam. These spirits are supposed to be of four distinct kinds, as the elements from which they have their origin, and are known, to those who have studied the cabalistical philosophy, by the names of Sylphs, Gnomes, Salamanders, and Nauds, as they belong to the elements of Air, Earth, Fire, or Water. The general reader will find an entertaining account of these elementary spirits in the French book, entitled, "Entretiens de Comte de Gabalis." The ingenious Comte de la Motte Fouqué composed, in German, one of the most successful productions of his fertile brain, where a beautiful and even affecting effect is produced by the introduction of a water-nymph, who loses the privilege of immortality, by consenting to become accessible to human feelings, and uniting her lot with that of a mortal, who treats her with ingratitude.

In imitation of an example so successful, the White Lady of Avenel was introduced into the following sheets. She is represented as connected with the family of Avenel by one of those mystic ties, which, in ancient times, were supposed to exist, in certain circumstances, between the creatures of the elements and the children of men. Such instances of mysterious union are recognised in Ireland, in the real Milesian families, who are possessed of a Banshie; and they are known among the traditions of the Highlanders, which, in many cases, attached an immortal being or spirit to the service of particular families or tribes. These demons, if they are to be called so, announced good or evil fortune to the families connected with them; and though some only condescended to meddle with matters of importance, others, like the May Mollach, or Maid of the Hairy Arms, condescended to mingle in ordinary sports, and even to direct the Chief how to play at draughts.

There was, therefore, no great violence in supposing such a being as this to have existed, while the elementary spirits were believed in; but it was more difficult to describe or imagine its attributes and principles of action. Shakspeare, the first of authorities in such a case, has painted Ariel, that beautiful creature of his fancy, as only approaching so near to humanity as to know the nature of that sympathy which the creatures of clay felt for each other, as we learn from the expression—"Mine would if I were human." The inferences from this are singular, but seem capable of regular deduction. A being, however superior to man in length of life in power over the elements—in certain perceptions respecting the present, the past, and the future, yet still incapable of human passions, of sentiments of moral good and evil, of meriting future rewards or punishments, belongs rather to the class of animals than of human creatures, and must therefore be presumed to act more from temporary benevolence or caprice, than from any thing approaching to feeling or reasoning. Such a being's superiority in power can only be compared to that of the elephant or lion, who are greater in strength than man, though inferior in the scale of creation. The partialities which we suppose such spirits to entertain must be like those of the dog; their sudden starts of passion, or the indulgence of a frolic, or mischief, may be compared to those of the numerous varieties of the cat. All these dispositions are, however controlled by the laws which render the elementary race subordinate to the command to be subjected by his science, as the sect of Gre and on this turned the Rosicrucian philosophy, powered by his superior courage and daring, wh illusions at defiance.

It is with reference to this idea of the supposed elements, that the White Lady of Avenel is repr ing a varying, capricious, and inconsistent par assigned to her in the narrative; manifesting t tachment to the family with whom her destinies but evincing whim, and even a species of malevo other mortals, as the Sacristan and the Border incorrect life subjected them to receive petty m her hand. The White Lady is scarcely supposed have possessed either the power or the inclinati than inflict terror or create embarrassment, and jected by those mortals, who, by virtuous resolut energy, could assert superiority over her. In th she seems to constitute a being of a middle cla esprit follet who places its pleasure in misleading mortals, and the benevolent Fairy of the East, guides, aids, and supports them.

Either, however, the author executed his p ently, or the public did not approve of it; for t of Avenel was far from being popular. He does the present statement, in the view of arming more favourable opinion on the subject, but a purpose of exculpating himself from the charge tently intruded into the narrative a being of mere and propensities.

In the delineation of another character, the Monastery failed, where he hoped for some succe is no successful subject of ridicule as the fashi the time, it occurred to him that the more serio narrative might be relieved by the humour of a age of Queen Elizabeth. In every period, the and maintain the highest rank of society, has d power of assuming and supporting a certain fa of affectation, usually connected with some vi and energy of character, but distinguished at th a transcendant flight, by sound sense and both faculties too vulgar to be admitted into one who claims to be esteemed "a choice spi These, in their different places, constitute the day, whose boast it is to drive the whims o trenty.

On all occasions, the manners of the sovere and the time, must give the tone to the peculia qualities by which those who would attain the h must seek to distinguish themselves. The reg being that of a maiden queen, was distinguish ram of the courtiers and especially the affectati est deference to the sovereign. After the ackn the Queen's matchless perfections, the same de tended to beauty as it existed among the less court, who sparkled, as it was the mode to say, l lustre. It is true, that radiant knights no lo Heaven, the peacock, and the Indies, to perfor extravagant chivalry, in which they endanger others as well as their own; but although their plays of personal gallantry seldom went further days than the tiltyard, where barricades, calle vented the shock of the horses, and limited the exploits' skill to the comparatively safe enc lances, the language of the lovers to their ladies exalted terms which Amadis would have addre before encountering a dragon for her sake. Thus te gallantry found a clever but conceited author a species of constitution and form, and lay do manner of conversation, in a pedantic book, call his England. Of this, a brief account is given which it may now be proper to make some addi

The extravagance of Euphuism, or a symbo the same class, predominates in the romances and Senderi, which were read for the amusem set of France during the long reign of Louis X supposed to contain the only legitimate langua gallantry. In this reign they encountered the sa and Boileau. A similar disorder, spreading into formed the ground of the affected dialogue of th the précieuses style, who formed the coterie of the hotel, and afforded Moliere matter for his adm Les Précieuses Ridicules. In England, the humour to have long survived the accession of James I.

The author had the vanity to think that a ch peculiarities should turn on extravagances wh universally fashionable, might be read in a fictiti a good chance of affording amusement to the t tion, who, fond as they are of looking back on t manners of the ir ancestors, might be also supp sible of their absurdities. He must fairly ackno was dis appointed, and that the Euphuist, far counted a well drawn and humorous character was condemned as unnatural and absurd.

It would be easy to account for this failure, by defect to arise from the author's want of skill, many readers may not be inclined to look furth author himself can scarcely be supposed willing this final cause, if any other can be alleged, he suspect, that, contrary to what he originally sup ject was injudiciously chosen, in which, and not treating it, lay the source of the want of succes

The manners of a rude people are always foun and therefore the feelings of a more polished ge tively sympathize with them. We need no m no antiquarian dissertations, to enable the most cognise the sentiments and diction of the charac

as Lear says, to strip off our lendings—to set aside s principles and adornments which we have received nparatively artificial system of society, and our na- are in unison with those of the bard of Chaos and who live in his verses. It is the same with a great arratives of my friend Mr Cooper. We sympathize ian chiefs and back woodsmen, and acknowledge, cters which he presents to us, the same truth of e by which we should feel ourselves influenced if e same condition. So much is this the case, that difficult, or almost impossible, to reclaim a savage, s youth to war and the chase, to the restraints and civilized life, nothing is more easy or common, men who have been educated in all the habits and improved society, willing to exchange them for the of the hunter and the fisher. The very amuse- pursued and relished by men of all ranks, whose permit active exercise, are hunting, fishing, and in es, war, the natural and necessary business of the yden, where his hero talks of being

——"As free as nature first made man,
When wild in woods the noble savage ran."

gh the occupations, and even the sentiments of hu- n a primitive state, find access and interest in the e more civilized part of the species, it does not low, that the national tastes, opinions, and follies, ed period, should afford either the same interest or usement to those of another. These generally, to extravagance, are founded not upon any natural to the species, but upon the growth of some pecu- of affectation, with which mankind in general, and enerations in particular, feel no common interest . The extravagances of coxcombry in manners and indeed the legitimate, and often the successful ob- e, during the time when they exist. In evidence of cal critics may observe how many dramatic jeux well received every season, because the satirist levels l-known or fashionable absurdity; or, in the dra e, "shoots folly as it flies." But when the peculiar keeps the wing no longer, it is reckoned but waste a paper pellet of ridicule on what has ceased d the pieces in which such forgotten absurdities e subject of ridicule, fall quietly into oblivion with hich gave them fashion, or only continue to exist , because they contain some other more permanent n that which connects them with manners and fol- porary character.

aps, affords a reason why the comedies of Ben Jon- upon system, or what the age termed humours,— s meant factitious and affected characters, super- hat which was common to the rest of their race,— ute satire, deep scholarship, and strong sense, do t general pleasure, but are confined to the closet uary, whose studies have assured him that the per- e dramatist were once, though they are now no its of existing nature.

another example of our hypothesis from Shaks- f, who, of all authors, drew his portraits for all ages. hole sum of the idolatry which affects us at his ss of readers peruse, without amusement, the cha- d on the extravagances of temporary fashion; and Don Armado, the pedant Holofernes, even Nym re read with little pleasure by the mass of the pub- rtraits of which we cannot recognise the humour, originals no longer exist. In like manner, while s of Romeo and Juliet continue to interest every utio, drawn as an accurate representation of the gentleman of the period, and as such received by us approbation of contemporaries, has so little to present age, that, stripped of all his puns and quirks , he only retains his place in the scene, in virtue of fanciful speech upon dreaming, which belongs to age, and because he is a personage whose presence ble to the plot.

lready prosecuted perhaps too far an argument, the which is to prove, that the introduction of an hu- g, like Sir Piercie Shafton, upon some forgotten model of folly, once fashionable, is rather likely he disgust of the reader, as unnatural, than find him hter. Whether owing to this theory, or whether simple and probable cause of the author's failure in on of the subject he had proposed to himself, the objection of incredulus odi was applied to the Eu- ell as to the White Lady of Avenel; and the one ed as unnatural, while the other was rejected as little in the story to atone for these failures in two nts. The incidents were inartificially huddled together. There was no part of the intrigue to which deep interest was found to apply; and the conclusion was brought about, not by incidents arising out of the story itself, but in consequence of public transactions, with which the narrative has little connexion, and which the reader had little opportunity to become acquainted with.

This, if not a positive fault, was yet a great defect in the Romance. It is true, that not only the practice of some great authors in this department, but even the general course of human life itself, may be quoted in favour of this more obvious, and less artificial practice, of arranging a narrative. It is seldom that the same circle of personages who have surrounded an individual at his first outset in life, continue to have an interest in his career till his fate comes to a crisis. On the contrary, and more especially if the events of his life be of a varied character, and worth communicating to others, or to the world, the hero's later connexions are usually totally separated from those with whom he began the voyage, but whom the individual has outsailed, or who have drifted astray, or foundered on the passage. This hackneyed comparison holds good in another point. The numerous vessels of so many different sorts, and destined for such different purposes, which are launched in the same mighty ocean, although each endeavours to pursue its own course, are in every case more influenced by the winds and tides which are common to the element which they all navigate, than by their own separate exertions. And it is thus in the world, that, when human prudence has done its best, some general, perhaps national event, destroys the schemes of the individual, as the casual touch of a more powerful being sweeps away the web of the spider.

Many excellent romances have been composed in this view of human life, where the hero is conducted through a variety of detached scenes, in which various agents appear and disappear, without, perhaps, having any permanent influence on the progress of the story. Such is the structure of Gil Blas, Roderick Random, and the lives and adventures of many other heroes, who are described as running through different stations of life, and encountering various adventures, which are only connected with each other by having happened to be witnessed by the same individual, whose identity unites them together, as the string of a necklace links the beads, which are otherwise detached.

But though such an unconnected course of adventures is what most frequently occurs in nature, yet the province of the romance writer being artificial, there is more required from him than a mere compliance with the simplicity of reality,—just as we demand from the scientific gardener, that he shall arrange, in curious knots and artificial parterres, the flowers which "nature boon" distributes freely on hill and dale. Fielding, accordingly, in most of his novels, but especially in Tom Jones, his chef-d'œuvre, has set the distinguished example of a story regularly built and consistent in all its parts, in which nothing occurs, and scarce a personage is introduced, that has not some share in tending to advance the catastrophe.

To demand equal correctness and felicity in those who may follow in the track of that illustrious novelist, would be to fetter too much the power of giving pleasure, by surrounding it with penal rules; since of this sort of light literature it may be especially said—tout genre permis, hors le genre ennuyeux. Still, however, the more closely and happily the story is combined, and the more natural and felicitous the catastrophe, the nearer such a composition will approach the perfection of the novelist's art; nor can an author neglect this branch of his profession, without incurring proportional censure.

For such censure the Monastery gave but too much occasion. The intrigue of the Romance, neither very interesting in itself, nor very happily detailed, is at length finally disentangled by the breaking out of national hostilities between England and Scotland, and the as sudden renewal of the truce. Instances of this kind, it is true, cannot in reality have been uncommon, but the resorting to such, in order to accomplish the catastrophe, as by a tour de force, was objected to as inartificial, and not perfectly intelligible to the general reader.

Still the Monastery, though exposed to severe and just criticism, did not fail, judging from the extent of its circulation, to have some interest for the public. And this, too, was according to the ordinary course of such matters; for it very seldom happens that literary reputation is gained by a single effort, and still more rarely is it lost by a solitary miscarriage.

The author, therefore, had his days of grace allowed him, and time if he pleased, to comfort himself with the burden of the old Scots song,

"If it isna weel bobbit, We'll bob it again."

ABBOTSFORD,
1st November 1830.

INTRODUCTORY EPISTLE

FROM

CAPTAIN CLUTTERBUCK,

LATE OF HIS MAJESTY'S —— REGIMENT OF INFANTRY,

TO

THE AUTHOR OF "WAVERLEY."

SIR,

ALTHOUGH I do not pretend to the pleasure of your personal acquaintance, like many whom I believe to be equally strangers to you, I am nevertheless interested in your publications, and desire their continuance;—not that I pretend to much taste in fictitious composition, or that I am apt to be interested in your grave scenes, or amused by those which are meant to be lively. I will not disguise from you, that I have yawned over the last interview of MacIvor and his sister, and fell fairly asleep while the schoolmaster was reading the humours of Dandie Dinmont. You see, sir, that I scorn to solicit your favour in a way to which you are no stranger. If the papers I enclose you are worth nothing, I will not endeavour to recommend them by personal flattery, as a bad cook pours rancid butter upon stale fish. No, sir! What I respect in you, is the light you have occasionally thrown on national antiquities, a study which I have commenced rather late in life, but to which I am attached with the devotion of a first love, because it is the only study I ever cared a farthing for.

You shall have my history, sir, (it will not reach to three volumes,) before that of my manuscript; and as you usually throw out a few lines of verse, (by way of skirmishers, I suppose,) at the head of each division of prose, I have had the luck to light upon a stanza in the schoolmaster's copy of Burns which describes me exactly. I love it better, because it was originally designed for Captain Grose, an excellent antiquary, though, like yourself, somewhat too apt to treat with levity his own pursuits:

> 'Tis said he was a soldier bred,
> And one wad rather fa'en than fled;
> But now he has quit the spurtle blade
> And dog-skin wallet,
> And ta'en the—antiquarian trade,
> I think they call it.

I never could conceive what influenced me, when a boy, in the choice of a profession. Military zeal and ardour it was not, which made me stand out for a commission in the Scots Fusiliers, when my tutors and curators wished to bind me apprentice to old David Stoles, Clerk to his Majesty's Signet. I say, military zeal it was not: for I was no fighting boy in my own person, and cared not a penny to read the history of the heroes who turned the world upside down in former ages. As for courage, I had, as I have since discovered, just as much of it as served my turn, and not one grain of surplus. I soon found out, indeed, that in action there was more danger in running away than in standing fast; and besides, I could not afford to lose my commission, which was my chief means of support. But, as for that overboiling valour, which I have heard many of ours talk of, though I seldom observed that it influenced them in the actual affair—that exuberant zeal, which courts Danger as a bride,—truly my courage was of a coarser description, much less sensational.

Again, the love of a red coat, which, in default of all other aptitudes to the profession, has made many a bad soldier and some good ones, was an utter stranger to my disposition. I cared not a "bodle" for the company of the misses. Nay, though there was a boarding-school in the village, and though we used to meet with its fair inmates at Susan Liziffont's weekly Practicque, I cannot recollect any strong emotions being excited on those occasions, except the innate regret with which I went through the polite ceremonial of presenting my partner with an orange, thrust into my pocket in my aunt for this special purpose, but which, had I dared, I certainly would have secreted for my own personal use. As for vanity, or love of finery for itself, I was such a stranger to it, that the difficulty was great to make me brush my coat, and appear in proper trim upon parade. I shall never forget the rebuke of my old Colonel on a morning when the King reviewed a brigade of which ours made part. "I am no friend to extravagance, Ensign Clutterbuck," said he; "but, on the day when we are to pass before the Sovereign of the kingdom, in the name of God I would have at least shown him an inch of clean linen."

Thus, a stranger to all the ordinary motives which lead young men to make the army their choice, and without the least desire to become either a hero or a dandy, I really do not know what determined my thoughts that way, unless it were the happy state of half-pay indolence enjoyed by Cap little, who had set up his staff of rest in my native Every other person had, or seemed to have, someth less or more. They did not indeed precisely go to s learn tasks, that last of evils in my estimation; but escape my boyish observation, that they were all with something or other like duty or labour—all but Captain Doolittle. The minister had his parish to his preaching to prepare, though perhaps he made than he needed about both. The laird had his fa improving operations to superintend; and, besides, attend trustee meetings, and lieutenancy meetings, courts, and meetings of justices, and what not—was a (that I detested,) and as much in the open air, wet o his own grieve. The shopkeeper (the village boast of commerce) stood indeed pretty much at his ease counter, for his custom was by no means overburden still he enjoyed his otium, as the Baillie calls it, a tion of tumbling all the wares in his booth over and any one chose to want a yard of muslin, a nosegay of caraways, a paper of pins, the Sermons of Mr. the Life of Jack the Giant-Queller, (not Killer, erroneously written and pronounced.—See my essay history of this worthy, where real facts have in a g been obscured by fable.) In short, all in the vi under the necessity of doing something which they ther have left undone, excepting Captain Doolittle, w every morning in the open street, which formed the of our village, in a blue coat with a red neck, and whist the whole evening, when he could make up a pa happy vacuity of all employment appeared to me so that it became the primary lust, which, according t tem of Helvetius, as the minister says, determined talents towards the profession I was destined to illust

But who, alas, can form a just estimate of their fu pects in this deceitful world! I was not long enga new profession, before I discovered, that if the indep dolence of half pay was a paradise, the officer must pas the purgatory of duty and service in order to gain ad it. Captain Doolittle might brush his blue coat wit neck, or leave it unbrushed, at his pleasure; but Ens seruck had no such option. Captain Doolittle ma lied at ten o'clock, if he had a mind; but the Ens make the rounds in his turn. What was worse, the might repose under the tester of his tent-bed until no was so pleased; but the Ensign. God help him, had upon parade at peep of day. As for duty, I made thi as I could, had the serjeant to whisper to me the command, and bustled through as other folks did. vice. I saw enough for an indolent man—was buffeted down the world, and visited both the East and We Egypt, and other distant places, which my youth ha dreamed of. The French I saw, and felt too; witness ers of my right hand, which one of their cursed has off with his sabre as neatly as an hospital surgeon. the death of an old aunt, who left me some fifteen pounds, snugly vested in the three per cents, gave me wish for opportunity of retiring, with the prospect ing a clean shirt and a guinea four times a-week at less

For the purpose of commencing my new way of l lected for my residence the village of Kennaquhair, in of Scotland, celebrated for the ruins of its magnificen tery, overawing them to lead my future life in the st dignity of half pay an annuity. I was not long, ho making the grand discovery, that in order to enjoy lei absolutely necessary it should be preceded by occupati some time, it was delightful to wake at daybreak, dre the reveille—then to recollect my happy emancipati the slavery that doomed me to start at a piece of c parchment, turn on my other side, damn the parade, a sleep again. But even this enjoyment had its term and time, when it became a stock entirely at my own began to hang heavy on my hand.

I angled for two days, during which time I lost twenty and several scores of yards of gut and line, and caught a minnow. Hunting was out of the question, for the of a horse by no means agrees with a half-pay establi

…t, the shepherds and ploughmen, and my very dog, … every time that I missed, which was, generally … very time I fired. Besides, the country gentlemen … ter like their game, and began to talk of prosecu… iterdicts. I did not give up fighting the French to … a domestic war with the "pleasant men of Teviot… e song calls them; so I e'en spent three days (very … in cleaning my gun, and disposing it upon two … my chimney-piece.

…ess of this accidental experiment set me on trying … the mechanical arts. Accordingly, I took down … I my landlady's cuckoo-clock, and in so doing, si… companion of the spring for ever and a day. I … turning lathe, and, in attempting to use it, I very … hed off, with an inch-and half former, one of the … h the hussar had left me.

…ried, both those of the little circulating library, and … re rational subscription collection maintained by … tual people. But neither the light reading of the … e heavy artillery of the other, suited my purpose. … I asleep at the fourth or fifth page of history or dis… and it took me a month's hard reading to wade … alf bound trashy novel, during which I was pestered … ations to return the volumes, by every half-bred … ties about the place. In short, during the hours … e town besides had something to do, I had nothing … o walk in the churchyard, and whistle till it was …

…ese promenades, the Ruins necessarily forced them… y attention, and, by degrees, I found myself engag… ing the more minute ornaments, and at length the … n, of this noble structure. The old sexton aided … and gave me his portion of traditional lore. Every … omething to my stock of knowledge respecting the … e of the building, and at length I made discoveries … the purpose of several detached and very ruinous … it, the use of which had hitherto been either un… gether, or erroneously explained.

…rledge which I thus acquired I had frequent oppor… retailing to those visiters whom the progress of … ur brought to visit this celebrated spot. Without … g on the privilege of my friend the sexton, I became … n assistant Cicerone in the task of description and … t, and often (seeing a fresh party of visitors arrive) … ed over to me those to whom he had told half his … the flattering observation. "What needs I say ony … it? There's the Captain kens mair anent it than … man in the town." Then would I salute the stran… usly, and expatiate to their astonished minds upon … hancels, and naves, arches, Gothic and Saxon arch… lions and flying buttresses. It not infrequently hap… an acquaintance which commenced in the Abbey … n the inn, which served to relieve the solitude as … monotony of my landlady's shoulder of mutton, … st, cold, or hashed.

… my mind became enlarged: I found a book or two … htened me on the subject of Gothic architecture, … ow with pleasure, because I was interested in what … . Even my character began to dilate and expand. … more authority at the club, and was listened to … ice, because on one subject, at least, I possessed … nation than any of its members. Indeed, I found … ny stories about Egypt, which, to say truth, were … hreadbare, were now listened to with more respect … ly "The Captain," they said, "had something in …,—there were few folk kend sae muckle about the …

… general approbation waxed my own sense of self… and my feeling of general comfort. I ate with … te, I digested with more ease, I lay down at night … id slept sound till morning, when I arose with a … y importance, and hied me to measure, to examine, … pare the various parts of this interesting structure. … se and consciousness of certain unpleasant sensa… on descript nature, about my head and stomach, to … been in the habit of attending, more for the benefit … e apothecary than my own, for the pure want of … se to think about. I had found out an occupation … and was happy because I had something to do. … had commenced local antiquary, and was not un… ne name.

…was in this pleasing career of busy idleness, for so … ust be called, it happened that I was one night sit… ttle parlour adjacent to the closet which my land… r bedroom, in the act of preparing for an early … [illegible] of Mon[illegible] … Monasticon, for … the library at A—, was lying on the table before … by some excellent Cheshire cheese (a present by … m an honest London citizen, to whom I had ex… lifference betwixt a Gothic and a Saxon arch), and … anderhagen's best ale. Thus armed at all points … ld enemy Time, I was leisurely and deliciously pe… ed—now reading a line of old Dugdale—now sip… or munching my bread and cheese—now undoing … at my breeches' knees, or a button or two of my … until the village clock should strike ten, before … make it a rule never to go to bed. A loud knock… , interrupted my ordinary process on this occasion, … e of my honest landlord of the George was heard … "What the deevil, Mrs Grimslees, the Captain …

is no in his bed? and a gentleman at our house has ordered a fowl and minced collops, and a bottle of sherry, and has sent to ask him to supper, to tell him all about the Abbey."

"Na," answered Luckie Grimslees, in the true sleepy tone of a Scottish matron when ten o'clock is going to strike, "he's no in his bed, but I'se warrant him no gae out at this time o' night to keep folks sitting up waiting for him—the Captain's a decent man."

I plainly perceived this last compliment was made for my hearing, by way both of indicating and recommending the course of conduct which Mrs. Grimslees desired I should pursue. But I had not been knocked about the world for thirty years and odd, and lived a bluff bachelor all the while, to come home and be put under petticoat government by my landlady. Accordingly I opened my chamber-door, and desired my old friend David to walk up stairs.

"Captain," said he, as he entered, "I am as glad to find you up as if I had hooked a twenty pound saumon. There's a gentleman up yonder that will not sleep sound in his bed this blessed night, unless he has the pleasure to drink a glass of wine with you."

"You know, David," I replied, with becoming dignity, "that I cannot with propriety go out to visit strangers at this time of night, or accept of invitations from people of whom I know nothing."

David swore a round oath, and added, "Was ever the like heard of? He has ordered a fowl and egg sauce, a pancake and minched collops, and a bottle of sherry—D'ye think I wad come and ask you to go to keep company with ony bit English rider, that sups on toasted cheese, and a cheerer of rum-toddy? This is a gentleman every inch of him, and a virtuoso, a clean virtuoso—a sad-coloured stand of claithes, and a wig like the curled back of a mug-ewe. The very first question he speered was about the auld drawbrig that has been at the bottom of the water these twalscore years—I have seen the fundations when we were sticking saumon—And how the deevil sauld he ken ony thing about the auld drawbrig, unless he were a virtuoso?"†

David being a virtuoso in his own way, and moreover a landholder and heritor, was a qualified judge of all who frequented his house, and therefore I could not avoid again tying the strings of my knees.

"That's right, Captain," vociferated David; "you twa will be as thick as three in a bed an ance ye forgather. I haena seen the like o' him my very sell since I saw the great Doctor Samuel Johnson on his tower through Scotland, whilk tower is lying in my back-parlour for the amusement of my guests, wi' the twa boards torn aff."

"Then the gentleman is a scholar, David?"

"I'se uphaud him a scholar," answered David; "he has a black coat on, or a brown ane, at ony rate."

"Is he a clergyman?"

"I am thinking no, for he looked after his horse's supper before he spoke o' his ain," replied mine host.

"Has he a servant?" demanded I.

"Nae servant," answered David; "but a grand face he has o' his ain, that wad gar ony body be willing to serve him that looks upon him."

"And what makes him think of disturbing me? Ah, David, this has been some of your chattering; you are perpetually bringing your guests on my shoulders, as if it were my business to entertain every man who comes to the George."

"What the deil wad ye hae me do, Captain?" answered mine host; "a gentleman lights down, and asks me in a most earnest manner, what man of sense and learning there is about our town, that can tell him about the antiquities of the place, and specially about the auld Abbey—ye wadna hae me tell the gentleman a lee? and ye ken weel eneugh there is naebody in the town can say a reasonable word about it, be it no yoursell, except the bedral, and he is as fou as a piper by this time. So, says I, there's Captain Clutterbuck, that's a very civil gentleman, and has little to do forby telling a' the auld cracks about the Abbey, and dwells just hard by. Then says the gentleman to me, 'Sir,' says he, very civilly, 'have the goodness to step to Captain Clutterbuck with my compliments, and say I am a stranger, who have been led to these parts chiefly by the fame of these Ruins, and that I would call upon him, but the hour is late.' And mair he said that I have forgotten, but I weel remember it ended,—'And, landlord, get a bottle of your best sherry, and supper for two'—You wadna have had me refuse to do the gentleman's bidding, and me a publican?"

"Well, David," said I, "I wish your virtuoso had taken a fitter hour—but as you say he is a gentleman"——

"I'se uphaud him that—the order speaks for itsell—a bottle of sherry—minched collops and a fowl—that's speaking like a gentleman, I trow?—That's right, Captain, button weel up, the night's raw—but the water's clearing for a' that; we'll be on't wi' my Lord's boats, and we'll hae ill luck if I dinna send you a kipper to relish your ale at e'en."‡

In five minutes after this dialogue, I found myself in the parlour of the George, and in the presence of the stranger.

He was a grave personage, about my own age, (which we shall call about fifty,) and really had, as my friend David expressed it, something in his face that inclined men to oblige and to serve him. Yet this expression of authority was not at all of the cast which I have seen in the countenance of a general of brigade, neither was the stranger's dress at all martial. It con-

…te was, and is, the principal inn in the village of Kennaquhair. But the landlord of the period was not the same … person by whom the inn is now kept. David Kyle, a … ietor of no little importance, a first rate person of consequence, whatever belonged to the business of the town, was the original landlord of the inn. Poor David! like many other … k so much care of public affairs, as in some degree to … neglect his own. There are persons still alive at Kennaquhair who can recognise him and his peculiarities in the following sketch of mine Host of the George.

† There is more to be said about this old bridge hereafter. See Note, Chapter V. page 23

‡ The nobleman whose boats are mentioned in the text, is the late kind and amiable Lord Sommerville, an intimate friend of the author. David Kyle was a constant and privileged attendant when Lord Sommerville had a party for spearing salmon: on such occasions, eighty or a hundred fish were often killed between Gleamer and Leaderfoot.

sisted of a uniform suit of iron-gray clothes, cut in rather an old-fashioned form. His legs were defended with strong leathern gambadoes, which, according to an antiquarian contrivance, opened at the sides, and were secured by steel clasps. His countenance was worn as much by toil and sorrow as by age, for it intimated that he had seen and endured much. His address was singularly pleasing and gentlemanlike, and the apology which he made for disturbing me at such an hour, and in such a manner, was so well and handsomely expressed, that I could not reply otherwise than by declaring my willingness to be of service to him.

"I have been a traveller to-day, sir," said he, "and I would willingly defer the little I have to say till after supper, for which I feel rather more appetized than usual."

We sate down to table, and notwithstanding the stranger's alleged appetite, as well as the gentle preparation of cheese and ale which I had already laid aboard, I really believe that I of the two did the greater honour to my friend David's fowl and minced collops.

When the cloth was removed, and we had each made a tumbler of negus, of that liquor which hosts call Sherry, and guests call Lisbon, I perceived that the stranger seemed pensive, silent, and somewhat embarrassed, as if he had something to communicate which he knew not well how to introduce. To pave the way for him, I spoke of the ancient ruins of the Monastery, and of their history. But, to my great surprise, I found I had met my match with a witness. The stranger not only knew all that I could tell him, but a great deal more; and, what was still more mortifying, he was able, by reference to dates, charters, and other evidence of facts, that, as Puma says, "downa be disputed," to correct many of the vague tales which I had adopted on loose and vulgar tradition, as well as to confute more than one of my favourite theories on the subject of the old monks and their dwellings, which I had sported freely in all the presumption of superior information. And here I cannot but remark, that much of the stranger's arguments and inductions rested upon the authority of Mr. Deputy Register of Scotland,* and his lucubrations; a gentleman whose indefatigable research into the national records is like to destroy my trade, and that of all local antiquaries, by substituting truth instead of legend and romance. Alas, I would the learned gentleman did but know how difficult it is for us dealers in petty wares of antiquity to—

> Pluck from our memories a rooted "is geal," > Raze out the written troubles of our brain,
> Or cleanse our bosoms of that perilous stuff—

and so forth. It would, I am sure, move his pity to think how many old dogs he hath set to learn new tricks, how many venerable parrots he hath taught to sing a new song, how many gray heads he hath addled by vain attempts to exchange their old Sumpsimus for his new Sumpsimus. But let it pass. Humana perpessi sumus—All changes round us, past, present, and to come; that which was history yesterday becomes fable to-day, and the truth of to-day is hatched into a lie by to-morrow.

Finding myself like to be overpowered in the Monastery, which I had hitherto regarded as my citadel, I began, like a skilful general, to evacuate that place of defence, and fight my way through the adjacent country. I had recourse to my acquaintance with the families and antiquities of the neighbourhood, ground on which I thought I might skirmish at large without its being possible for the stranger to meet me with advantage. But I was mistaken.

The man in the iron-gray suit showed a much more minute knowledge of these particulars than I had the least pretension to. He could tell the very year in which the family of De Haga first settled on their ancient barony.† Not a Thane within reach but he knew his family and connections, how many of his ancestors had fallen by the sword of the English, how many in domestic brawl, and how many by the hand of the executioner for march-treason. Their castles he was acquainted with from turret to foundation-stone; and as for the miscellaneous antiquities scattered about the country, he knew every one of them from a cromlech to a cairn, and could give as good an account of each as if he had lived in the time of the Danes or Druids.

I was now in the mortifying predicament of one who suddenly finds himself a scholar when he came to teach, and nothing was left for me but to pick up as much of his conversation as I could, for the benefit of the next company. I told, indeed, Allan Ramsay's story of the Monk and Miller's Wife, in order to retreat with some honour under cover of a parting volley. Here, however, my flank was again turned by the eternal stranger.

"You are pleased to be facetious, sir," said he: "but you cannot be ignorant, that the ludicrous incident you mentioned is the subject of a tale much older than that of Allan Ramsay."

I nodded, unwilling to acknowledge my ignorance, though, in fact, I knew no more what he meant than did one of my friend David's post-horses.

"I do not allude," continued my omniscient companion, "to the curious poem published by Pinkerton from the Maitland Manuscript, called the Fryars of Berwick, although it presents a very minute and amusing picture of Scottish manners during the reign of James V.; but rather to the Italian novelist, by whom, so far as I know, the story was first printed, although unquestionably he first took his original from fabliaux."‡

"It is not to be doubted," answered I, not v standing, however, the proposition to which I qualified assent.

"Yet," continued my companion, "I question known my situation and profession, whether yo pitched upon this precise anecdote for my amus

This observation he made in a tone of perfect I pricked up my ears at the hint, and answered I could, that my ignorance of his condition and the only cause of my having stumbled on any t ble; and that I was most willing to apologize f tional offence so soon as I should know wherein

"Nay, no offence, sir," he replied; "offence where it is taken. I have been too long accust severe and cruel misconstructions, to be offende jest, though directed at my profession."

"Am I to understand then," I answered, "th ing with a Catholic clergyman?"

"An unworthy member of the order of Saint B the stranger, "belonging to a community of you men, long established in France, and scattered un events of the Revolution."

"Then," said I, "you are a native Scotchman neighbourhood?"

"Not so," answered the monk; "I am a Scot tract in early, and never was in this neighbourh whole life."

"Never in this neighbourhood, and yet so minu ed with its history, its traditions, and even its s ry! You surprise me, sir," I replied.

"It is not surprising," he said, "that I should of local information, when it is considered, tha excellent man, as well as a good Scotchman, th our religious community, employed much of his king me acquainted with these particulars; and disgusted with what has been passing around many years amused myself by digesting and arra ous scraps of information which I derived from n tive, and other aged brethren of our order."

"I presume, sir," said I, "though I would h trude the question, that you are now returned to a view to settle amongst your countrymen, since fical catastrophe of our time has reduced your co

"No, sir," replied the Benedictine, "such is tion. A European potentate, who still cherishe faith, has offered us a retreat within his domi few of my scattered brethren are already assemb God for blessings on their protector, and pardo mies. No one, I believe, will be able to object t new establishment, that the extent of our rever consistent with our vows of poverty and abstin us strive to be thankful to God, that the ann abundance is removed from us."

"Many of your convents abroad, sir," said I, handsome incomes—and yet, allowing for times any were better provided for than the Monast lare. It is said to have possessed nearly two th in yearly money-rent, fourteen chalders and nine l fifty-six chalders five bolls barley, forty four ch bolls oats, capons and poultry, butter, salt, carria peats and kain, wood and ale."

"Even too much of all these temporal goods, companion," which, though well intended by the served only to make the establishment the envy of those by whom it was finally devoured."

"In the meanwhile, however," I observed, "t an easy life of it, and, as the old song goes,

> —— ate gude kale
> On Fridays when they fasted."

"I understand you, sir," said the Benedictine cult, saith the proverb, to carry a full cup wit Unquestionably the wealth of the community, as the safety of the establishment by exciting th others, was also in frequent instances a snare to themselves. And yet we have seen the revenue expended, not only in acts of beneficence and ho dividuals, but in works of general and permanen the world at large. The noble folio collection o torians commenced in 1737, under the inspection pense of the community of Saint Maur, will lo the revenues of the Benedictines were not alway indulgence, and that the members of that order formly slumber in sloth and indolence, when charged the formal duties of their rule."

As I knew nothing earthly at the time about t of Saint Maur and their learned labours, I could mumbling assent to this proposition. I have s noble work in the library of a distinguished fami own I am ashamed to reflect, that in so wealth curs, a similar digest of our historians should n ken, under the patronage of the noble and the valry of that which the Benedictines of Paris ex expense of their own conventual funds.

"I perceive," said the ex-Benedictine, smiling heretical prejudices are too strong to allow us any merit, whether literary or spiritual."

"Far from it, sir," said I; "I assure you I ha obliged to monks in my time. When I was quart nastery in Flanders, in the campaign of 1793,

* Thomas Thomson, Esq., whose well-deserved panegyric ought to be found on another page than one written by an intimate friend of thirty years' standing.

† The family of De Haga, moderanised into Haig, of Bemerside, is of the highest antiquity and is the subject of one of the prophecies of Thomas the Rhymer:

> Betide, betide, whate'er betide,
> Haig shall be Haig of Bemerside.

‡ It is curious to remark at how little expense of invention ages are content to receive amusement. The same story and Dunbar have successively handled, forms also th western farce, No Song, no Supper.

.bly in my life They were jolly fellows the Flem- nd right sorry was I to leave my good quarters, hat my honest hosts were to be at the mercy of ..ties. But fortune de la guerre!"

..nedictine looked down and was silent. I had ..wakened a train of bitter reflections, or rather I ..uched rudely upon a chord which seldom ceas- ..of itself. But he was too much accustomed to ..train of ideas to suffer it to overcome him. On ..eavour to atone for my blunder "If there was ..his journey to this country in which I could ..assist him I begged to offer him my best ser- ..I laid some little emphasis on the words "with ..for it would ill become me, a sound protestant, ..of government so far as my half-pay was con- ..ed to mix myself in any recruiting which my com ..have undertaken in behalf of foreign seminaries, ..r design for the advancement of popery, which, ..ever our family tree .. of Babylon or no, ..means in any manner to advise or countenance. ..nd hastened to relieve my indecision. "I was ..st your assistance, sir," he said, "in a matter ..but interest you as an antiquary, and a person of ..I assure you it relates entirely to events and ..out to the distance of two centuries and a half ..seen too much of the violent unsettlement ..in which I was bound to be a rash labourer in the ..ition in that of my own years."

..assured him of my willingness to assist him in any ..not interfere with my allegiance or religion.

..," he replied, "affects neither. May God bless ..mily of Britain! They are not, indeed, of that ..fore which my ancestors struggled and suffered in ..Providence which has committed his present Ma- ..ions, has given him the virtues necessary to his ..and integrity, a true love of his country and ..view of the dangers by which she is surrounded ..on of these realms I am contented to hope that ..r, whose mysterious dispensation has rent them ..n of the church, will, in his own good time and ..e them to its holy fold. The efforts of an indiv ..nd humble as myself, might well retard, but could ..a work so mighty."

..a inquire, sir," said I, "with what purpose you ..try?"

..anon replied, he took from his pocket a clasped ..out the size of a regimental orderly-book, full. ..t memoranda; and drawing one of the candles ..or David, as a strong proof of his respect for the ..ndulged us with two,) he seemed to peruse the ..arnestly.

..mong the ruins of the western end of the Abbey ..e, looking up to me, yet keeping the memoran- ..open, and occasionally glancing at it, as if to re- ..ry, "a sort of recess or chapel beneath a broken ..e immediate vicinity of one of those shattered ..s which once supported the magnificent roof, ..now encumbered that part of the building with

..d I, "that I know whereabouts you are. Is there ..wall of the chapel, or recess which you mention, ..stone, bearing a coat of arms, which no one hi- ..able to decipher?"

..ht," answered the Benedictine; and again con- ..oranda, he added, "the arms on the dexter side ..ndinning, being a cross parted by a cross indent ..charged of the same; and on the sinister three ..those of Avenel; they are two ancient families, ..inct in this country — the arms part per pale."

..nd I, "there is no part of this ancient structure ..u are not as well acquainted as was the mason ..but if your information be correct, he who made ..ngs must have had better eyes than mine."

..said the Benedictine, "have long been closed in ..y when he inspected the monument it was in a ..ate, or he may have derived his information from .. the place."

..," said I, "that no such tradition now exists.— ..everal reconnoissances among the old people, in ..something of the armorial bearings, but I never ..circumstance. It seems odd that you should ..t in a foreign land."

..ne particulars," he replied, "were formerly look- ..ore important, and they were sanctified to the ..ined recollection of them, because they related ..mended to memory, but which their eyes could ..hold. It is possible, in like manner, that on the ..usquehannah, you may find traditions current ..es in England, which are utterly forgotten in the ..where they originated. But to my purpose. In ..ked by the armorial bearings, lies buried a trea- ..n order to remove it that I have undertaken my .."

.." echoed I, in astonishment.

..d the monk, "an inestimable treasure for those .. to use it rightly."

..did tingle a little at the word treasure, and that ..ury, with a neat groom in blue and scarlet livery, ..cockade on his glazed hat, seemed as it were to ..e room before my eyes, while a voice, as of a ..ed in my ear, "Captain Clutterbuck's tilbury— ..I resisted the devil, and he fled from me.

..said I, "all hidden treasure belongs either to the ..of the soil; and as I have served his majesty, I ..myself in any adventure which may have an ..t of Exchequer."

..e I seek," said the stranger smiling, "will not be envied by princes or nobles,—it is simply the heart of an upright man."

"Ah! I understand you," I answered; "some relic, forgotten in the confusion of the Reformation. I know the value which men of your persuasion put upon the bodies and limbs of saints. I have seen the Three Kings of Cologne."

"The relics which I seek, however," said the Benedictine "are not precisely of that nature. The excellent relative whom I have already mentioned, amused his leisure hours with putting into form the traditions of his family, particularly some remarkable circumstances which took place about the first breaking out of the schism of the church in Scotland. He became so much interested in his own labours, that at length he resolved that the heart of one individual, the hero of his tale, should rest no longer in a land of heresy, now deserted by all his kindred. As he knew where it was deposited, he formed the resolution to visit his native country for the purpose of recovering this venerated relic. But age, and at length disease, interfered with his resolution and it was on his deathbed that he charged me to undertake the task in his stead. The various important events which have crowded upon each other, our ruin and our exile, have for many years obliged me to postpone this delegated duty. Why, indeed, transfer the relics of a holy and worthy man to a country, where religion and virtue are become the mockery of the scorner? I have now a home, which I trust may be permanent, if any thing in this earth can be termed so. Thither will I transport the heart of the good father, and beside the shrine which it shall occupy, I will construct my own grave."

"He must, indeed, have been an excellent man," replied I, "whose memory, at so distant a period, calls forth such strong marks of regard."

"He was, as you justly term him," said the ecclesiastic, "indeed excellent—excellent in his life and doctrine—excellent, above all, in his self-denied and disinterested sacrifice of all that life holds dear, to principle and to friendship. But you shall read his history. I shall be happy at once to gratify your curiosity, and to show my sense of your kindness, if you will have the goodness to procure me the means of accomplishing my object."

I replied to the Benedictine, that, as the rubbish amongst which he proposed to search was no part of the ordinary burial ground, and as I was on the best terms with the sexton, I had little doubt that I could procure him the means of executing his pious purpose.

With this promise we parted for the night; and on the ensuing morning I made it my business to see the sexton, who, for a small gratuity, readily granted permission of search, on condition, however, that he should be present himself, to see that the stranger removed nothing of intrinsic value.

"To banes, and skulls, and hearts, if he can find ony, he shall be welcome," said this guardian of the ruined Monastery, "there's plenty a' about, an he's curious of them; but if there be ony picts" (meaning perhaps pyx) "or chalishes, or the like of such Popish veshells of gold and silver, deil hae me an Iconseeve at their being removed."

The sexton also stipulated, that our researches should take place at night, being unwilling to excite observation, or give rise to scandal.

My new acquaintance and I spent the day as became lovers of hoar antiquity. We visited every corner of these magnificent ruins again and again during the forenoon; and, having made a comfortable dinner at David's, we walked in the afternoon to such places in the neighbourhood as ancient tradition or modern conjecture had rendered markworthy. Night found us in the interior of the ruins, attended by the sexton, who carried a dark lantern, and stumbling alternately over the graves of the dead, and the fragments of that architecture, "which they doubtless trusted would have canopied their bones till doomsday."

I am by no means particularly superstitious, and yet there was that in the present service which I did not very much like. There was something awful in the resolution of disturbing, at such an hour, and in such a place, the still and mute sanctity of the grave. My companions were free from this impression—the stranger from his energetic desire to execute the purpose for which he came—and the sexton from habitual indifference.— We soon stood in the aisle, which, by the account of the Benedictine, contained the bones of the family of Glendinning, and were busily employed in removing the rubbish from a corner which the stranger pointed out. If a half-pay Captain could have represented an ancient Border-knight, or an ex-Benedictine of the nineteenth century a wizard monk of the sixteenth, we might have aptly enough personified the search after Michael Scott's lamp and book of magic power. But the sexton would have been de trop in the group.*

Ere the stranger, assisted by the sexton in his task, had been long at work, they came to some hewn stones, which seemed to have made part of a small shrine, though now displaced and destroyed.

"Let us remove these with caution, my friend," said the stranger, "lest we injure that which I come to seek."

"They are prime stanes," said the sexton, "picked free every ane of them;—warse than the best wad never serve the monks, I'se warrant."

A minute after he had made this observation, he exclaimed, "I hae fund something now that stands again' the spade, as if it were neither earth nor stane."

The stranger stooped eagerly to assist him.

"Na, na, haill o' my ain," said the sexton; "nae halves o

* This is one of those passages which must now read awkwardly, since every one knows that the Novelist and the author of the Lay of the Minstrel, is the same person. But before the avowal was made, the author was forced into this and similar offences against good taste, to meet an argument, often repeated, that there was something very mysterious in the Author of Waverley's reserve concerning Sir Walter Scott, an author sufficiently voluminous at least. I had a great mind to remove the passages from this edition, but the more candid way is to explain how they came there.

quarters :' —and he lifted from amongst the ruins a small leaden box.

"You will be disappointed, my friend," said the Benedictine, "if you expect any thing there but the mouldering dust of a human heart, closed in an inner case of porphyry."

I interposed as a neutral party, and taking the box from the sexton, reminded him, that if there were treasure concealed in it, still it could not become the property of the finder. I then proposed, that as the place was too dark to examine the contents of the leaden casket, we should adjourn to David's, where we might have the advantage of light and fire while carrying on our investigation. The stranger requested us to go before, assuring us that he would follow in a few minutes.

I fancy that old Mattocks suspected these few minutes might be employed in effecting further discoveries amongst the tombs, for he glided back through a side-aisle to watch the Benedictine's motions, but presently returned, and told me in a whisper, that "the gentleman was on his knees amang the cauld stanes, praying like ony saunt."

I stole back, and beheld the old man actually employed as Mattocks had informed me. The language seemed to be Latin and as the whispered, yet solemn accent, glided away through the ruined aisles, I could not help reflecting how long it was since they had heard the forms of that religion, for the exercise of which they had been reared at such cost of time, taste, labour, and expense. "Come away, come away," said I, "let us leave him to himself, Mattocks; this is no business of ours."

"My certes, no, Captain," said Mattocks; "ne'ertheless, it winna be amiss to keep an ee on him. My father, rest his saul, was a horse couper, and used to say he never was cheated in a naig in his life, saving by a west country whig frae Kilmarnock, that said a grace ower a dram o' whisky. But this gentleman will be a Roman, I'se warrant?"

"You are perfectly right in that, Saunders," said I.

"Ay, I have seen twa or three of their priests that were chased ower here some score o' years syne. They just danced like mad when they looked on the friars' heads, and the nuns' heads, in the cloister yonder; they took to them like auld acquaintance like.—Od, he is not stirring yet, mair than he were a through stane.* I never kend a Roman, to say kend him, but ane—mair by token, he was the only ane in the town to ken—and that was auld Jock of the Pend. It wad hae been lang ere ye fand Jock praying in the Abbey in a thick night, wi' his knees on a cauld stane. Jock likit a kirk wi' a chimley in't. Mony a merry ploy I hae had wi' him down at the inn yonder; and when he died, decently I wad hae earded him; but, or I gat his grave weel howkit, some of the quality, that were o' his ain unhappy persuasion, had the corpse whirried away up the water, and buried him after their ain pleasure, doubtless—they kend best. I wad hae made nae great charge. I wadna hae excised Johnnie, dead or alive. Stay, see—the strange gentleman is coming."

"Hold the lantern to assist him, Mattocks," said I.—"This is rough walking, sir."

"Yes," replied the Benedictine; "I may say with the poet, who is doubtless familiar to you"——

I should be surprised if he were, thought I internally.

The stranger continued:

"Saint Francis be my speed! how oft to-night
Have my old feet stumbled at graves!"

"We are now clear of the churchyard," said I, "and have but a short walk to David's, where I hope we shall find a cheerful fire to enliven us after our night's work."

We entered, accordingly, the little parlour, into which Mattocks was also about to push himself with sufficient effrontery, when David, with a most astounding oath, expelled him by head and shoulders, d——ning his curiosity, that would not let gentlemen be private in their own inn. Apparently mine host considered his own presence as no intrusion, for he crowded up to the table on which I had laid down the leaden box. It was frail and wasted, as might be guessed, from having lain so many years in the ground. On opening it, we found deposited within, a case made of porphyry, as the stranger had announced to us.

"I fancy," he said, "gentlemen, your curiosity will not be satisfied,—perhaps I should say that your suspicions will not be removed,—unless I undo this casket; yet it only contains the mouldering remains of a heart, once the seat of the noblest thoughts."

He undid the box with great caution; but the shrivelled substance which it contained bore now no resemblance to what it might once have been, the means used having been apparently unequal to preserve its shape and colour, although they were adequate to prevent its total decay. We were quite satisfied, notwithstanding, that it was what the stranger asserted, the remains of a human heart; and David readily promised his influence in the village, which was almost co-ordinate with that of the bailie himself, to silence all idle rumours. He was, moreover, pleased to favour us with his company to supper; and having taken the lion's share of two bottles of sherry, he not only sanctioned with his plenary authority the stranger's removal of the heart, but, I believe, would have authorized the removal of the Abbey itself, were it not that it happens considerably to advantage the worthy publican's own custom.

The object of the Benedictine's visit to the land of his forefathers being now accomplished, he announced his intention of leaving us early in the ensuing day, but requested my company to breakfast with him before his departure. I came accordingly, and when we had finished our morning's meal, the priest took me apart, and, pulling from his pocket a large bundle of papers, he put them into my hands. "These," said he, "Captain Clutterbuck, are genuine Memoirs of the sixteenth century, and exhibit in a singular, and, as I think, an interesting point of view, the manners of that period. I am induced to believe that their p[illegible]ation will not be an unacceptable present to the British pub[illegible]; and I willingly make over to you any profit that may ar[illegible] from such a transaction."

* A tombstone.

I stared a little at this annunciation, and observ hand seemed too modern for the date he assigned script.

"Do not mistake me, sir," said the Benedictine mean to say the Memoirs were written in the sixtee
but only, that they were compiled from authentic
that period, but written in the taste and language o
day. My uncle commenced this book, and I, partl
my habit of English composition, and partly to d
choly thoughts, amused my leisure hours with cor
concluding it. You will see the period of the stor uncle leaves off his narrative, and I commence m
they relate in a great measure to different persons,
a different period."

Retaining the papers in my hand, I proceeded to my doubts, whether, as a good Protestant, I coul or superintend a publication written probably in Popery.

"You will find," he said, "no matter of controv
sheets, nor any sentiments stated, with which, I tr
in all persuasions will not be willing to join. I r was writing for a land unhappily divided from t
faith; and I have taken care to say nothing which,
preted, could give ground for accusing me of partia
upon collating my narrative with the proofs to which
for you will find copies of many of the original pa
parcel—you are of opinion that I have been partia faith, I freely give you leave to correct my errors in
I own, however, I am not conscious of this defect,
ther to fear that the Catholics may be of opinion,
mentioned circumstances respecting the decay
which preceded, and partly occasioned, the great s
by you the Reformation, over which I ought to h veil. And indeed this is one reason why I choo should appear in a foreign land, and pass to the p
the hands of a stranger."

To this I had nothing to reply, unless to object t competency to the task the good father was desiro
upon me. On this subject he was pleased to say than his knowledge of me fully warranted—more than my modesty will permit me to record. At leng with advising me, if I continued to feel the diffid stated, to apply to some veteran of literature, who might supply my deficiencies. Upon these term with mutual expressions of regard, and I have neve
of him.

After several attempts to peruse the quires of p
gularly conferred on me, in which I was interrupte inexplicable fits of yawning, I at length, in a communicated them to our village club, from who
a more favourable reception than the unlucky co
my nerves had been able to afford them. They pronounced the work to be exceedingly good, and would be guilty of the greatest possible injury to ing village, if I should suppress what threw such and radiant light upon the history of the ancient Saint Mary.

At length, by dint of listening to their opinion,
bious of my own; and indeed, when I heard passa
by the sonorous voice of our worthy pastor, I was tired than I have felt myself at some of his own ser
and so great is the difference betwixt reading a th
making toilsome way through all the difficulties o
and, as the man says in the play, "having the
you;"—it is positively like being wafted over a cre
or wading through it on your feet, with the mu knees. Still, however, there remained the grea finding some one who could act as editor, correct
the press and of the language, which, according t
master, was absolutely necessary.

Since the trees walked forth to choose them
never was an honour so bandied about. The pars
leave the quiet of his chimney corner—the bailie dignity of his situation, and the approach of the fair, as reasons against going to Edinburgh to m
ments for printing the Benedictine's Manuscript.
master alone seemed of malleable stuff, and, desi
of emulating the fame of Jedediah Cleishbotha
wish to undertake this momentous commission.
strance from three opulent farmers, whose sons be board, and schooling, for twenty pounds per an came like a frost over the blossoms of his literary
he was compelled to decline the service.

In these circumstances, sir, I apply to you, by our little council of war, nothing doubting you w
inclined to take the duty upon you, as it is muc
with that in which you have distinguished yours request is, that you will review, or rather revise an enclosed packet, and prepare it for the press, by tions, additions, and curtailments, as you think nec
give my hinting to you, that the deepest well ma
ed,—the best corps of grenadiers, as our old gener expressed himself, may be [illegible]. A few hints c harm; and, for the prize money, let the battle be f it shall be parted at the drum head. I hope y nothing amiss that I have said. I am a plain sold accustomed to compliments. I may add, that I sh contented to march in the front with you—that i name with yours on the title page.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your unknown humble Ser
CUTHBERT CLU

VILLAGE OF KENNAQUHAIR,
—— of April, 18——.

For the Author of "Waverley," &c.
care of Mr. John Ballantyne, Hanover Street, Edinburgh.

ANSWER

BY

THE AUTHOR OF "WAVERLEY,"

TO THE

?EGOING LETTER FROM CAPTAIN CLUTTERBUCK.

---

e, that, notwithstanding the distance and cere- ddress, I return an answer in the terms of fami- ith is, your origin and native country are better ian even to yourself. You derive your respect- if I am not greatly mistaken, from a land which ch pleasure, as well as profit, to those who have essfully. I mean that part of the terra incognita the province of Utopia. Its productions, though ry (and some who use tea and tobacco without and unsubstantial luxuries, have nevertheless, luxuries, a general acceptation, and are secretly those who express the greatest scorn and dis- publi. The dr. m drinker is often the first to he smell of spirits it is not unusual to hear old lecinim against scandal—the private book-cases eeming men would not brook decent eyes—and t of the wise and learned, but of those most such, when the spring-lock of their library is vet cap pulled over their ears, their feet insinu- turkey slippers, are to be found, were their re- intruded upon, busily engaged with the last new

he truly wise and learned disdain these shifts, ie said novel as avowedly as they would the lid ox. I will only quote one instance, though I l. Did you know the celebrated Watt of Bir- ain Clutterbuck? I believe not, though, from it to state, he would not have failed to have intance with you. It was only once my fortune ether in body or in spirit it matters not. There about half a score of our Northern Lights, who em, heaven knows how, a well-known character Jedediah Cleishbotham. This worthy person, Edinburgh during the Christmas vacation, had f lion in the place, and was led in leash from along with the guisards, the stone-eater, and nts of the season, which "exhibit their unpa- n private family-parties, if required." Amidst ood Mr. Watt, the man whose genius discovered multiplying our national resources to a degree yond his own stupendous powers of calculation n; bringing the treasures of the abyss to the earth—giving the feeble arm of man the momen- e-commanding manufactures to arise, as the het produced water in the desert, affording the ising with that time and tide which wait for no ling without that wind which defied the com- nts of Xerxes himself.* This potent commander t—this abridger of time and space—this magi- udy machinery has produced a change on the rld of which, extraordinary as they are, are per- eginning to be felt—was not only the most pro- cience, the most successful combiner of powers of numbers, as adapted to practical purposes,— e of the most generally well-informed,—but one kindest of human beings. d, surrounded by the little band I have mention- literati, men not less tenacious, generally speak- n fame and their own opinions, than the national supposed to be jealous of the high character va won upon service. Methinks I yet see and all never see or hear again. In his eighty-fifth kind, benevolent old man had his attention one's question, his information at every one's

d fancy overflowed on every subject. One gen- eep philologist, he talked with him on the ori- iabet as if he had been coeval with Cadmus; brated critic,—you would have said the old man itical economy and belles-lettres all his life,—of science it is unnecessary to speak, it was his own distinguished walk. And yet, Captain Clutterbuck, when he spoke with your countryman Jedediah Cleishbotham, you would have sworn he had been coeval with Claver'se and Burley, with the persecutors and persecuted, and could number every shot the dragoons had fired at the fugitive Covenanters. In fact, we discovered that no novel of the least celebrity escaped his perusal, and that the gifted man of science was as much addicted to the productions of your native country, (the land of Utopia aforesaid,) in other words, as shameless and obstinate a peruser of novels, as if he had been a very milliner's apprentice of eighteen. I know little apology for troubling you with these things, excepting the de- sire to commemorate a delightful evening, and a wish to encou- rage you to shake off that modest diffidence which makes you afraid of being supposed connected with the fairy-land of delu sive fiction. I will requite your tag of verse from Horace him- self, with a paraphrase for your own use, my dear Captain, and for that of your country club, excepting in reverence the clergy- man and schoolmaster:—

Ne sit ancillæ tibi amor pudori, &c.

> Take thou no scorn,
> Of fiction born,
> Fair fiction's muse to woo;
> Old Homer's theme
> Was but a dream,
> Himself a fiction too.

Having told you your country, I must next, my dear Captain Clutterbuck, make free to mention your own immediate de- scent. You are not to suppose your land of prodigies so little known to us as the careful concealment of your origin would seem to imply. But you have it in common with many of your country, studiously and anxiously to hide any connexion with it. There is this difference, indeed, betwixt your countrymen and those of our more material world, that many of the most estimable of them, such as an old Highland gentleman called Ossian, a monk of Bristol called Rowley, and others, are inclined to pass themselves off as denizens of the land of reality, where- as most of our fellow-citizens who deny their country are such as that country would be very willing to disclaim. The espe- cial circumstances you mention relating to your life and ser- vices, impose not upon us. We know the versatility of the un- substantial species to which you belong permits them to assume all manner of disguises; we have seen them apparelled in the caftan of a Persian, and the silken robe of a Chinese,† and are prepared to suspect their real character under every disguise. But how can we be ignorant of your country and manners, or deceived by the evasion of its inhabitants, when the voyages of discovery which have been made to it rival in number those re- corded by Purchas or by Hackluyt?‡ And to show the skill and perseverance of your navigators and travellers, we have only to name Sindbad, Aboulfouaris, and Robinson Crusoe. These were the men for discoveries. Could we have sent Captain Greenland to look out for the north-west passage, or Peter Wilkins to examine Baffin's Bay what discoveries might we not have expected! But there are feats, and these both nume- rous and extraordinary, performed by the inhabitants of your country, which we read without once attempting to emulate.

I wander from my purpose, which was to assure you, that I know you as well as the mother who did not bear you, for Mac- Duff's peculiarity sticks to your whole race. You are not born of woman, unless, indeed, in that figurative sense, in which the celebrated Maria Edgeworth may, in her state of single blessed- ness, be termed mother of the finest family in England. You belong, sir, to the Editors of the land of Utopia, a sort of per- sons for whom I have the highest esteem. How is it possible it should be otherwise, when you reckon among your corporation the sage Cid Hamet Benengeli, the short-faced president of the Spectator's Club, poor Ben Silton, and many others, who have acted as gentlemen-ushers to works which have cheered our heaviest, and added wings to our lightest hours?

What I have remarked as peculiar to Editors of the class which I venture to enrol you, is the happy combination of for tuitous circumstances which usually put you in possession of the

* ingenious author alludes to the national adage:
> The king said sail,
> But the wind said no.

?er (who is also a land-surveyor) thinks the whole pas- Watt's improvements on the steam engine.—Note by ?uck.

† See The Persian Letters, and The Citizen of the World.

‡ See Les Voyages Imaginaires.

works which you have the goodness to bring into public notice. One walks on the sea-shore, and a wave casts on land a small cylindrical trunk or casket, containing a manuscript much damaged with sea water, which is with difficulty deciphered, and so forth.* Another steps into a chandler's shop to purchase a pound of butter, and behold! the waste paper on which it is laid is the manuscript of a cabalist.† A third is so fortunate as to obtain from a woman who lets lodgings, the curious contents of an antique bureau, the property of a deceased lodger.‡ All these are certainly possible occurrences; but I know not how, they seldom occur to any Editors, save those of your country. At least I can answer for myself, that in my solitary walks by the sea, I never saw it cast ashore any thing but dulse and tangle, and now and then a deceased star-fish; my landlady never presented me with any manuscript save her cursed bill; and the most interesting of my discoveries in the way of waste paper, was finding a favourite passage of one of my own novels wrapt round an ounce of snuff. No, Captain, the funds to which I have drawn my power of amusing the public, have been bought otherwise than by fortuitous adventure. I have buried myself in libraries, to extract from the nonsense of ancient days new nonsense of my own. I have turned over volumes, which, from the pot-hooks I was obliged to decipher, might have been the cabalistic manuscripts of Cornelius Agrippa, although I never saw "the door open and the devil come in."§ But all the domestic inhabitants of the libraries were disturbed by the vehemence of my studies;—

> From my research the boldest spider fled,
> And moths, retreating, trembled as I read.

From this learned sepulchre I emerged like the Magician in the Persian Tales, from his twelvemonth's residence in the mountain, not like him to soar over the heads of the multitude, but to mingle in the crowd, and to elbow amongst the throng, making my way from the highest society to the lowest, undergoing the scorn, or, what is harder to brook, the patronising condescension of the one, and enduring the vulgar familiarity of the other,—and all, you will say, for what? to collect materials for one of those manuscripts with which mere chance so often accommodates your countrymen; in other words to write a successful novel. "O, Athenians, how hard we labour to deserve your praise!"

I might stop here, my dear Clutterbuck; it would have a touching effect, and the air of proper deference to our dear Public.—But I will not be false with you,—(though falsehood is—excuse the observation—the current coin of your country,) the truth is I have studied and lived for the purpose of gratifying my own curiosity, and passing my own time; and though the result has been, that, in one shape or other I have been frequently before the Public, perhaps more frequently than prudence warranted, yet I cannot claim from them the favour due to those who have dedicated their ease and leisure to the improvement and entertainment of others.

Having communicated thus freely with you, my dear Captain, it follows, of course, that I will gratefully accept of your communication, which, as your Benedictine observed, divides itself both by subject, manner, and age, into two parts. But I am sorry I cannot gratify your literary ambition, by suffering your name to appear upon the title page; and I will candidly tell you the reason.

The Editors of your country are of such a soft and passive disposition, that they have frequently done themselves great disgrace by giving up the coadjutors who first brought them into public notice and public favour, and suffering their names to be used by those quacks and impostors who live upon the ideas of others. Thus I shame to tell how the sage Cid Hamet Benengeli was induced by one Juan Avellaneda to play the Turk with the ingenious Miguel Cervantes, and to publish a second Part of the adventures of his hero, the renowned Don Quixote, without the knowledge or co-operation of his principal aforesaid. It is true, the Arabian sage returned to his allegiance, and thereafter composed a genuine continuation of the Knight of La Mancha, in which the said Avellaneda of Tordesillas is severely . For in this you pseudo editors resemble the juggler's d ape, to which a sly old Scotsman likened James I., " i Jackoo in your hand, you can make him bite me; Jackoo in my hand, I can make him bite you." Yet standing the amende honorable thus made by Cid Ham geli, his temporary defection did not the less occasi cease of the ingenious Hidalgo Don Quixote, if he c to die, whose memory is immortal. Cervantes put him lest he should again fall into bad hands. Awful, yet j quence of Cid Hamet's defection!

To quote a more modern and much less important ir am sorry to observe my old acquaintance Jedediah Clei has misbehaved himself so far as to desert his origin and set up for himself. I am afraid the poor pedagogue little by his new allies, unless the pleasure of entert public, and, for aught I know, the gentlemen of the with disputes about his identity.‖ Observe, therefor Clutterbuck, that, wise by these great examples, I rece a partner, but a sleeping partner only. As I give you employ or use the firm of the copartnery we are abou I will announce my property in my title page, and pu mark on my own chattels, which the attorney tells me a crime to counterfeit, as much as it would to imitate graph of any other emblazoner, a crime amounting, as ments upon little wares as ... to nothing short of If, therefore, my dear friend, your name should hereaf in any title page without mine, readers will know wh of you. I scorn to use either arguments or threats; bu not but be sensible, that, as you owe your literary ex me on the one hand, so, on the other, your very all ... posal. I can at pleasure cut off your annuity, strike from the half-pay establishment, nay actually put you without being answerable to any one. These are pl to a gentleman who has served during the whole w am aware, you will take nothing amiss at my hands.

And now, my good sir, let us address ourselves to ou arrange as we best can the manuscript of your Bene as to suit the taste of this critical age. You will f made very liberal use of his permission, to alter what ed too favourable to the Church of Rome, which I a were it but for her fasts and penances.

Our reader is doubtless impatient, and we must John Bunyan,

> We have too long detain'd him in the porch,
> And kept him from the sunshine with a torch.

Adieu, therefore, my dear Captain—remember me resp the parson, the schoolmaster, and the bailie, and all the happy club in the village of Kennaquhair. I h seen, and never shall see, one of their faces; and notw ing, I believe that as yet I am better acquainted with any other man who lives.—I shall soon introduce you cund friend, Mr. John Ballantyne of Trinity-Grove, w will find warm from his match at single stick with Publisher.¶ Peace to their differences! It is a wrat and the irritabile genus comprehends the bookselling the book-writing species.—Once more adieu!

THE AUTHOR OF WA

* See the History of Automathes.
† Adventures of a Guinea.
‡ Adventures of an Atom.
§ See Southey's Ballad on the Young Man who read in a Conjuror's Books.

‖ I am since more correctly informed, that Mr. Cleishbotha months since at Gandercleugh, and that the person assuming an impostor. The real Jedediah made a most Christian and ed and, as I am credibly informed, having sent for a Cameroni man when he was in extremis, was so fortunate as to convin man, that, after all, he had no wish to bring down on the sca nant of Mountain folks, "the bonnets of Bonny Dundee." the speculators in print and paper will not allow a good man in his grave!

This note, and the passages in the text, were occasioned by bookseller having printed, as a speculation, an additional se Tales of My Landlord, which was not so fortunate as to pass ing on the world as genuine.

¶ In consequence of the pseudo Tales of My Landlord print don, as already mentioned, the late Mr. John Ballantyne, the publisher, had a controversy with the interloping bibliopolist, sisting that his Jedediah Cleishbotham was the real Simon Pure

THE MONASTERY.

CHAPTER 1.

the Monks, the Monks they did the mischief!
s all the grossness, all the superstition
most gross and superstitious age—
-le be praised that sent the healthful tempest
catter'd all these pestilential vapours!
iat we owed them all to yonder Harlot
ted on the seven hills with her cup of gold,
as soon believe, with kind Sir Roger,
old Moll White took wing with cat and broomstick, aised the last night's thunder.—Old Play.

illage described in the Benedictine's manu-
y the name of Kennaquhair, bears the same ermination which occurs in Traquhair, Ca-and other compounds. The learned Chalrives this word Quhair, from the winding
f a stream; a definition which coincides, in kable degree, with the serpentine turns of the veed near the village of which we speak. It a long famous for the splendid Monastery of lary, founded by David the First of Scotland,
e reign were formed, in the same county, the plendid establishments of Melrose, Jedburgh, lso. The donations of land with which the ndowed these wealthy fraternities procured
m the Monkish historians the epithet of Saint,
m one of his impoverished descendants the
c censure, "that he had been a sore saint for
wn."

ems probable, notwithstanding, that David,
s a wise as well as a pious monarch, was not olely by religious motives to those great acts ficence to the church, but annexed political o his pious generosity. His possessions in nberland and Cumberland became precarious loss of the Battle of the Standard; and since iparatively fertile valley of Teviotdale was become the frontier of his kingdom, it is he wished to secure at least a part of these possessions by placing them in the hands of ks, whose property was for a long time re-even amidst the rage of a frontier war. In nner alone had the King some chance of en-rotection and security to the cultivators of the d, in fact, for several ages the possessions of bbeys were each a sort of Goshen, enjoying
n light of peace and immunity, while the rest
ountry, occupied by wild clans and maraudons, was one dark scene of confusion, blood,
emitted outrage.

ese immunities did not continue down to the f the crowns. Long before that period the twixt England and Scotland had lost their character of international hostilities, and had on the part of the English a struggle for sub-
, on that of the Scots a desperate and infuri-fence of their liberties. This introduced on les a degree of fury and animosity unknown arlier period of their history; and as religious soon gave way to national hatred spurred by f plunder, the patrimony of the Church was ger sacred from incursions on either side.
owever, the tenants and vassals of the great
had many advantages over those of the lay
who were harassed by constant military duty,
ey became desperate, and lost all relish for the eace. The vassals of the church, on the other ere only liable to be called to arms on geneasions, and at other times were permitted in ative quiet to possess their farms and feus.*

They of course exhibited superior skill in every thing that related to the cultivation of the soil, and were therefore both wealthier and better informed than the military retainers of the restless chiefs and nobles in their neighbourhood.

The residence of these church vassals was usually in a small village or hamlet, where, for the sake of mutual aid and protection, some thirty or forty families dwelt together. This was called the Town, and the land belonging to the various families by whom the Town was inhabited, was called the Township. They usually possessed the land in common, though in various proportions, according to their several grants. The part of the Township, properly arable, and kept as such continually under the plough, was called in-field. Here the use of quantities of manure supplied in some degree the exhaustion of the soil, and the feuars raised tolerable oats and bear,† usually sowed on alternate ridges, on which the labour of the whole community was bestowed without distinction, the produce being divided after harvest, agreeably to their respective interests.

There was, besides, out-field land, from which it was thought possible to extract a crop now and then, after which it was abandoned to the "skiey influences," until the exhausted powers of vegetation were restored. These out-field spots were selected by any feuar at his own choice, amongst the sheep-walks and hills which were always annexed to the Township, to serve as pasturage to the community. The trouble of cultivating these patches of out-field, and the precarious chance that the crop would pay the labour, were considered as giving a right to any feuar, who chose to undertake the adventure, to the produce which might result from it.

There remained the pasturage of extensive moors, where the valleys often afforded good grass, and upon which the whole cattle belonging to the community fed indiscriminately during the summer, under the charge of the Town-herd, who regularly drove them out to pasture in the morning, and brought them back at night, without which precaution they would have fallen a speedy prey to some of the Snatchers in the neighbourhood. These are things to make modern agriculturists hold up their hands and stare; but the same mode of cultivation is not yet entirely in desuetude in some distant parts of North Britain, and may be witnessed in full force and exercise in the Zetland Archipelago.

The habitations of the church-feuars were not less primitive than their agriculture. In each village or town were several small towers, having battlements projecting over the side-walls, and usually an advanced angle or two with shot holes for flanking the door-way, which was always defended by a strong door of oak, studded with nails, and often by an exterior grated door of iron. These small peel-houses were ordinarily inhabited by the principal feuars and their families; but upon the alarm of approaching danger, the whole inhabitants thronged from their own miserable cottages, which were situated around, to garrison these points of defence. It was then no easy matter for a hostile party to penetrate into the village, for the men were habituated to the use of bows and fire-arms, and the towers being generally so placed, that the discharge from one crossed that of another, it was impossible to assault any of them individually.

The interior of these houses was usually sufficiently wretched, for it would have been folly to have furnished them in a manner which could excite the avarice of their lawless neighbours. Yet the families themselves exhibited in their appearance a degree of comfort, information, and independence

* possessions conferred upon vassals and their heirs, a small quit-rent, or a moderate proportion of the profits was a favourite manner, by which the churchmen the patrimony of their convents; and many descendants feuars, as they are called, are still to be found in possession their family inheritances in the neighbourhood of the steries of Scotland.

† Or bigg, a coarse kind of barley.

which could hardly have been expected. Their in-field supplied them with bread and home-brewed ale, their herds and flocks with beef and mutton. (the extravagance of killing lambs or calves was never thought of.) Each family killed a mart, or fat bullock, in November, which was salted up for winter use, to which the goodwife could, upon great occasions, add a dish of pigeons or a fat capon—the ill-cultivated garden afforded "lang-cale,"—and the river gave salmon to serve as a relish during the season of Lent.

Of fuel they had plenty, for the bogs afforded turf; and the remains of the abused woods continued to give them logs for burning, as well as timber for the usual domestic purposes. In addition to these comforts, the goodman would now and then sally forth to the greenwood, and mark down a buck of season with his gun or his cross-bow; and the Father Confessor seldom refused him absolution for the trespass, if duly invited to take his share of the smoking haunch. Some, still bolder, made, either with their own domestics, or by associating themselves with the moss-troopers, in the language of shepherds, "a start and overloup;" and the golden ornaments and silken head-gear worn by the females of one or two families of note, were invidiously traced by their neighbours to such successful excursions. This, however, was a more inexpiable crime in the eyes of the Abbot and Community of St. Mary's, than the borrowing one of the "gude king's deer;" and they failed not to discountenance and punish, by every means in their power, offences which were sure to lead to severe retaliation upon the property of the church, and which tended to alter the character of their peaceful vassalage.

As for the information possessed by those dependants of the Abbacies, they might have been truly said to be better fed than taught, even though their fare had been worse than it was. Still, however, they enjoyed opportunities of knowledge from which others were excluded. The Monks were in general well acquainted with their vassals and tenants, and familiar in the families of the better class among them, where they were sure to be received with the respect due to their twofold character of spiritual father and secular landlord. Thus it often happened, when a boy displayed talents and inclination for study, one of the brethren, with a view to his being bred to the church, or out of good-nature, in order to pass away his own idle time, if he had no better motive, initiated him into the mysteries of reading and writing, and imparted to him such other knowledge as he himself possessed. And the heads of these allied families, having more time for reflection, and more skill, as well as stronger motives for improving their small properties, bore amongst their neighbours the character of shrewd, intelligent men, who claimed respect on account of their comparative wealth, even while they were despised for a less warlike and enterprising turn than the other Borderers. They lived as much as they well could amongst themselves, avoiding the company of others, and dreading nothing more than to be involved in the deadly feuds and ceaseless contentions of the secular landholders.

Such is a general picture of these communities. During the fatal wars in the commencement of Queen Mary's reign, they had suffered dreadfully by the hostile invasions. For the English, now a Protestant people, were so far from sparing the church-lands, that they forayed them with more unrelenting severity than even the possessions of the laity. But the peace of 1550 had restored some degree of tranquillity to these distracted and harassed regions, and matters began again gradually to settle upon the former footing. The monks repaired their ravaged shrines—the feuar again roofed his small fortalice which the enemy had ruined—the poor labourer rebuilt his cottage, an easy task, where a few sods, stones, and a few pieces of wood from the next copse, furnished all the materials necessary. The cattle, lastly, were driven out of the wastes and thickets in which the remnant of them had been secreted; and the mighty bull moved at the head of his seraglio and their followers, to take possession of their wonted pastures. There ensued peace and quiet, the state of the age and nation considered, to the M[onastery of] Saint Mary, and its dependencies, for se[veral tran]quil years.

CHAPTER II.

In yon lone vale his early youth was bred,
Not solitary then—the bugle-horn
Of fell Alecto often waked its windings,
From where the brook joins the majestic riv[er]
To the wild northern bog, the curlew's haun[t,]
Where oozes forth its first and feeble streamle[t.]

We have said, that most of the feuars d[welt in the] village belonging to their townships. Th[is was not,] however, universally the case. A lonely [tower, to] which the reader must now be introdu[ced, was at] least one exception to the general rule.

It was of small dimensions, yet larger [than those] which occurred in the village, as intimat[ing that, in] case of assault, the proprietor would have [to rely on] his own unassisted strength. Two or th[ree misera]ble huts, at the foot of the fortalice, held [the bonds]men and tenants of the feuar. The site w[as a beauti]ful green knoll, which started up suddenly [in the] throat of a wild and narrow glen, and w[hich, being] surrounded, except on one side, by the [winding of] a small stream, afforded a position of c[onsiderable] strength.

But the great security of Glendearg, for [so the place] was called, lay in its secluded and almos[t inaccessible si]tuation. To reach the tower, it was n[ecessary to] travel three miles up the glen, crossing al[ternately twenty] times the little stream, which, winding [through the] narrow valley, encountered at every hu[ndred yards] the opposition of a rock or precipitous b[ank on the] one side, which altered its course, and [caused it to] shoot off in an oblique direction to the [other. The] hills which ascend on each side of this g[len are very] steep, and rise boldly over the stream, w[hich is thus] imprisoned within their barriers. The [sides of the] glen are impracticable for horse, and ar[e only to be] traversed by means of the sheep-paths whi[ch lie along] their sides. It would not be readily sup[posed that a] road so hopeless and so difficult could [lead to a] habitation more important than the sum[mer shealing] of a shepherd.

Yet the glen, though lonely, nearly i[naccessible,] and sterile, was not then absolutely voi[d of beauty.] The turf which covered the small porti[on of level] ground on the sides of the stream, was [as close and] verdant as if it had occupied the scythe[s of a hun]dred gardeners once a-fortnight; and i[t was gar]nished with an embroidery of daisies an[d wild flow]ers, which the scythes would certainly hav[e destroyed.] The little brook, now confined betwixt c[lose banks,] now left at large to choose its course [through the] narrow valley, danced carelessly on fro[m stream to] pool, light and unturbid, as that better cla[ss of spirits] who pass their way through life, yieldin[g to insur]mountable obstacles, but as far from bei[ng subdued] by them as the sailor who meets by cha[nce an] unfavourable wind, and shapes his cou[rse so as to] be driven back as little as possible.

The mountains, as they would have be[en termed in] England, Scottice the steep braes, rose a[bruptly over] the little glen, here presenting the gray fa[ce of a rock,] from which the turf had been peeled by [the torrents,] and there displaying patches of wood [and copse,] which had escaped the waste of the cat[tle and the] sheep of the feuars, and which, featheri[ng naturally] up the beds of empty torrents, or occupyi[ng the con]cave recesses of the bank, gave at once [beauty and] variety to the landscape. Above thes[e scattered] woods rose the hill, in barren, but purp[le majesty;] the dark rich hue, particularly in autum[n, contrast]ing beautifully with the thickets of oak [and birch,] the mountain-ashes and thorns, the ald[ers and qui]vering aspens, which checkered and va[rie]d [the] scene, and not less with the dark-green [velvet] turf, which composed the level part of [the narrow] glen.

Yet, though thus embellished, the sce[ne could nei]ther be strictly termed sublime or b[eautiful, and] scarcely even picturesque or striking

olitude pressed on the heart; the traveller felt ıcertainty whither he was going, or in what
a path was to terminate, which, at times,
more on the imagination than the grand fea-
a show-scene, when you know the exact dis-
f the inn where your dinner is bespoke, and moment preparing. These are ideas, how-a far later age; for at the time we treat of, the sque, the beautiful, the sublime, and all their shiate shades, were ideas absolutely unknown inhabitants and occasional visiters of Glen-

e had, however, attached to the scene feelings
the time. Its name, signifying the Red Val-ms to have been derived, not only from the olour of the heath, with which the upper part of ig banks was profusely clothed, but also from red colour of the rocks, and of the precipitous
banks, which in that country are called scaurs.
ter glen, about the head of Ettrick, has acquired ie name from similar circumstances; and e probably more in Scotland to which it has ven.

r Glendearg did not abound in mortal visitants,
tion, that it might not be absolutely destitute
itants, had peopled its recesses with beings ig to another world. The savage and capriown Man of the Moors, a being which seems uine descendant of the northern dwarfs, was d to be seen there frequently, especially after annal equinox, when the fogs were thick, and not easily distinguished. The Scottish fairies, whimsical, irritable, and mischievous tribe,
ough at times capriciously benevolent, were equently adverse to mortals, were also sup-have formed a residence in a particularly ess of the glen, of which the real name was,
ion to that circumstance, Corrie nan Shian,
in corrupted Celtic, signifies the Hollow of
ies. But the neighbours were more cautious king about this place, and avoided giving it a om an idea common then throughout all the
and Celtic provinces of Scotland, and still in many places, that to speak either good or his capricious race of imaginary beings, is to their resentment, and that secrecy and si-
what they chiefly desire from those who may upon their revels, or discover their haunts.
sterious terror was thus attached to the dale,
afforded access from the broad valley of the
up the little glen we have described, to the e called the Tower of Glendearg. Beyond the where, as we have said, the tower was situated,
s grew more steep, and narrowed on the slen-
ok, so as scarce to leave a footpath; and there
n terminated in a wild waterfall, where a thread of water dashed in a precipitous line over two or three precipices. Yet farther in e direction, and above these successive ca-
lay a wild and extensive morass, frequented waterfowl, wide, waste, apparently almost iable, and serving in a great measure to se-ne inhabitants of the glen from those who
the northward.

itless and indefatigable moss-troopers, indeed,
passes were well known, and sometimes af-retreat. They often rode down the glen—this tower asked and received hospitality—
with a sort of reserve on the part of its more inhabitants, who entertained them as a party American Indians might be received by a ropean settler, as much out of fear as hospihile the uppermost wish of the landlord is dy departure of the savage guests.
ad not always been the current of feeling in valley and its tower. Simon Glendinning,
r inhabitant, boasted his connexion by blood
ncient family of Glendonwyne, on the western
He used to narrate, at his fireside, in the evenings, the feats of the family to which nged, one of whom fell by the side of the Earl of Douglas at Otterbourne. On these is Simon usually held upon his knee an broadsword, which had belonged to his ancestors before any of the family had consented to accept a fief under the peaceful dominion of the Monks of St. Mary's. In modern days, Simon might have lived at ease on his own estate, and quietly murmured against the fate that had doomed him to dwell there, and cut off his access to martial renown. But so many opportunities, nay, so many calls there were for him, who in those days spoke big, to make good his words by his actions, that Simon Glendinning was soon under the necessity of marching with the men of the Halidome, as it was called, of Saint Mary's, in that disastrous campaign which was concluded by the battle of Pinkie.

The Catholic clergy were deeply interested in that national quarrel, the principal object of which was, to prevent the union of the infant Queen Mary with the son of the heretical Henry VIII. The Monks had called out their vassals, under an experienced leader. Many of themselves had taken arms, and marched to the field, under a banner representing a female, supposed to personify the Scottish Church, kneeling in the attitude of prayer, with the legend, *Afflictæ Sponsæ ne obliviscaris.

The Scots, however, in all their wars, had more occasion for good and cautious generals than for excitation, whether political or enthusiastic. Their headlong and impatient courage uniformly induced them to rush into action without duly weighing either their own situation or that of their enemies, and the inevitable consequence was frequent defeat. With the dolorous slaughter of Pinkie we have nothing to do, excepting that, among ten thousand men of low and high degree, Simon Glendinning, of the Tower of Glendearg, bit the dust, no way disparaging in his death that ancient race from which he claimed his descent.

When the doleful news, which spread terror and mourning through the whole of Scotland, reached the tower of Glendearg, the widow of Simon, Elspeth Brydone by her family name, was alone in that desolate habitation, excepting a hind or two, alike past martial and agricultural labour, and the helpless widows and families of those who had fallen with their master. The feeling of desolation was universal;—but what availed it? The Monks, their patrons and protectors, were driven from their Abbey by the English forces, who now overran the country, and compelled at least an appearance of submission on the part of the inhabitants. The Protector, Somerset, formed a strong camp among the ruins of the ancient castle of Roxburgh, and compelled the neighbouring country to come in, pay tribute, and take assurance from him, as the phrase then went. Indeed there was no power of resistance remaining; and the few barons whose high spirit disdained even the appearance of surrender, could only retreat into the wildest fastnesses of the country, leaving their houses and property to the wrath of the English, who detached parties everywhere, to distress, by military exaction, those whose chiefs had not made their submission. The Abbot and his community having retreated beyond the Forth, their lands were severely forayed, as their sentiments were held peculiarly inimical to the alliance with England.

Amongst the troops detached on this service was a small party, commanded by Stawarth Bolton, a captain in the English army, and full of the blunt and unpretending gallantry and generosity which have so often distinguished that nation. Resistance was in vain. Elspeth Brydone, when she descried a dozen of horsemen threading their way up the glen, with a man at their head, whose scarlet cloak, bright armour, and dancing plume, proclaimed him a leader, saw no better protection for herself than to issue from the iron gate, covered with a long mourning veil, and holding one of her two sons in each hand, to meet the Englishman—state her deserted condition—place the little tower at his command—and beg for his mercy. She stated, in a few brief words, her intention, and added, "I submit, because I have no means of resistance."

"And I do not ask your submission, mistress, for the same reason," replied the Englishman.

* Forget not the afflicted Spouse.

satisfied of your peaceful intentions is all I ask; and, from what you tell me, there is no reason to doubt them."

"At least, sir," said Elspeth Brydone, "take share of what our spence and our garners afford. Your horses are tired—your folk want refreshment."

"Not a whit—not a whit," answered the honest Englishman; "it shall never be said we disturbed by carousal the widow of a brave soldier, while she was mourning for her husband.—Comrades, face about.—Yet stay," he added, checking his war-horse, "my parties are out in every direction; they must have some token that your family are under my assurance of safety.—Here, my little fellow," said he, speaking to the eldest boy, who might be about nine or ten years old, "lend me thy bonnet."

The child reddened, looked sulky, and hesitated, while the mother, with many a fye and nay pshaw, and such sarsenet chidings as tender mothers give to spoiled children, at length succeeded in snatching the bonnet from him, and handing it to the English leader.

Stawarth Bolton took his embroidered red cross from his barret-cap, and putting it into the loop of the boy's bonnet, said to the mistress, (for the title of lady was not given to dames of her degree,) "By this token, which all my people will respect, you will be freed from any importunity on the part of our forayers." * He placed it on the boy's head; but it was no sooner there, than the little fellow, his veins swelling, and his eyes shooting fire through tears, snatched the bonnet from his head, and, ere his mother could interfere, skimmed it into the brook. The other boy ran instantly to fish it out again, threw it back to his brother, first taking out the cross, which, with great veneration, he kissed, and put into his bosom. The Englishman was half diverted, half surprised, with the scene.

"What mean ye by throwing away Saint George's red cross?" said he to the elder boy, in a tone betwixt jest and earnest.

"Because Saint George is a southern saint," said the child, sulkily.

"Good!"—said Stawarth Bolton.—"And what did you mean by taking it out of the brook again, my little-fellow?" he demanded of the younger.

"Because the priest says it is the common sign of salvation to all good Christians."

"Why, good again!" said the honest soldier. "I protest unto you, mistress, I envy you these boys. Are they both yours?"

Stawarth Bolton had reason to put the question, for Halbert Glendinning, the elder of the two, had hair as dark as the raven's plumage, black eyes, large, bold, and sparkling, that glittered under eyebrows of the same complexion; a skin deep embrowned, though it could not be termed swarthy, and an air of activity, frankness, and determination, far beyond his age. On the other hand, Edward, the younger brother, was light haired, blue-eyed, and of fairer complexion, in countenance rather pale, and not exhibiting that rosy hue which colours the sanguine cheek of robust health. Yet the boy had nothing sickly or ill-conditioned in his look, but was, on the contrary, a fair and handsome child, with a smiling face, and mild, yet cheerful eye.

The mother glanced a proud motherly gl at the one, and then at the other, ere she the Englishman, "Surely, sir, they are children."

"And by the same father, mistress?" warth; but, seeing a blush of displeasur her brow, he instantly added, "Nay, I offence; I would have asked the same q any of my gossips in Merry Lincoln.—W you have two fair boys; I would I could bo for Dame Bolton and I live childless in our Come, little fellows, which of you will go w

The trembling mother, half-fearing as drew the children towards her, one with ei while they both answered the stranger. " go with you," said Halbert boldly, "for false-hearted southern; and the southern father; and I will war on you to the death can draw my father's sword."

"God-a-mercy, my little levin-bolt," said "the goodly custom of deadly feud will down in thy day, I presume.—And you, white-head, will you not go with me, to rid horse?"

"No," said Edward demurely, "for heretic."

"Why, God-a-mercy still!" said Stawar "Well, dame, I see I shall find no recruit troop from you; and yet I do envy you little chubby knaves." He sighed a momen visible, in spite of gorget and corslet, and th "And yet my dame and I would bat quar of the knaves we should like best; for I sh for the black-eyed rogue—and she, I warra that blue-eyed, fair-haired darling. Nath must brook our solitary wedlock, and wi those that are more fortunate.—Sergeant Bi thou remain here till recalled—protect this under assurance—do them no wrong, and wrong to be done to them, as thou wilt ans Dame, Brittson is a married man, old an feed him on what you will, but give him much liquor."

Dame Glendinning again offered refresh with a faltering voice, and an obvious invitation should not be accepted. The that, supposing her boys as precious in th the Englishman as in her own, (the most of parental errors,) she was half afraid, admiration he expressed of them in his blun might end in his actually carrying off one of the little darlings whom he appeared so much. She kept hold of their hands, there her feeble strength could have been of se any violence been intended, and saw wit could not disguise, the little party of horse march, in order to descend the glen. He did not escape Stawarth Bolton. "I fo dame," he said, "for being suspicious that lish falcon was hovering over your Scott brood. But fear not—those who have fe dren have fewest cares; nor does a wise m those of another household. Adieu, dam the black-eyed rogue is able to drive a f England, teach him to spare women and even for the sake of Stawarth Bolton."

"God be with you, gallant southern!" speth Glendinning, but not till he was out o spurring on his good horse to regain the h party, whose plumage and armour were now and gradually disappearing in the distance winded down the glen.

"Mother," said the elder boy, "I will not to a prayer for a southern."

"Mother," said the younger, more rev "is it right to pray for a heretic?"

"The God to whom I pray only knows," poor Elspeth; "but these two words, sou heretic, have already cost Scotland ten th her best and bravest, and me a husband, s father; and, whether blessing or banning wish to hear them more.—Follow me to sir," she said to Brittson, "and such as w offer you shall be at your disposal."

* As gallantry of all times and nations has the same mode of thinking and acting, so it often expresses itself by the same symbols. In the civil war, 1715-6, a party of Highlanders, under a Chieftain of rank, came to Rose Castle, the seat of the Bishop of Carlisle, but then occupied by the family of Squire Dacre of Cumberland. They demanded quarters, which of course were not to be refused to armed men of a strange attire and unknown language. But the domestic represented to the captain of the mountaineers, that the lady of the mansion had been just delivered of a daughter, and expressed her hope that, under these circumstances, his party would give as little trouble as possible. "God forbid," said the gallant chief, "that I or mine should be the means of adding to a lady's inconvenience at such a time. May I request to see the infant?" The child was brought, and the Highlander, taking his cockade out of his bonnet, and fastening it on the child's breast, "That will be a token," he said, "to any of our people who may come hither, that Donald M'Donald of Kinloch Moidart, has taken the family of Rose Castle under his protection." The lady when received in infancy this grace of Highland protection, is now Mary, Lady Clerk of Penicuick, and on the 10th of June still wears the cockade which was pinned on her breast, with a white rose as a kindred decoration.

CHAPTER III.

> They lighted down on Tweed water,
> And blew their coals sae het,
> And fired the March and Teviotdale,
> All in an evening late.—Auld Maitland.

e report soon spread through the patrimony of Mary's and its vicinity, that the Mistress of learg had received assurance from the English ain, and that her cattle were not to be driven her corn burnt. Among others who heard this , it reached the ears of a lady, who, once much r in rank than Elspeth Glendinning, was now same calamity reduced to even greater misfor-

was the widow of a brave soldier, Walter l, descended of a very ancient Border family, once possessed immense estates in Eskdale. had long since passed from them into other , but they still enjoyed an ancient Barony of lerable extent, not very far from the patrimony . Mary's, and lying upon the same side of the with the narrow vale of Glendearg, at the head hich was the little tower of the Glendinnings. they had lived, bearing a respectable rank gst the gentry of their province, though neither ty nor powerful. This general regard had been augmented by the skill, courage, and enter- which had been displayed by Walter Avenel, st Baron.

en Scotland began to recover from the dreadful she had sustained after the battle of Pinkie- h, Avenel was one of the first who, assembling all force, set an example in those bloody and aring skirmishes, which showed that a nation, h conquered and overrun by invaders, may yet against them such a war of detail as shall in d become fatal to the foreigners. In one of however, Walter Avenel fell, and the news came to the house of his fathers was followed distracting intelligence, that a party of Eng- en were coming to plunder the mansion and of his widow, in order, by this act of terror, to t others from following the example of the sed.

unfortunate lady had no better refuge than the able cottage of a shepherd among the hills, to she was hastily removed, scarce conscious or for what purpose her terrified attendants removing her and her infant daughter from her ouse. Here she was tended with all the du- service of ancient times by the shepherd's wife, Tacket, who in better days had been her own woman. For a time the lady was unconscious misery; but when the first stunning effect of vas so far passed away that she could form an te of her own situation, the widow of Avenel use to envy the lot of her husband in his dark ilent abode. The domestics who had guided her place of refuge, were presently obliged to se for their own safety, or to seek for necessary stence; and the shepherd and his wife, whose cottage she shared, were soon after deprived of eans of affording their late mistress even that sustenance which they had gladly shared with Some of the English foragers had discovered riven off the few sheep which had escaped the researches of their avarice. Two cows shared te of the remnant of their stock; they had af- l the family almost their sole support, and now e appeared to stare them in the face.

e are broken and beggared now, out and out," ld Martin the shepherd, and he wrung his in the bitterness of agony, "the thieves, the ing thieves! not a cloot left of the haill hirsel!"

nd to see poor Grizzy and Crummie," said his "turning back their necks to the byre, and rout- hile the stony-hearted villains were brogging on wi' their lances!"

here were but four of them," said Martin, "and seen the day forty wad not have ventured this . But our strength and manhood is gane with ir maister!"

or the sake of the holy rood, whisht, man!" said oodwife; "our leddy is half gane already, as ye may see by that fleightering of the ee-lid—a word mair and she's dead outright."

"I could almost wish," said Martin, "we were a' gane, for what to do passes my puir wit. I care little for mysell, or you, Tibb; we can make a fend—work or want—we can do baith, but she can do neither."

They canvassed their situation thus openly before the lady, convinced by the paleness of her look, her quivering lip, and dead-set eye, that she neither heard nor understood what they were saying.

"There is a way," said the shepherd, "but I kenna if she could bring her heart to it,—there's Simon Glendinning's widow of the glen yonder, has had assurance from the southern loons, and nae soldier to steer them for one cause or other. Now, if the leddy could bow her mind to take quarters with Elspeth Glendinning till better days cast up, nae doubt it wad be doing an honour to the like of her, but"——

"An honour!" answered Tibb, "ay, by my word, sic an honour as wad be pride to her kin mony a lang year after her banes were in the mould. Oh! gudeman, to hear ye even the Lady of Avenel to seeking quarters wi' a kirk-vassal's widow!"

"Loath should I be to wish her to it," said Martin; "but what may we do? to stay here is mere starvation; and where to go, I'm sure I ken nae mair than ony tup I ever herded."

"Speak no more of it," said the widow of Avenel, suddenly joining in the conversation. "I will go to the tower. Dame Elspeth is of good folk, a widow, and the mother of orphans,—she will give us house-room until something be thought upon. These evil showers make the low bush better than no bield."

"See there, see there," said Martin, "you see the leddy has twice our sense."

"And natural it is," said Tibb, "seeing that she is convent-bred, and can lay silk broidery, forby white-seam and shell-work."

"Do you not think," said the lady to Martin, still clasping her child to her bosom, and making it clear from what motives she desired the refuge, "that Dame Glendinning will make us welcome?"

"Blithely welcome, blithely welcome, my leddy," answered Martin cheerily, "and we shall deserve a welcome at her hand. Men are scarce now, my leddy, with these wars; and gie me a thought of time to it, I can do as gude a day's darg as ever I did in my life, and Tibb can sort cows with ony living woman."

"And muckle mair could I do," said Tibb, "were it in ony feasible house; but there will be neither pearlins to mend, nor pinners to busk up, in Elspeth Glendinning's."

"Whisht wi' your pride, woman," said the shepherd; "eneugh ye can do, baith outside and inside, an ye set your mind to it; and hard it is if we twa canna work for three folk's meat, forby my dainty wee leddy there. Come awa, come awa, nae use in staying here langer; we have five Scots miles over moss and muir, and that is nae easy walk for a leddy born and bred."

Household stuff there was little or none to remove or care for; an old pony which had escaped the plunderers, owing partly to its pitiful appearance, partly from the reluctance which it showed to be caught by strangers, was employed to carry the few blankets, and other trifles which they possessed. When Shagram came to his master's well-known whistle, he was surprised to find the poor thing had been wounded, though slightly, by an arrow, which one of the forayers had shot off in anger after he had long chased it in vain.

"Ay, Shagram," said the old man, as he applied something to the wound, "must you rue the langbow as weel as all of us?"

"What corner in Scotland rues it not!" said the Lady of Avenel.

"Ay, ay, madam," said Martin, "God keep the kindly Scot from the cloth-yard shaft, and he will keep himsell from the handy stroke. But let us go our way; the trash that is left I can come back for. There is nae ane to stir it but the good neighbours, and they"——

"For the love of God, goodman," said his wife.

gipsy fashion upon Shagram, betwixt two bundles of bedding; the Lady of Avenel walking by the animal's side; Tibb leading the bridle, and old Martin walking a little before, looking anxiously around him to explore the way.

Martin's task as guide, after two or three miles' walking, became more difficult than he himself had expected, or than he was willing to avow. It happened that the extensive range of pasturage, with which he was conversant, lay to the west, and to get into the little valley of Glendearg he had to proceed easterly. In the wilder districts of Scotland, the passage from one vale to another, otherwise than by descending that which you leave, and re-ascending the other, is often very difficult. Heights and hollows, mosses and rocks intervene, and all those local impediments which throw a traveller out of his course. So that Martin, however sure of his general direction, became conscious, and at length was forced reluctantly to admit, that he had missed the direct road to Glendearg, though he insisted they must be very near it. "If we can but win across this wide bog," he said, "I shall warrant we are on the top of the tower."

But to get across the bog was a point of no small difficulty. The farther they ventured into it, though proceeding with all the caution which Martin's experience recommended, the more unsound the ground became, until, after they had passed some places of great peril, their best argument for going forward came to be, that they had to encounter equal danger in returning.

The Lady of Avenel had been tenderly nurtured, but what will not a woman endure when her child is in danger? Complaining less of the dangers of

* This superstition continues to prevail, though one would suppose it must now be antiquated. It is only a year or two since an itinerant puppet-show-man, who, disdaining to acknowledge the profession of Gines de Passamonte, called himself an artist from Vauxhall, brought a complaint of a singular nature before the author, as Sheriff of Selkirkshire. The remarkable dexterity with which the show-man had exhibited the machinery of his little stage, had, upon a Selkirk fair-day, excited the eager curiosity of some mechanics of Galashiels. These men, from no worse motive that could be discovered than a thirst after knowledge beyond their sphere, committed a burglary upon the barn in which the puppets had been consigned to repose, and carried them off in the nook of their plaids, when returning from Selkirk to their own village.

tated whether to exert his absolute authority or defer to the contumacious obstinacy of Shagram, was not greatly comforted by his wife's observation, who, seeing Shagram stare with his eyes, distend his nostrils, and tremble with terror, hinted that he surely saw more than they could see."

In this dilemma, the child suddenly exclaimed, "Bonny leddy signs to us to come you gate." They all looked in the direction where the child pointed, but saw nothing, save a wreath of rising mist, which fancy might form into a human figure; but Shagram afforded to Martin only the sorrowful conviction that the danger of their situation was about to be increased by a heavy fog. He once more essayed to urge forward Shagram; but the animal was intent upon its determination not to move in the direction recommended. "Take your own way for it," said Martin, "and let us see what you can do."

Shagram, abandoned to the discretion of his own free will, set off boldly in the direction the child pointed. There was nothing wonderful in the animal in its bringing them safe to the other side of the dangerous morass; for the instinct of these animals in traversing bogs is one of the most curious facts in their nature, and is a fact generally established. But it was remarkable that the child more than once mentioned the beautiful lady and her signals, and that Shagram seemed to be in the secret, always moving in the same direction which she indicated. The Lady of Avenel took little notice at the time, her mind being probably occupied by the instant danger, but her attendants exchanged expressive looks with each other more than once.

"All-Hallow Eve!" said Tibb, in a whisper to Martin.

"For the mercy of Our Lady, not a word of that now!" said Martin in reply. "Tell your beads, woman, if you cannot be silent."

When they got once more on firm ground, Martin recognised certain land-marks, or cairns, on the tops of the neighbouring hills, by which he was able to guide his course, and ere long they arrived at the Tower of Glendearg.

It was at the sight of this little fortalice that the misery of her lot pressed hard upon the poor Lady of Avenel. When by any accident they had a her companion in misfortune. The Lady of nel had been meek and courteous in her prosperi- in adversity, therefore, she met with the greater pathy. Besides, there was a point of pride in tering and supporting a woman of such supe- birth and rank; and, not to do Elspeth Glendin- ; injustice, she felt sympathy for a woman whose re- mbled her own in so many points, yet was much more severe. Every species of hospitality gladly and respectfully extended to the distressed ilies, and they were kindly requested to stay as at Glendearg as their circumstances rendered ssary, or their inclination prompted.

CHAPTER IV.

Ne'er be I found, by thee unawed,
On that thrice-hallow'd eve abroad,
When goblins haunt from flood and fen,
The sleets of men
COLLINS' Ode to Fear.

the country became more settled, the Lady of nel would have willingly returned to her hus- l's mansion. But that was no longer in her er. It was a reign of minority, when the strong- ad the best right, and when acts of usurpation frequent amongst those who had much power little conscience.

lian Avenel, the younger brother of the deceased ter, was a person of this description. He best- d not to seize upon his brother's house and lands, oon as the retreat of the English permitted him. irst, he occupied the property in the name of his e, but when the lady proposed to return with her d to the mansion of its fathers, he gave her to erstand, that Avenel being a male fief, descended he brother, instead of the daughter, of the last essor. The ancient philosopher declined a dispute the emperor who commanded twenty legions, the widow of Walter Avenel was in no condition aintain a contest with the leader of twenty moss- pers. Julian was also a man of service, who d back a friend in case of need, and was sure, efore, to find protectors among the ruling power patience and forbearance were so far attended advantage, that Julian, for very shame's sake, d no longer suffer her to be absolutely dependant he charity of Elspeth Glendinning. A drove of le and a bull (which were probably missed by e English farmer) were driven to the pastures Glendearg; presents of raiment and household f were sent liberally, and some little money, ugh with a more sparing hand; for those in the ation of Julian Avenel could come more easily the goods, than the representing medium of va- and made their payments chiefly in kind.

In short, however clear the little Mary's right ie possessions of her father, her mother saw the ssity of giving way, at least for the time, to the pation of her uncle.

n the meantime, the widows of Walter Avenel Simon Glendinning had become habituated to h other's society, and were unwilling to part. e lady could hope no more secret and secure resi- ce than in the tower of Glendearg, and she was in a condition to support her share of the mu- l house keeping. Elspeth, on the other hand, felt le as well as pleasure, in the society of a guest of h distinction, and was at all times willing to pay ch greater deference than the Lady of Walter Ave- could be prevailed on to accept.

Martin and his wife diligently served the united ily in their several vocations, and yielded obe- ce to both mistresses, though always consider- themselves as the especial servants of the Lady Avenel. This distinction sometimes occasioned ight degree of difference between Dame Elspeth Tibb; the former being jealous of her own con- tence, and the latter apt to lay too much stress n the rank and family of her mistress. But both e alike desirous to conceal such petty squabbles n the lady, her hostess scarce yielding to her old mestic in respect for her person. Neither did the rence exist in such a degree as to interrupt the general harmony of the family, for the one wisely gave way as she saw the other become warm; and Tibb, though she often gave the first provocation, had generally the sense to be the first in relinquishing the argument.

The world which lay beyond was gradually forgotten by the inhabitants of this sequestered glen, and unless when she attended mass at the Monastery Church upon some high holiday, Alice of Avenel almost forgot that she once held an equal rank with the proud wives of the neighbouring barons and nobles who on such occasions crowded to the solemnity. The recollection gave her little pain. She loved her husband for himself, and in his inestimable loss all lesser subjects of regret had ceased to interest her. At times, indeed, she thought of claiming the protection of the Queen Regent (Mary of Guise) for her little orphan, but the fear of Julian Avenel always came between. She was sensible that he would have neither scruple nor difficulty in spiriting away the child, (if he did not proceed farther,) should he once consider its existence as formidable to his interest. Besides, he led a wild and unsettled life, mingling in all feuds and forays, wherever there was a spear to be broken; he evinced no purpose of marrying, and the fate which he continually was braving might at length remove him from his usurped inheritance. Alice of Avenel, therefore, judged it wise to check all ambitious thoughts for the present, and remain quiet in the rude, but peaceable retreat, to which Providence had conducted her.

It was upon an All-Hallow's eve, when the family had resided together for the space of three years, that the domestic circle was assembled round the blazing turf-fire, in the old narrow hall of the Tower of Glendearg. The idea of the master or mistress of the mansion feeding or living apart from their domestics, was at this period never entertained. The highest end of the board, the most commodious settle by the fire, — these were the only marks of distinction; and the servants mingled, with deference indeed, but unreproved and with freedom, in whatever conversation was going forward. But the two or three domestics, kept merely for agricultural purposes, had retired to their own cottages without, and with them a couple of wenches, usually employed within doors, the daughters of one of the hinds.

After their departure, Martin locked, first, the iron gate; and, secondly, the inner door of the tower, when the domestic circle was thus arranged. Dame Elspeth sate pulling the thread from her distaff; Tibb watched the progress of scalding the whey, which hung in a large pot upon the crook, a chain terminated by a hook, which was suspended in the chimney to serve the purpose of the modern crane. Martin, while busied in repairing some of the household articles, (for every man in those days was his own carpenter and smith, as well as his own tailor and shoemaker,) kept from time to time a watchful eye upon the three children.

They were allowed, however, to exercise their juvenile restlessness by running up and down the hall, behind the seats of the elder members of the family, with the privilege of occasionally making excursions into one or two small apartments which opened from it, and gave excellent opportunity to play at hide-and-seek. This night, however, the children seemed not disposed to avail themselves of their privilege of visiting these dark regions, but preferred carrying on their gambols in the vicinity of the light.

In the meanwhile Alice of Avenel, sitting close to an iron candlestick, which supported a mis-shapen torch of domestic manufacture, read small detached passages from a thick clasped volume, which she preserved with the greatest care. The art of reading the lady had acquired by her residence in a nunnery during her youth, but she seldom, of late years, put it to any other use than perusing this little volume, which formed her whole library. The family listened to the portions which she selected, as to some good thing which there was a merit in hearing with respect, whether it was fully understood or no. To her daughter, Alice of Avenel had determined to impart their mystery more fully, but the knowledge was at that period attended with personal danger, and was not rashly to be trusted to a child.

The noise of the romping children interrupted, from time to time, the voice of the lady, and drew on the noisy culprits the rebuke of Elspeth.

"Could they not go farther a-field, if they behoved to make such a din, and disturb the lady's good words?" And this command was backed with the threat of sending the whole party to bed if it was not attended to punctually. Acting under the injunction, the children first played at a greater distance from the party, and more quietly, and then began to stray into the adjacent apartments, as they became impatient of the restraint to which they were subjected. But, all at once, the two boys came open-mouthed into the hall, to tell that there was an armed man in the spence.

"It must be Christie of Clint-hill," said Martin, rising; "what can have brought him here at this time?"

"Or how came he in?" said Elspeth.

"Alas! what can he seek?" said the Lady of Avenel, to whom this man, a tenant of her husband's brother, and who sometimes executed his commissions at Glendearg, was an object of secret apprehension and suspicion. "Gracious heavens!" she added, rising up, "where is my child?" All rushed to the spence, Halbert Glendinning first arming himself with a rusty sword, and the younger seizing upon the lady's book. They hastened to the spence, and were relieved of a part of their anxiety by meeting Mary at the door of the apartment. She did not seem in the slightest degree alarmed or disturbed. They rushed into the spence, (a sort of interior apartment in which the family ate their victuals in the summer season,) but there was no one there.

"Where is Christie of Clint-hill?" said Martin.

"I do not know," said little Mary; "I never saw him."

"And what made you, ye misleard loons," said Dame Elspeth to her two boys, "come yon gate into the hall, roaring like bull-segs, to frighten the leddy, and her far frae strong?" The boys looked at each other in silence and confusion, and their mother proceeded with her lecture. "Could ye find nae night for daffin but Hallowe'en, and nae time but when the leddy was reading to us about the holy saints? May ne'er be in my fingers, if I dinna sort ye baith for it!" The eldest boy bent his eyes on the ground, the younger began to weep, but neither spoke; and the mother would have proceeded to extremities, but for the interposition of the little maiden.

"Dame Elspeth, it was my fault—I did say to them, that I saw a man in the spence."

"And what made you do so, child," said her mother, "to startle us all thus?"

"Because," said Mary, lowering her voice, "I could not help it."

"Not help it, Mary!—you occasioned all this idle noise, and you could not help it? How mean you by that, minion?"

"There really was an armed man in the spence," said Mary; "and because I was surprised to see him, I cried out to Halbert and Edward"——

"She has told it herself," said Halbert Glendinning, "or it ha' never been told by me."

"Nor by me neither," said Edward, emulously.

"Mistress Mary," said Elspeth, "you never told us any thing before that was not true; tell us if this was a Hallowe'en cantrip, and make an end of it." The Lady of Avenel looked as if she would have interfered, but knew not how; and Elspeth, who was too eagerly curious to regard any distant hint, persevered in her inquiries. "Was it Christie of the Clint-hill?—I would not for a mark that he were about the house, and a body no ken where."

"It was not Christie," said Mary; "it was—it was a gentleman—a gentleman with a bright breastplate, like what I hae seen langsyne, when we dwelt at Avenel"——

"What like was he?" continued Tibb, who now took share in the investigation.

"Black-haired, black-eyed, with a peaked black beard," said the child, "and many a fold of pearling round his neck, and hanging down his breast over his breastplate; and he had a beautiful hawk, with silver bells, standing on his left hand, with a crimson silk hood upon its head"——

"Ask her no more questions, for the love of God," said the anxious matron to Elspeth, "but look to my leddy!" But the lady of Avenel, taking Mary in her hand, turned hastily away, and, walking into the hall, gave them no opportunity of remarking in what manner she received the child's communication, which she thus cut short. What Tibb thought of it appeared from her crossing herself repeatedly, and whispering into Elspeth's ear, "Saint Mary preserve us! the lassie has seen her father!"

When they reached the hall, they found the lady holding her daughter on her knee, and kissing her repeatedly. When they entered, she again rose, as if to shun observation, and returned to the little apartment where her child and she occupied the same bed.

The boys were also sent to their cabin, and no one remained by the hall fire save the faithful Tibb and Dame Elspeth, excellent persons both, and as thorough gossips as ever wagged a tongue.

It was but natural that they should instantly resume the subject of the supernatural appearance, for such they deemed it, which had this night alarmed the family.

"I could have wished it had been the deil himself—he guid to and preserve us!—rather than Christie o' the Clint-hill," said the matron of the mansion, "for the word runs rife in the country, that he is ane of the maist masterfu' thieves ever lap on horse."

"Hout-tout, Dame Elspeth," said Tibb, "fear ye naething frae Christie; tods keep their ain holes clean. You kirk-folk make sic a fasherie about men shifting a wee bit for their living! Our Border-lairds would ride with few men at their back, if a' the light-handed lads were out o' gate."

"Better they rade wi' nane than distress the country-side the gate they do," said Dame Elspeth.

"But wha is to haud back the Southron, then," said Tibb, "if ye take away the lances and broadswords? I trow we auld wives couldna do that wi' rock and wheel, and as little the monks wi' bell and book."

"And see weel as the lances and broadswords hae kept them back, I trow!—I was mair beholden to nae Southron, and that was Stawarth Bolton, than to a' the Border-riders ever wore Saint Andrew's cross—I reckon their skelping back and forward, and lifting honest men's gear, has been a main cause of a' the breach between us and England, and I am sure that cost me a kind goodman. They spoke about the wedding of the Prince and our Queen, but it's as like to be the driving of the Cumberland folk's stocking that brought them down on us like dragons." Tibb would not have failed in other circumstances to answer what she thought reflections disparaging to her country folk; but she recollected that Dame Elspeth was mistress of the family, curbed her own zealous patriotism, and hastened to change the subject.

"And is it not strange," she said, "that the heiress of Avenel should have seen her father this blessed night?"

"And ye think it was her father, then?" said Elspeth Glendinning.

"What else can I think?" said Tibb.

"It may hae been something waur, in his likeness," said Dame Glendinning.

"I ken nae thing about that," said Tibb,—"but his likeness it was, that I will be sworn to, just as he used to ride out a-hawking; for having enemies in the country, he seldom laid off the breastplate; and for my part," added Tibb, "I dinna think a man looks like a man unless he has steel on his breast and by his side too."

"I have no skill of your harness on breast or side either," said Dame Glendinning; "but I ken there is little luck in Hallowe'en sights, for I have had one myself."

"Indeed, Dame Elspeth?" said old Tibb, edging her stool closer to the huge elbow-chair occupied by her friend, "I should like to hear about that."

"Ye maun ken then, Tibb," said Dame Glendin-

at when I was a hempie of nineteen or wasna my fault if I wasna at a' the mergs time about."
was very natural," said Tibb; "but ye hae
nce that, or ye wadna hand our braw gal-ightly."
had that wad sober me or ony ane," said
n. "Aweel, Tibb, a lass like me wasna to rs, for I wasna sae ill-favoured that the bark after me."
should that be," said Tibb, "and you sae a
ried woman to this day?"
, cummer," said the matron of Glendearg, er sat at of honour, in her turn, a little nearer stool on which Tibb was seated; "weel-
s past my time of day; but I might pass
wasna sae tocherless but what I had a bit
y breast-lace. My father was portioner of g."
e tell'd me that before," said Tibb; "but Hallowe'en?"
, aweel, I had mair joes than ane, but I fane o' them; and sae, at Hallowe'en, Father
the cellarer—he was cellarer before this ther Clement, that now is—was cracking nd drinking his brown beer with us, and s might be, and they would have me try a ken wha suld wed me; and the monk said
nae ill in it, and if there was, he would for it. And wha but I into the barn to ny three weights o' naething sair, sair my gave me for fear of wrang-doing and wrangbaith; but I had aye a bauld spirit. I had owed the last weight clean out, and the s shining bright upon the floor, when in e presence of my dear Simon Glendinning,
w happy. I never saw him plainer in my did that moment; he held up an arrow as me, and I swarf'd awa wi' fright. Muckle
e was to bring me to mysell again, and sair
to make me believe it was a trick of Faolas and Simon between them, and that was to signify Cupid's shaft, as the Father and mony a time Simon wad throep it to
was married—gude man, he liked not it said that he was seen out o' the body!—
the end o' it, Tibb; we were married, and goose wing was the death o' him after a'!"
as been of ower many brave men!" said wish there wasna sae a bird as a goose in warld, for by the cheeking that we hae at ide."
ell me, Tibb," said Dame Glendinning, es your leddy aye do reading out o' that k book wi' the silver clasps?—there are
y gude words in it to come frae ony body
t—An it were about Robin Hood, or some Lindsay's ballants, ane wad ken better
ay to it. I am no misdoubting your mis-way, but I wad like ill to hae a decent nted wi' ghaists and gyre-carlines."
e nae reason to doubt my leddy, or ony says or does, Dame Glendinning," said the Tibb, something offended; "and touching
it's weel kend she was born on Hallowe'en
years gane, and they that are born on Halhilles see mair than ither folk."
hat wad be the cause, then, that the bairn cuckle din about what it saw?—if it had Halbert himself, forby Edward, who is of ire, he wad hae yammered the haill night
ancy. But it's like Mistress Mary has sic ir natural to her."
nay weel be," said Tibb; "for on Hallow-ras born, as I tell ye, and our auld parish
l fain hae had the night ower, and All-Hal-egun. But for a' that, the sweet bairn is ither bairns, as ye may see yourself; and s blessed night, and anes before when we hat weary bog on the road here, I kenna
y mair than it her folk."
hat saw she in the bog, then," said Dame
ng, "forby moor-cocks and heather-blut-

"The wean saw something like a white leddy that weised us the gate," said Tibb, "when we were like to hae perished in the moss-hags—certain it was that Shagram reisted, and I ken Martin thinks he saw something."

"And what might the white leddy be?" said El-speth; "have ye ony guess o' that?"

"It's weel kend that, Dame Elspeth," said Tibb;
"if ye had lived under grit folk, as I hae dune, ye wadna be to seek in that matter."

"I hae aye keepit my ain ha' house abune my head," said Elspeth, not without emphasis, "and if I hayena lived wi' grit folk, grit folk have lived wi'
me."

"Weel, weel, dame," said Tibb, "your pardon's prayed, there was nae offence meant. But ye maun
ken the great ancient families canna be just served
wi' the ordinary saunts, (praise to them!) like Saunt Anthony, Saunt Cuthbert, and the like, that come and gang at every sinner's bidding, but they hae a sort of saunts or angels, or what not, to themsells,
and as for the White Maiden of Avenel, she is kend
ower the haill country. And she is aye seen to yammer and wail before ony o' that family dies, as was weel kend by twenty folk before the death of Walter Avenel, haly be his cast!"

"If she can do nae mair than that," said Elspeth,
somewhat scornfully, "they needna make mony vows to her, I trow. Can she make nae better fend for them than that, and has naething better to do than wail on them?"

"Mony braw services can the White Maiden do for them to the boot of that, and has dune in the auld histories," said Tibb, "but I mind o' naething in my day, except it was her that the bairn saw in the bog."

"Aweel, aweel, Tibb," said Dame Glendinning, rising and lighting the iron lamp, "these are great privileges of your grand folk. But our Lady and Saunt Paul are good enough saunts for me, and I'se warrant them never leave me in a bog that they can help me out o', seeing I send four waxen candles to their chapels every Candlemas; and if they are not seen to weep at my death, I'se warrant them smile at my joyful rising again, whilk Heaven send to all of us. Amen."

"Amen," answered Tibb, devoutly; "and now it's time I should hap up the wee bit gathering turf, as the fire is ower low."

Busily she set herself to perform this duty. The relict of Simon Glendinning did but pause a moment to cast a heedful and cautious glance all around the hall, to see that nothing was out of its proper place;
then, wishing Tibb good-night, she retired to repose.

"The deil's in the carline," said Tibb to herself,
"because she was the wife of a cock-laird, she thinks hersell grander, I trow, than the bowerwoman of a lady of that ilk!" Having given vent to her suppressed spleen in this little ejaculation, Tibb also betook herself to slumber.

CHAPTER V.

A priest, ye cry, a priest!—lame shepherds they,
How shall they gather in the straggling flock?
Dumb dogs which bark not—how shall they compel
The loitering vagrants to the Master's fold?
Fitter to bask before the blazing fire,
And snuff the mess neat handed Phillis dresses,
Than on the snow-wreath battle with the wolf.

Reformation.

The health of the Lady of Avenel had been gradually decaying ever since her disaster. It seemed as if the few years which followed her husband's death had done on her the work of half a century.
She lost the fresh elasticity of form, the colour and the touch of health, and became wasted, wan, and feeble. She appeared to have no formed complaint;
yet it was evident to those who looked on her, that her strength waned daily. Her lips at length became blanched and her eye dim; yet she spoke not of any desire to see a priest, until Elspeth Glendinning, in her zeal could not refrain from touching upon a point, which she deemed essential to salvation. Alice of Avenel received her hint kindly, and thanked her for it.

"If any good priest would take the trouble of such a journey," she said, "he should be welcome; for the prayers and lessons of the good must be at all times advantageous."

This quiet acquiescence was not quite what Elspeth Glendinning wished or expected. She made up, however, by her own enthusiasm, for the lady's want of eagerness to avail herself of ghostly counsel, and Martin was despatched with such haste as Shagram would make, to pray one of the religious men of Saint Mary's to come up to administer the last consolations to the Widow of Walter de Avenel.

When the Sacristan had announced to the Lord Abbot, that the Lady of the unquiet Walter de Avenel was in very weak health in the Tower of Glendearg, and desired the assistance of a father confessor, the lordly monk paused on the request.

"We do remember Walter de Avenel," he said; 'a good knight and a valiant; he was dispossessed of his lands, and slain by the Southron.—May not the lady come hither to the sacrament of confession? the road is distant, and painful to travel."

"The lady is unwell, holy father," answered the Sacristan, "and unable to bear the journey."

"True—ay—yes—then must one of our brethren go to her.—Knowest thou if she hath aught of a jointure from this Walter de Avenel?"

"Very little, holy father," said the Sacristan; "she hath resided at Glendearg since her husband's death, wellnigh on the charity of a poor widow, called Elspeth Glendinning."

"Why, thou knowest all the widows in the country-side?" said the Abbot. "Ho! ho! ho!" and he shook his portly sides at his own jest.

"Ho! ho! ho!" echoed the Sacristan, in the tone and tune in which an inferior applauds the jest of his superior.—Then added, with a hypocritical snuffle, and a sly twinkle of his eye, "It is our duty, most holy father, to comfort the widow—He! he! he! he!"

This last laugh was more moderate, until the Abbot should put his sanction on the jest.

"Ho! ho!" said the Abbot; "then to leave jesting, Father Philip, take thou thy riding gear, and go to confess this Dame Avenel.'

"But," said the Sacristan——

"Give me no Buts; neither But nor If pass between monk and Abbot, Father Philip; the bands of discipline must not be relaxed—heresy gathers force like a snowball—the multitude expect confessions and preachings from the Benedictine, as they would from so many beggarly friars—and we may not desert the vineyard, though the toil be grievous unto us."

"And with so little advantage to the holy monastery" said the Sacristan.

"True, Father Philip; but wot you not that what preventeth harm doeth good? This Julian de Avenel lives a light and evil life, and should we neglect the widow of his brother, he might foray our lands, and we never able to show who hurt us—moreover it is our duty to an ancient family, who, in their day, have been benefactors to the Abbey. Away with thee instantly, brother; ride night and day, an it be necessary, and let men see how diligent Abbot Boniface and his faithful children are in the execution of their spiritual duty—toil not deterring them, for the glen is five miles in length—fear not withholding them, for it is said to be haunted of spectres—nothing moving them from pursuit of their spiritual calling; to the confusion of calumnious heretics, and the comfort and edification of all true and faithful sons of the Catholic Church.—I wonder what our brother Eustace will say to this?"

Breathless with his own picture of the dangers and toil which he was to encounter, and the fame which he was to acquire, both by proxy, the Abbot moved slowly to finish his orisons in the refectory, and the Sacristan, with no very good will, accompanied old Martin in his return to Glendearg; the greatest impediment in the journey being the trouble of restraining his pampered mule, that she might tread in something like an equal pace with poor jaded Shagram.

After remaining an hour in private with his penitent, the monk returned, moody and full of thought. Dame Elspeth, who had placed for the honoured guest some refreshment in the hall, was struck with the embarrassment which appeared in his countenance. Elspeth watched him with great anxiety. She observed there was that on his brow which rather resembled a person come from hearing the confession of some enormous crime, than the look of a confessor who resigns a reconciled penitent, not to earth, but to heaven. After long hesitating, she could not at length refrain from hazarding a question. She was sure, she said, the lordly had made an easy shrift. Five years had they resided together, and she could safely say, no woman lived better.

"Woman," said the Sacristan, sternly, "thou speakest than knowest not what.—What avails cleaning the outside of the platter, if the inside be foul with heresy?"

"Our dishes and trenchers are not so clean as they could be wished, holy father," said Elspeth, but half understanding what he said, and beginning with her apron to wipe the dust from the plates, of which she supposed him to complain.

"Forbear, Dame Elspeth," said the monk; "your plates are as clean as wooden trenchers and pewter flagons can well be; the foulness of which I speak is that of pestilential heresy which is daily becoming ingrained in this our Holy Church of Scotland, and as a canker-worm in the rose-garland of the Spouse."

"Holy Mother of Heaven!" said Dame Elspeth, crossing herself, "have I kept house with a heretic?"

"No, Elspeth, no," replied the monk; "it were too strong a speech for me to make of this unhappy lady, but I would I could say she is free from heretical opinions. Alas! they fly about like the pestilence by noonday, and infect even the first and fairest of the flock! For it is easy to see of this dame, that she hath been high in judgment as in rank."

"And she can write and read, I had almost said, as well as your reverence," said Elspeth.

"Whom doth she write to, and what doth she read?" said the monk, eagerly.

"Nay," replied Elspeth, "I cannot say I ever saw her write at all, but her maiden that was—she now serves the family—says she can write—And for reading, she has often read to us good things out of a thick black volume with silver clasps."

"Let me see it," said the monk, hastily, "on your allegiance as a true vassal—on your faith as a Catholic Christian—instantly—instantly let me see it!"

The good woman hesitated, alarmed at the tone in which the confessor took up her information; and being moreover of opinion, that what so good a woman as the Lady of Avenel studied so devoutly, could not be of a tendency actually evil. But borne down by the clamour, exclamations, and something like threats used by Father Philip, she at length brought him the fatal volume. It was easy to do this without suspicion on the part of the owner, as she lay on her bed exhausted with the fatigue of a long conference with her confessor, and as the small round, or turret closet, in which was the book and her other trifling property, was accessible by another door. Of all her effects the book was the last, she would have thought of securing, for of what use or interest could it be in a family who neither read themselves, nor were in the habit of seeing any who did? so that Dame Elspeth had no difficulty in possessing herself of the volume, although her heart all the while accused her of an ungenerous and an inhospitable part towards her friend and inmate. The double power of a landlord and a feudal superior was before her eyes; and, to say truth, the boldness with which she might otherwise have resisted this double authority, was, I grieve to say it, much qualified by the curiosity she entertained, as a daughter of Eve, to have some explanation respecting the mysterious volume which the lady cherished with so much care, yet whose contents she imparted with such caution. For never had Alice of Avenel read them any passage from the book in question, until the iron door of the tower was locked, and all possibility of intrusion prevented. Even then she had shown, by the selection of passages, that she was more anxious to ther minds the principles which the vo-med, than to introduce them to it as a faith.

spection, half curious, half remorseful, had
ook in the monk's hands, he exclaim. l.
g over the leaves, "Now, by mine old r suspected! My mule, my mule! -I will nger here -well hast thou done, dame, in ng us this precious volume."
n witchcraft or devil's work!" said Dame
" it agitated.
forbid," said the monk, signing hime cross, "it is the Holy Scripture. But d into the vulgar tongue, and therefore,
of the Holy Catholic Church, unfit to ands of any lay person."
is the Holy Scripture communicated for n salvation," said Elspeth. "Good father, struct may ignorance better; but lack of
be a deadly sin, and truly, to my poor
should be glad to read the Holy Scrip-

ay thou wouldst," said the monk; "and did our mother Eve seek to have know-od and evil, and thus Sin came into the Death by Sin."
ire, and that's true!" said Elspeth. "O, dealt by the counsel of Saint Peter and
!"
ad reverenced the command of Heaven," onk, "which, as it gave her birth, life, and fixed upon the grant such conditions as pon'd with its holy pleasure. I tell thee,
e Word Angels -that is, the text alone,
unskilled eye and unhallowed lips, is like
g medicines which sick men take by the he learned. Such patients recover and nile those dealing in them at their own perish by their own deed."
oubt, nae doubt," said the poor woman,
rence knows best."
said Father Philip, in a tone as deferenthought could possibly become the Sacris-Mary's,-"Not I, but the Holy Father of m, and our own holy father the Lord Ab-best. I, the poor Sacristan of Saint Mat repeat what I hear from others my supe-of this, good woman, he assured, -the ere Word, slayeth. But the church hath rs to gloze and to expound the same unto l congregation; and this I say, not so beloved brethren -I mean, my beloved
r the Sacristan had got into the end of one sermons.)-"This I speak not so much of , curates, and secular clergy, so called be-hive after the fashion of the seculum or nd by those lives which sequestrate us from neither do I speak this of the mendicant
ouer blacks or gray, whether crossed or bat of the Monks, and especially of the nedictine, reformed on the rule of Saint Clairvaux, thence called Cistercian, of nks, Christian brethren sister. I would
is the happiness and glory of the country
ng the holy ministers of Saint Mary's,
though an unworthy brother, may say it
ed more saints, more bishops, more popes patrons make us thankful! than any holy in Scotland. Wherefore -But I see th my mule in readiness, and I will but with the kiss of sisterhood, which maketh
d, and so betake me to my toilsome re-
e glen is of bad reputation for the evil spe-haunt it. Moreover, I may arrive too late ge, whereby I may be obliged to take the h I observed to be somewhat waxen."
gly, he took his leave of Dame Elspeth,
onfounded by the rapidity of his utterance.
etrine he gave forth, and by no means easy
ect of the book, which her conscience told ould not have communicated to any one,
e knowledge of its owner.
standing the haste which the monk as well as his mule made to return to better quarters than they had left at the head of Glendearg; notwithstanding the eager desire Father Philip had to be the very first who should acquaint the Abbot that a copy of the book they most dreaded had been found within the Halidome, or patrimony of the Abbey; notwithstanding, moreover, certain feelings which induced him to harry as fast as possible through the gloomy and evil-reputed glen, still the difficulties of the road, and the rider's want of habitude of quick motion, were such, that twilight came upon him ere he had nearly cleared the narrow valley.

It was indeed a gloomy ride. The two sides of the valley were so near, that at every double of the river the shadows from the western sky fell upon, and totally obscured, the eastern bank; the thickets of copsewood seemed to wave with a portentous agitation of boughs and leaves, and the very crags and scaurs seemed higher and grimmer than they had appeared to the monk while he was travelling in daylight, and in company. Father Philip was heartily rejoiced, when, emerging from the narrow glen, he gained the open valley of the Tweed, which held on its majestic course from current to pool, and from pool stretched away to other currents, with a dignity peculiar to itself amongst the Scottish rivers; for whatever may have been the drought of the season, the Tweed usually fills up the space between its banks, seldom leaving those extensive sheets of shingle which deform the margins of many of the celebrated Scottish streams.

The monk, insensible to beauties which the age had not regarded as deserving of notice, was nevertheless, like a prudent general, pleased to find himself out of the narrow glen in which the enemy might have stolen upon him unperceived. He drew up his bridle, reduced his mule to her natural and luxurious amble, instead of the agitating and broken trot at which, to his no small inconvenience, she had hitherto proceeded, and, wiping his brow, gazed forth at leisure on the broad moon, which, now mingling with the lights of evening, was rising over field and forest, village and fortalice, and, above all, over the stately Monastery, seen far and dim amid the yellow light.

The worst part of this magnificent view, in the monk's apprehension, was that the Monastery stood on the opposite side of the river, and that of the many fine bridges which have since been built across that classical stream, not one then existed. There was, however, in recompense, a bridge then standing which has since disappeared, although its ruins may be still traced by the curious.

It was of a very peculiar form. Two strong abutments were built on either side of the river, at a part where the stream was peculiarly contracted. Upon a rock in the centre of the current was built a solid piece of masonry, constructed like the pier of a bridge, and presenting, like a pier, an angle to the current of the stream. The masonry continued solid until the pier rose to a level with the two abutments upon either side, and from thence the building rose in the form of a tower. The lower story of this tower consisted only of an archway or passage through the building, over either entrance to which hung a drawbridge with counterpoises, either of which, when dropped, connected the archway with the opposite abutment, where the farther end of the drawbridge rested. When both bridges were thus lowered, the passage over the river was complete.

The bridge-keeper, who was the dependant of a neighbouring baron, resided with his family in the second and third stories of the tower, which, when both drawbridges were raised, formed an insulated fortalice in the midst of the river. He was entitled to a small toll or custom for the passage, concerning the amount of which disputes sometimes arose between him and the passengers. It is needless to say, that the bridge-ward had usually the better in these questions, since he could at pleasure detain the traveller on the opposite side; or, suffering him to pass half way, might keep him prisoner in his tower till they were agreed on the rate of pontage.*

* A bridge of the very peculiar construction described in the text, actually existed at a small hamlet about a mile and a half

But it was most frequently with the Monks of Saint Mary's that the warder had to dispute his perquisites. These holy men insisted for, and at length obtained, a right of gratuitous passage to themselves, greatly to the discontent of the bridgekeeper. But when they demanded the same immunity for the numerous pilgrims who visited the shrine, the bridgekeeper waxed restive, and was supported by his lord in his resistance. The controversy grew animated on both sides; the Abbot menaced excommunication, and the keeper of the bridge, though unable to retaliate in kind, yet made each individual monk who had to cross and recross the river, endure a sort of purgatory, ere he would accommodate them with a passage. This was a great inconvenience, and would have proved a more serious one, but that the river was fordable for man and horse in ordinary weather.

It was a fine moonlight night, as we have already said, when father Philip approached this bridge, the singular construction of which gives a curious idea of the insecurity of the times. The river was not in flood, but it was above its ordinary level—a heavy water, as it is called in that country, through which the monk had no particular inclination to ride, if he could manage the matter better.

"Peter, my good friend," cried the Sacristan, raising his voice; "my very excellent friend, Peter, be so kind as to lower the drawbridge. Peter, I say, dost thou not hear?—it is thy gossip, Father Philip, who calls thee."

Peter heard him perfectly well, and saw him into the bargain; but, as he had considered the Sacristan as peculiarly his enemy in his dispute with the convent, he went quietly to bed, after reconnoitering the monk through his loop-hole, observing to his wife, that "riding the water in a moonlight night would do the Sacristan no harm, and would teach him the value of a brig the neist time, on whilk a man might pass high and dry, winter and summer, flood and ebb."

After exhausting his voice in entreaties and threats, which were equally unattended to by Peter of the Brig, as he was called, Father Philip at length moved down the river to take the ordinary ford at the head of the next stream. Cursing the rustic obstinacy of Peter, he began, nevertheless, to persuade himself that the passage of the river by the ford was not only safe, but pleasant. The banks and scattered trees were so beautifully reflected from the bosom of the dark stream, the whole cool and delicious picture formed so pleasing a contrast to his late agitation, to the warmth occasioned by his vain endeavours to move the relentless porter of the bridge, that the result was rather agreeable than otherwise.

As Father Philip came close to the water's edge, at the spot where he was to enter it, there sat a female under a large broken scathed oak-tree, or rather under the remains of such a tree, weeping, wringing her hands, and looking earnestly on the current of the river. The monk was struck with astonishment to see a female there at that time of night. But he was, in all honest service,—and if a step farther, I put it upon his own conscience,—a devoted squire of dames. After observing the maiden for a moment, although she seemed to take no notice of his presence, he was moved by her distress, and willing to offer his assistance. "Damsel," said he, "thou seemest in no ordinary distress; peradventure, like myself, thou hast been refused passage at the bridge by the churlish keeper, and thy crossing may concern thee either for performance of a vow, or some other weighty charge."

The maiden uttered some inarticulate sound, looked at the river, and then in the face of the Sacristan. It struck Father Philip at that instant, that a Highland Chief of distinction had been for some time expected to pay his vows at the shrine of St. Mary's; and that possibly this fair maiden might be one of his family, travelling alone for accomplishment of a vow, or left behind by some accident, whom, therefore, it would be but right and prudent to use every civility in his power, especially as she seemed unacquainted with the Lowland tongue. Such at least was the only motive the Sacristan could ever known to assign for his courtesy; if there was any other, I once more refer it to his own conscience.

To express himself by signs, the common language of all nations, the cautious Sacristan first pointed to the river, then to his mule's crupper, and then made as graceful as he could, a sign to induce the fair lady to mount behind him. She seemed to understand his meaning, for she rose up as if to accept the offer; and while the good monk, who, as we have hinted, was no great cavalier, laboured, with the pressure of the right leg and the use of the left rein, to place his mule with her side to the bank in such a position that the lady might mount with ease, she rose from the ground with rather portentous agility, and at one bound sate behind the monk upon the animal, much the firmer rider of the two. The mule by no means seemed to approve of this double burden: she bounded, bolted, and would soon have thrown Father Philip over her head, had not the maiden with a firm hand detained him in the saddle.

At length the restive brute changed her humour, and, from refusing to budge off the spot, suddenly stretched her nose homeward, and dashed into the ford as fast as she could scamper. A new terror now invaded the monk's mind—the ford seemed unusually deep, the water eddied off in strong ripple from the counter of the mule, and began to rise upon her sides. Philip lost his presence of mind, which was at all time his most ready attribute, the mule yielded to the weight of the current, and as the rider was not attentive to keep her head turned up the river, she drifted downward, lost the ford and her footing at once, and began to swim with her head down the stream. And what was sufficiently strange, at the same moment, notwithstanding the extreme peril, the damsel began to sing, thereby increasing, if any thing could increase, the bodily fear of the worthy Sacristan.

I.

Merrily swim we, the moon shines bright,
Both current and ripple are dancing in light.
We have roused the night raven, I heard him croak,
As we plashed along beneath the oak
That flings its broad branches so far and so wide,
Their shadows are dancing in midst of the tide.
"Who wakens my nestlings," the raven he said,
"My beak shall ere morn in his blood be red,
For a blue swoln corpse is a dainty meal,
And I'll have my share with the pike and the eel."

II.

Merrily swim we, the moon shines bright,
There's a golden gleam on the distant height;
There's a silver shower on the alders dank
And the drooping willows that wave on the bank.
I see the Abbey, both turret and tower,
It is all astir for the vesper hour:
The monks for the chapel are leaving each cell,
But where's Father Philip, should toll the bell?

III.

Merrily swim we, the moon shines bright,
Downward we drift through shadow and light.

I know not; but as it is singular in its kind, I have thought to exhibit it."

The vestiges of this uncommon species of bridge still exist, and the author has often seen the foundations of the roll when drifting down the Tweed at night, for the purpose of killing salmon by torch light. Mr. John Mercer of Bridge-end recollects, that about fifty years ago the pillars were visible above water; and the late Mr. David Kyle, of the George Inn, Melrose, told the author that he saw a stone taken from the river bearing this inscription:—

"I, Sir John Pringle of Palmer stede,
Gave an annual mar[illegible] of gowd aue reid,
To help to bigg my brigg ower Tweal."

Pringle of Galashiels, afterwards of Whytbank, was the person to whom the bridge belonged.

above Melrose, called from the circumstance Bridge-end. It is thus noticed in Gordon's Iter Septentrionale:—

"In another journey through the south parts of Scotland, about a mile and a half from Melrose, in the shire of Tweeddale, I saw the remains of a curious bridge over the river Tweed, consisting of three oblong pillars, or rather towers, standing within the water, without any arches to join them. The middle one, which is the most entire, has a door towards the north, and I suppose, another opposite one towards the south, which I could not see without crossing the water. In the middle of this tower is a projection or cornice surrounding it; the whole is hollow from the door towards, and now open at the top, near which is a small window. I was informed that not long ago a countryman and his family lived in this tower—and got his livelihood by laying out planks from pillar to pillar, and conveying passengers over the river. Whether this be ancient or modern,

n rock the eddies sleep.
' silent, dark and deep
iy has risen from the fathomless pool,
ghted his candle of death and of dool:
ther, look, and you'll laugh to see
gapes and glares with his eyes on thee!

IV

g to your fishing, whom watch ye to night?
' man or a man of might?
an or priest that must float in your cove,
was crosses to visit his love?
ed ye the kelpy reply, as we pass'd,— ls ing on the warder the lock at the bridge fast!
come to cove are safe,
layman, lover or monk."

ong the damsel might have continued to here the terrified monk's journey might have uncertain. As she sung the last stanza, ed at, or rather in, a broad tranquil sheet caused by a strong wear or damhead, runss the river, which dashed in a broad catathe barrier. The mule, whether from choice, ced by the suction of the current, made toe cut intended to supply the convent mills, ed it half swimming half wading, and pitchnlucky monk to and fro in the saddle at a te.

person flew hither and thither, his garment ose, and in an effort to retain it, his hand n the volume of the Lady of Avenel which is bosom. No sooner had he grasped it, companion pitched him out of the saddle stream, where, still keeping her hand on his e gave him two or three good souses in the uld, so as to ensure that every part of him share of wetting, and then quitted her hold was so near the side that by a slight effort it one he was incapable) he might scramble . This accordingly he accomplished, and is eyes to see what had become of his exry companion, she was no where to be seen; e heard, as if from the surface of the river, ng with the noise of the water breaking over ead, a fragment of her wild song, which o run thus:—

—landed! the black book hath won,
d you seen Berwick with morn n' sun!
, and save ye, and blithe mot ye be,
iom they land that go swimming with me.

stacy of the monk's terror could be endured ; his head grew dizzy, and, after staggering ps onward, and running himself against a unk down in a state of insensibility.

CHAPTER VI.

let us sit in conclave. That these weeds
oted from the vineyard of the church,
these foul tares be severed from the wheat,
re, I trust, agreed.—Yet how to do this,
urt the wholesome crop and tender vine plants,
s good advisement. The Reformation.

esper service in the Monastery Church of 's was now over. The Abbot had disrobed f his magnificent vestures of ceremony, and his ordinary habit, which was a black gown, r a white cassock, with a narrow scapulary; and venerable dress, which was well calcuet off to advantage the portly mien of Abbot t times no one could have filled the state of Abbot, for such was his dignity, more re than this worthy prelate. He had, no ny of those habits of self-indulgence which pt to acquire who live for themselves alone. ain, moreover; and when boldly confronted, times shown symptoms of timidity, not very t with the high claims which he preferred inent member of the church, or with the deference which he exacted from his relithren, and all who were placed under his l. But he was hospitable, charitable, and eans of himself disposed to proceed with gainst any one. In short, he would in other e slumbered out his term of preferment with credit as any other "purple Abbot," who lived easily, but at the same time decorously—slept soundly, and did not disquiet himself with dreams.

But the wide alarm spread through the whole Church of Rome by the progress of the reformed doctrines, sorely disturbed the repose of Abbot Boniface, and opened to him a wide field of duties and cares which he had never so much as dreamed of. There were opinions to be combated and refuted—practices to be inquired into—heretics to be detected and punished—the fallen off to be reclaimed—the wavering to be confirmed—scandal to be removed from the clergy, and the vigour of discipline to be re-established. Post upon post arrived at the Monastery of St. Mary's—horses reeking, and riders exhausted—this from the Privy Council, that from the Primate of Scotland, and this other again from the Queen Mother, exhorting, approving, condemning, requesting advice upon this subject, and requiring information upon that.

These missives Abbot Boniface received with an important air of helplessness, or a helpless air of importance, whichever the reader may please to term it, evincing at once gratified vanity, and profound trouble of mind.

The sharp-witted Primate of Saint Andrews had foreseen the deficiencies of the Abbot of St. Mary's, and endeavoured to provide for them by getting admitted into his Monastery as Sub-Prior a brother Cistercian, a man of parts and knowledge, devoted to the service of the Catholic church, and very capable not only to advise the Abbot on occasions of difficulty, but to make him sensible of his duty in case he should, from good-nature or timidity, be disposed to shrink from it.

Father Eustace played the same part in the Monastery, as the old general who, in foreign armies, is placed at the elbow of the Prince of the Blood, who nominally commands in chief, on condition of attempting nothing without the advice of his dry-nurse; and he shared the fate of all such dry-nurses, being heartily disliked as well as feared by his principal. Still, however, the Primate's intention was fully answered. Father Eustace became the constant theme and often the bugbear of the worthy Abbot, who hardly dared to turn himself in his bed without considering what Father Eustace would think of it. In every case of difficulty, Father Eustace was summoned, and his opinion asked; and no sooner was the embarrassment removed, than the Abbot's next thought was how to get rid of his adviser. In every letter which he wrote to those in power, he recommended Father Eustace to some high church preferment, a bishopric or an abbey; and as they dropped one after another, and were otherwise conferred, he began to think, as he confessed to the Sacristan in the bitterness of his spirit, that the Monastery of St. Mary's had got a life-rent lease of their Sub-Prior.

Yet more indignant he would have been, had he suspected that Father Eustace's ambition was fixed upon his own mitre, which, from some attacks of an apoplectic nature, deemed by the Abbot's friends to be more serious than by himself, it was supposed might be shortly vacant. But the confidence which, like other dignitaries, he reposed in his own health, prevented Abbot Boniface from imagining that it held any concatenation with the motions of Father Eustace.

The necessity under which he found himself of consulting with his grand adviser, in cases of real difficulty, rendered the worthy Abbot particularly desirous of doing without him in all ordinary cases of administration, though not without considering what Father Eustace would have said of the matter. He scorned, therefore, to give a hint to the Sub-Prior of the bold stroke by which he had despatched Brother Philip to Glendearg; but when the vespers came without his re-appearance he became a little uneasy, the more as other matters weighed upon his mind. The feud with the warder or keeper of the bridge threatened to be attended with bad consequences, as the man's quarrel was taken up by the martial baron under whom he served; and pressing letters of an unpleasant tendency had just arrived from the Primate. Like a gouty man, who catches hold of his crutch

while he curses the infirmity that reduces him to use it, the Abbot, however reluctant, found himself obliged to require Eustace's presence, after the service was over, in his house, or rather palace, which was attached to, and made part of, the Monastery.

Abbot Boniface was seated in his high-backed chair, the grotesque carved back of which terminated in a mitre, before a fire where two or three large logs were reduced to one red glowing mass of charcoal. At his elbow, on an oaken stand, stood the remains of a roasted capon, on which his reverence had made his evening meal, flanked by a goodly stoup of Bourdeaux of excellent flavour. He was gazing indolently on the fire, partly engaged in meditation on his past and present fortunes, partly occupied by endeavouring to trace towers and steeples in the red embers.

"Yes," thought the Abbot to himself, "in that red perspective I could fancy to myself the peaceful towers of Dundrennan, where I passed my life ere I was called to pomp and to trouble. A quiet brotherhood we were, regular in our domestic duties; and when the frailties of humanity prevailed over us, we confessed, and were absolved by each other, and the most formidable part of the penance was the jest of the convent on the culprit. I can almost fancy that I see the cloister garden, and the pear-trees which I grafted with my own hands. And for what have I changed all this, but to be overwhelmed with business which concerns me not, to be called My Lord Abbot, and to be tutored by Father Eustace? I would these towers were the Abbey of Aberbrothwick, and Father Eustace the Abbot,—or I would he were in the fire on any terms, so I were rid of him! The Primate says our Holy Father the Pope hath an adviser—I am sure he could not live a week with such a one as mine. Then there is no learning what Father Eustace thinks till you confess your own difficulties—No hint will bring forth his opinion—he is like a miser, who will not unbuckle his purse to bestow a farthing, until the wretch who needs it has owned his excess of poverty, and wrung out the boon by importunity. And thus I am dishonoured in the eyes of my religious brethren, who behold me treated like a child which hath no sense of its own—I will bear it no longer!—Brother Bennet," (a lay brother answered to his call)—"tell Father Eustace that I need not his presence."

"I came to say to your reverence, that the holy father is entering even now from the cloisters."

"Be it so," said the Abbot, "he is welcome,—remove these things—or rather, place a trencher, the holy father may be a little hungry—yet, no—remove them, for there is no good fellowship in him—Let the stoup of wine remain, however, and place another cup."

The lay brother obeyed these contradictory commands in the way he judged most seemly—he removed the carcass of the half-sacked capon, and placed two goblets beside the stoup of Bourdeaux. At the same instant entered Father Eustace.

He was a thin, sharp-faced, slight-made little man, whose keen gray eyes seemed almost to look through the person to whom he addressed himself. His body was emaciated not only with the fasts which he observed with rigid punctuality, but also by the active and unwearied exercise of his sharp and piercing intellect;—

> A fiery soul, which, working out its way,
> Fretted the puny body to decay,
> And o'er-informed the tenement of clay.

He turned with conventual reverence to the Lord Abbot; and as they stood together, it was scarce possible to see a more complete difference of form and expression. The good-natured rosy face and laughing eye of the Abbot, which even his present anxiety could not greatly ruffle, was a wonderful contrast to the thin pallid cheek and quick penetrating glance of the monk, in which an eager and keen spirit glanced through eyes to which it seemed to give supernatural lustre.

The Abbot opened the conversation by motioning to his monk to take a stool, and inviting to a cup of wine. The courtesy was declined with respect, yet not without a remark, that the vesper-service was past.

"For the stomach's sake, brother," said [illegible] colouring a little, "you know the text."

"It is a dangerous one," answered the [illegible] handle alone, or at late hours. Cut off from society, the juice of the grape becomes a poison of solitude, and therefore I ever shun

Abbot Boniface had poured himself out [illegible] who in might hold about half an English [illegible] either struck with the truth of the observation, ashamed to act in direct opposition to it, [illegible] it to remain untasted before him, and immediately changed the subject.

"The Primate hath written to us," said he, "to make strict search within our bounds after heretical persons denounced in this list, who have withdrawn themselves from the justice which their opinions deserve. It is deemed probable that they will attempt to retire to England by our Border, and the Primate requireth me to watch with [illegible] and what not."

"Assuredly," said the monk, "the magistrate does not bear the sword in vain—those be they that [illegible] world upside down—and doubtless your reverence's wisdom will with due diligence second the efforts of the Right Reverend Father in God, being [illegible] remptory defence of the Holy Church."

"Ay, but how is this to be done?" answered the Abbot; "Saint Mary aid us! The Primate writes to me as if I were a temporal baron—a man under command, having soldiers under him! He would have me forth—scour the country—guard the passes—[illegible] these men do not travel as those who [illegible] their lives for nothing—the last who [illegible] passed the dry-march at the Ridingburn [illegible] escort of thirty spears, as our reverend brother the Abbot of Kelso did write unto us. How [illegible] and scapularies to stop the way?"

"Your bailiff is accounted a good man," said the holy father," said Eustace; "your vassals [illegible] to rise for the defence of the Holy Kirk [illegible] tenure on which they hold their lands—if they not come forth for the Church which gives [illegible] bread, let their possessions be given to others."

"We shall not be wanting," said the Abbot, [illegible] letting himself with importance, "to do [illegible] may advantage Holy Kirk—thyself shall [illegible] charge to our Bailiff and our officials—but [illegible] is our controversy with the warden of the [illegible] the Baron of Meigallot—Saint Mary! vexations multiply upon the House, and upon the [illegible] that a man wots not where to turn to! [illegible] say, Father Eustace, thou wouldst look into [illegible] dents touching this free passage for the pilgrims."

"I have looked into the Chartulary of the [illegible] holy father," said Eustace, "and there is [illegible] written and formal grant of all duties and [illegible] payable at the drawbridge of Brigton, [illegible] ecclesiastics of this foundation, but by ever [illegible] truly designed to accomplish his vows at the [illegible] to the Abbot Ailford, and the Monks of the [illegible] Saint Mary in Kennaquhair, from that time [illegible] ever. The deed is dated on Saint Bridget's [illegible] the year of Redemption 1137, and bears the [illegible] seal of the granter, Charles of Meigallot, [illegible] grandfather of this baron, and purports to [illegible] for the safety of his own soul, and for the [illegible] souls of his father and mother, and of all [illegible] cessors and successors, being Barons of [illegible]."

"But he all goes," said the Abbot, "thanks [illegible] wards have been in possession of the seduced [illegible] rendered them available for more than fifty [illegible] and the baron threatens violence—meanwhile [illegible] journey of the pilgrims is interrupted, to the [illegible] die of their own souls, and the diminution [illegible] revenues of Saint Mary. The Sacristan [illegible] to put on a boat; but the warden, whom [illegible] est to be a godless man, has sworn the devil [illegible] but that if they put on a boat on the lake [illegible] he will rive her board from board—and [illegible] say we should compound the claim for a [illegible] in silver." Here the Abbot paused a moment [illegible] reply, but receiving none, he added, "What thinkest thou, Father Eustace? why art thou [illegible]"

"Because I am surprised at the question

rd Abbot of Saint Mary's asks at the youngest of brethren."

'Yo ngest in time of your abode with us, Brother stace," said the Abbot, "no' youngest in years, I think in experience—Sub Prior also of this con- it."

"I am astonished," continued Eustace, "that the bot of this venerable house should ask of any one, ether he can alienate the patrimony of our holy d divine patroness, or give up to an unconsenta- us, and perhaps a heretic baron, the rights confer- on this church by his devout progenitor. Popes d councils alike prohibit it—the honour of the liv- ; and the weal of departed souls, alike forbid it— nay not be. To force, if he dare use it, we must render; but never by our consent should we see goods of the church plundered, with as little uple as he would drive off a herd of English ves. Rouse yourself, reverend father, and doubt hing but that the good cause shall prevail. Whet spiritual sword, and direct it against the wicked o would usurp our holy rights. Wiret the temporal ord if it be necessary, and stir up the courage and l of your loyal vassals."

The Abbot sighed deeply. "All this," he said, "is n spoken by him who hath to act it not; but"— was interrupted by the entrance of Bennet rather tly. "The mule on which the Sacristan had set in the morning had returned," he said, "to the vent stable all over wet, and with the saddle ned round beneath her belly."

'Sancta Maria!" said the Abbot, "our dear bro- r hath perished by the way!"

'It may not be," said Eustace hastily—"let the l be told—cause the brethren to get torches - rm the village -hurry down to the river—I myself l be the foremost."

The real Abbot stood astonished and agape, when once he beheld his office filled, and saw all which ought to have ordered, going forward at the dic- es of the youngest monk in the convent. But ere orders of Eustace, which nobody dreamed of dis- ting, were carried into execution, the necessity was vented by the sudden apparition of the Sacristan, ose supposed danger excited all the alarm.

CHAPTER VII.

> Raze out the written troubles of the brain,
> Cleanse the foul bosom of the perilous stuff
> That weighs upon the heart. - Macb th.

WHAT betwixt cold and fright, the afflicted Sacris- n stood before his Superior, propped on the friendly m of the convent miller, drenched with water, and ere able to utter a syllable.

After various attempts to speak, the first words he ered were,

> Swim we merrily—the moon shines bright."

"Swim we merrily!" retorted the Abbot indignant- ; "a merry night have ye chosen for swimming, d a becoming salutation to your Superior!"

"Our brother is bewildered," said Eustace;—peak, Father Philip, how is it with you?"

> "Good luck to your fishing."

tinued the Sacristan, making a most dolorous at- pt at the tune of his strange companion.

'Good luck to your fishing!" repeated the Abbot, more surprised and displeased; "by my hal- , he is drunken with wine, and comes to our sence with his jolly catches on his throat! It bread water can cure such folly"—

With your pardon, venerable father," said the Prior, "of water our brother has had enough; methinks, the confusion of his eye is rather that terror, than of aught reproaching his profession. ere did you find him, Hob Miller?"

An it please your reverence, I did but go to shut sluice of the mill-pond as I was going to shut the ce, I heard something groan near to me; but judg- it was one of Giles Fletcher's hogs—for so please , he never shuts his gate—I caught up my lever, d was about—Saint Mary forgive me!—to strike where I heard the sound, when, as the saints would have it, I heard the second groan just like that of a living man. So I raised up my knaves, and found the Father Sacristan lying wet and senseless under th wall of our kiln. So soon as we brought him to himself a bit, he prayed to be brought to your reverence, but I doubt me, his wits have gone a bell-wa vering by the road. It was but now that he spoke in somewhat better form."

"Well!" said Brother Eustace, "thou hast done well, Hob Miller; only begone now, and remember a second time, to pause, ere you strike in the dark."

"Please your reverence, it shall be a lesson to me," said the miller, "not to mistake a holy man for a hog again, so long as I live." And, making a bow, with profound humility, the miller withdrew.

"And now that this churl is gone, Father Philip," said Eustace, "wilt thou tell our venerable Superior what ails thee? art thou vino gravatus, man? if so, we will have thee to thy cell."

"Water! water! not wine," muttered the exhausted Sacristan.

"Nay," said the monk, "if that be thy complaint, wine may perhaps cure thee;" and he reached him a cup, which the patient drank off to his great benefit.

"And now," said the Abbot, "let his garments be changed, or rather let him be carried to the infirmary; for it will prejudice our health, should we hear his narrative while he stands there, steaming like a rising hoar-frost."

"I will hear his adventure," said Eustace, "and report it to your reverence." And, accordingly, he attended the Sacristan to his cell. In about half an hour he returned to the Abbot.

"How is it with Father Philip?" said the Abbot; "and through what came he into such a state?"

"He comes from Glendearg, reverend sir," said Eustace; "and for the rest, he telleth such a legend, as has not been heard in this Monastery for many a long day." He then gave the Abbot the outlines of the Sacristan's adventures in the homeward journey, and added, that for some time he was inclined to think his brain was infirm, seeing he had sung, laughed, and wept, all in the same breath.

"A wonderful thing it is to us," said the Abbot, "that Satan has been permitted to put forth his hand thus far on one of our sacred brethren!"

"True," said Father Eustace; "but for every text there is a paraphrase; and I have my suspicions, that if the drenching of Father Philip cometh of the Evil One, yet it may not have been altogether without his own personal fault."

"How!" said the Father Abbot; "I will not believe that thou makest doubt that Satan, in former days, hath been permitted to afflict saints and holy men, even as he afflicted the pious Job!"

"God forbid I should make question of it," said the monk, crossing himself; "yet, where there is an exposition of the Sacristan's tale, which is less than miraculous, I hold it safe to consider it at least, if not to abide by it. Now, this Hob the Miller hath a buxom daughter. Suppose I say only suppose—that our Sacristan met her at the ford on her return from her uncle's on the other side, for there she hath this evening been—suppose, that, in courtesy, and to save her stripping hose and shoon, the Sacristan brought her across behind him—suppose he carried his fair burden farther than the maiden was willing to admit; and we may easily suppose farther, that this wetting was the result of it."

"And thus I stood invented to deceive us!" said the Superior, nodding with wrath; "but most strictly shall it be sifted and inquired into; it is not upon us that Father Philip must hope to pass the result of his own evil practices for doings of Satan. To-morrow let the wench to appear before us we will examine, and we will punish."

"Under your reverence's favour," said Eustace, "that were but poor policy. As things now stand with us, the heretics catch hold of each flying report which tends to the scandal of our clergy. We must abate the evil, not only by strengthening discipline, but also by suppressing and stifling the voice of scandal. If my conjectures are true, the miller's though the answers he returned were in some degree incoherent, owing to his intermingling with them ever and anon snatches of the strange damsel's song, which had made such deep impression on his imagination, that he could not prevent himself from imitating it repeatedly in the course of his examination. The Abbot had compassion with the Sacristan's involuntary frailty, to which something supernatural seemed annexed, and finally became of opinion, that Father Eustace's more natural explanation was rather plausible than just. And indeed, although we have recorded the adventure as we find it written down, we cannot forbear to add, that there was a schism on the subject in the convent, and that several of the brethren pretended to have good reason for thinking that the miller's black-eyed daughter was at the bottom of the affair after all. Whichever way it might be interpreted, all agreed that it had too ludicrous a sound to be permitted to get abroad, and therefore the Sacristan was charged, on his vow of obedience, to say no more of his ducking; an injunction which, having once eased his mind by telling his story, it may be well conjectured that he joyfully obeyed.

The attention of father Eustace was much less forcibly arrested by the marvellous tale of the Sacristan's danger, and his escape, than by the mention of the volume which he had brought with him from the tower of Glendearg. A copy of the Scriptures, translated into the vulgar tongue, had found its way even into the proper territory of the church, and had been discovered in one of the most hidden and sequestered recesses of the Halidome of Saint Mary's.

He anxiously requested to see the volume. In this the Sacristan was unable to gratify him, for he had lost it, as far as he recollected, when the supernatural being, as he conceived her to be, took her departure from him. Father Eustace went down to the spot in person, and searched all around it, in hopes of recovering the volume in question; but his labour was in vain. He returned to the Abbot, and reported that it must have fallen into the river or the mill-stream; "for I will hardly believe," he said, "that Father Philip's musical friend would fly off with a copy of the Holy Scriptures."

the devil's."

"I will essay, reverend Father," said t
tan, "but the tune hangs by my memory
in a beggar's rags; it mingles with the ps
very bells of the convent seem to repeat t
and jingle to the tune; and were you to death at this very moment, it is my belief
die singing it.—'Now swim we merrily—
were a spell upon me."

He then again began to warble

"Good luck to your fishing."

And checking himself in the strain with di
exclaimed, "It is too certain—I am but a l
Swim we merrily—I shall sing it at the ve Wo is me! I shall sing all the remainder and yet never be able to change the tune!"

The honest Abbot replied, "he knew ma fellow in the same condition;" and con remark with "ho! ho! ho!" for his rev
the reader may partly have observed, w
those dull folks who love a quiet joke.

The Sacristan, well acquainted with his humour, endeavoured to join in the laug unfortunate canticle came again across his tion, and interrupted the hilarity of his echo.

"By the rood, Brother Philip," said t
much moved, "you become altogether ir
and I am convinced that such a spell coul sist over a person of religion, and in a house, unless he were under mortal sin. V say the seven penitentiary psalms—make d
of thy scourge and hair-cloth—refrain for
from all food, save bread and water—I m shrive thee, and we will see if this singing
be driven out of thee; at least I think F
stace himself could devise no better exorci

The Sacristan sighed deeply, but kne stranee was vain. He retired therefore t to try how far psalmody might be able t
the sounds of the syren tune which haunt mory.

Meanwhile, Father Eustace proceeded to bridge, in his way to the lonely valley of
In a brief conversation with the churlish

CHAPTER VIII.

not with time, the wise man's treasure,
ols are lavish on't the fatal Fisher
's while we waste moments. -Old Play

R must overspread the little valley, up but steadily rode the monk Eustace. nsensible to the feeling of melancholy scene and by the season. The stream urmur with a deep and oppressed note, ng the departure of autumn. Among copses which here and there fringed its k trees only retained that pallid green their russet hue. The leaves of the most of them stripped from the branches, t each breath, and disturbed by every ule; while the foliage of other trees, ed, kept still precarious possession of nting the first wind to scatter them.

dropped into the natural train of pensive h these autumnal emblems of mortal iliarly calculated to inspire. "There," ing at the leaves which lay strewed the hopes of early youth, first formed soonest wither, and loveliest in spring st contemptible in winter; but you ye added, looking to a knot of beeches re their withered leaves, "you are the f adventurous manhood, formed later, ing to the mind of age, although it ac- near in unity! None lasts none en- e foliage of the hardy oak, which only w itself when that of the rest of the syed hills its existence. A pale and de- all it possesses, but still it retains that itality to the last. So be it with Father e very hopes of my youth I have trodden those neglected rustlers—to the prouder manhood I look back as to lofty chi- ch the path and essence have long since y religious vows, the faithful profession made in my maturer age, shall retain at of Eustace lives. Dangerous it may must be yet live it shall, the proud de- o serve the church of which I am a to combat the heresies by which she is hus spoke, at least thus thought, a man ling to his imperfect knowledge, con- vital interests of Christianity with the and usurped claims of the Church of fending his cause with ardour worthy ng onward in this contemplative mood, help thinking more than once, that he n the form of a female dressed in white, d in the attitude of lamentation. But n was only momentary, and whenever adily to the point where he conceived eared, it always proved that he had mis- atural object, a white crag, or the trunk birch-tree with its silver bark, for the question.

tace had dwelt too long in Rome to par- stitious feelings of the more ignorant ty; yet he certainly thought it extraor- o strong an impression should have been mind by the legend of the Sacristan. ," he said to himself, "that this story, ess was the invention of Brother Philip own impropriety of conduct, should run my head, and disturb my more serious m wont, I think, to have more command s. I will repeat my prayers, and banish n my recollection.'

accordingly began with devotion to tell ursuance of the prescribed rule of his s not again disturbed by any wander- nagination until he found himself be- le fortalice of Glendearg.

dinning, who stood at the gate, set up prise and joy at seeing the good father. e said, "Jasper, where be a' the folk?— reverend Sub-Prior to dismount, and from him.—O father! God has sent d—I was just going to send man and horse to the convent, though I ought to be ashamed to give so much trouble to your reverences."

"Our trouble matters not, good dame," said Father Eustace; "in what can I pleasure you? I came hither to visit the Lady of Avenel."

"Well-a-day!" said Dame Elspeth, "and it was on her part that I had the boldness to think of summoning you, for the good lady will never be able to wear over the day!—Would it please you to go to her chamber?"

"Hath she not been shriven by Father Philip?" said the monk.

"Shriven she was," said the Dame of Glendearg "and by Father Philip, as your reverence truly says—but—I wish it may have been a clean shrift—Me- thought Father Philip looked but moody upon it—and there was a book which he took away with him, that"——She paused as if unwilling to proceed.

"Speak out, Dame Glendinning," said the Father, "with us it is your duty to have no secrets."

"Nay, if it please your reverence, it is not that I would keep any thing from your reverence's know- ledge, but I fear I should prejudice the lady in your opinion; for she is an excellent lady—months and years has she dwelt in this tower, and none more exemplary than she; but this matter, doubtless, she will explain it herself to your reverence."

"I desire first to know it from you, Dame Glendin- ning," said the monk; "and I again repeat, it is your duty to tell it to me."

"This book, if it please your reverence, which Father Philip removed from Glendearg, was this morning returned to us in a strange manner," said the good widow.

"Returned!" said the monk; "how mean you?"

"I mean," answered Dame Glendinning, "that it was brought back to the tower of Glendearg, the saints best know how that same book which Father Philip carried with him but yesterday. Old Martin, that is my tasker and the lady's servant, was driving out the cows to the pasture—for we have three good milk-cows, reverend Father, blessed be Saint Wald- have, and thanks to the holy Monastery"——

The monk groaned with impatience; but he re- membered that a woman of the good dame's condi- tion was like a top, which, if you let it spin on untouched, must at last come to a pause; but, if you interrupt it by flogging, there is no end to its gyra- tions. "But to speak no more of the cows, your reverence, though they are likely cattle as ever were tied to a stake, the tasker was driving them out, and the lads, that is my Halbert and my Edward, that your reverence has seen at church on holidays, and especially Halbert,—for you patted him on the head, and gave him a brooch of Saint Cuthbert, which he wears in his bonnet,—and little Mary Avenel, that is the lady's daughter, they ran all after the cattle, and began to play up and down the pasture as young folk will, your reverence. And at length they lost sight of Martin and the cows; and they began to run up a little cleugh which we call Corri-nan-shian, where there is a wee bit stripe of a burn, and they saw there —Good guide us!—a White Woman sitting on the burn-side wringing her hands—so the bairns were frighted to see a strange woman sitting there, all but Halbert, who will be sixteen come Whitsuntide; and, besides, he never feared ony thing—and when they went up to her behold she was passed away!"

"For shame, good woman!" said Father Eustace "a woman of your sense to listen to a tale so idle!—the young folk told you a lie, and that was all."

"Nay, sir, it was more than that," said the old dame; "for, besides that they never told me a lie in their lives, I must warn you, that on the very ground where the White Woman was sitting, they found the Lady of Avenel's book, and brought it with them to the tower."

"That is worthy of mark at least," said the monk. "Know you no other copy of this volume within these bounds?"

"None, your reverence," returned Elspeth; "why should there?—no one could read it were there twenty."

"Then you are sure it is the very same volume which you gave to Father Philip?" said the monk.

"As sure as that I now speak with your reverence."

"It is most singular!" said the monk; and he walked across the room in a musing posture.

"I have been upon nettles to hear what your reverence would say," continued Dame Glendinning, "respecting this matter—There is nothing I would not do for the Lady of Avenel and her family, and that has been proved, and for her servants to boot, both Martin and Tibb, although Tibb is not so civil sometimes as altogether I have a right to expect; but I cannot think it becoming to have angels, or ghosts, or fairies, or the like, waiting upon a leddy when she is in another woman's house, in respect it is no ways creditable. Ony thing she had to do was always done to her hand, without costing her either pains or pence, as a country body says; and besides the discredit, I cannot but think that there is no safety in having such unchancy creatures about ane. But I have tied red thread around the bairns's throats," (so her fondness still called them,) "and given this ane of them a riding wand of rowan-tree, forby sewing up a slip of witch-elm into their doublets; and I wish to know of your reverence if there be ony thing mair that a lone woman can do in the matter of ghosts and fairies? Be here! that I should have named their unlucky names twice ower!"

"Dame Glendinning," answered the monk, somewhat abruptly, when the good woman had finished her narrative, "I pray you, do you know the miller's daughter?"

"Did I know Kate Happer?" replied the widow; "as weel as the beggar knows his dish—a canty quean was Kate, and a special cummer of my ain may be twenty years syne."

"She cannot be the wench I mean," said Father Eustace; "she after whom I inquire is scarce fifteen, a black-eyed girl—you may have seen her at the kirk."

"Your reverence must be in the right; and she is my cummer's niece, doubtless, that you are pleased to speak of: But I thank God I have always been too duteous in attention to the mass to know whether young wenches have black eyes or green ones."

The good Father had so much of the world about him, that he was unable to avoid smiling, when the dame boasted her absolute resistance to a temptation, which was not quite so liable to beset her as those of the other sex.

"Perhaps, then," he said, "you know her usual dress, Dame Glendinning?"

"Ay, ay, Father," answered the dame readily enough, "a white kirtle the wench wears, to hide the dust of the mill no doubt—and a blue hood, that might weel be spared, for pride fulness."

Then, may it not be she," said the Father, "who has brought back this book, and stepped out of the way when the children came near her?"

"The dame paused—was unwilling, to combat the solution suggested by the monk—but was at a loss to conceive why the lass of the mill should come so far from home into so wild a corner, merely to leave an old book with three children, from whose observation she wished to conceal herself. Above all, she could not understand why, since she had acquaintances in the family, and since the dame Glendinning had always paid her multure and knaveship duly, the said lass of the mill had not come in to rest herself and eat a morsel, and tell her the current news of your leave, I will see this lady—do you g and prepare her to see me."

Dame Glendinning left the lower apartmen ingly, which the monk paced in anxious consideration how he might best discharge manity as well as with effect, the impor imposed on him. He resolved to approach side of the sick person with reprimands, only by a feeling for her weak condition— mind, in case of her reply, to which late of hardened heretics might encourage her. pared with answers to their customary High thought, also, with zeal against her rized intrusion into the priestly function, h the Sacred Scriptures, he imagined to hi answers which one of the modern school taught return to him—the victorious refutat should lay the dependant prostrate at the C mercy—and the healing, yet awful exhortati under pain of refusing the last consolatio lation, he'd signed to make to the penitent, her, as she loved her own soul's welfare, to him what she knew of the dark m iniquity, by which heresies were introduce most secluded spots of the very patrimony of herself—what agents they had who could as it were unseen, from place to place, brou volume which the church had interdicted from which it had been removed under h auspices; and who, by encouraging the d profane thirst after knowledge forbidden to the laity, had encouraged the fisher of s with effects this old bait of ambition and va

Much of this premeditated disputation e good father, when Elspeth returned, her tea faster than her apron could dry them, and a signal to follow her. "How," said the she then so near her end!—nay, the churc break or bruise, when comfort is yet possi forgetting his polemics, the good Sub-Prio to the little apartment, where, on the wr which she had occupied since her misfor driven her to the Tower of Glendearg, the Walter Avenel had rendered up her spirit t tor. "My God!" said the Sub-Prior, "a unfortunate dallying suffered her to depa the Church's consolation! Look to her, exclaimed with eager impatience; "is th a sparkle of the life left?—may she not be recalled but for a moment? Oh! would could express, but by the most imperfect by the most feeble motion, her acquiesce needful task of penitential prayer! —Doe breathe? Art thou sure she doth not?"

"She will never breathe more," said t "O! the poor fatherless girl—now mother O, the kind companion I have had these m whom I shall never see again! But she is for certain, if ever woman went there; fo of better life"—

"Woe to me," said the good monk, "if went not hence in good assurance—woe t less shepherd, who suffered the wolf to ca one from the flock, while he busied hi trimming his sling and his staff to save th battle! O! if in the long Hereafter, augh should that poor spirit charge what has

on, who admired her sufficiently itstanding some trifling points of lized her after her death, and could te of praise with which she did not
y.
dy of Avenel, however she might me of the doctrines announced by me, and although she had probably om that corrupted system of Christ-me on which Christianity itself is rtheless been regular in her attend-hip of the church, not, perhaps, ex-les so far as to break off communed was the first sentiment of the who seem to have studied, for a vord a sermon, until the violence of it inevitable.
, on the present occasion, listened o every thing which could lead to lady's orthodoxy in the main points conscience reproached him sorely, protracting conversation with the arg, he had not instantly hastened
e was so necessary. "If," he said, rd lady, "thou art yet free from the e to the followers of false doctrine suffer for a time, to expiate faults
but partaking of mortal frailty more
, fear not that thy abode shall be l regions to which thou mayest be
—if masses, if penance, if macera-
, till it resembles that extenuated oul hath abandoned, may assure thy Holy Church—the godly founda-Patroness herself, shall intercede rrors were counterbalanced by so eave me, dame—here, and by her perform those duties which this nds!"
e monk, who employed himself in re, though erroneous prayers, for the ted spirit. For an hour he remain-ent of death, and then returned to e found the still weeping friend of injustice to Mrs. Elspeth Glendin-

, if we suppose her to have been this long interval, or rather, if we tirely absorbed by the tribute of sor-nd frankly and plentifully to her de-
to be incapable of attending to the y due to the holy visiter—who was
, and Sub-Prior—mighty in all rear considerations, so far as the vas-stery were interested.
ad had been toasted—her choicest rowed ale had been broached—her
been placed on the hall-table, along voury ham and her choicest cheese,
ed herself to the extremity of sor-
not till she had arranged her little the board, that she sat down in the threw her checked apron over her
ay to the current of tears and sobs,
s no grimace or affectation. The
he honours of her house to be as especially when a monk, was her visi-
r pressing sail upon her conscience;
ere sensibly affected to find she had to indulge her sorrow for her des confessions of the Sub-Prior's preith the saint, account to his reap-med all the offices of hospitality with voured to console her. Not her hat-

gold, and the best she assured him,
the patrimony of Saint Mary—not
, which "though sacred saint, God sain were so good"—not the ale, nor any ch poor Elspeth's stores afforded,
the Sub-Prior to break his fast.
e said, "I must not taste food until happy if, in so doing, I can expiate
e—happier still, if my sufferings of this trifling nature, undertaken in pure faith and sin
gleness of heart, may benefit the soul of the deceased.
Yet, dame," he added, "I may not so far forget the living in my cares for the dead, as to leave behind me that book, which is to the ignorant what, to our first parents, the tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil,
unhappily proved—excellent indeed in itself, but fatal
because used by those to whom it is prohibited."

"O, blithely, reverend father," said the widow of Simon Glendinning, "will I give you the book, if so be I can wile it from the bairns; and indeed, poor things, as the case stands with them even now, you might take the heart out of their bodies, and they never find it out, they are sae begrutten."*

"Give them this missal instead, good dame," said
the Father, drawing from his pocket one which was curiously illuminated with paintings, "and I will come myself, or send one at a fitting time, and teach them the meaning of these pictures."

"The bonny images!" said Dame Glendinning, forgetting for an instant her grief in her admiration;
"and weel I wot," added she, "it is another sort of a book than the poor Lady of Avenel's; and blessed might we have been this day, if your reverence had found the way up the glen, instead of Father Philip, though the Sacristan is a powerful man too, and speaks as if he would gar the house fly abroad, save that the walls are grey thick. Simon's forbears (may he and they be blessed!) took care of that."

The monk ordered his mule, and was about to take his leave; and the good dame was still delaying him
with questions about the funeral, when a horseman,
armed and accoutred, rode into the little court-yard
which surrounded the Keep.

CHAPTER IX.

For since they rode among our doors
With splent on spauld and rusty spure,
There grows no fruit into our furs:
Thus said John Up-on-land. —Bannatyne MS

THE Scottish laws, which were as wisely and judiciously made as they were carelessly and inef-fectually executed, had in vain endeavoured to restrain the damage done to agriculture, by the chiefs and landed proprietors retaining in their service what were called jack-men, from the jack, or doublet quilt-ed with iron, which they wore as defensive armour.
These military retainers conducted themselves with great insolence towards the industrious part of the community—lived in a great measure by plunder, and were ready to execute any commands of their master,
however unlawful. In adopting this mode of life,
men resigned the quiet hopes and regular labours of industry, for an unsettled, precarious, and dangerous
trade, which yet had such charms for those once accustomed to it, that they became incapable of following any other. Hence the complaint of John Upland, a fictitious character, representing a countryman, into whose mouth the poets of the day put their general satires upon men and manners:

They ride at out in such a rage
Be forest, firth, and field,
With buckler, bow, and brand.
Lo! where they ride out through the rye!
The Deil mot save the company,
Quoth John Up-on-land.

Christie of the Clinthill, the horseman who now arrived at the little Tower of Glendearg, was one of the hopeful company of whom the poet complains,
as was indicated by his "splent on spauld," (iron-plates on his shoulder,) his rusted spurs, and his long lance. An iron skull-cap, none of the brightest, bore for distinction a sprig of the holly, which was Avenel's badge. A long two-edged straight sword, having a handle made of polished oak, hung down by his side. The meagre condition of his horse, and the wild and emaciated look of the rider, showed their occupation could not be accounted an easy or a thriving one. He saluted Dame Glendinning with little courtesy, and the monk with less; for the growing disrespect to the religious orders had not failed to extend itself among a class of men of such disorderly

* Begrutten—over-wept.

Christie of the Clinthill, the laird's chief jackman; ye know that little havings can be expected from the like o' them."

"Are you a retainer of the Laird of Avenel?" said the monk, addressing himself to the horseman, "and do you speak thus rudely to a brother of Saint Mary's, to whom thy master is so much beholden?"

"He means to be yet more beholden to your house, Sir Monk," answered the fellow; "for hearing his sister-in-law, the widow of Walter of Avenel, was on her death-bed, he sent me to say to the Father Abbot and the brethren, that he will hold the funeral feast at their convent, and invites himself thereto, with a score of horse, and some friends, and to abide there for three days and three nights,—having horse-meat and men's meat at the charge of the community; of which his intention he sends due notice, that fitting preparation may be timously made."

"Friend," said the Sub-Prior, "believe not that I will do to the Father Abbot the indignity of delivering such an errand. Think'st thou the goods of the church were bestowed upon her by holy princes and pious nobles, now dead and gone, to be consumed in revelry by every profligate layman who numbers in his train more followers than he can support by honest means, or by his own incomings? Tell thy master, from the Sub-Prior of Saint Mary's, that the Primate hath issued his commands to us, that we submit no longer to this compulsory exaction of hospitality on slight or false pretences. Our lands and goods were given to relieve pilgrims and pious persons, not to feast bands of rude soldiers."

"This to me!" said the angry spearman, "this to me and to my master?—Look to yourself then, Sir Priest, and try if Ave and Credo will keep bullocks from wandering, and hay-stacks from burning."

"Dost thou menace the Holy Church's patrimony with waste and fire-raising," said the Sub-Prior, "and that in the face of the sun? I call on all who hear me to bear witness to the words this ruffian has spoken. Remember how the Lord James drowned such as you by scores in the black pool at Joddart. To him and to the Primate will I complain."—The soldier shifted the position of his lance, and brought it down to a level with the monk's body.

Dame Gheudinning began to shriek for assistance.

For your master's proffered visit of three d
such a company and retinue, I have no au
reply to it; you must intimate your Chief
to the Reverend Lord Abbot."

"That will cost me a further ride," said
"but it is all in the day's work.—How now,
said he to Halbert, who was handling the k
which he had laid a-lee; "how do you lik plaything?—will you go with me, and be trooper?"

"The Saints in their mercy forbid!" said
mother; and then, afraid of having displease
by the vivacity of her exclamation, she follo
by explaining, that since Simon's death she look on a spear or a bow, or any impleme
struction, without trembling.

"Pshaw!" answered Christie, "thou shou
another husband, dame, and drive such foll
thy thoughts—what sayst thou to such a lad as I? Why, this old tower of thine is enough, and there is no want of cleuchs, a
and bogs, and thickets, if one was set hard might bide here, and keep his half-score of
as many geldings, and live on what he coul hand on, and be kind to thee, old wench."

"Alas! Master Christie," said the matro you should talk to a lone woman in such a
and death in the house besides!"

"Lone woman! -why, that is the very rea
shouldst take a mate. Thy old friend is da good—choose thou another of somewhat frame, and that will not die of the pip like chicken.—Better still -Come, dame, let something to eat, and we will talk more of Dame Elspeth, though she well knew the

of the man, whom in fact she both disliked an
could not help simpering at the personal addre
he thought proper to make to her. She whi
the Sub-Prior, "Ony thing just to keep hi
and went into the tower to set before the st
food he desired, trusting, betwixt good cheer
power of her own charms, to keep Christi Clinthill so well amused, that the altercation
him and the holy father should not be renew

The Sub-Prior was equally unwilling to ha unnecessary rupture between the community

…er, declared, that now the kind lady was … ok was Mary's, and no one but Mary …

…is not a fit book for Mary to read, my … aid the Father gently, "you would not … man with her?"

…read it," answered the young champion … "and so it could not be wrong—it shall … away.—I wonder where Halbert is?— … the bravading tales of gay Christie, I … always wishing for fighting, and now … is way."

…ward, you would not fight with me, who … iest and an old man?"

…ere as good a priest as the Pope," said … it is not as the bulls to boot, you shall … ay Mary's book without her leave. I … for it."

…on, my love," said the monk, amused … ate frank disap manifested by the boy. … ke it; I only borrow it; and I leave in … owa …, missal, as a pledge I will bring …"

…ined the missal with eager curiosity. … at the pictures with which it was ill… … Saint George and the dragon—Halbert will … Saint Michael brandishing his sword … of the Wicked One—and that will do … o. And see the Saint John leading his … wilderness, with his little cross made of … reed staff—that shall be my favour… … shall we find one for poor Mary?—here … woman weeping and lamenting herself."

…Saint Mary Magdalen repenting of her … boy," said the Father.

…not suit our Mary; for she commits no … s never angry with us, but when we do … rong."

…aid the Father, "I will show you a Mary, … tect her and you and all good children. … ly she is represented, with her gown co… … lden stars."

…as lost in wonder at the portrait of the … h the Sub-Prior turned up to him.

…e said, "is really like our sweet Mary; … will let you take away the black book, … such goodly shows in it, and leave this … read. But you must promise to bring … ok, good Father—for now I think upon … like that best which was her mother's."

…tantly return," said the monk, evading … "and perhaps I may teach you to write … h beautiful letters as you see there writ… … aint them blue, green, and yellow, and … n with gold."

…to make such figures as these blessed … specially these two Marys?" said the boy.

…r blessing," said the Sub-Prior, "I can … at art too, so far as I am myself capable … and you of learning it."

…said Edward, "will I paint Mary's pic… … member you are to bring back the black … ou must promise me."

…Prior, anxious to get rid of the boy's … and to set forward on his return to the … ions having any farther interview with … galloper, answered by giving the promise … red, mounted his mule, and set forth on … me ward.

…mber day was well spent ere the Sub… … d his journey; for the difficulty of the … various delays which he had met with … had detained him longer than he pro… … ill easterly wind was sighing among … leaves, and stripping them from the hold … retained on the parent trees.

…" said the monk, "our prospects in this … grow more disconsolate as the stream of … on. Little have I gained by my journey, … certainty that heresy is busy among us … an his usual activity, and that the spirit … religious orders, and plundering the … operty, so general in the eastern districts … has now come nearer home."

The tread of a horse which came up behind him, interrupted his reverie, and he soon saw he was mounted by the same wild rider whom he had left at the tower.

"Good even, my son, and benedicite," said the Sub-Prior as he passed; but the rude soldier scarce acknowledged the greeting by bending his head; and dashing the spurs into his horse, went on at a pace which soon left the monk and his mule far behind. "And there," thought the Sub-Prior, "goes another plague of the times—a fellow whose birth designed him to cultivate the earth, but who is perverted, by the unhallowed and unchristian divisions of the country, into a daring dissolute robber. The barons of Scotland are now turned masterful thieves and ruffians, oppressing the poor by violence, and wasting the Church, by extorting free quarters from abbeys and priories, without either shame or reason.—I fear me I shall be too late to counsel the Abbot to make a stand against these daring sorners.*—I must make haste." He struck his mule with his riding-wand accordingly; but instead of mending her pace, the animal suddenly started from the path, and the rider's utmost efforts could not force her forward.

"Art thou, too, infected with the spirit of the times?" said the Sub-Prior; "thou wert wont to be ready and serviceable, and art now as restive as any wild jack-man or stubborn heretic of them all."

While he was contending with the startled animal, a voice like that of a female, chanted in his ear, or at least very close to it,

"Good evening, Sir Priest, and so late as you ride,
With your mule so fair and your mantle so wide;
But ride you through valley, or ride you o'er hill,
There is one that has warrant to wait on you still.
Back, back,
The volume black!
I have a warrant to carry it back."

The Sub-Prior looked around, but neither bush nor brake was near, which could conceal an ambushed songstress. "May our Lady have mercy on me!" he said; "I trust my senses have not forsaken me—yet how my thoughts should arrange themselves into rhymes which I despise, and music which I care not for, or why there should be the sound of a female voice in ears, to which its melody has been so long indifferent, baffles my comprehension, and almost realizes the vision of Philip the Sacristan.—Come, good mule, betake thee to the path, and let us hence while our judgment serves us."

But the mule stood as if it had been rooted to the spot, backed from the point to which it was pressed by its rider, and by her ears laid close into her neck, and her eyes almost starting from their sockets, testified that she was under great terror.

While the Sub-Prior, by alternate threats and soothing, endeavoured to reclaim the wayward animal to her duty, the wild musical voice was again heard close beside him.

"What ho! Sub-Prior, and came you but here
To conjure a book from a dead woman's bier?
Sain you, and save you, be wary and wise,
Ride back with the book or you'll pay for your prize.
Back, back,
There's death in the track!
In the name of my master, I bid thee bear back."

"In the name of MY Master," said the astonished monk, "that name before which all things created tremble, I conjure thee to say what thou art that hauntest me thus?"

The same voice replied,

"That which is neither ill nor well,
That which belongs not to Heaven nor to hell,
A wreath of the mist, a bubble of the stream,
'Twixt a waking thought and a sleeping dream,
A form that men spy
With the half-shut eye,
In the beams of the setting sun, am I."

"This is more than simple fantasy," said the Sub-Prior, rousing himself; though, notwithstanding the

* To sorne, in Scotland, is to exact free quarters against the will of the landlord. It is declared equivalent to theft, by a statute passed in the year 1445. The great chieftains oppressed the Monasteries very much by exactions of this nature. The community of Aberbrothwick complained of an Earl of Angus I think, who was in the regular habit of visiting them once a-year, with a train of a thousand horse, and abiding till the whole winter provisions of the convent were exhausted.

natural hardihood of his temper, the sensible presence of a supernatural being so near him, failed not to make his blood run cold and his hair bristle. "I charge thee," he said aloud, "be thine errand what it will, to depart and trouble me no more!—False spirit, thou canst not appal any save those who do the work negligently."

The voice immediately answered:

"Vainly, Sir Prior, wouldst thou bar me my right!
Like the star when it shoots I can dart through the night;
I can glance on the foam-bell and ride on the air,
And travel the world with the bonny nightmare.
Again, again,
At the crook of the glen,
Where brickers fly fastest, I'll meet thee again."

The road was now apparently left open: for the mule collected herself, and changed from her posture of terror to one which promised advance, although a profuse perspiration, and general trembling of the joints, indicated the bodily terror she had undergone.

"I used to doubt the existence of Cabalists and Rosicrucans," thought the Sub-Prior, "but, by my Holy Order, I know no longer what to say!—My pulse beats temperately—my hand is cool—I am fasting from every thing but sin, and possessed of my ordinary faculties—Either some fiend is permitted to bewilder me, or the tales of Cornelius Agrippa, Paracelsus, and others who treat of occult philosophy, are not without foundation. At the crook of the glen? I could have desired to avoid a second meeting, but I am on the service of the church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against me."

He moved forward accordingly, but with precaution, and not without fear; for he neither knew the manner in which, or the place where, his journey might be next interrupted by his invisible attendant. He descended the glen without interruption for about a mile farther, when, just at the spot where the brook approached the steep hill, with a winding so abrupt as to leave scarcely room for a horse to pass, the mule was again visited with the same symptoms of terror which had before interrupted her course. Better acquainted than before with the cause of her restiveness, the Priest employed no effort to make her proceed, but addressed himself to the object, which he doubted not was the same that had formerly interrupted him, in the words of solemn exorcism prescribed by the church of Rome on such occasions.

In reply to his demand, the voice again sung:—

"Men of good are bold as sackless,*
Men of rede are wild and reckless,
Lie thou still
In the nook of the hill,
For those be before thee that wish thee ill."

While the Sub-Prior listened, with his head turned in the direction from which the sounds seemed to come, he felt as if something rushed against him; and ere he could discover the cause, he was pushed from his saddle with gentle but irresistible force. Before he reached the ground his senses were gone, and he lay long in a state of insensibility; for the sunset had not ceased to gild the top of the distant hill when he fell, and when he again became conscious of existence, the pale moon was gleaming on the landscape. He awakened in a state of terror, from which, for a few minutes, he found it difficult to shake himself free. At length he sate up on the grass, and became sensible, by repeated exertion, that the only personal injury which he had sustained was the numbness arising from extreme cold. The motion of something near him made the blood again run to his heart, and by a sudden effort he started up, and looking around saw to his relief that the noise was occasioned by the footsteps of his own mule. The peaceable animal had remained quietly beside her master during his trance, browsing on the grass which grew plentifully in that sequestered nook.

With some exertion he collected himself, remounted the animal, and meditating upon his wild adventure, descended the glen till its junction with the broader valley through which the Tweed winds. The drawbridge was readily dropped at his first summons; and so much had he won upon the heart of the churlish warden, that Peter appeared himself with a lantern to show the Sub-Prior his way over the perilous pass.

"By my sooth, sir," he said, holding the light up to Father Eustace's face, "you look sorely travelled and deadly pale—but a little matter serves to weary out you men of the cell. I now who speak to you—I have ridden before I was perched up here on this pillar betwixt wind and water—it may be thirty Scots miles before I broke my fast, and have had the red of a bramble rose in my cheek all the while—But will you taste some food, or a cup of distilled waters?"

"I may not," said Father Eustace, "being under a vow; but I thank you for your kindness, and pray you to give what I may not accept to the next poor pilgrim who comes hither pale and fainting. For so I shall be the better both with him here, and with you hereafter."

"By my faith, and I will do so," said Peter Bridge-Ward, "even for thy sake—It is strange now, how this Sub-Prior gets round one's heart more than the rest of these cowled gentry, that think of nothing but quaffing and stuffing!—Wife, I say—wife, we will give a cup of distilled waters and a crust of bread unto the next pilgrim that comes over; and ye may keep for the purpose the grunds of the last greybeard† and the ill-baked bannock which the bairns couldna eat."

While Peter issued these charitable, and at the same time, prudent injunctions, the Sub-Prior, whose mild interference had awaked the Bridge-Ward to such an act of unwonted generosity, was pacing onward to the Monastery. In the way, he had to commune with and subdue his own rebellious heart, an enemy, he was sensible, more formidable than any which the external powers of Satan could place in his way.

Father Eustace had indeed strong temptation to suppress the extraordinary incident which had befallen him, which he was the more reluctant to confess, because he had passed so severe a judgment upon Father Philip, who, as he was now not unwilling to allow, had, on his return from Glendearg, encountered obstacles somewhat similar to his own. Of this the Sub-Prior was the more convinced, when, feeling in his bosom for the Book which he had brought off from the Tower of Glendearg, he found it was amissing, which he could only account for by supposing it had been stolen from him during his trance.

"If I confess this strange visitation," thought the Sub-Prior, "I become the ridicule of all my brethren—I whom the Primate sent hither to be a watch, as it were, and a check upon their follies. I give the Abbot an advantage over me which I shall never again recover, and Heaven only knows how he may abuse it, in his foolish simplicity, to the dishonour and loss of Holy Kirk.—But then, if I make not true confession of my shame, with what face can I again presume to admonish or restrain others?—Avow, proud heart," continued he, addressing himself, "that the weal of Holy Church interests thee less in this matter than thine own humiliation—Yes, Heaven has punished thee even in that point in which thou didst deem thyself most strong, in thy spiritual pride and thy carnal wisdom. Thou hast laughed at and derided the mere pretence of thy brethren—stoop thyself, if in turn to their derision—tell what they may not believe—affirm that which they will ascribe to idle fear, or perhaps to idle falsehood—sustain the disgrace of a silly visionary, or a wilful deceiver.—Be it so; I will do my duty, and make ample confession to my Superior. If the discharge of this duty destroys my usefulness in this house, God and our Lady will send me where I can better serve them."

There was no little merit in the resolution thus piously and generously formed by Father Eustace. To men of any rank the esteem of their order is naturally most dear; but in the monastic establishment, cut off, as the brethren are, from other objects of ambition, as well as from all exterior friendship and relationship, the place which they hold in the opinion of each other is all in all.

But the consciousness how much he should rejoice the Abbot and most of the other monks of Saint

* Sackless—Innocent.

† An old-fashioned name for an earthen jar for holding spirits.

o were impatient of the unauthorized, yet control, which he was wont to exercise in of the convent, by a confession which
him in a ludicrous, or perhaps even in a int of view, could not weigh with Father comparison with the task which his ned.

g in his feelings of duty, he approached gate of the Monastery, he was surprised ies gleaming, and men assembled around horse-back, some on foot, while several aks, distinguished through the night by scapularies, were making themselves busy crowd. The Sub-Prior was received with is shout of joy, which at once made him
it he had himself been the object of their

e is! there he is! God be thanked—there nd fear!" exclaimed the vassals; while the aimed, "Te Deum laudamus—the blood
nts is precious in thy sight!"
the matter, children? what is the matthrea?" said Father Eustace, dismountgate.
other, if thou know'st not, we will not thou art in the refectory," answered the Suffice it that the Lord Abbot had ordered zealous and faithful vassals, instantly to guard thee from imminent peril—Ye may ir horses, children, and dismiss; and, to-ch who was at this rendezvous may send ent kitchen for a quarter of a yard of roast-black-jack full of double ale."*
ials dispersed with joyful acclamation, and
, with equal jubilee, conducted the Sub-
he refectory.

CHAPTER X.

nd——
and well, may Heaven's high name be bless'd for't!
treason couch'd a lance against us.—DECKER.

er was the Sub-Prior hurried into the re-
his rejoicing companions, than the first whom he fixed his eye proved to be Chris-Clinthill. He was seated in the chimney-ered and guarded, his features drawn into sulky and turbid resolution with which ened in guilt are accustomed to view the f punishment. But as the Sub-Prior drew
, his face assumed a more wild and star-sion, while he exclaimed—"The devil! the elf, brings the dead back upon the living!"
said a monk to him, "say rather, that Our
the attempts of the wicked on her faithful our dear brother lives and moves."
nd moves!" said the ruffian, rising and wards the Sub-Prior as well as his chains
ait; "nay, then I will never trust ashen
tted point more—It is even so," he added, d on the Sub-Prior with astonishment;
'em nor wound—not as much as a rent in nence should my wound have come?" said stace.

the good lance that never failed me be-
ed Christie of the Clinthill.
absolve thee for thy purpose!" said the ; "wouldst thou have slain a servant of

ose!" answered Christie; "the Fifemen whole pack of ye were slain, there were t Flodden."
! art thou heretic as well as murderer?"
by Saint Giles," replied the rider; "I lis-ely enough to the Laird of Monance, when ye were all cheats and knaves; but when ave had me go hear one Wiseheart, a goshey call him, he might as well have per-

* One of the few reminiscences of old Parr, or Henry Jenkins, which, that, at some convent in the veteran's native land, the community, before the dissolution, used to regale themselves with roast-beef by the measure of feet and yards.

suaded the wild colt that had flung one rider, to kneel down and help another into the saddle."

"There is some goodness about him yet," said the Sacristan to the Abbot, who at that moment entered——"He refused to hear a heretic preacher."

"The better for him in the next world," answered the Abbot. "Prepare for death, my son—we deliver thee over to the secular arm of our bailie, for execution on the Gallow-hill by peep of light."

"Amen!" said the ruffian; "'tis the end I must have come by sooner or later—and what care I whether I feed the crows at Saint Mary's or at Carlisle?"

"Let me implore your reverend patience for an instant," said the Sub-Prior; "until I shall inquire"——

"What!" exclaimed the Abbot, observing him for the first time—"Our dear brother restored to us when his life was unhoped for!—nay, kneel not to a sinner like me—stand up—thou hast my blessing. When this villain came to the gate, accused by his own evil conscience, and crying out he had murdered thee, I thought that the pillar of our main aisle had fallen—no more shall a life so precious be exposed to such risks, as occur in this Border country; no longer shall one beloved and rescued of Heaven hold so low a station in the church as that of a poor Sub-Prior. I will write by express to the Primate for thy speedy removal and advancement."

"Nay, but let me understand," said the Sub-Prior; "did the soldier say that he had slain me?"

"That he had transfixed you," answered the Abbot, "in full career with his lance—but it seems he had taken an indifferent aim. But no sooner didst thou fall to the ground mortally gored, as he deemed, with his weapon, than our blessed Patroness appeared to him, as he averred"——

"I averred no such thing," said the prisoner; "I said a woman in white interrupted me, as I was about to examine the priest's cassock, for they are usually well lined—she had a bulrush in her hand, with one touch of which she struck me from my horse, as I might strike down a child of four years old with an iron mace—and then, like a singing fiend as she was, she sung to me,

> 'Thank the holly bush
> That nods on thy brow;
> Or with this slender rush
> I had strangled thee now.'

I gathered myself up with fear and difficulty, threw myself on my horse, and came hither like a fool to get myself hanged for a rogue."

"Thou seest, honoured brother," said the Abbot to the Sub-Prior, "in what favour thou art with our blessed Patroness, that she herself becomes the guardian of thy paths—Not since the days of our blessed founder hath she shown such grace to any one. All unworthy were we to hold spiritual superiority over thee, and we pray thee to prepare for thy speedy removal to Aberbrothwick."

"Alas! my lord and father," said the Sub-Prior, "your words pierce my very soul. Under the seal of confession will I presently tell thee why I conceive myself rather the baffled sport of a spirit of another sort, than the protected favourite of the heavenly powers. But first let me ask this unhappy man a question or two."

"Do as ye list," replied the Abbot—"but you shall not convince me that it is fitting you remain in this inferior office in the convent of Saint Mary."

"I would ask of this poor man," said Father Eustace, "for what purpose he nourished the thought of putting to death one who never did him evil?"

"Ay! but thou didst menace me with evil," said the ruffian, "and no one but a fool is menaced twice. Dost thou not remember what you said touching the Primate and Lord James, and the black pool of Jedwood? Didst thou think me fool enough to wait till thou hadst betrayed me to the sack and the fork? There were small wisdom in that, methinks—as little as in coming hither to tell my own misdeeds. I think the devil was in me when I took this road. I might have remembered the proverb, 'Never Friar forgot feud.'"

"And it was solely for that—for that only hasty word of mine, uttered in a moment of impatience, and forgotten ere it was well spoken?" said Father Eustace.

"Ay! for that, and—for the love of thy gold crucifix," said Christie of the Clinthill.

"Gracious Heaven! and could the yellow metal—the glittering earth—so far overcome every sense of what is thereby represented?—Father Abbot, I pray, as a dear boon, you will deliver this guilty person to my mercy."

"Nay, brother," interposed the Sacristan, "to your doom if you will, not to your mercy.—Remember, we are not all equally favoured by our blessed Lady, nor is it likely that every frock in the Convent will serve as a coat of proof when a lance is couched against it."

"For that very reason," said the Sub-Prior, "I would not that for my worthless self the community were to fall at feud with Julian of Avenel, this man's master."

"Our Lady forbid!" said the Sacristan; "he is a second Julian the apostate."

"With our reverend father the Abbot's permission, then," said Father Eustace, "I desire this man may be freed from his chains, and suffered to depart uninjured;—and here, friend," he added, giving him the golden crucifix, "is the image for which thou wert willing to stain thy hands with murder. View it well, and may it inspire thee with other and better thoughts than those which referred to it as a piece of bullion. Part with it, nevertheless, if thy necessities require, and get thee one of such coarse substance that Mammon shall have no share in any of the reflections to which it gives rise. It was the bequest of a dear friend to me; but dearer service can it never do than that of winning a soul to Heaven."

The Borderer, now freed from his chains, stood gazing alternately on the Sub-Prior, and on the golden crucifix. "By Saint Giles," said he, "I understand ye not! An ye give me gold for couching my lance at thee, what would you give me to level it at a heretic?"

"The Church," said the Sub-Prior, "will try the effect of her spiritual censures to bring these stray sheep into the fold, ere she employ the edge of the sword of Saint Peter."

"Ay, but," said the ruffian, "they say the Primate recommends a little strangling and burning in aid both of censure and of sword. But fare ye well! I owe you a life, and it may be I will not forget my debt."

The bailie now came bustling in, dressed in his blue coat and bandaliers, and attended by two or three halberdiers. "I have been a thought too late in waiting upon your reverend lordship. I am grown somewhat fatter since the field of Pinkie, and my leathern coat slips not on so soon as it was wont; but the dungeon is ready, and though, as I said, I have been somewhat late"—

Here his intended prisoner walked gravely up to the officer's nose, to his great amazement.

"You have been indeed somewhat late, bailie," said he, "and I am greatly obliged to your buff-coat, and to the time you took to put it on. If the secular arm had arrived some quarter of an hour sooner, I had been out of the reach of spiritual grace; but as it is, I wish you good even, and a safe riddance out of your garment of durance, in which you have much the air of a hog in armour."

Wroth was the bailie with this comparison, and exclaimed in ire—"An it were not for the presence of the venerable Lord Abbot, thou knave"—

"Nay, an thou wouldst try conclusions," said Christie of the Clinthill, "I will meet thee at daybreak by Saint Mary's well."

"Hardened wretch!" said Father Eustace, "art thou but this instant delivered from death, and dost thou so soon nurse thoughts of slaughter?"

"I will meet with thee ere it be long, thou knave," said the bailie, "and teach thee thine Oremus."

"I will meet thy cattle in a moonlight night before that day," said he of the Clinthill.

"I will have thee by the neck one misty morning, thou strong thief," answered the secular officer of the church.

"Thou art thyself as strong a thief as ev retorted Christie; "and if the worms were on ing on that fat carcass of thine I might v to have thine office, by favour of these reverei

"A cast of their office and a cast of mi swered the bailie; "a cord and a confesso all thou wilt have from us."

"Sirs," said the Sub-Prior, observing tha them began to make more interest than wa decorous in this wrangling betwixt justice quity, "I pray you both to depart—Mas retire with your halberdiers, and trouble not whom we have dismissed.—And thou, Ca whatever be thy name, take thy departure member thou owest thy life to the Lord clemency."

"Nay, as to that," answered Christie that I owe it to your own; but impute it to list, I owe a life among ye, and there is a And, whistling as he went, he left the ap seeming as if he held the life which he had not worth further thanks.

"Obstinate even to brutality!" said Fa stace; "and yet who knows but some better be under so rude an exterior?"

"Save a thief from the gallows," said the tan—"you know the rest of the proverb; a ting, as may Heaven grant, that our lives a are safe from this outrageous knave, who sure our meal and our malt, our herds and our

"Marry, that will I, my brethren," said monk. "Ah, brethren, you little know wha made of a repentant robber. In Abbot I days—ay, and I remember them as it were —the freebooters were the best welcome came to Saint Mary's. Ay, they paid tithe drove that they brought over from the So because they were something lightly come known them make the tithe a seventh their confessor knew his business.—Ay, whe from the tower a score of fat bullocks, or a sheep, coming down the valley, with two stout men-at-arms behind them, with their steel caps, and their black-jacks, and th lances, the good Lord Abbot Ingilram was say—he was a merry man—'There come the the spoilers of the Egyptians!' Ay, and I the famous John the Armstrang,—a fair ma and a goodly, the more pity that hemp heckled for him—I have seen him come Abbey Church with nine tassals of gold in hi and every tassal made of nine English noble would go from chapel to chapel, and from image, and from altar to altar, on his kn leave here a tassel, and there a noble, till as little gold on his bonnet as on my hood- find no such Border thieves now!"

"No, truly, Brother Nicolas," answered th "they are more apt to take any gold the Ch left, than to bequeath or bestow any—and beshrew me if I think they care whether be fed on the meadows of Lanercost Abbey or Mary's!"

"There is no good thing left in them," s Nicolas; "they are clean naught—Ah, th that I have seen! such proper men! and as proper, and as pious as pitiful!"

"It skills not talking of it, Brother Nico the Abbot; "and I will now dismiss you thren, holding your meeting upon this our concerning the danger of our reverend instead of the attendance on the lands this Yet let the bells be duly rung for the edificat laymen without, and also that the novices due reverence.—And now, benedicite, breth cellarer will bestow on each a grace-cup a sel as ye pass the buttery, for ye have been and anxious, and dangerous it is to fall asle ease with empty stomach."

"Gratias agimus quam maximas, Dom rendissime!" replied the brethren, departin due order.

But the Sub-Prior remained behind, and his knees before the Abbot, as he was abou

ed him to hear under the seal of confession ures of the day. The reverend Lord Abbot nd would have alleged fatigue; but to stance, of all men, he was ashamed to show
e in his religious duties. The confession, roceeded, in which Father Eustace told all dinary circumstances which had befallen the journey. And being questioned by the ther he was not conscious of any secret
which he might have been subjected for a e delusions of evil spirits, the Sub-Prior with frank avowal, that he thought he deserved such penance for having judged ternal rigour of the report of father Philip an.

," said the penitent, "may have been nvince me, not only that he can at plea-communication betwixt us and beings of
and, as we word it, supernatural class, but ish our pride of superior wisdom, or supe-
e, or superior learning."

I said that virtue is its own reward; and if duty was ever more completely recom-
in by the audience which the reverend Abillingly yielded to the confession of the

To find the object, of his fear shall we his envy, or of both, accusing himself of ror with which he had so tacitly charged at once a corroboration of the Abbot's
a soothing of his pride, and an allaying of
The sense of triumph, however, rather inan diminished his natural good-humour;
was Abbot Boniface from being disposed e over his Sub-Prior in consequence of this that in his exhortation he hovered somerously betwixt the natural expression of atified vanity, and his timid reluctance to elings of Father Eustace.

ther," said he, ex cathedra, "it cannot ped your judicious observation that we declined our own judgment in favour of n, even about those matters which most cerned the community. Nevertheless, uld we be, could you think that we did because we deemed our own opinion less or our wit more shallow, than that of our
ren. For it was done exclusively to give r brethren, such as your much-esteemed ar fr brother, that courage which is nea free deliverance of your opinion—we oft-ng apart our proper judgment, that our in-especially our dear brother the Sub-Prior,
mforted and encouraged in proposing va-own thoughts. Which our deference and nay, in some sort, have produced in your st reverend brother, that self-opinion of knowledge, which hath led unfortunately overestimating your own faculties, and there-ing yourself, as is but too visible, to the mockeries of evil spirits. For it is assured en always holdeth us in the least esteem em of ourselves most highly; and also,
r hand, it may be that we have somewhat
on what became our high seat in this Abering ourselves to be too much guided, and were, controlled, by the voice of our inferefore," continued the Lord Abbot, "in such faults shall and must be amended—er presuming less upon your gifts and car-
n, and I taking heed not so easily to relin-own opinion for that of one lower in n office. Nevertheless, we would not that thereby lose the high advantage which we ed, and may yet derive, from your wise hich hath been so often recommended to most Reverend Primate. Wherefore, on igh moment, we will call you to our private, and listen to your opinion, which, if ree with our own, we will deliver to the s emanating directly from ourselves; thus u, dearest brother, that seeming victory
apt to engender spiritual pride, and avoid-es the temptation of falling into that mo-
of opinion, whereby our office is lessened
and our person (were that of consequence) rendered less important in the eyes of the community over which we preside."

Notwithstanding the high notions which, as a rigid Catholic, Father Eustace entertained of the sacrament of confession, as his church calls it, there was some danger that a sense of the ridiculous might have stolen on him when he heard his superior, with such simple cunning lay, out a little plan for availing himself of the Sub-Prior's wisdom and experience, while he should take the whole credit to himself. Yet his conscience immediately told him that he was right.

"I should have thought more," he reflected, "of the spiritual Superior, and less of the individual. I should have spread my mantle over the frailties of my spiritual father, and done what I might to support his character, and, of course, to extend his utility among the brethren, as well as with others. The Abbot cannot be humbled, but what the community must be humbled in his person. Her boast is, that over all her children, especially over those called to places of distinction, she can diffuse those gifts which are necessary to render them illustrious."

Actuated by these sentiments, Father Eustace frankly assented to the charge which his Superior, even in that moment of authority, had rather intimated than made, and signified his humble acquiescence in any mode of communicating his counsel which might be most agreeable to the Lord Abbot, and might best remove from himself all temptation to glory in his own wisdom. He then prayed the reverend Father to assign him such penance as might best suit his offence, intimating, at the same time, that he had already fasted the whole day.

"And it is that I complain of," answered the Abbot, instead of giving him credit for his abstinence; "it is these very penances, fasts, and vigils, of which we complain; as tending only to generate air and fumes of vanity, which, ascending from the stomach into the head, do but puff us up with vain-glory and self-opinion. It is meet and beseeming that novices should undergo fasts and vigils; for some part of every community must fast, and young stomachs may best endure it. Besides, in them it abates wicked thoughts, and the desire of worldly delights. But, reverend brother, for those to fast who are dead and mortified to the world, as I and thou, is work of supererogation, and is but the matter of spiritual pride. Wherefore, I enjoin thee, most reverend brother, go to the buttery, and drink two cups at least of good wine, eating withal a comfortable morsel, such as may best suit thy taste and stomach. And in respect that thine opinion of thy own wisdom hath at times made thee less conformable to, and companionable with, the weaker and less learned brethren, I enjoin thee, during the said repast, to choose for thy companion our reverend brother Nicolas, and, without interruption or impatience, to listen for a stricken hour to his narration, concerning those things which befell in the times of our venerable predecessor, Abbot Ingilram, on whose soul may Heaven have mercy! And for such holy exercises as may further advantage your soul, and expiate the faults whereof you have contritely and humbly avowed yourself guilty, we will ponder upon that matter, and announce our will unto you the next morning."

It was remarkable, that after this memorable evening, the feelings of the worthy Abbot towards his adviser were much more kindly and friendly than when he deemed the Sub-Prior the impeccable and infallible person, in whose garment of virtue and wisdom no flaw was to be discerned. It seemed as if this avowal of his own imperfections had recommended Father Eustace to the friendship of the Superior, although at the same time this increase of benevolence was attended with some circumstances, which, to a man of the Sub-Prior's natural elevation of mind and temper, were more grievous than even undergoing the legends of the dull and verbose Father Nicolas. For instance, the Abbot seldom mentioned him to the other monks, without designing him our beloved Brother Eustace, poor man!—and now and then he used to warn the younger brethren against the snares of vainglory and spiritual pride, which Satan sets for the more rigidly righteous; with such books and demonstrations as did all but expressly designate the Sub-Prior as one who had fallen at one time under such delusions. Upon these occasions, it required all the votive obedience of a monk, all the philosophical discipline of the schools, and all the patience of a Christian, to enable Father Eustace to endure the pompous and patronising parade of his honest, but somewhat thickheaded Superior. He began himself to be desirous of leaving the Monastery, or at least he manifestly declined to interfere with its affairs, in that marked and authoritative manner, which he had at first practised.

CHAPTER XI.

> You call this education, do you not?
> Why, 'tis the forced march of a herd of bullocks
> Before a shouting drover. The grand van
> Move on at ease, and pause a while to snatch
> A passing morsel from the dewy greensward;
> While all the blows, the oaths, the indignation,
> Fall on the croupe of the ill fated haggard
> That cripples in the rear. Old Play.

Two or three years glided on, during which the storm of the approaching alteration in church government became each day louder and more perilous. Owing to the circumstances which we have intimated in the end of the last chapter, the Sub-Prior Eustace appeared to have altered considerably his habits of life. He afforded, on all extraordinary occasions, to the Abbot, whether privately, or in the assembled Chapter, the support of his wisdom and experience; but in his ordinary habits he seemed now to live more for himself, and less for the community, than had been his former practice.

He often absented himself for whole days from the convent; and as the adventure of Glendearg dwelt deeply on his memory, he was repeatedly induced to visit that lonely tower, and to take an interest in the orphans who had their shelter under its roof. Besides, he felt a deep anxiety to know whether the volume which he had lost, when so strangely preserved from the lance of the murderer, had again found its way back to the Tower of Glendearg. "It was strange," he thought, "that a spirit," for such he could not help judging the being whose voice he had heard, "should, on the one side, seek the advancement of heresy, and, on the other, interpose to save the life of a zealous Catholic priest."

But from no inquiry which he made of the various inhabitants of the Tower of Glendearg, could he learn that the copy of the translated Scriptures, for which he made such diligent inquiry, had again been seen by any of them.

In the mean while the good father's occasional visits were of no small consequence to Edward Glendinning and to Mary Avenel. The former displayed a power of apprehending and retaining whatever was taught him, which filled Father Eustace with admiration. He was at once acute and industrious, alert and accurate; one of those rare combinations of talent and industry, which are seldom united.

It was the earnest desire of Father Eustace that the excellent qualities thus early displayed by Edward should be dedicated to the service of the church, to which he thought the youth's own consent might be easily obtained, as he was of a calm, contemplative, retired habit, and seemed to consider knowledge as the principal object, and its enlargement as the greatest pleasure in life. As to the mother, the Sub-Prior had little doubt that, trained as she was to view the monks of Saint Mary's with such profound reverence, she would be but too happy in an opportunity of enrolling one of her sons in its honoured community. But the good Father proved to be mistaken in both these particulars.

When he spoke to Elspeth Glendinning of that which a mother best loves to hear—the proficiency and abilities of her son,—she listened with a delighted ear. But when Father Eustace hinted at the duty of dedicating to the service of the church, talents which seemed fitted to defend and adorn it, the dame endeavoured always to shift the subject; and when pressed farther, enlarged on her own incapacity, as a lone woman, to manage the feu; on the advantage which her neighbours of the township were often taking of her unprotected state, and on the wish she had that Edward might fill his father's place, remain in the tower, and close her eyes.

On such occasions the Sub-Prior would answer, that even in a worldly point of view the welfare of the family would be best consulted by one of the sons entering into the community of St. Mary's, as it was not to be supposed that he would fail to afford his family the important protection which he could then easily extend towards them. What could be a more pleasing prospect than to see him high in honour? or what more sweet than to have the last duties rendered to her by a son, revered for his holiness of life and exemplary manners? Besides, he endeavoured to impress upon the dame that her eldest son, Halbert, whose bold temper and headstrong indulgence of a wandering humour, rendered him incapable of learning, was, for that reason, as well as that he was her eldest born, fittest to bustle through the affairs of the world, and manage the little fief.

Elspeth durst not directly dissent from what was proposed, for fear of giving displeasure, and yet she always had something to say against it. Halbert, she said, was not like any of the neighbour boys—he was taller by the head, and stronger by the half, than any boy of his years within the Halidome. But he was fit for no peaceful work that could be devised. If he liked a book ill, he liked a plough or a pattle worse. He had scoured his father's old broadsword—suspended it by a belt round his waist, and seldom stirred without it. He was a sweet boy and a gentle if spoken fair, but cross him and he was a born devil. "In a word," she said, bursting into tears, "deprive me of Edward, good father, and ye bereave my house of prop and pillar; for my heart tells me that Halbert will take to his father's gates, and die his father's death."

When the conversation came to this crisis, the good-humoured monk was always content to drop the discussion for the time, trusting some opportunity would occur of removing her prejudices, for such he thought them, against Edward's proposed destination.

When, leaving the mother, the Sub-Prior addressed himself to the son, animating his zeal for knowledge, and pointing out how amply it might be gratified should he agree to take holy orders, he found the same repugnance which Dame Elspeth had exhibited. Edward pleaded a want of sufficient vocation to so serious a profession—his reluctance to leave his mother, and other objections, which the Sub-Prior treated as evasive.

"I plainly perceive," he said one day, in answer to them, "that the devil has his factors as well as Heaven, and that they are equally, or, alas! the former are perhaps more active, in bespeaking for their master the first of the market. I trust, young man, that neither idleness, nor licentious pleasure, nor the love of worldly gain and worldly grandeur, the chief baits with which the great Fisher of souls conceals his hook, are the causes of your declining the career to which I would incite you. But above all, I trust—above all I hope—that the vanity of superior knowledge—a sin with which those who have made proficiency in learning are most frequently beset—has not led you into the awful hazard of listening to the dangerous doctrines which are now afloat concerning religion. Better for you that you were as grossly ignorant as the beasts which perish, than that the pride of knowledge should induce you to lend an ear to the voice of the heretics." Edward Glendinning listened to the rebuke with a downcast look, and failed not, when it was concluded, earnestly to vindicate himself from the charge of having pushed his studies into any subjects which the Church inhibited; and so the matter was left to form vain conjectures respecting the cause of his reluctance to embrace the monastic state.

It is an old proverb, used by Chaucer, and quoted by Elizabeth, that "the greatest clerks are not the wisest men;" and it is as true as if the poet had not rhymed, or the queen reasoned on it. If Father Eustace had

t had his thoughts turned so much to the progress
heresy, and so little to what was passing in the wer, he might have read, in the speaking eyes of ary Avenel, now a girl of fourteen or fifteen, reasons hich might disincline her youthful companion toards the monastic vows. I have said, that she also as a promising pupil of the good father, upon whom r innocent and infantine beauty had an effect of hich he was himself, perhaps, unconscious. Her nk and expectations entitled her to be taught the ts of reading and writing;- and each lesson which
e monk assigned her was conned over in company
ith Edward, and by him explained and re-explained,
d again illustrated, until she became perfectly mas-
ss of it.

In the beginning of their studies, Halbert had been eir school companion. But the boldness and imtience of his disposition soon quarrelled with an cupation, in which, without assiduity and unretted attention, no progress was to be expected.
e Sub-Prior's visits were at irregular intervals, and en weeks would intervene between them, in which e Halbert was sure to forget all that had been scribed for him to learn, and much which he had rtly acquired before. His deficiencies on these oc-sions gave him pain, but it was not of that sort ich produces amendment.

For a time, like all who are fond of idleness, he enavoured to detach the attention of his brother and ary Avenel from their task, rather than to learn s own, and such dialogues as the following would sue:—

"Take your bonnet, Edward, and make haste—
e Laird of Colmslie is at the head of the glen with s hounds."

"I care not, Halbert," answered the younger bro-er; "two brace of dogs may kill a deer without my ing there to see them, and I must help Mary Ave-
l with her lesson."

'Ay! you will labour at the monk's lessons till you
n monk yourself," answered Halbert.—"Mary, ll you go with me, and I will show you the cuat's nest I told you of?"

"I cannot go with you, Halbert," answered Mary,
ecause I must study this lesson—it will take me
ng to learn it—I am sorry I am so dull, for if I uld get my task as fast as Edward, I should like go with you."

"Should you indeed?" said Halbert; "then I will ait for you—and what is more, I will try to get my ason also."

With a smile and a sigh he took up the primer, and gan heavily to con over the task which had been signed him. As if banished from the society of e two others, he sat sad and solitary in one of the ep window-recesses; and, after in vain struggling ith the difficulties of his task, and his disinclina-
on to learn it, he found himself involuntarily en-aged in watching the movements of the other two
dents, instead of toiling any longer.

The picture which Halbert looked upon was deightful in itself, but somehow or other it afforded y little pleasure to him. The beautiful girl, with ks of simple, yet earnest anxiety, was bent on dis-tangling those intricacies which obstructed her ogress to knowledge, and looking ever and anon to ward for assistance, while, seated close by her side,
e watchful to remove every obstacle from her way,
eemed at once to be proud of the progress which pupil made, and of the assistance which he was
e to render her. There was a bond betwixt them, trong and interesting tie, the desire of obtaining owledge, the pride of surmounting difficulties.

eeling most acutely, yet ignorant of the nature
l source of his own emotions, Halbert could no
ger endure to look upon this quiet scene, but,
rting up, dashed his book from him, and exclaimed ud, "To the fiend I bequeath all books, and the amers that make them!—I would a score of throns would come up the glen, and we should rn how little all this muttering and scribbling is rth."

Mary Avenel and his brother started, and looked at lbert with surprise, while he went on with great animation, his features swelling, and the tears starting into his eyes as he spoke.—"Yes, Mary—I wish
a score of Southrons came up the glen this very day;
and you should see one good hand, and one good sword, do more to protect you, than all the books that were ever opened, and all the pens that ever grew on a goose's wing."

Mary looked a little surprised and a little frightened
at his vehemence, but instantly replied affectionately,
"You are vexed, Halbert, because you do not get your lesson so fast as Edward can; and so am I, for I am as stupid as you—But come, and Edward shall sit betwixt us and teach us."

"He shall not teach me," said Halbert, in the same angry mood; "I never can learn him to do any thing that is honourable and manly, and he shall not teach me any of his monkish tricks.- I hate the monks,
with their drawling nasal tone like so many frogs,
and their long black petticoats like so many women,
and their reverences, and their lordships, and their lazy vassals, that do nothing but paddle in the mire with plough and harrow, from Yule to Michaelmas. I will call none lord, but him who wears a sword to make his title good; and I will call none man, but he
that can bear himself manlike and masterful."

"For Heaven's sake, peace, brother!" said Edward; "if such words were taken up, and reported
out of the house, they would be our mother's ruin."

"Report them yourself, then, and they will be your making, and nobody's marring save mine own. Say, that Halbert Glendinning will never be vassal to an old man with a cowl and shaven crown, while there are twenty barons who wear casque and plume that lack bold followers. Let them grant you these wretched acres, and much meal may they bear you to make your brochan!" He left the room hastily, but instantly returned, and continued to speak with the same tone of quick and irritated feeling. "And you need not think so much, neither of you, and especially you, Edward, need not think so much of your parchment book there, and your cunning in reading
it. By my faith, I will soon learn to read as well as you; and—for I know a better teacher than your grim old monk, and a better book than his printed breviary; and since you like scholar-craft so well, Mary Avenel, you shall see whether Edward or I have most of it." He left the apartment, and came not again.

"What can be the matter with him?" said Mary,
following Halbert with her eyes from the window,
as with hasty and unequal steps he ran up the wild
glen—"Where can your brother be going, Edward?
—what book?—what teacher does he talk of?"

"It avails not guessing," said Edward. "Halbert
is angry, he knows not why, and speaks of he knows not what; let us go again to our lessons, and he will come home when he has tired himself with scrambling among the crags as usual."

But Mary's anxiety on account of Halbert seemed more deeply rooted. She declined prosecuting the task in which they had been so pleasingly engaged,
under the excuse of a head-ache; nor could Edward prevail upon her to resume it again that morning.

Meanwhile Halbert, his head unbonneted, his features swelled with jealous anger, and the tear still in his eye, sped up the wild and upper extremity of the little valley of Glendearg with the speed of a roebuck,
choosing, as if in desperate defiance of the difficulties of the way, the wildest and most dangerous paths, and voluntarily exposing himself a hundred times to dangers which he might have escaped by turning a little aside from them. It seemed as if he wished his course to be as straight as that of the arrow to its mark.

He arrived at length in a narrow and secluded
cleuch, or deep ravine, which ran down into the valley, and contributed a scanty rivulet to the supply of the brook with which Glendearg is watered.— Up this he sped with the same precipitate haste
which had marked his departure from the tower;
nor did he pause and look round until he had reached
the fountain from which the rivulet had its rise.

Here Halbert stopt short, and cast a gloomy and almost a frightened glance around him. A huge rock, rose in front, from a cleft of which grew a wild holly tree, whose dark green branches rustled over the spring which arose beneath. The banks on either hand rose so high, and approached each other so closely, that it was only when the sun was at its meridian height, and during the summer solstice, that its rays could reach the bottom of the chasm in which he stood. But it was now summer, and the hour was noon, so that the unwonted reflection of the sun was dancing in the pellucid fountain.

"It is the season and the hour," said Halbert to himself; "and now I——I might soon become wiser than Edward with all his pains! Mary should see whether he alone is fit to be consulted, and to sit by her side, and hang over her as she reads, and point out every word and every letter. And she loves me better than him—I am sure she does—for she comes of noble blood, and scorns sloth and cowardice.—And do I myself not stand here slothful and cowardly as any priest of them all?—Why should I fear to call upon this form—this shape?—Already have I endured the vision, and why not again?—What can it do to me, who am a man of lith and limb, and have by my side my father's sword? Does my heart beat—do my hairs bristle, at the thought of calling up a painted shadow, and how should I face a band of Southrons in flesh and blood? By the soul of the first Glendinning, I will make proof of the charm!"

He cast the leathern brogue or buskin from his right foot, planted himself in a firm posture, unsheathed his sword, and first looking around to collect his resolution, he bowed three times deliberately towards the holly-tree, and as often to the little fountain, repeating at the same time, with a determined voice, the following rhyme:

"Thrice to the holly brake—
Thrice to the well:—
I bid thee awake,
White maid of Avenel!

Noon gleams on the Lake—
Noon glows on the Fell—
Wake thee, O wake,
White maid of Avenel!"

These lines were hardly uttered, when there stood the figure of a female clothed in white, within three steps of Halbert Glendinning.

"I guess, 'twas frightful there to see
A lady richly clad as she—Beautiful exceedingly."*

CHAPTER XII.

There's something in that ancient superstition,
Which, erring as it is, our fancy loves.
The spring that, with its thousand crystal bubbles,
Bursts from the bosom of some desert rock
In secret solitude, may well be deem'd
The haunt of something purer, more refined,
And mightier than ourselves. —Old Play.

Young Halbert Glendinning had scarcely pronounced the mystical rhymes, when, as we have mentioned in the conclusion of the last chapter, an appearance, as of a beautiful female, dressed in white, stood within two yards of him. His terror for the moment overcame his natural courage, as well as the strong resolution which he had formed, that the figure which he had now twice seen should not a third time daunt him. But it would seem there is something thrilling and abhorrent to flesh and blood, in the consciousness that we stand in presence of a being in form like to ourselves, but so different in faculties and nature, that we can neither understand its purposes, nor calculate its means of pursuing them.

Halbert stood silent, and gasped for breath, his hairs erecting themselves on his head—his mouth open—his eyes fixed, and, as the sole remaining sign of his late determined purpose, his sword pointed towards the apparition. At length, with a voice of ineffable sweetness, the White Lady, for by that name we shall distinguish this being, sung, or rather chanted, the following lines:

"Youth of the dark eye, wherefore didst thou call me?
Wherefore art thou here, if terrors can appal thee?
He that seeks to deal with us must know nor fear nor f
To coward and churl our speech is dark, our gifts are
ing.
The breeze that brought me hither now, must sweep I ground.
The fleecy cloud on which I ride for Araby is bound:
The fleecy cloud is drifting by, the breeze sighs for my
For I must sail a thousand miles before the close of da

The astonishment of Halbert began once i give way to his resolution, and he gained voice to say, though with a faltering accent, "In th of God, what art thou?" The answer was in of a different tone and measure:—

"What I am I must not show—
What I am thou couldst not know—
Something betwixt heaven and hell—
Something that neither stood nor fell—Something that through thy wit or will
May work thee good—may work thee ill.
Neither substance quite, nor shadow,
Haunting lonely moor and meadow,
Dancing by the haunted spring,
Riding on the whirlwind's wing;
Aping in fantastic fashion
Every change of human passion,
While o'er our frozen minds they pass,
Like shadows from the mirror'd glass.
Wayward, fickle is our mood,
Hovering betwixt bad and good,
Happier than brief dated man,
Living twenty times his span;
Far less happy, for we have
Help nor hope beyond the grave!
Man awakes to joy or sorrow;
Ours the sleep that knows no morrow.
This is all that I can show—
This is all that thou mayst know."

The White Lady paused, and appeared to a answer; but, as Halbert hesitated how to fr speech, the vision seemed gradually to fade, come more and more incorporeal. Justly g thus to be a symptom of her disappearance. compelled himself to say,—"Lady, when I s in the glen, and when you brought back th book of Mary of Avenel, thou didst say I sho day learn to read it."

The White Lady replied,

"Ay! and I taught thee the word and the spell,
To waken me here by the Fairies' Well.
But thou hast loved the heron and hawk,
More than to seek my haunted walk;
And thou hast loved the lance and the sword
More than good text and holy word;
And thou hast loved the deer to track,
More than the lines and the letters black;
And thou art a ranger of moss and of wood,
And scornest the nurture of gentle blood."

"I will do so no longer, fair maiden," said H "I desire to learn; and thou didst promise n when I did so desire, thou wouldst be my he am no longer afraid of thy presence, and I longer regardless of instruction." As he utter words, the figure of the White Maiden grew gr as distinct as it had been at first; and what h nigh faded into an ill-defined and colourless sh again assumed an appearance at least of co consistency, although the hues were less vivi the outline of the figure less distinct and defin at least it seemed to Halbert—than those of a nary inhabitant of the earth. "Wilt thou gr request," he said, "fair Lady, and give to my k the holy book which Mary of Avenel has s wept for?"

The White Lady replied:

"Thy craven fear my truth accused,
Thine idlehood my trust abused;
He that draws to harbour late,
Must sleep without, or burst the gate.
There is a star for thee which burn'd,
Its influence wanes, its course is turned;
Valour and constancy alone
Can bring thee back the chance that's flown."

"If I have been a loiterer, Lady," answered Glendinning, "thou shalt now find me will press forward with double speed. Other th have filled my mind, other thoughts have e my heart, within a brief period—and by H other occupations shall henceforward fill up m I have lived in this day the space of years—I hither a boy—I will return a man—a man, w may converse not only with his own kind, bu whatever God permits to be visible to him.

* Coleridge's Christabelle.

he contents of that mysterious volume—I will why the Lady of Avenel loved it—why the feared, and would have stolen it—why thou wice recover it from their hands.—What mys- wrapt in it?—Speak, I conjure thee!" The assumed an air peculiarly sad and solemn, as, ng her head, and folding her arms on her , she replied:

"Within that awful volume lies
The mystery of mysteries!
Happiest they of human race,
To whom God has granted grace
To read, to fear, to hope, to pray,
To lift the latch, and force the way;
And better had they ne'er been born,
Who read to doubt, or read to scorn."

ve me the volume, Lady," said young Glendin- "They call me idle—they call me dull—in this t my industry shall not fail, nor, with God's ig, shall my understanding. Give me the vo- The apparition again replied:

"Many a fathom dark and deep
I have laid the book to sleep;
Ethereal fires around it glowing—Ethereal music ever flowing—
The sacred pledge of Heav'n
All things revere,
Each in his sphere,
Save man, for whom 'twas giv'n:
Lend thy hand, and thou shalt spy
Things ne'er seen by mortal eye."

ert Glendinning boldly reached his hand to hite Lady.

earest thou to go with me?" she said, as his trembled at the soft and cold touch of her own—

"Fearest thou to go with me?
Still it is free to thee
A peasant to dwell;
Thou mayst drive the dull steer,
And chase the king's deer,
But never more come near
This haunted well."

what thou sayest be true," said the undaunted my destinies are higher than thine own. There e neither well nor wood which I dare not visit. ır of aught, natural or supernatural, shall ber th through my native valley."

had scarce uttered the words, when they both ided through the earth with a rapidity which way Halbert's breath and every other sensation, ; that of being hurried on with the utmost ve-

At length they stopped with a shock so sud- nat the mortal journeyer through this unknown must have been thrown down with violence, not been upheld by his supernatural companion. vas more than a minute, ere, looking around e beheld a grotto, or natural cavern, composed most splendid spars and crystals, which re- t in a thousand prismatic hues the light of a nt flame that glowed on an altar of alabaster. ltar with its fire, formed the central point of the , which was of a round form, and very high in of, resembling in some respects the dome of a ral. Corresponding to the four points of the ss, there went off four long galleries, or ar- constructed of the same brilliant materials he dome itself, and the termination of which ost in darkness.

human imagination can conceive, or words to describe, the glorious radiance, which, shot y forth by the flame, was returned from so many ed thousand points of reflection, afforded by arry pillars and their numerous angular crys- The fire itself did not remain steady and un- l, but rose and fell, sometimes ascending in a nt pyramid of condensed flame half way up the xpanse, and again fading into a softer and rosy hue, and hovering, as it were, on the sur- f the altar, to collect its strength for another ful exertion. There was no visible fuel by which fed, nor did it emit either smoke or vapour of nd.

at was of all the most remarkable, the black e so often mentioned lay not only unconsumed, touched in the slightest degree, amid this in- of fire, which, while it seemed to be of force ent to melt adamant, had no effect whatever on the sacred book thus subjected to its utmost influence.

The White Lady, having paused long enough to let young Glendinning take a complete survey of what was around him, now said, in her usual chant,

"Here lies the volume thou boldly hast sought;
Touch it and take it,—'twill dearly be bought!"

Familiarized in some degree with marvels, and desperately desirous of showing the courage he had boasted, Halbert plunged his hand, without hesitation, into the flame, trusting to the rapidity of the motion, to snatch out the volume before the fire could greatly affect it. But he was much disappointed. The flame instantly caught upon his sleeve, and though he withdrew his hand immediately, yet his arm was so dreadfully scorched, that he had well-nigh screamed with pain. He suppressed the natural expression of anguish, however, and only intimated the agony which he felt by a contortion and a muttered groan. The White Lady passed her cold hand over his arm, and ere she had finished the following metrical chant, his pain had entirely gone, and no mark of the scorching was visible:

"Rash thy deed,
Mortal weed
To immortal flames applying;
Rasher trust
Thin thing of dust,
On his own weak worth relying:
Strip thee of such fences vain,
Strip, and prove thy luck again."

Obedient to what he understood to be the meaning of his conductress, Halbert bared his arm to the shoulder, throwing down the remains of his sleeve, which no sooner touched the floor on which he stood than it collected itself together, shrivelled itself up, and was without any visible fire reduced to light tinder, which a sudden breath of wind dispersed into empty space. The White Lady, observing the surprise of the youth, immediately repeated—

"Mortal warp and mortal woof Cannot brook this charmed roof;
All that mortal art hath wrought,
In our cell returns to nought.
The molten gold returns to clay,
The polish'd diamond melts away;
All is alter'd, all is flown,
Nought stands fast but truth alone.
Not for that thy quest give o'er:
Courage! prove thy chance once more."

Emboldened by her words, Halbert Glendinning made a second effort, and, plunging his bare arm into the flame, took out the sacred volume without feeling either heat or inconvenience of any kind. Astonished, and almost terrified, at his own success, he beheld the flame collect itself, and shoot up into one long and final stream, which seemed as if it would ascend to the very roof of the cavern, and then sinking as suddenly, became totally extinguished. The deepest darkness ensued; but Halbert had no time to consider his situation, for the White Lady had already caught his hand, and they ascended to upper air with the same velocity with which they had sunk into the earth.

They stood by the fountain in the Corri-nan-shian when they emerged from the bowels of the earth; but on casting a bewildered glance around him, the youth was surprised to observe, that the shadows had fallen far to the east, and that the day was well-nigh spent. He gazed on his conductress for explanation, but her figure began to fade before his eyes—her cheeks grew paler, her features less distinct, her form became shadowy, and blended itself with the mist which was ascending the hollow ravine. What had late the symmetry of form, and the delicate, yet clear hues of feminine beauty, now resembled the flitting and pale ghost of some maiden who had died for love, as it is seen, indistinctly and by moonlight, by her perjured lover.

"Stay, spirit!" said the youth, emboldened by his success in the subterranean dome, "thy kindness must not leave me, as one encumbered with a weapon he knows not how to wield. Thou must teach me the art to read, and to understand, this volume; else what avails it me that I possess it?"

But the figure of the White Lady still waned before his eyes, until it became an outline as pale and indistinct as that of the moon, when the winter morning is far advanced: and ere she had ended the following chant she was entirely invisible:—

'Alas! alas!
Not ours the grace
These holy characters to trace:
Idle forms of painted air,
Not to us is given to share
The boon bestow'd on Adam's race!
With patience bide,
Heaven will provide
The fitting time, the fitting guide."

The form was already gone, and now the voice itself had melted away in melancholy cadence, softening, as if the Being who spoke had been slowly wafted from the spot where she had commenced her melody.

It was at this moment that Halbert felt the extremity of the terror which he had hitherto so manfully suppressed. The very necessity of exertion had given him spirit to make it, and the presence of the mysterious Being, while it was a subject of fear in itself, had nevertheless given him the sense of protection being near to him. It was when he could reflect with composure on what had passed, that a cold tremor shot across his limbs, his hair bristled, and he was afraid to look around, lest he should find at his elbow something more frightful than the first vision. A breeze arising suddenly realized the beautiful and wild idea of the most imaginative of our modern bards*—

It fann'd his cheek, it raised his hair,
Like a meadow gale in spring;
It mingled strangely with his fears,
Yet it felt like a welcoming.

The youth stood silent and astonished for a few minutes. It seemed to him that the extraordinary being he had seen, half his terror, half his protectress, was still hovering on the gale which swept past him, and that she might again make herself sensible to his organs of sight. "Speak!" he said, wildly tossing his arms, "speak yet again—be once more present, lovely vision!—thrice have I now seen thee, yet the idea of thy invisible presence around or beside me, makes my heart beat faster than if the earth yawned and gave up a demon." But neither sound nor appearance indicated the presence of the White Lady, and nothing preternatural beyond what he had already witnessed, was again audible or visible. Halbert, in the meanwhile, by the very exertion of again inviting the presence of this mysterious being, had recovered his natural audacity. He looked around once more, and resumed his solitary path down the valley into whose recesses he had penetrated.

Nothing could be more strongly contrasted than the storm of passion with which he had bounded over stock and crag, in order to plunge himself into the Corri-nan-shian, and the sobered mood in which he now returned homeward, industriously seeking out the most practicable path, not from a wish to avoid danger, but that he might not by personal toil distract his attention, deeply fixed on the extraordinary scene which he had witnessed. In the former case he had sought by hazard and bodily exertion to indulge at once the fiery excitation of passion, and to banish the cause of the excitement from his recollection; while now he studiously avoided all interruption to his contemplative walk, lest the difficulty of the way should interfere with, or disturb, his own deep reflections. Thus slowly pacing forth his course, with the air of a pilgrim rather than of a deer-hunter, Halbert about the close of the evening regained his paternal tower.

CHAPTER XIII.

The Miller was of manly make,
To meet him was na mows;
There durst nae ten come him to take,
Sae noited he their pows.
Christ's Kirk on the Green.

IT was after sunset, as we have already stated, when Halbert Glendinning returned to the abode of his father. The hour of dinner was at noon, and that of supper about an hour after sunset at this period of the year. The former had passed without Halbert's appearing; but this was no uncommon circumstance, for the chase, or any other pastime which occurred, made Halbert a frequent neglecter of hours; and his mother, though angry and disappointed when she saw him not at table, was so much accustomed to his occasional absence, and knew so little how to teach him more regularity, that a testy observation was almost all the censure with which such omissions were visited.

On the present occasion, however, the wrath of good Dame Elspeth soared higher than usual. It was not merely on account of the special tup's-head and trotters, the haggis and the side of mutton, with which her table was set forth, but also because of the arrival of no less a person than Hob Miller, as he was universally termed, though the man's name was Happer.

The object of the Miller's visit to the Tower of Glendearg was like the purpose of those embassies which potentates send to each other's courts, partly ostensible, partly politic. In outward show, Hob came to visit his friends of the Halidome, and share the festivity common among country folk, after the barn-yard has been filled, and to renew old intimacies by new conviviality. But in very truth he also came to have an eye upon the contents of each stack, and to obtain such information respecting the extent of the crop reaped and gathered in by each feuar, as might prevent the possibility of abstracted multures.

All the world knows that the cultivators of each barony or regality, temporal or spiritual, in Scotland are obliged to bring their corn to be grinded at the mill of the territory, for which they pay a heavy charge, called the intown multures. I could speak to the thirlage of invecta et illata too, but let that pass. I have said enough to intimate that I talk not without book. Those of the Sucken, or enthralled ground, were liable in penalties, if, deviating from this thirlage, (or thraldom,) they carried their grain to another mill. Now such another mill, erected on the lands of a lay-baron, lay within a tempting and convenient distance of Glendearg; and the miller was so obliging, and his charges so moderate, that it required Hob Miller's utmost vigilance to prevent evasions of his right of monopoly.

The most effectual means he could devise was this show of good fellowship and neighbourly friendship,—under colour of which he made his annual cruise through the barony—numbered every corn-stack, and computed its contents by the boll, so that he could give a shrewd hint afterwards whether or not the grist came to the right mill.

Dame Elspeth, like her compeers, was obliged to take these domiciliary visits in the sense of politeness; but in her case they had not occurred since her husband's death, probably because the Tower of Glendearg was distant, and there was but a trifling quantity of arable or infield land attached to it. This year there had been, upon some speculation of old Martin's, several bolls sown in the out-field, which, the season being fine, had ripened remarkably well. Perhaps this circumstance occasioned the honest Miller's including Glendearg, on this occasion, in his annual round.

Dame Glendinning received with pleasure a visit which she used formerly only to endure with patience; and she had changed her view of the matter chiefly, if not entirely, because Hob had brought with him his daughter Mysie, of whose features she could give so slight an account, but whose dress she had described so accurately to the Sub-Prior.

Hitherto this girl had been an object of very trifling consideration in the eyes of the good widow; but the Sub-Prior's particular and somewhat mysterious inquiries had set her brains to work on the subject of Mysie of the Mill; and she had here asked a broad question, and there she had thrown out an innuendo, and there again she had gradually led on to a conversation on the subject of poor Mysie. And from all inquiries and investigations, she had collected, that Mysie was a dark-eyed laughter-loving cherry cheeks, and a skin as white as finest bolted flour, out of which was bbot's own wastel-bread. For her temper, and laughed from morning to night; fortune, a material article, besides that iller might have amassed by means of golden thumb, Mysie was to inherit a me lump of land, with the prospect of mill-acres descending to her husband on if a fair word were spoken in season and to the Prior, and to the Sub-Prior, enstan, and so forth.

* Coleridge.

and again turning these advantages own mind, Elspeth at length came to that the only way to save her son a life of "spur, spear, and snaffle," as that of the border-riders, from the dint of shaft, or the loop of an inch-cord, was, d marry and settle, and that Mysie Happer his destined bride.

wish, Hob Miller arrived on his stronbearing on a pillion behind him the lovely cheeks like a peony-rose, (if Dame Glendinning ever seen one,) spirits all afloat with y, and a profusion of hair as black as beau-ideal which Dame Glendinning dying forth in her imagination, became realized in the buxom form of Mysie m, in the course of half an hour, she is the maiden who was to fix the restutored Halbert. True, Mysie, as the aw, was likely to love dancing round a well as managing a domestic concern, was likely to break more heads than he stacks of corn. But then a miller s be of manly make, and has been dence the days of Chaucer and James I.* able to outdo and bully the whole sucken, e use this barbarous phrase,) in all athletics, was one way to render easy the cols which men would have disputed with able champion. Then, as to the defithe miller's wife, the dame was of opiey might be supplied by the activity of mother. "I will keep house for the yself, for the tower is grown very lonely," e Glendinning, "and to live near the nair comfortable in my auld age—and may agree with his brother about the ecially as he is a favourite with the Sub-n he may live in the auld tower like his before him and wha kens but Mary blooded as she is, may e'en draw in her chimney-nook, and sit down here for —It's true she has no tocher, but the or beauty and sense ne'er crossed my ave kend every wench in the Halidome 's—ay, and their mothers that bore is a sweet and a lovely creature as d over brown hair—ay, and then, though os her out of her ain for the present to be thought the gray-goose-shaft will his coat of proof, as, God help us! it many a better man's. And, moreover, if tand on their pedigree and gentle race, I say to them, that is, to her gentle whilk o' ye was her best friend when on the gate to Glendearg in a misty beast mair like a cadger than aught they tax him with churl's blood, Edward at, for by the old proverb, how

Gentle deed
Makes gentle bleud.

yet, moreover, there comes no churl's blood from Glendinning or Brydone; for, says Edward"——

The hoarse voice of the Miller at this moment recalled the dame from her reverie, and compelled her to remember, that if she meant to realize her airy castle, she must begin by laying the foundation in civility to her guest and his daughter, whom she was at that moment most strangely neglecting, though her whole plan turned on conciliating their favour and good opinion, and that, in fact, while arranging matters for so intimate a union with her company, she was suffering them to sit unnoticed, and in their riding gear, as if about to resume their journey. "And so I say, dame," concluded the Miller, (for she had not marked the beginning of his speech,) "an ye be so busied with your housewife-skep, or aught else, why Mysie and I will trot our way down the glen again to Johnnie Broxmouth's, who pressed us right kindly to bide with him."

Starting at once from her dream of marriages and intermarriages, mills, mill-lands, and baronies, Dame Elspeth felt for a moment like the milk-maid in the fable, when she overset the pitcher, on the contents of which so many golden dreams were founded. But the foundation of Dame Glendinning's hopes was only tottering, not overthrown, and she hastened to restore is equilibrium. Instead of attempting to account for her absence of mind and want of attention to her guests, which she might have found something difficult, she assumed the offensive, like an able general when he finds it necessary, by a bold attack, to disguise his weakness.

A loud exclamation she made, and a passionate complaint she set up against the unkindness of her old friend, who could for an instant doubt the heartiness of her welcome to him and to his hopeful daughter; and then to think of his going back to John Broxmouth's, when the auld tower stood where it did, and had room in it for a friend or two in the worst of times—and he too a neighbour that his umquhile gossip Simon, blessed be his cast, used to think the best friend he had in the Halidome! And on she went, urging her complaint with so much seriousness, that she had wellnigh imposed on herself as well as upon Hob Miller, who had no mind to take any thing in dudgeon; and as it suited his plans to pass the night at Glendearg, would have been equally contented to do so even had his reception been less vehemently hospitable.

To all Elspeth's expostulations on the unkindness of his proposal to leave her dwelling, he answered composedly. "Nay, dame, what could I tell? ye might have had other grist to grind, for ye looked as if ye scarce saw us or what know I? ye might bear in mind the words Martin and I had about the last barley ye sawed—for I ken dry multures† will sometimes stick in the throat. A man seeks but his awn, and yet folk shall hold him for both miller and miller's man, that is miller and knave,‡ all the country over."

"Alas, that you will say so, neighbour Hob," said Dame Elspeth, "or that Martin should have had any words with you about the mill-dues! I will chide him roundly for it, I promise you, on the faith of a true widow. You know full well that a lone woman is sore put upon by her servants."

"Nay, dame," said the Miller, unbuckling the broad belt which made fast his cloak, and served, at the same time, to suspend by his side a swingeing Andrew Ferrara, "bear no grudge at Martin, for I bear none—I take it on me as a thing of mine office, to maintain my right of multure, lock, and goupen.§ And reason good, for, as the old song says,

I live by my mill, God bless her,
She's parent, child, and wife

* [illegible] have chosen for a motto, is from a poem in [illegible] of Scotland. As for the Miller who figures [illegible] pictures, [illegible] sacred and [illegible], attributes, all of which [illegible], especially the last, [illegible] more on the strength of the outside than [illegible] of his [illegible].

er was a stout carl for the nones,
he was of brawn, and eke of bones;
ved well, for wheresoe'er he cam,
ing he wold bere away the ram;
short shoulder'd, brood, a thick gnarr;
as no door that he n'olde heave of bar,
at at a running with his head, &c.

† Dry multures were a fine, or compensation in money, for not grinding at the mill of the thirl. It was, and is, accounted a very vexatious exaction.

‡ The miller's lad is in the language of thirlage called the knave, which, indeed, signified originally his lad, (Knabe—German,) but by degrees came to be taken in a worse sense. In the old translations of the Bible, Paul is made to term himself the knave of our Saviour. The allowance of meal taken by the miller's servant was called knave-ship.

§ The multure was the regular exaction for grinding the meal. The lock, signifying a small quantity, and the goupen, a handful

The poor old slat. I am beholden to her for my living, and bound to stand by her, as I say to my mill-knaves, in right and in wrong. And so should every honest fellow stand by his bread-winner. And so, Mysie, ye may doff your cloak since our neighbour is so kindly glad to see us—why, I think, we are as likely to see here not one in the Halidome pays their multures more duly, sequels, arriage, and carriage, and mill-services, used and wont."

With that the Miller hung his ample cloak without further ceremony upon a huge pair of stag's antlers, which adorned at once the naked walls of the tower, and served for what we vulgarly call cloak-pins.

In the mean time Dame Elspeth assisted to disembarrass the damsel whom she destined for her future daughter-in-law, of her hood, mantle, and the rest of her riding gear, giving her to appear as beseemed the buxom daughter of the wealthy Miller, gay and goodly in a white kirtle, the seams of which were embroidered with green silken lace or fringe, entwined with some silver thread. An anxious glance did Elspeth cast upon the good-humoured face, which was now more fully shown to her, and was only obscured by a quantity of raven black hair, which the maid of the mill had restrained by a snood of green silk, embroidered with silver, corresponding to the trimmings of her kirtle. The countenance itself was exceedingly comely the eyes black, large, and roguishly good-humoured the mouth was small—the lips well formed, though somewhat full the teeth were pearly white—and the chin had a very seducing dimple in it. The form belonging to this joyous face was full and round, and firm and fair. It might become coarse and masculine some years hence, which is the common fault of Scottish beauty; but in Mysie's sixteenth year she had the shape of an Hebe. The anxious Elspeth, with all her maternal partiality, could not help admitting within herself, that a better man than Halbert might go farther and fare worse. She looked a little gaddy, and Halbert was not nineteen; still it was time he should be settled, for to that point the dame always returned; and here was an excellent opportunity.

The simple cunning of Dame Elspeth now exhausted itself in commendations of her fair guest, from the snood, as they say, to the single-soled shoe. Mysie listened and blushed with pleasure for the first five minutes; but ere ten had elapsed, she began to view the old lady's compliments rather as subjects of mirth than of vanity, and was much more disposed to laugh at than to be flattered with them, for Nature had mingled the good-humour with which she had endowed the damsel with no small portion of shrewdness. Even Hob himself began to tire of hearing his daughter's praises, and broke in with, "Ay, ay, she is a clever quean enough; and, were she five years older, she shall lay a loaded sack on an *aver with e'er a lass in the Halidome. But I have been looking for your two sons, dame. Men say downby, that Halbert's turned a wild springald, and that we may have word of him from Westmoreland one moonlight night or another."

"God forbid, my good neighbour; God, in his mercy, forbid!" said Dame Glendinning earnestly; for it was touching the very key-note of her apprehensions, to hint any probability that Halbert might become one of the marauders so common in the age and country. But, fearful of having betrayed too much alarm on the subject, she immediately added, "That though, since the last rout at Pinkie-cleuch, she had been all of a tremble when a gun or a spear was named, or when men spoke of fighting; yet, thanks to God and Our Lady, her sons were like to live and die honest and peaceful tenants to the Abbey, as their father might have done, but for that awful hosting which he went forth to, with mony a brave man that never returned."

"Ye need not tell me of it, dame," said the Miller, "since I was there myself, and made two pair of legs (and these were not mine, but my mare's) worth one pair of hands. I judged how it would be, when I saw our host break ranks, with rushing on through that broken ploughed field, and so as they had made a pricker of me, I e'en pricked off with myself while the play was good."

"Ay, ay, neighbour," said the dame, "ye were aye a wise and a wary man; if my Simon had had your wit, he might have been here to speak about it this day: but he was aye cracking of his good blood and his high kindred, and less would not serve him than to bide the hang to the last, with the earls and knights, and squires, that had no wives to greet for them, or else had wives that cared not how soon they were widows; but that is not for the like of us. But touching my son Halbert, there is no fear of him; for if it should be his misfortune to be in the like case, he has the best pair of heels in the Halidome, and could run almost as fast as your mare herself."

"Is this he, neighbour?" quoth the Miller.

"No," replied the mother; "that is my youngest son, Edward, who can read and write like the Lord Abbot himself, if it were not a sin to say so."

"Ay," said the Miller; "and is that the young clerk the Sub-Prior thinks so much of? they say he will come far ben that lad; wha kens but he may come to be Sub-Prior himself?—as broken a ship has come to land."

"To be a Prior, neighbour Miller," said Edward, "A man must first be a priest, and for that I judge I have little vocation."

"He will take to the plough-pettle, neighbour," said the good dame; "and so will Halbert too, I trust. I wish you saw Halbert.—Edward, where is your brother?"

"Hunting, I think," replied Edward; "at least he left us this morning to join the Laird of Colmslie and his hounds. I have heard them baying in the glen all day."

"And if I had heard that music," said the Miller, "it would have done my heart good, ay, and maybe taken me two or three miles out of my road. When I was the Miller of Morebattle's knave, I have followed the hounds from Eckford to the foot of Hounam-law—followed them on foot, Dame Glendinning, ay, and led the chase when the Laird of Cessford and his gay riders were all thrown out by the mosses and gills. I brought the stag on my back to Hounam Cross, when the dogs had pulled him down. I think I see the old gray knight, as he sate so upright on his strong war-horse, all white with foam; and 'Miller,' said he to me, 'an thou wilt turn thy back on the mill, and wend with me, I will make a man of thee.' But I chose rather to abide by clap and hopper, and the better luck was mine; for the proud Percy caused hang five of the Laird's henchmen at Alnwick for burning a rickle of houses some gate beyond Fowberry, and it might have been my luck as well as another man's."

"Ah, neighbour, neighbour," said Dame Glendinning, "you were aye wise and wary; but if you like hunting, I must say Halbert's the lad to please you. He hath all those fair holiday-terms of hawk and hound as ready in his mouth as Tom with the tod's-tail, that is the Lord Abbot's ranger."

"Ranger he not homeward at dinner-time, dame," demanded the Miller; "for we call noon the dinner-hour at Kennaquhair?"

The widow was forced to admit, that, even at this important period of the day, Halbert was frequently absent; at which the Miller shook his head, intimating, at the same time, some allusion to the proverb of MacFarlane's geese, which "liked their play better than their meat."†

That the delay of dinner might not increase the

were additional perquisites demanded by the miller, and submitted to or resisted by the Stickler as circumstances permitted. These and other petty dues were called in general the Sequels.

* Aver—Properly a horse of labour.

† A brood of wild geese, which long frequented one of the uppermost islands in Loch-Lomond, called Inch-Tavoe, was supposed to have some mysterious connexion with the ancient family of MacFarlane of that ilk, and it is said never seen after the ruin and extinction of that house. The MacFarlanes had a house and garden upon that same island of Inch-Tavoe. Here James VI. was, on one occasion, regaled by the chieftain. His majesty had been previously much amused by the great pains taken by each other on the Loch. But, when one which was brought to table, was found to be tough and ill fed, James observed—"that MacFarlane's geese liked their play better than their meat," a proverb which has been current ever since.

sposition to prejudge Halbert, Dame Glenlled hastily on Mary Avenel to take the task
ning Mysie Happer, while she herself rushed hen, and entering at once into the province
'acket, rummaged among trenchers and tched pots from the fire, and placed pans ons on it, accompanying her own feats of ctivity with such a continued list of injuncbb, that Tibb at length lost patience, and e was as muckle wark about meating an
, as if they had been to banquet the blood
But this, as it was supposed to be spoken
ie Glendinning did not think it convenient

CHAPTER XIV.

me have the friends who eat my victuals,
ts as my dishes — The feast's nought
e more plain pe dominates. John Plaintext, he mighty Lord, our English simple;
Sly Alderman, a butter'd dumpling;
ot whisker'd Cornets, ruff- and ress,
ond the Dandy, a green goose in sippets.
e board is cleared at once and bill
ame principle - Variety —New Play

at brave lass is this?" said Hob Miller, as nel entered the apartment to supply the Dame Elspeth Glendinning.
oung Lady of Avenel, father," said the
he Mill, dropping as low a curtsy as her ners enabled her to make. The Miller, doffed his bonnet, and made his reverence,
ther so low perhaps as if the young lady
red in the pride of rank and riches, yet so e high birth the due homage which the r a length of time scrupulously rendered

from having had her mother's example
for so many years, and from a native sense
y and even of dignity, Mary Avenel had a demeanour which marked her title to ion, and effectually checked any attempt at
on the part of those who might be her in her present situation, but could not be d her equals. She was by nature mild,
d contemplative, gentle in disposition, and able when accidentally offended; but still
f a retired and reserved habit, and shunned
ordinary sports, even when the rare occur-fair or wake gave her an opportunity of with companions of her own age. If at s she was seen for an instant, she appeared them with the composed indifference of one heir gayety was a matter of no interest, and ed only desirous to glide away from the oon as she possibly could.
ng also had transpired concerning her n on All-hallow Eve, and the powers with t circumstance was supposed to invest her visible world. And from all these particu-ined, the young men and women of the used to distinguish Mary among them-
the name of the Spirit of Avenel, as if the agile form, the beautiful but rather colour-
, the dark blue eye, and the shady hair, had ather to the immaterial than the substantial he general tradition of the White Lady, who osed to wait on the fortunes of the family of ve a sort of zest to this piece of rural wit.
reat offence, however, to the two sons of endinning; and when the expression was esence applied to the young lady, Edward to check the petulance of those who used gth of argument, and Halbert by strength
In such cases Halbert had this advantage,
ugh he could render no aid to his brother's
, yet when circumstances required it, he was ve that of Edward, who never indeed hin-nenced a fray, but, on the other hand, did any reluctance to enter into combat in behalf, or in his rescue.
; zealous attachment of the two youths,
nselves, from the retired situation in which
, comparative strangers in the Halidome,
II.

did not serve in any degree to alter the feelings of the inhabitants towards the young lady, who seemed to have dropped amongst them from another sphere of life. Still, however, she was regarded with respect, if not with fondness; and the attention of the Sub-Prior to the family, not to mention the formidable name of Julian Avenel, which every new incident of those tumultuous times tended to render more famous, attached to his niece a certain importance. Thus some aspired to her acquaintance out of pride, while the more timid of the friars were anxious to inculcate upon their children, the necessity of being respectful to the noble orphan. So that Mary Avenel, little loved because little known, was regarded with a mysterious awe, partly derived from fear of her uncle's mosstroopers, and partly from her own retired and distant habits, enhanced by the superstitious opinions of the time and country.

It was not without some portion of this awe, that Mysie felt herself left alone in company with a young person so distant in rank, and so different in bearing, from herself; for her worthy father had taken the first opportunity to step out unobserved, in order to mark how the barn-yard was filled, and what prospect it afforded of grist to the mill. In youth, however, there is a sort of free-masonry, which, without much conversation, teaches young persons to estimate each other's character, and places them at ease on the shortest acquaintance. It is only when taught deceit by the commerce of the world, that we learn to shroud our character from observation, and to disguise our real sentiments from those with whom we are placed in communion.

Accordingly, the two young women were soon engaged in such objects of interest as best became their age. They visited Mary Avenel's pigeons, which she nursed with the tenderness of a mother; they turned over her slender stores of finery, which yet contained some articles that excited the respect of her companion, though Mysie was too good-humoured to nourish envy. A golden rosary, and some female ornaments marking superior rank, had been rescued in the moment of their utmost adversity, more by Tibb Tacket's presence of mind, than by the care of their owner, who was at that sad period too much sunk in grief to pay any attention to such circumstances. They struck Mysie with a deep impression of veneration; for, excepting what the Lord Abbot and the convent might possess, she did not believe there was so much real gold in the world as was exhibited in these few trinkets, and Mary, however sage and serious, was not above being pleased with the admiration of her rustic companion.

Nothing, indeed, could exhibit a stronger contrast than the appearance of the two girls;—the good-humoured laughter-loving countenance of the Maid of the Mill, who stood gazing with unrepressed astonishment on whatever was in her inexperienced eye rare and costly, and with an humble, and at the same time cheerful acquiescence in her inferiority, asking all the little queries about the use and value of the ornaments, while Mary Avenel, with her quiet composed dignity and placidity of manner, produced them one after another for the amusement of her companion.

As they became gradually more familiar, Mysie of the Mill was just venturing to ask, why Mary Avenel never appeared at the May-pole, and to express her wonder when the young lady said she disliked dancing, when a trampling of horses at the gate of the tower interrupted their conversation.

Mysie flew to the shot-window in the full ardour of unrestrained female curiosity. "Saint Mary! sweet lady! here come two well-mounted gallants; will you step this way to look at them?"

"No," said Mary Avenel, "you shall tell me who they are."

"Well, if you like it better," said Mysie—"but how shall I know them?—Stay, I do know one of them, and so do you, lady; he is a blithe man somewhat light of hand they say, but the gallants of these days think no great harm of that. He is your uncle's henchman, that they call Christie of the Clinthill; and he has not his old green jerkin and the rusty black-jack over it, but a scarlet cloak, laid down with silver lace three inches broad, and a breastplate you might see to dress your hair in, as well as in that keeking glass in the ivory frame that you showed me even now. Come, dear lady, come to the shot-window and see him."

"If it be the man you mean, Mysie," replied the orphan of Avenel, "I shall see him soon enough, considering either the pleasure or comfort the sight will give me."

"Nay, but if you will not come to see gay Christie," replied the Maid of the Mill, her face flushed with eager curiosity, "come and tell me who the gallant is that is with him, the handsomest, the very lovesomest young man I ever saw with sight."

"It is my foster-brother, Halbert Glendinning," said Mary, with apparent indifference; for she had been accustomed to call the sons of Elspeth her foster-brethren, and to live with them as if they had been her brothers in earnest.

"Nay, by Our Lady, that it is not," said Mysie; "I know the favour of both the Glendinnings well, and I think this rider be not of our country. He has a crimson velvet bonnet, and long brown hair falling down under it, and a beard on his upper lip, and his chin clean and close shaved, save a small patch on the point of it, and a sky-blue jerkin, slashed and lined with white satin, and trunk-hose to suit, and no weapon but a rapier and dagger: Well, if I was a man, I would never wear weapon but the rapier! it is so slender and becoming, instead of having a cart-load of iron at my back, like my father's broadsword, with its great rusty basket-hilt. Do you not delight in the rapier and poniard, lady?"

"The best sword," answered Mary, "if I must needs answer a question of the sort, is that which is drawn in the best cause, and which is best used when it is out of the scabbard."

"But can you not guess who this stranger should be?" said Mysie.

"Indeed, I cannot even attempt it; but to judge by his companion, it is no matter how little he is known," replied Mary.

"My bonnie on his bonny face," said Mysie, "if he is not going to alight here! Now, I am as much pleased as if my father had given me the silver earrings he has promised me so often; nay, you had as well come to the window, for you must see him by and by, whether you will or not."

I do not know how much sooner Mary Avenel might have sought the point of observation, if she had not been scared from it by the unrestrained curiosity expressed by her buxom friend; but at length the same feeling prevailed over her sense of dignity, and satisfied with having displayed all the indifference that was necessary in point of decorum, she no longer thought herself bound to restrain her curiosity.

From the out-shot or projecting window she could perceive that Christie of the Clinthill was attended on the present occasion by a very gay and gallant cavalier, who, from the nobleness of his appearance and manner, his rich and handsome dress, and the showy appearance of his horse and furniture, must, she agreed with her new friend, be a person of some consequence.

Christie also seemed conscious of something which made him call out with more than his usual insolence of manner, "What, ho! so ho! the house! Carl peasants, will no one answer when I call?—Ho! Martin,—Tibb,—Dame Glendinning! a curran on you, must we stand keeping our horses in the cold here, and they steaming with heat, when we have ridden so sharply?"

At length he was obeyed, and old Martin made his appearance. "Ha!" said Christie, "art thou there, old Truepenny? here, stable me these steeds, and see them well bedded, and stretch thine old limbs by rubbing them down; and see thou quit not the stable till there is not a turned hair on either of them."

Martin took the horses to the stable as commanded, but suppressed not his indignation a moment after he could vent it with safety. "Would not any one think," he said to Jasper, an old ploughman, who, in coming to his assistance, had heard Christie's imperious injunctions, "[redacted]n Christie of the Clinthill, was laird o[redacted] of him? No such thing, man! I remem[redacted] a little dirty turnspit boy in the house of Avenel, that every body in a frosty morning like this warmed his fingers by kicking or cuffling! and now he is a gentleman, and swears, d—n him and renounce him, as if the gentlemen could not so much as keep their own wickedness to themselves, without the like of him going to hell in their very company, and by the same road. I have as much a mind as ever I had to my dinner, to go back and tell him to sort his horse himself, since he is as able as I am."

"Hout tout, man!" answered Jasper, "keep a calm sough; better to fleech a fool than fight with him."

Martin acknowledged the truth of the proverb, and, much comforted therewith, betook himself to cleaning the stranger's horse with great assiduity, remarking, it was a pleasure to handle a handsome nag, and turned over the other to the charge of Jasper. Nor was it until Christie's commands were literally complied with, that he deemed it proper, after fitting ablutions, to join the party in the spence; not for the purpose of waiting upon them, as a mere modern reader might possibly expect, but that he might have his share of dinner in their company.

In the meanwhile Christie had presented his companion to Dame Glendinning as Sir Piercie Shafton, a friend of his and of his master, come to spend three or four days with little din in the tower. The good dame could not conceive how she was entitled to such an honour, and would fain have pleaded her want of every sort of convenience to entertain a guest of that quality. But, indeed, the visiter, when he cast his eyes round the bare walls, eyed the huge black chimney, scrutinized the meagre and broken furniture of the apartment, and beheld the embarrassment of the mistress of the family, intimated great reluctance to intrude upon Dame Glendinning a visit, which could scarce, from all appearances, prove otherwise than an inconvenience to her, and a penance to himself.

But the reluctant hostess and her guest had to do with an inexorable man, who silenced all expostulation with, "such was his master's pleasure. And, moreover," he continued, "though the Baron of Avenel's will must, and ought to prove law to all within ten miles around him, yet here dame," he said, "is a letter from your petticoated baron, the lord-priest yonder, who enjoins you, as you regard his pleasure, that you afford to this good knight such decent accommodation as is in your power, suffering him to live as privately as he shall desire.—And for you, Sir Piercie Shafton," continued Christie, "you will judge for yourself, whether secrecy and safety is not more your object even now, than soft beds and high cheer. And do not judge of the dame's goods by the semblance of her cottage; for you will see by the dinner she is about to spread for us, that the vassal of the kirk is seldom found with her basket bare." To Mary Avenel Christie presented the stranger, after the best fashion he could, as to the niece of his master the Baron.

While he thus laboured to reconcile Sir Piercie Shafton to his fate, the widow having consulted her son Edward on the real import of the Lord Abbot's injunction, and having found that Christie had given a true exposition, saw nothing else left for her but to make that fate as easy as she could to the stranger. He himself also seemed reconciled to his lot by some feeling, probably of strong necessity, and accepted with a good grace the hospitality which the dame offered with a very indifferent one.

In fact, the dinner, which soon smoked before the assembled guests, was of that substantial kind which warrants plenty and comfort. Dame Glendinning had cooked it after her best manner; and delighted with the handsome appearance which her good cheer made when placed on the table, forgot both her plans and the vexations which interrupted them, in the hospitable duty of pressing her assembled visiters to eat and drink, watching every trencher as it waxed empty, and loading it with fresh supplies ere the guest could utter a negative.

[redacted]any attentively re-
[redacted]d seemed endeavour-[redacted]each other's character.
e Shafton condescended to speak to no one
ry Avenel, and on her he conferred exactly familiar and compassionate, though some-nful sort of attention, which a pretty fellow
ays will sometimes condescend to bestow
'ry miss, when there is no prettier or more e woman present. The manner indeed was or the etiquette of those times did not perercie Shafton to pick his teeth, or to yawn, ble like the beggar whose tongue (as he cut out by the Turks, or to affect deafness
ss, or any other infirmity of the organs,
h the embroidery of his conversation was the groundwork was the same, and the l and ornate compliments with which the ight of the sixteenth century interlarded his
on, were as much the offspring of egotism onceit, as the jargon of the coxcombs of ays.
nglish knight was, however, something
t finding that Mary Avenel listened with ndifference, and answered with wonderful
all the fine things which ought, as he con-have dazzled her with their brilliancy, and r by their obscurity. But if he was disapmaking the desired, or rather the expected
, upon her whom he addressed, Sir Piercie discourse was marvellous in the ears of Miller's daughter, and not the less so that comprehend the meaning of a single word uttered. Indeed, the gallant knight's lan-
s far too courtly to be understood by persons greater acuteness than Mysie's.
bout this period, that the "only rare poet
e, the witty, comical, facetiously-quick, and cetious John Lyly—he that sate at Apoland to whom Phœbus gave a wreath of bays without snatching"*—he, in short,
e that singularly uneconomical work, called and his Euphuel, was in the very zenith urdity and reputation. The quaint, forced, ttural style which he introduced by his y of Wit," had a fashion as rapid as it was
y—all the court ladies were his scholars,
ter Euphuisme, was as necessary a quali-
a courtly gallant, as those of understand-
o use his rapier, or to dance a measure.
no wonder that the Maid of the Mill was fectually blinded by the intricacies of this d courtly style of conversation, as she had
by the dust of her father's own mealsacks.
she sate with her mouth and eyes as open ill-door and the two windows, showing hite as her father's bolted flour, and endea-secure a word or two for her own future
the pearls of rhetoric which Sir Piercie
cattered around him with such bounteous

male part of the company, Edward felt
of his own manner and slowness of speech,
observed the handsome young courtier,
ise and volubility of which he had no con-
m over all the commonplace topics of highantry. It is true, the good sense and natu-
of young Glendinning soon mastered him gallant cavalier was speaking more use-
where is the man of greatest merit, and
, who has not suffered from being outstripped
cation, and outstripped in the race of life, less reserve, and of qualities more showy,
substantial? and with constituted pust
e, that can see the prize without envy
itors more worthy than himself.
Glendinning had no such philosophy,
despised the jargon of the gay cavalier, he facility with which he could run on, as

d yet more extravagant are the compliments paid to
by his editor Blount. Notwithstanding all exagge was really a man of wit and imagination, though eformed by the most unnatural affectation that ever printed page.

well as the courtly grace of his tone and expression, and the perfect ease and elegance with which he offered all the little acts of politeness to which the duties of the table gave opportunity. And if I am to speak truth, I must own that he envied those qualities the more, as they were all exercised in Mary Avenel's service, and, although only so far accepted as they could not be refused, intimated a wish on the stranger's part to place himself in her good graces, as the only person in the room to whom he thought it worth while to recommend himself. His title, rank, and very handsome figure, together with some sparks of wit and spirit which flashed across the cloud of nonsense which he uttered, rendered him, as the words of the old song say, "a lad for a lady's viewing;" so that poor Edward, with all his real worth and acquired knowledge, in his home-spun doublet, blue cap, and deer-skin trowsers, looked like a clown beside the courtier, and, feeling the full inferiority, nourished no good will to him by whom he was eclipsed.

Christie, on the other hand, so soon as he had satisfied to the full a commodious appetite, by means of which persons of his profession could, like the wolf and eagle, gorge themselves with as much food at one meal as might serve them for several days, began also to feel himself more in the back-ground than he liked to be. This worthy had, amongst his other good qualities, an excellent opinion of himself; and, being of a bold and forward disposition, had no mind to be thrown into the shade by any one. With that impudent familiarity which such persons mistake for graceful ease, he broke in upon the knight's finest speeches with as little remorse as he would have driven the point of his lance through a laced doublet.

Sir Piercie Shafton, a man of rank and high birth, by no means encouraged or endured this familiarity, and requited the intruder either with total neglect, or such laconic replies, as intimated a sovereign contempt for the rude spearman, who affected to converse with him upon terms of equality.

The Miller held his peace; for, as his usual conversation turned chiefly on his clapper and toll-dish, he had no mind to brag of his wealth in presence of Christie of the Clinthill, or to intrude his discourse on the English cavalier.

A little specimen of the conversation may not be out of place, were it but to show young ladies what fine things they have lost by living when Euphuism is out of fashion.

"Credit me, fairest lady," said the knight, "that such is the cunning of our English courtiers of the hodiernal strain, that, as they have infinitely refined upon the plain and rusticial discourse of our fathers, which, as I may say, more beseemed the mouths of country roisterers in a May-game than that of courtly gallants in a galliard, so I hold it ineffably and unutterably impossible, that those who may succeed us in that garden of wit and courtesy shall alter or amend it. Venus delighteth but in the language of Mercury Bucephalus will stoop to no one but Alexander, none can sound Apollo's pipe but Orpheus."

"Valiant sir," said Mary, who could scarce help laughing, "we have but to rejoice in the chance which hath honoured this solitude with a glimpse of the sun of courtesy, though it rather blinds than enlightens us."

"Pretty and quaint, fairest lady," answered the Euphuist. "Ah, that I had with me my Anatomy of Wit—that all-to-be-unparalleled volume—that quintessence of human wit—that treasury of quaint invention—that exquisitely-pleasant-to-read, and inevitably necessary-to-be-remembered manual of all that is worthy to be known—which indoctrines the rude in civility, the dull in intellectuality, the heavy in jocosity, the blunt in gentility, the vulgar in nobility, and all of them in that unutterable perfection of human utterance, that eloquence which no other eloquence is sufficient to praise, that art which, when we call it by its own name of Euphuism, we bestow on it its richest panegyric."

"By Saint Mary," said Christie of the Clinthill, "if your worship had told me that you had left such stores of wealth as you talk of at Prudhoe Castle, Long Dickie and I would have had them off with us

rs of the southland hills; but, thus con-
length reply, "Hout ay, mistress, I'se ve heard you say something like that."
" said Halbert, in a firm and command-
oice, "what or whom is it that you fear
her's roof?—I well hope that it harbours
n whose presence you are afraid to say e to me or my brother? I am sorry I tained so late, being ignorant of the fair
ich I should encounter on my return.—
t this excuse suffice: and what satisfies rust, be nothing less than acceptable to calculated so justly betwixt the submis-is parent, and the natural feeling of dig-

ho was by birth master of the mansion, rsal satisfaction. And as Elspeth hurd to Tibb on the same evening, "She s it had been in the callant. Till that k pets and passions if he was spoke to,
gh the house like a four-year-auld at the advice that was minted at him, but now grave and as douce as the Lord Abbot kendrina," she said, "what might be the
but it was like he was a wonderfu' cal-
w."

then separated, the young men retiring
ments, the elder to their household cares.
ie went to see his horse properly accom-lward: he took himself to his book, and o was as ingenious in employing his had latterly appeared imperfect in men-applied himself to constructing a place
ent in the floor of his apartment by raishem on which he resolved to deposit that oly Scriptures which had been so strange-rous the possession of men and spirits.
nwhile, Sir Piercie Shafton sate still as he circle in which he had deposited himds folded on his breast, his legs stretched
before him and resting upon the heels,
t up to the ceiling as if he had meant to mesh of every cobweb with which the
was canopied, wearing at the same time solemn and imperturbable gravity, as if e had depended on the accuracy of his scarce he roused from his listless state of

ve absorption so as to take some supper,
hich the younger females appeared not stared around twice or thrice as if he ething; but he asked not for them, and l his sense of a proper audience being his abstraction and absence of mind,
iking until he was twice addressed, and
g, without trope or figure, in that plain ich nobody could speak better when he

inding himself in undisturbed possession
ersation, indulged all who chose to listen
of his own wild and inglorious warfare,
e Elspeth's curch bristled with horror,
acket rejoiced to find herself once more
any of a jack-man, listened to his tales,
nona to Othello's, with undisguised dentime the two young Glendinnings were ed up in their own reflections, and only
m them by the signal to move bedward.

CHAPTER XV.

no coin 'tis true, but coins new phrases,
them forth as knaves vend gilded counters,
se men scorn, and fools accept in payment.
Old Play.

orning Christie of the Clinthill was noe seen. As this worthy personage did e himself on sounding a trumpet before nts, no one was surprised at his moon-ure, though some alarm was excited lest made it empty-handed. So, in the lane national ballad,

e ran to cupboard, and some to kist,
nought was gone that could be mist.

All was in order, the key of the stable left above the door, and that of the iron grate in the inside of the lock. In short, the retreat had been made with scrupulous attention to the security of the garrison, and so far Christie left them nothing to complain of.

The safety of the premises was ascertained by Halbert, who, instead of catching up a gun or a crossbow, and sallying out for the day as had been his frequent custom, now, with a gravity beyond his years, took a survey of all around the tower, and then returned to the spence, or public apartment, in which, at the early hour of seven, the morning meal was prepared.

There he found the Euphuist, in the same elegant posture of abstruse calculation which he had exhibited on the preceding evening, his arms folded in the same angle, his eyes turned up to the same cobwebs, and his heels resting on the ground as before. Tired of this affectation of indolent importance, and not much flattered with his guest's persevering in it to the last, Halbert resolved at once to break the ice, being determined to know what circumstances had brought to the Tower of Glendinning a guest at once so supercilious and so silent.

"Sir Knight," he said, with some firmness, "I have twice given you good morning, to which the absence of your mind hath, I presume, prevented you from yielding attention, or from making return. This exchange of courtesy is at your pleasure to give or withhold. But, as what I have farther to say concerns your comfort and your motions in an especial manner, I will entreat you to give me some signs of attention, that I may be sure I am not wasting my words on a monumental image."

At this unexpected address, Sir Piercie Shafton opened his eyes, and afforded the speaker a broad stare; but, as Halbert returned the glance without either confusion or dismay, the knight thought proper to change his posture, draw in his legs, raise his eyes, fix them on young Glendinning, and assume the appearance of one who listens to what is said to him. Nay, to make his purpose more evident, he gave voice to his resolution in these words, "Speak! we do hear."

"Sir Knight," said the youth, "It is the custom of this Halidome, or patrimony of St. Mary's, to trouble with inquiries no guests who receive our hospitality, providing they tarry in our house only for a single revolution of the sun. We know that both criminals and debtors come hither for sanctuary, and we scorn to extort from the pilgrim, whom chance may make our guest, an avowal of the cause of his pilgrimage and penance. But when one so high above our rank as yourself, Sir Knight, and especially one to whom the possession of such pre-eminence is not indifferent, shows his determination to be our guest for a longer time, it is our usage to inquire of him whence he comes, and what is the cause of his journey?"

The English knight gaped twice or thrice before he answered, and then replied in a bantering tone, "Truly, good villagio, your question hath in it somewhat of embarrassment, for you ask me of things concerning which I am not as yet altogether determined what answer I may find it convenient to make. Let it suffice thee, kind juvenal, that thou hast the Lord Abbot's authority for treating me to the best of that power of thine, which, indeed, may not always so well suffice for my accommodation as either of us would desire."

"I must have a more precise answer than this, Sir Knight," said the young Glendinning.

"Friend," said the knight, "be not outrageous. It may suit your northern manners thus to press harshly upon the secrets of thy betters; but believe me, that even as the lute struck by an unskilful hand, doth produce discords, so"——At this moment the door of the apartment opened, and Mary Avenel presented herself—"But who can talk of discords," said the knight, assuming his complimentary vein and humour, "when the soul of harmony descends upon us in the presence of surpassing beauty! For even as foxes, wolves, and other animals void of sense and reason, do fly from the presence of the resplendent sun of heaven when he arises in his glory, so do strife, wrath, and all ireful passions retreat, and, as it were, scud away, from the face which now beams upon us, with power to compose our angry passions, illuminate our errors and difficulties, soothe our wounded minds, and lull to rest our disorderly apprehensions; for as the heat and warmth of the eye of the day is to the material and physical world, so is the eye which I now bow down before to that of the intellectual microcosm."

He concluded with a profound bow; and Mary Avenel, gazing from one to the other, and plainly seeing that something was amiss, could only say, "For heaven's sake, what is the meaning of this?"

The newly-acquired tact and intelligence of her foster-brother was as yet insufficient to enable him to give an answer. He was quite uncertain how he ought to deal with a guest, who, preserving a singularly high tone of assumed superiority and importance, seemed nevertheless so little serious in what he said, that it was quite impossible to discern with accuracy whether he was in jest or earnest.

Forming, however, the internal resolution to bring Sir Piercie Shafton to a reckoning at a more fit place and season, he resolved to prosecute the matter no farther at present; and the entrance of his mother with the damsel of the Mill, and the return of the honest Miller from the stack-yard, where he had been numbering and calculating the probable amount of the season's grist, rendered farther discussion impossible for the moment.

In the course of the calculation, it could not but strike the man of meal and grindstones, that, after the church's dues were paid, and after all which he himself could by any means deduct from the crop, still the residue which must revert to Dame Glendinning could not be less than considerable. I wot not if this led the honest Miller to nourish any plans similar to those adopted by Elspeth; but it is certain that he accepted with grateful alacrity an invitation which the dame gave to his daughter, to remain a week or two as her guest at Glendearg.

The principal persons being thus in high good-humour with each other, all business gave place to the hilarity of the morning repast; and so much did Sir Piercie appear gratified by the attention which was paid to every word that he uttered by the nut-brown Mysie, that, notwithstanding his high birth and distinguished quality, he bestowed on her some of the more ordinary and second rate tropes of his elocution.

Mary Avenel, when relieved from the awkwardness of feeling the full weight of his conversation addressed to herself, enjoyed it much more; and the good knight, encouraged by those conciliating marks of approbation from the sex, for whose sake he cultivated his oratorical talents, made speedy intimation of his purpose to be more communicative than he had shown himself in his conversation with Halbert Glendinning, and gave them to understand, that it was in consequence of some pressing danger that he was at present their involuntary guest.

The conclusion of the breakfast was a signal for the separation of the company. The Miller went to prepare for his departure; his daughter to arrange matters for her unexpected stay; Edward was summoned to consultation by Martin concerning some agricultural matter, in which Halbert could not be brought to interest himself; the dame left the room upon her household concerns, and Mary was in the act of following her, when she suddenly recollected that if she did so, the strange knight and Halbert must be left alone together, at the risk of another quarrel.

The maiden no sooner observed this circumstance, than she instantly returned from the door of the apartment, and, seating herself in a small stone window-seat, resolved to maintain that curb which she was sensible her presence imposed on Halbert Glendinning, of whose quick temper she had some apprehensions.

The stranger marked her motions, and, either interpreting them as inviting his society, or obedient to those laws of gallantry which permitted him not to leave a lady in silence and solitude, he instantly placed himself near to her side, and open versation as follows:—

"Credit me, fair lady," he said, addre Avenel, "it much rejoiceth me, being, banished man from the delights of mine o that I shall find here, in this obscure and tage of the north, a fair form and a candic whom I may explain my mutual sentim let me pray you in particular, lovely lad cording to the universal custom now pred our court, the garden of superior wits, change with me some epithet whereby mark my devotion to your service. Be he named, for example, my Protection, and your Affability."

"Our northern and country manners, do not permit us to exchange epithets to whom we are strangers," replied Mary

"Nay, but see now," said the knight, are startled! even as the unbroken st swerves aside from the shaking of a hs though he must in time encounter the a pennon. This courtly exchange of epit nour, is no more than the compliments between valour and beauty, wherever the under whatever circumstances. Elizabe land herself calls Philip Sydney her Cour in return calls that princess his Inspiratic fore, my fair Protection, for by such epit be mine to denominate you"——

"Not without the young lady's consen terrupted Halbert; "most truly do I hope and quaint breeding will not so far prev more ordinary rules of civil behaviour."

"Fair tenant of an indifferent copyhc the knight, with the same coolness an mien, but in a tone somewhat more lo used to the young lady, "we do not, in t parts, much intermingle discourse, save with whom we may stand on some footing and I must, in all discretion, remind yc necessity which makes us inhabitants cabin, doth not place us otherwise on t each other."

"By Saint Mary," replied young Glen is my thought that it does; for plain me he who asks the shelter is indebted to hi it; and so far, therefore, is our rank equ this roof covers us both."

"Thou art altogether deceived," an Piercie; "and that thou mayst fully ada our relative condition, know that I accoun thy guest, but that of thy master, the Lo St. Mary's, who, for reasons best know and me, chooseth to administer his hosp through the means of thee, his servant who art, therefore, in good truth, as passiv ment of my accommodation as this il rugged joint-stool on which I sit, or as trencher from which I eat my coarse Wherefore," he added, turning to Mary, " tress, or rather, as I said before, most tection"*——

Mary Avenel was about to reply to hir stern, fierce, and resentful expression o countenance with which Halbert exclai from the King of Scotland, did he live, wc such terms!" induced her to throw here

* There are many instances to be met with dramas of this whimsical and conceited custom o formed an intimacy, distinguishing each other b epithet. In Every Man out of his Humour, there debate upon names most fit to bind the relation ardo and Cavaliero Shift, which ends by adop Countenance and Resolution. What is more to the speech of Hedon, a voluptuary and a courtie Revels. "You know that I call Madam Philantia and she calls me her AMBITION. Now, when I m presence, anon, I will come to her and say, 'Sw have hitherto contented my sense with the lilies but now I will taste the roses of your lip.' To w not but blushing answer, 'Nay, now you are too and then do I reply, 'I cannot be too ambitious sweet lady.' Will not be good?"—I think there nant of this foppery preserved in masonic lodges brother is distinguished by a name in the Lod some abstract quality, as Discretion, or the like. S of Gavin Wilson.

the stranger, exclaiming, "For God's sake. beware what you do!"

not, fairest Protection," replied Sir Piercie, utmost serenity, "that I can be provoked ustical and mistaught juvenal to do aught ning your presence or mine own dignity; on shall the gunner's linstock give fire unto , as the spark of passion inflame my blood, as it is to serenity by the respect due to the of my gracious Protection!"

may well call her your protection, Sir said Halbert; "by Saint Andrew, it is the sible word I have heard you speak! But we t where her protection shall no longer afford er."

st Protection," continued the courtier, not ouring with a look, far less with a direct re- hreat of the incensed Halbert, "doubt not faithful Affability will be more commoved by h of this rude sby, than the bright and serene perturbed by the baying of the cottage-cur, the height of his own dung-hill, which, in eit, lifteth him nearer unto the majestie ."

at lengths so unsavoury a simile might have albert's imagination, is left uncertain; for at ment Edward rushed into the apartment with ligence that the two most important officers onvent, the Kitchener and Refectioner, were ed with a sumpter-mule, loaded with provi- nouncing that the Lord Abbot, the Sub- d the Sacristan, were on their way thither. stance so very extraordinary had never been in the annals of St. Mary's, or in the tradi- Glendearg, though there was a faint legend- rt that a certain Abbot had dined there in after having been bewildered in a hunting n amongst the wilds which lie to the north- But that the present Lord Abbot should have voluntary journey to so wild and dreary a very Kamtschatka of the Halidome, was a ver dreamt of; and the news excited the surprise in all the members of the family, albert alone.

ery youth was too full of the insult he had re- think of any thing as unconnected with it. lad of it," he exclaimed; "I am glad the mes hither. I will know of him by what stranger is sent hither to domineer over us r father's roof, as if we were slaves and not I will tell the proud priest to his beard"——

! alas! my brother," said Edward, "think se words may cost thee!"

what will, or what can they cost me," said " that I should sacrifice my human feelings ustifiable resentment to the fear of what the n do?"

mother—our mother!" exclaimed Edward; f she is deprived of her home, expelled from rty, how can you amend what your rashness ?"

too true, by Heaven!" said Halbert, striking ead. Then, stamping his foot against the xpress the full energy of the passion to which no longer give vent, he turned round and left ment.

Avenel looked at the stranger knight, while ndeavouring to frame a request that he would t the intemperate violence of her foster-bro- ie prejudice of his family, in the mind of the But Sir Piercie, the very pink of courtesy, ed her meaning from her embarrassment, ed not to be entreated.

t me, fairest Protection," said he, "your is less than capable of seeing or hearing, of reciting or reiterating, aught of an un- ature which may have chanced while I en- Elysium of your presence. The winds of ion may indeed rudely agitate the bosom of ; but the heart of the courtier is polished to m. As the frozen lake receives not the of the breeze, even so"—— oice of Dame Glendinning, in shrill sum- ere demanded Mary Avenel's attendance, who instantly obeyed, not a little glad to escape from the compliments and similies of this courtlike gallant. Nor was it apparently less a relief on his part for no sooner was she past the threshold of the room, than he exchanged the look of formal and elaborate politeness which had accompanied each word he had uttered hitherto, for an expression of the utmost lassitude and ennui; and after indulging in one or two portentous yawns, broke forth into a soliloquy.

"What the foul fiend sent this wench hither? As if it were not sufficient plague to be harboured in a hovel that would hardly serve for a dog's kennel in England, baited by a rude peasant-boy, and dependant on the faith of a mercenary ruffian, but I cannot even have time to muse over my own mishap, but must come aloft, frisk, fidget, and make speeches, to please this pale lectic phantom, because she has gentle blood in her veins! By mine honour, setting prejudice aside, the mill-wench is the more attractive of the two—But patienza, Piercie Shafton; thou must not lose thy well earned claim to be accounted a devout servant of the fair sex, a witty-brained, prompt, and accomplished courtier. Rather thank Heaven, Piercie Shafton, which hath sent thee a subject, wherein, without derogating from thy rank, (since the honours of the Avenel family are beyond dispute,) thou mayst find a whetstone for thy witty compliments, a strop whereon to sharpen thine acute engine, a butt whereat to shoot the arrows of thy gallantry. For even as a Bilbon blade, the more it is rubbed the brighter and the sharper will it prove, so——But what need I waste my stock of similitudes in holding converse with myself?—Yonder comes the monkish retinue, like some half score of crows winging their way slowly up the valley. I hope, a'gad, they have not forgotten my trunk-mails of apparel amid the ample provision they have made for their own belly-timber—Mercy, a'gad, I were finely holped up if the vesture has miscarried among the thievish Borderers!"

Stung by this reflection, he ran hastily down stairs, and caused his horse to be saddled, that he might, as soon as possible, ascertain this important point, by meeting the Lord Abbot and his retinue as they came up the glen. He had not ridden a mile before he met them advancing with the slowness and decorum, which became persons of their dignity and profession. The knight failed not to greet the Lord Abbot with all the formal compliments with which men of rank at that period exchanged courtesies. He had the good fortune to find that his mails were numbered among the train of baggage which attended upon the party; and, satisfied in that particular, he turned his horse's head, and accompanied the Abbot to the Tower of Glendearg.

Great, in the mean while, had been the turmoil of the good Dame Elspeth and her coadjutors, to prepare for the fitting reception of the Father Lord Abbot and his retinue. The monks had indeed taken care not to trust too much to the state of her pantry; but she was not the less anxious to make such additions as might enable her to claim the thanks of her feudal lord and spiritual father. Meeting Halbert, as, with his blood on fire, he returned from his altercation with her guest, she commanded him instantly to go forth to the hill, and not to return without venison; reminding him that he was apt enough to go thither for his own pleasure, and must now do so for the credit of the house.

The Miller, who was now hastening his journey homewards, promised to send up some salmon by his own servant. Dame Elspeth, who, by this time thought she had guests enough, had begun to repent of her invitation to poor Mysie, and was just considering by what means, short of giving offence, she could send off the Maid of the Mill behind her father, and adjourn all her own aerial architecture till some future opportunity, when this unexpected generosity on the part of the sire rendered any present attempt to return his daughter on his hands too highly ungracious to be farther thought on. So the Miller departed alone on his homeward journey.

Dame Elspeth's sense of hospitality proved in this instance its own reward; for Mysie had dwelt too near the Convent to be altogether ignorant of the noble art of cookery, which her father patronised to the extent of consuming on festival days such dainties as his daughter could prepare in emulation of the luxuries of the Abbot's kitchen. Laying aside, therefore, her holiday kirtle, and adopting a dress more suitable to the occasion, the good-humoured maiden bared her snowy arms above the elbows; and, as Elspeth acknowledged, in the language of the time and country, took "entire and aefauld part with her" in the labours of the day; showing unparalleled talent, and indefatigable industry, in the preparation of mortreux, blanc-manger, and heaven knows what delicacies besides, which Dame Glendinning, unassisted by her skill, dared not even have dreamt of presenting.

Leaving this able substitute in the kitchen, and regretting that Mary Avenel was so brought up, that she could intrust nothing to her care, unless it might be seeing the great chamber strewed with rushes, and ornamented with such flowers and branches as the season afforded, Dame Elspeth hastily donned her best attire, and with a beating heart presented herself at the door of her little tower, to make her obeisance to the Lord Abbot as he crossed her humble threshold. Edward stood by his mother, and felt the same palpitation, which his philosophy was at a loss to account for. He was yet to learn how long it is ere our reason is enabled to triumph over the force of external circumstances, and how much our feelings are affected by novelty, and blunted by use and habit.

On the present occasion he witnessed with wonder and awe the approach of some half-score of riders, sober men upon sober palfreys, muffled in their long black garments, and only relieved by their white scapularies, showing more like a funeral procession than aught else, and not quickening their pace beyond that which permitted easy conversation and easy digestion. The sobriety of the scene was indeed somewhat enlivened by the presence of Sir Piercie Shafton, who, to show that his skill in the manege was not inferior to his other accomplishments, kept alternately pressing and checking his gay courser, forcing him to piaffe, to caracole, to passage, and to do all the other feats of the school, to the great annoyance of the Lord Abbot, the wonted sobriety of whose palfrey became at length discomposed by the vivacity of its companion, while the dignitary kept crying out in bodily alarm, "I do pray you, sir—Sir Knight—good now, Sir Piercie—Be quiet, Benedict, there is a good steed—soh, poor fellow!" and uttering all the other precatory and soothing exclamations by which a timid horseman usually bespeaks the favour of a frisky companion, or of his own unquiet nag, and concluding the bead-roll with a sincere Deo gratias so soon as he alighted in the court-yard of the Tower of Glendearg.

The inhabitants unanimously knelt down to kiss the hand of the Lord Abbot, a ceremony which even the monks were often condemned to. Good Abbot Boniface was too much fluttered by the incidents of the latter part of his journey, to go through this ceremony with much solemnity, or indeed with much patience. He kept wiping his brow with a snow-white handkerchief with one hand, while another was abandoned to the homage of his vassals; and then signing the cross with his outstretched arm, and exclaiming, "Bless ye—bless ye, my children!" he hastened into the house, and murmured not a little at the darkness and steepness of the rugged winding stair, whereby he at length scaled the spence destined for his entertainment, and, overcome with fatigue, threw himself, I do not say into an easy chair, but into the easiest the apartment afforded.

CHAPTER XVI.

> A courtier extraordinary, who by diet
> Of meats and drinks, his temperate exercise,
> Choice music, frequent bath, his horary shifts
> Of shirts and waistcoats, means to immortalize
> Mortality itself, and makes the essence
> Of his whole happiness the trim of court.
>
> Magnetic Lady.

When the Lord Abbot had suddenly and superciliously vanished from the eyes of his expectant vassals, the Sub-Prior made amends for the negligence of his principal, by the kind and affectionate greeting which he gave to all the members of the family, but especially to Dame Elspeth, her foster-daughter, and her son Edward. "Where," he even condescended to inquire, "is that naughty Nimrod, Halbert?—He hath not yet, I trust, turned, like his great prototype, his hunting-spear against man?"

"O no, an it please your reverence," said Dame Glendinning, "Halbert is up the glen to get some venison, or surely he would not have been absent when such a day of honour dawned upon me and mine."

"O, to get savoury meat, such as our soul loveth," muttered the Sub-Prior; "it has been at times an acceptable gift. I bid you good morrow, my good dame, as I must attend upon his lordship the Father Abbot."

"And O, reverend sir," said the good widow, detaining him, "if it might be your pleasure to take part with us if there is any thing wrong; and if there is any thing wanted, to say that it is just coming, or to make some excuses your learning best knows how. Every bit of vassail and silver work have we been spoiled of since Pinkie Cleuch, when I lost poor Simon Glendinning, that was the warst of a'."

"Never mind—never fear," said the Sub-Prior, gently extricating his garment from the anxious grasp of Dame Elspeth, "the Refectioner has with him the Abbot's plate and drinking cups; and I pray you to believe that whatever is short in your entertainment will be deemed amply made up in your good-will."

So saying, he escaped from her, and went into the spence, where such preparations as haste permitted were making for the noon collation of the Abbot and the English knight. Here he found the Lord Abbot, for whom a cushion, composed of all the plaids in the house, had been unable to render Simon's huge elbow-chair a soft or comfortable place of rest.

"Benedicite!" said Abbot Boniface, "now marry fie upon these hard benches with all my heart—they are as uneasy as the scabella of our novices. Saint Jude be with us, Sir Knight, how have you contrived to pass over the night in this dungeon? An your bed was no softer than your seat, you might as well have slept on the stone couch of Saint Pacomius. After trotting a full ten miles, a man needs a softer seat than has fallen to my hard lot."

With sympathizing faces, the Sacristan and the Refectioner ran to raise the Lord Abbot, and to adjust his seat to his mind, which was at length accomplished in some sort, although he continued alternately to bewail his fatigue, and to exult in the conscious sense of having discharged an arduous duty. "You errant cavaliers," said he, addressing the knight, "may now perceive that others have their travail and their toils to undergo as well as your honoured faculty. And thus I will say for myself and the soldiers of Saint Mary, among whom I may be termed captain, that it is not our wont to flinch from the heat of the service, or to withdraw from the good fight. No, by Saint Mary!—no sooner did I learn that you were here, and dared not for certain reasons come to the Monastery, where with as good will, and with more convenience, we might have given you a better reception, than, striking the table with my hammer, I called a brother—Timothy, said I, let them saddle Benedict—let them saddle my black palfrey, and bid the Sub-Prior and some half-score of attendants be in readiness to-morrow after matins—we would ride to Glendearg.—Brother Timothy stared, thinking, I imagine, that his ears had scarce done him justice—but I repeated my commands, and said, Let the Kitchener and Refectioner go before to aid the poor vassals to whom the place belongs in making a suitable collation. So that you will consider, good Sir Piercie, our mutual incommodities, and forgive whatever you may find amiss."

"By my faith," said Sir Piercie Shafton, "there is nothing to forgive—If you spiritual warriors have to submit to the grievous incommodities which your lordship narrates, it would ill become me, a sinful and secular man, to complain of a bed as hard as a

f broth which relished as if made of burnt flesh, which, in its sable and singed shape,
to put me on a level with Richard Cœur-de-
ion he ate up the head of a Moor carbonadoed, ther viands savouring rather of the rusticity
orthern region."

he good saints, sir," said the Abbot, somewhat
iched in point of his character for hospitality,
he was in truth a most faithful and zealous
r, "it grieves me to the heart that you have ir vassals no better provided for your recep-
t I crave leave to observe, that if Sir Piercie
s affairs had permitted him to honour with pany our poor house of Saint Mary's, he ave had less to complain of in respect of ts."

give your lordship the reasons," said Sir Shafton, "why I could not at this present proach your dwelling, or avail myself of its own and undoubted hospitality, craves either
day, or," looking around him, "a limited

ord Abbot immediately issued his mandate
efectioner: "Hie thee to the kitchen, Brother
, and there make inquiry of our brother the
er, within what time he opines that our collay
be prepared, since sin and sorrow it were,
ing the hardships of this noble and gallant
no whit mentioning or weighing those we s have endured, if we were now either to or retard the hour of refection beyond the en the viands are fit to be set before us."

er Hilarius parted with an eager alertness to the will of his Superior, and returned with rance, that punctually at one afternoon would ition be ready.

ore that time," said the accurate Refectioner,
afers, flammis, and pastry-meat, will scarce
d the just degree of fire which learned pot-
pre-eminent as fittest for the body; and if it be past one o'clock, were it but ten minutes,
her the Kitchener opines, that the haunch of would suffer in spite of the skill of the little whom he has recommended to your holi-
his praises."

w!" said the Abbot, "a haunch of venison!
when e'er came that dainty? I remember not ist entimate its presence in thy hamper of

please your holiness and lordship," said the ner, "he is a son of the woman of the house
h shot it and sent it in—killed but now; yet,
nimal-heat hath not left the body, the Kitindertakes it shall eat as tender as a young and this youth hath a special gift in shoot-
; and never misses the heart or the brain; so blood is not driven through the flesh, as too often with us. It is a hart of grease—
ness has seldom seen such a haunch."

nce, Brother Hilarius," said the Abbot, wipmouth; "it is not beseeming our order to food so earnestly, especially as we must oft r animal powers exhausted by fasting, and ssible (as being ever mere mortals) to those longings" (he again wiped his mouth) "which the mention of victuals to a hungry man,
e down, however, the name of that youth—it
g merit should be rewarded, and he shall
r be a frater ad succurrendum in the kitchen tery."

s! reverend Father, and my good lord," re-Refectioner, "I did inquire after the youth,
arn he is one who prefers the casque to the d the sword of the flesh to the weapons of it."

if it be so," said the Abbot, "see that thou im as a deputy-keeper and man-at-arms, and lay brother of the Monastery—for old Tall-
r forester, waxes dim-eyed, and hath twice a noble buck, by hitting him unwarily on the . Ah! 'tis a foul fault, the abusing by evil-evil-dressing, evil appetite, or otherwise, the eatures indulged to us for our use. Wherefore, us the service of this youth, Brother Hilarius,
in the way that may best suit him.—And now, Sir Piercie Shafton, since the fates have assigned us a space of wellnigh an hour, ere we dare hope to enjoy more than the vapour or savour of our repast, may I pray you, of your courtesy, to tell me the cause of this visit; and, above all, to inform us, why you will not approach our more pleasant and better furnished hospitium?"

"Reverend Father, and my very good lord," said Sir Piercie Shafton, "it is well known to your wisdom, that there are stone walls which have ears, and that secrecy is to be looked to in matters which concern a man's head."

The Abbot signed to his attendants, excepting the Sub-Prior, to leave the room, and then said, "Your valour, Sir Piercie, may freely unburden yourself before our faithful friend and counsellor Father Eustace, the benefits of whose advice we may too soon lose, inasmuch as his merits will speedily recommend him to a higher station, in which, we trust, he may find the blessing of a friend and adviser as valuable as himself, since I may say of him, as our claustral rhyme goeth,*

'Dixit Abbas ad priorem,
Tu es homo bonæ moris,
Quia semper sanioris
Mihi das concilia.'

Indeed," he added, "the office of Sub-Prior is altogether beneath our dear brother; nor can we elevate him unto that of Prior, which, for certain reasons, is at present kept vacant amongst us. Howbeit, Father Eustace is fully possessed of my confidence, and worthy of yours, and well may it be said of him, Intravit in secretis nostris."

Sir Piercie Shafton bowed to the reverend brethren, and, heaving a sigh, as if he would have burst his steel-cuirass, he thus commenced his speech.

"Certes, reverend sirs, I may well heave such a suspiration, who have, as it were, exchanged heaven for purgatory, leaving the lightsome sphere of the royal court of England, for a remote nook in this inaccessible desert—quitting the tiltyard, where I was ever ready among my compeers to splinter a lance, either for the love of honour, or for the honour of love, in order to couch my knightly spear against base and pilfering besognios and marauders—exchanging the lighted halls, wherein I used nimbly to pace the swift coranto, or to move with a loftier grace in the stately galliard, for this rugged and decayed dungeon of rusty-coloured stone—quitting the gay theatre, for the solitary chimney-nook of a Scottish dog-house—bartering the sounds of the soul-ravishing lute, and the love-awakening viol-de-gamba, for the discordant squeak of a northern bagpipe—above all, exchanging the smiles of those beauties, who form a galaxy around the throne of England, for the cold courtesy of an untaught damsel, and the bewildered stare of a miller's maiden. More might I say, of the exchange of the conversation of gallant knights and gay courtiers of mine own order and capacity, whose conceits are bright and vivid as the lightning, for that of monks and churchmen—but it were discourteous to urge that topic."

The Abbot listened to this list of complaints with great round eyes, which evinced no exact intelligence of the orator's meaning; and when the knight paused to take breath, he looked with a doubtful and inquiring eye at the Sub-Prior, not well knowing in what tone he should reply to an exordium so extraordinary. The Sub-Prior accordingly stepped in to the relief of his principal.

"We deeply sympathize with you, Sir Knight, in the several mortifications and hardships to which fate has subjected you, particularly in that which has thrown you into the society of those, who, as they were conscious they deserved not such an honour, so neither did they at all desire it. But all this goes little way to expound the cause of this train of disasters, or, in plainer words, the reason which has compelled you into a situation having so few charms for you."

"Gentle and reverend sir," replied the Knight, "forgive an unhappy person, who, in giving a history of his miseries, dilated upon them extremely, even as he who, having fallen from a precipice, looketh upward to measure the height from which he hath been precipitated."

* The rest of this doggerel rhyme may be found in Tanner's learned work on British Monachism.

"Yea, but," said Father Eustace, "methinks it were wiser in him to tell those who come to lift him up, which of his bones have been broken."

"You, reverend sir," said the knight, "have in the encounter of our wits made a fair attaint; whereas I may be in some sort said to have broken my staff across.* Pardon me, grave sir, that I speak the language of the tiltyard, which is doubtless strange to your reverend ears.—Ah! brave resort of the noble, the fair, and the gay!—Ah! throne of love, and citadel of honour!—Ah! celestial beauties, by whose bright eyes it is graced! Never more shall Piercie Shafton advance, as the centre of your radiant glances, couch his lance, and spur his horse at the sound of the spirit-stirring trumpets, nobly called the voice of war—never more shall he battle his adversary's encounter boldly, break his spear dexterously, and ambling around the lovely circle, receive the rewards with which beauty honours chivalry!"

Here he paused, wrung his hands, looked upwards, and seemed lost in contemplation of his own fallen fortunes.

"Mad, very mad," whispered the Abbot to the Sub-Prior; "I would we were fairly rid of him; for, of a truth, I expect he will proceed from raving to mischief—Were it not better to call up the rest of the brethren?"

But the Sub-Prior knew better than his Superior how to distinguish the jargon of affectation from the ravings of insanity, and although the extremity of the knight's passion seemed altogether fantastic, yet he was not ignorant to what extravagances the fashion of the day can conduct its votaries.

Allowing, therefore, two minutes' space to permit the knight's enthusiastic feelings to exhaust themselves, he again gravely reminded him that the Lord Abbot had taken a journey, unwonted to his age and habits, solely to learn in what he could serve Sir Piercie Shafton—that it was altogether impossible he could do so without his receiving distinct information of the situation in which he had now sought refuge in Scotland.—"The day wore on," he observed, looking at the window; "and if the Abbot should be obliged to return to the Monastery without obtaining the necessary intelligence, the regret might be mutual, but the inconvenience was like to be all on Sir Piercie's own side."

The hint was not thrown away.

"Oh, goddess of courtesy!" said the knight, "can I have so far forgotten thy behests, as to make this good prelate's ease and time a sacrifice to my vain complaints! Know, then, most worthy, and not less worshipful, that I, your poor visiter and guest, am by birth nearly bound to the Piercie of Northumberland, whose fame is so widely blown through all parts of the world where English worth hath been known. Now, this present Earl of Northumberland, of whom I propose to give you the brief history"——

"It is altogether unnecessary," said the Abbot; "we know him to be a good and true nobleman, and a sworn upholder of our Catholic faith, in the spite of the heretical woman who now sits upon the throne of England. And it is specially as his kinsman, and as knowing that ye partake with him in such devout and faithful belief and adherence to our holy Mother Church, that we say to you, Sir Piercie Shafton, that ye be heartily welcome to us, and that, as we wist how, we would labour to do you good service in your extremity."

"For such kind offer I rest your most humble debtor," said Sir Piercie; "nor need I at this moment say more than that my Right Honourable Cousin of Northumberland, having devised with me and some others, the choice and picked spirits of the age, how and by what means the worship of God, according to the Catholic church, might be again introduced into this distracted kingdom of England, (even as one devaseth, by the assistance of his friend, to catch and to bridle a runaway steed,) it pleased him so deeply to intrust me in those communications, that my personal safety becomes, as it were, entwined or complicated therewith. Natheless, as we have had sudden reason to believe, this Princess Elizabeth, who maintaineth around her a sort of counsellors skilful in tracking whatever schemes may be pursued for bringing her title into challenge, or for erecting again the discipline of the Catholic church, has obtained certain knowledge of the trains which we had laid before we could give fire unto them. Wherefore, my Right Honourable Cousin of Northumberland, thinking it best belike that one man should take both blame and shame for the whole, did lay the burden of all this trafficking upon my back; which load I am the rather content to bear, in that he hath always shown himself my kind and honourable kinsman, as well as that my estate, I wot not how, hath of late been somewhat insufficient to maintain the expense of those braveries, wherewith it is incumbent on us, who are chosen and selected spirits, to distinguish ourselves from the vulgar."

"So that possibly," said the Sub-Prior, "your private affairs rendered a foreign journey less incommodious to you than it might have been to the noble earl, your right worthy cousin?"

"You are right, reverend sir," answered the courtier; "rem acu—you have touched the point with a needle—My cost and expenses had been indeed somewhat lavish at the late triumphs and tourneys, and the flat-capp'd citizens had shown themselves unwilling to furnish my pocket for new gallantries for the honour of the nation, as well as for mine own peculiar glory—and, to speak truth, it was in some part the hope of seeing these matters amended that led me to desire a new world in England."

"So that the miscarriage of your public enterprise, with the derangement of your own private affairs," said the Sub-Prior, "have induced you to seek Scotland as a place of refuge?"

"Rem acu, once again," said Sir Piercie; "and not without good cause, since my neck, if I remained, might have been brought within the circumstances of a halter—and so speedy was my journey northward, that I had but time to exchange my peach-coloured doublet of Genoa velvet, thickly laid over with goldsmith's work, for this cuirass, which was made by Bonamico of Milan, and travelled northward with all speed, judging that I might do well to visit my Right Honourable Cousin of Northumberland, at one of his numerous castles. But as I posted towards Alnwick, even with the speed of a star, which, darting from its native sphere, shoots wildly downwards, I was met at Northallerton by one Henry Vaughan, a servant of my right honourable kinsman, who showed me, that as then I might not with safety come to his presence, seeing that, in obedience to orders from his court, he was obliged to issue out letters for my incarceration."

"This," said the Abbot, "seems but hard measure on the part of your honourable kinsman."

"It might be so judged, my lord," replied Sir Piercie; "nevertheless, I will stand to the death for the honour of my Right Honourable Cousin of Northumberland. Also, Henry Vaughan gave me, from my said cousin, a good horse, and a purse of gold, with two Border-prickers, as they are called, for my guides, who conducted me, by such roads and bypaths as have never been seen since the days of Sir Lancelot and Sir Tristrem, into this kingdom of Scotland, and to the house of a certain baron, or one who holds the style of such, called Julian Avenel, with whom I found such reception as the place and party could afford."

"And that," said the Abbot, "must have been right wretched; for, to judge from the appetite which Julian showeth when abroad, he hath not, I judge, over-abundant provision at home."

"You are right, sir—your reverence is in the right," continued Sir Piercie; "we had but lenten fare, and, what was worse, a score to clear at the departure

* Attaint was a term of tilting used to express the champion's having attained his mark, or, in other words, struck his lance straight and fair against the helmet or breast of his adversary. Whereas to break the lance across, intimated a total failure in directing the point of the weapon on the object of his aim.

ough this Julian Avenel called us to no reckon-et he did so extravagantly admire the fashion
poniard—the poignet being of silver exquisitely
ed, and indeed the weapon being altogether a
of exceeding rare device and beauty—that in
I could not for very shame's sake but pray his tance of it; words which he gave me not the le of repeating twice, before he had stuck it into easy buff-belt, where, credit me, reverend sir, it rd more like a butcher's knife than a gentle-
s dagger."

o goodly a gift might at least have purchased
few days' hospitality," said Father Eustace.

everend sir," said Sir Piercie, "had I abidden him, I should have been complimented out of remnant of my wardrobe—actually flayed, by ospitable gods I swear it! Sir, he secured my doublet, and had a pluck at my galligaskins—I nforced to beat a retreat before I was altogether ged. That Border-knave his serving-man had k at me too, and usurped a scarlet cassock and curass belonging to the page of my body, whom fain to leave behind me. In good time I red a letter from my Right Honourable Cousin,
ing me that he had written to you in my behalf,
ent to your charge two mails filled with wear-
pparel—namely, my rich crimson silk doublet,
ed out and lined with cloth of gold, which I
at the last revels, with baldric and trimmings respond—also two pair black silk slops, with ing garters of carnation silk—also the flesh-cod silken doublet, with the trimmings of fur, in h I danced the salvage man at the Gray's-Inn imery—also"——

Sir Knight," said the Sub-Prior, "I pray you to the farther inventory of your wardrobe. The ts of Saint Mary's are no freebooting barons, whatever part of your vestments arrived at our
, have been this day faithfully brought hither.
the mails which contained them. I may pre-
from what has been said, as we have indeed
given to understand by the Earl of Northumber-that your desire is to remain for the present as own and as unnoticed, as may be consistent
your high worth and distinction?"

Alas, reverend father!" replied the courtier, "a
when it is in the scabbard cannot give lustre, a ond when it is in the casket cannot give light, worth, when it is compelled by circumstances to ire itself, cannot draw observation—my retreat
only attract the admiration of those few to whom mstances permit its displaying itself."

conceive now, my venerable father and lord,"
the Sub-Prior, "that your wisdom will assign a course of conduct to this noble knight, as may ike consistent with his safety, and with the weal
e community. For you wot well, that perilous es have been made in these audacious days, to lestruction of all ecclesiastical foundations, and our holy community has been repeatedly menaced.
erto they have found no flaw in our raiment; but ety, friendly as well to the Queen of England, as
e heretical doctrines of the schismatical church,
en to worse and wilder forms of heresy, prevails
at the court of our sovereign, who dare not yield
r suffering clergy the protection she would gladly nd to them."

My lord, and reverend sir," said the knight, "I gladly relieve ye of my presence, while ye canvass matter at your freedom; and to speak truly, I lesirous to see in what case the chamberlain of noble kinsman hath found my wardrobe, and he hath packed the same, and whether it has red from the journey there are four suits of as
and elegant device as ever the fancy of a fair
doated upon, every one having a treble and apriate change of ribbons, trimmings, and fringes, ch, in case of need, may as it were renew each of
, and multiply the four into twelve.—There is my sad-coloured riding-suit, and three cut-work s with falling bands—I pray you, pardon me—ist needs see how matters stand with them with-farther dallying."

ius speaking, he left the room; and the Sub-

Prior, looking after him significantly, added, "Where the treasure is will the heart be also."

"Saint Mary preserve our wits!" said the Abbot, stunned with the knight's abundance of words; "were man's brains ever so stuffed with silk and broadcloth, cut-work, and I wot not what besides! And what could move the Earl of Northumberland to assume for his bosom counsellor, in matters of depth and danger, such a feather-brained coxcomb as this!"

"Had he been other than what he is, venerable father," said the Sub-Prior, "he had been less fitted for the part of scape-goat, to which his Right Honourable Cousin had probably destined him from the commencement, in case of their plot failing. I know something of this Piercie Shafton. The legitimacy of his mother's descent from the Piercie family, the point on which he is most jealous, hath been called in question. If harebrained courage, and an outrageous spirit of gallantry, can make good his pretensions to the high lineage he claims, these qualities have never been denied him. For the rest, he is one of the ruffling gallants of the time, like Rowland Yorke, Stukely,* and others, who wear out their fortunes, and endanger their lives, in idle braveries, in order that they may be esteemed the only choice gallants of the time; and afterwards endeavour to repair their estate, by engaging in the desperate plots and conspiracies which wiser heads have devised. To use one of his own conceited similitudes, such courageous fools resemble hawks, which the wiser conspirator keeps hooded and blindfolded on his wrist until the quarry is on the wing, and who are then flown at them."

"Saint Mary," said the Abbot, "he were an evil guest to introduce into our quiet household. Our young monks make bustle enough, and more than is beseeming God's servants, about their outward attire already—this knight were enough to turn their brains, from the Vesturius down to the very scullion boy."

"A worse evil might follow," said the Sub-Prior: "In these bad days, the patrimony of the church is bought and sold, forfeited and distrained, as if it were the unhallowed soil appertaining to a secular baron. Think what penalty awaits us, were we convicted of harbouring a rebel to her whom they call the Queen of England! There would neither be wanting Scottish parasites to beg the lands of the foundation, nor an army from England to burn and harry the Halidome. The men of Scotland were once Scotsmen, firm and united in their love of their country, and throwing every other consideration aside when the frontier was menaced—now they are—what shall I call them—the one part French, the other part Eng-

* "Yorke," says Camden, "was a Londoner, a man of loose and dissolute behaviour, and desperately audacious—famous in his time amongst the common bullies and swaggerers, as being the first that, to the great admiration of many at his boldness, brought into England the bold and dangerous way of fencing with the rapier in duelling. Whereas, till that time, the English used to fight with long swords and bucklers, striking with the edge, and thought it no part of man either to push or strike beneath the girdle."

Having a command in the Low Countries, Yorke revolted to the Spaniards, and died miserably, poisoned, as was supposed, by his new allies. Three years afterwards, his bones were dug up and gibbeted by the command of the States of Holland.

Thomas Stukely, another distinguished gallant of the time, was bred a merchant, being the son of a rich clothier in the west. He wedded the daughter and heiress of a wealthy alderman of London, named Curtis, after whose death he squandered the riches he thus acquired in all manner of extravagance. His wife, whose fortune supplied his waste, represented to him that he ought to make more of her. Stukely replied, "I will make as much of thee, believe me, as it is possible for any to do;" and he kept his word in one sense, having stripped her even of her wearing apparel, before he finally ran away from her.

Having fled to Italy, he contrived to impose upon the Pope, with a plan of invading Ireland, for which he levied soldiers, and made some preparations; but ended by engaging himself and his troops in the service of King Sebastian of Portugal. He sailed with that prince on his fatal voyage to Barbary, and fell with him at the battle of Alcazar.

Stukely, as one of the first gallants of the time, has had the honour to be chronicled in song, in Evans's Old Ballads, vol. iii. edition 1810. His fate is also introduced in a tragedy, by George Peel, as has been supposed, called the Battle of Alcazar, from which play Dryden is alleged to have taken the idea of Don Sebastian; if so, it is surprising he omitted a character so congenial to King Charles the Second's time, as the witty, brave, and profligate Thomas Stukely.

lish, considering their dear native country merely as a prize-fighting stage, upon which foreigners are welcome to decide their quarrels."

"Bonnie lads!" replied the Abbot, "they are indeed slippery subjects in these evil times."

"And therefore," said Father Eustace, "we must walk warily—we must not, for example, bring this man—this Sir Piercie Shafton, to our house of Saint Mary's."

"But how then shall we dispose of him?" replied the Abbot; "bethink thee that he is a sufferer for holy Church's sake—that his patron, the Earl of Northumberland, hath been our friend, and that, lying so near us, he may work us weal or wo according as we deal with his kinsman."

"And, accordingly," said the Sub-Prior, "for these reasons, as well as for discharge of the great duty of Christian charity, I would protect and relieve this man. Let him not go back to Julian Avenel—that unconscientious baron would not stick to plunder the exiled stranger—Let him remain here—the spot is secluded, and if the accommodation be beneath his quality, discovery will become the less likely. We will make such means for his convenience as we can devise."

"Will he be persuaded, thinkest thou?" said the Abbot; "I will leave my own travelling bed for his repose, and send up a suitable easy-chair."

"With such easements," said the Sub-Prior, "he must not complain; and then if threatened by any sudden danger, he can soon come down to the sanctuary, where we will harbour him in secret until means can be devised of dismissing him in safety."

"Were we not better," said the Abbot, "send him on to the court, and get rid of him at once?"

"Ay, but at the expense of our friends—this butterfly may fold his wings, and lie under cover in the cold air of Glendearg; but were he at Holyrood, he would, did his life depend on it, expand his spangled drapery in the eyes of the queen and court. Rather than fail of distinction, he would sue for love to our gracious sovereign—the eyes of all men would be upon him in the course of three short days, and the international peace of the two ends of the island endangered for a creature, who, like a silly moth, cannot abstain from fluttering round a light."

"Thou hast prevailed with me, Father Eustace," said the Abbot, "and it will go hard but I improve on thy plan—I will send up in secret, not only household stuff, but wine and wassell-bread. There is a young swankie here who shoots venison well. I will give him directions to see that the knight lacks none."

"Whatever accommodation he can have, which infers not a risk of discovery," said the Sub-Prior, "it is our duty to afford him."

"Nay," said the Abbot, "we will do more, and will instantly dispatch a servant express to the keeper of our revestiary to send us such things as he may want even this night. See it done, good father."

"I will," answered Father Eustace—"but I hear the gull clamorous for some one to truss his points.* He will be fortunate if he light on any one here, who can do him the office of groom of the chamber."

"I would he would appear," said the Abbot, "for here comes the Refectioner with a collation.—By my faith, the ride hath given me a sharp appetite!"

CHAPTER XVII.

I'll seek for other aid—Sorcery, they say,
Full round invisible, as the air is motes
Dance in the sunbeam—If that spell
Or necromancy's art can compel them,
They shall be coupled with me.—JAMES DEFY.

THE reader's attention must be recalled to Halbert Glendinning, who had left the tower of Glendearg immediately after his quarrel with its new guest Sir Piercie Shafton. As he walked with a rapid pace up the glen old Martin followed him, beseeching him to be less hasty.

"Halbert," said the old man, "you will never live to have white hair, if you take fire thus at every spark of provocation."

"And why should I wish it, old man," said Halbert, "if I am to be the butt that every fool may aim a shaft of scorn against? What avails it, old man, that you yours it move, sleep, and wake, eat thy ungarded meal, and repose on thy hard pallet?—Why art thou so well pleased that the morning should call thee up to do the same and the evening again lay thee down a wearied-out wretch? Were it not better sleep and wake no more than so undergo this dull exchange of labour for insensibility and of insensibility for labour?"

"God help me," answered Martin, "there may be truth in what thou sayest—but walk slower, for my old limbs cannot keep pace with your young legs—walk slower, and I will tell you why age, though unlovely, is yet endurable."

"Speak on then," said Halbert, slackening his pace; "but remember we must seek venison to refresh the fatigues of these holy men, who will this morning have achieved a journey of ten miles; and if we reach not the Brocksburn head, we are scarce like to see an antler."

"Then know, my good Halbert," said Martin, "whom I love as my own son, that I am satisfied to live till death calls me, because my Maker wills it. Ay, and although I spend what men call a hard life, pinched with cold in winter, and burnt with heat in summer, though I feed hard and sleep hard, and am held mean and despised, yet I bethink me, that were I of no use on the face of this fair creation, God would withdraw me from it."

"Thou poor old man," said Halbert, "and can such a vain conceit as this of thy fancied use, reconcile thee to a world where thou playest so poor a part?"

"My part was nearly as poor," said Martin, "my person nearly as much despised, the day that I saved my mistress and her child from perishing in the wilderness."

"Right, Martin," answered Halbert; "there indeed, thou didst what might be a sufficient apology for a whole life of insignificance."

"And do you account it for nothing, Halbert, that I should have the power of giving you a lesson of patience and submission to the destinies of Providence? Methinks there is use for the gray hairs on the old scalp, were it but to instruct the green head by precept and by example."

Halbert held down his face, and remained silent for a minute or two, and then resumed his discourse—"Martin, seest thou aught changed in me of late?"

"Surely," said Martin, "I have always known you hasty, wild, and inconsiderate, rude, and prompt to speak at the volley and without reflection; but now, methinks, your bearing, without losing its natural fire, has something in it of force and dignity which it had not before. It seems as if you had fallen asleep a carle, and awakened a gentleman."

"Thou canst judge, then, of noble bearing?" said Halbert.

"Surely," answered Martin, "in some sort I can, for I have travelled through court, and camp, and city, with my master Walter Avenel, although he could do nothing for me in the long run, but give me room for two score of sheep on the hill—and surely even now, while I speak with you, I feel sensible that my language is more refined than it is my wont to use, and that though I know not the reason—the rude northern dialect, so familiar to my tongue, has given place to a more town-bred speech."

"And this change in myself and me, thou canst by no means account for?" said young Glendinning.

"Change!" replied Martin, "by Our Lady, it is not so much a change which I feel, as a recalling and renewing sentiments and expressions which I had some thirty years since, ere Tibb and I set up our humble household. It is singular, that your society should have this sort of influence over me, Halbert, and that I should never have experienced it ere now."

"Thinkest thou," said Halbert, "thou seest in me

* The points were the strings of cord or ribband, (so called, because pointed with metal like the laces of women's stays,) which attached the doublet to the hose. They were very numerous, and required assistance to tie them properly, which was called trussing.

:an raise me from this base, low, despised one where I may rank with those proud
low despise my clownish poverty?"
aused an instant, and then answered,
you may, Halbert; as broken a ship has
d. Heard ye never of Hughie Dun, who aldome, some thirty-five years gone by?
ellow was Hughie—could read and write
, and could wield brand and buckler with the riders. I mind him— the like of him seen in the Haldome of St. Mary's, and of the preferment that God sent him."
nat was that?" said Halbert, his eyes
ith eagerness.
g less," answered Martin, "than body-
he Archbishop of St. Andrews!" countenance fell.—"A servant—and to a
as this all that knowledge and activity
him to?"
his turn, looked with wistful surprise in his young friend. "And to what could
l him farther?" answered he. "The son
uar is not the stuff that lords and knights Courage and school-craft cannot change d into gentle blood, I trow. I have heard, Hughie Dun left a good five hundred punds oney to his only daughter, and that she Bailie of Pittenweem."
noment, and while Halbert was embar-devising a suitable answer, a deer bounded path. In an instant the crossbow was h's shoulder, the bolt whistled, and the giving one bound upright, dropt dead on ward.
ies the venison our dame wanted," said
who would have thought of an out-lying
so low down the glen at this season?—
nart of grease too, in full season, and three it on the brisket. Now this is all your rt, that follows you, go where you like.
o put in for it. I would warrant you were of the Abbot's yeomen-prickers, and ride
urple doublet as bold as the best."
ian," answered Halbert, "I will serve the o one. Take thou care to have down the he Tower, since they expect it. I will on
. I have two or three bird-bolts at my t may be I shall find wild-fowl."
ned his pace, and was soon out of sight.
sed for a moment, and looked after him.
s the making of a right gallant stripling,
have not the spoiling of him—Serve the d he. By my faith, and she hath worse om all that I e'er heard of him. And should he not keep a high head? They
the top of the ladder will at least get up
ls. They that mint* at a gown of gold, get a sleeve of it. But come, sir, (address-g.) you shall go to Glendearg on my two hat more slowly than you were frisking it on your own four nimble shanks. Nay,
, if you be so heavy, I will content me
st of you, and that's the haunch and the d e'en heave up the rest on the old oak
, and come back for it with one of the

artin returned to Glendearg with the venirt prosecuted his walk, breathing more
: he was free of his companion. "The a proud and lazy priest—body-squire to shop of Saint Andrews," he repeated to and this, with the privilege of allying his
the Bailie of Pittenweem, is thought a worth a brave man's struggling for;— a preferment which, if allowed, should hopes, past, present, and to come, of the rk-vassal! By heaven, but that I find in tance to practise their acts of nocturnal ould rather take the jack and lance, and he Border-riders.—Something I will do.
ded and dishonoured, I will not live the
ach whiffling stranger from the South,

* at.
orses; more particularly horses of labour.

because, forsooth, he wears tinkling spurs on a tawny boot. This thing—this phantom, be it what it will, I will see it once more. Since I spoke with her, and touched her hand, thoughts and feelings have dawned on me, of which my former life had not even dreamed; but shall I, who feel my father's glen too narrow for my expanding spirit, brook to be bearded in it by this vain gewgaw of a courtier, and in the sight too of Mary Avenel? I will not stoop to it, by heaven!"

As he spoke thus, he arrived in the sequestered glen of Corri-nan-shian, as it verged upon the hour of noon. A few moments he remained looking upon the fountain, and doubting in his own mind with what countenance the White Lady might receive him. She had not indeed expressly forbidden his again evoking her; but yet there was something like such a prohibition implied in the farewell, which recommended him to wait for another guide.

Halbert Glendinning did not long, however, allow himself to pause. Hardihood was the natural characteristic of his mind; and under the expansion and modification which his feelings had lately undergone, it had been augmented rather than diminished. He drew his sword, undid the buskin from his foot, bowed three times with deliberation towards the fountain, and as often towards the tree, and repeated the same rhyme as formerly.—

"Thrice to the holly brake—
Thrice to the well:—
I bid thee awake,
White Maid of Avenel!

Noon gleams on the lake—
Noon glows on the fell—
Wake thee, O wake,
White Maid of Avenel!"

His eye was on the holly bush as he spoke the last line; and it was not without an involuntary shuddering that he saw the air betwixt his eye and that object become more dim, and condense, as it were, into the faint appearance of a form, through which, however, so thin and transparent was the first appearance of the phantom, he could discern the outline of the bush, as through a veil of fine crape. But, gradually, it darkened into a more substantial appearance, and the White Lady stood before him with displeasure on her brow. She spoke, and her speech was still song, or rather measured chant; but, as if now more familiar, it flowed occasionally in modulated blank verse, and at other times in the lyrical measure which she had used at their former meeting.

"This is the day when the fairy kind
Sit weeping alone for their hopeless lot,
And the wood maiden sighs to the sighing wind,
And the mer-maiden weeps in her crystal grot:
For this is the day that a deed was wrought,
In which we have neither part nor share,
For the children of clay was salvation bought,
But not for the forms of sea or air!
And ever the mortal is most forlorn,
Who meeteth our race on the Friday morn."

"Spirit," said Halbert Glendinning boldly, "it is bootless to threaten one who holds his life at no rate. Thine anger can but slay; nor do I think thy power extendeth, or thy will stretcheth, so far. The terrors which your race produce upon others, are vain against me. My heart is hardened against fear, as by a sense of despair. If I am, as thy words infer, of a race more peculiarly the care of heaven than thine, it is mine to call, it must be thine to answer. I am the nobler being."

As he spoke, the figure looked upon him with a fierce and ireful countenance, which, without losing the similitude of that which it usually exhibited, had a wilder and more exaggerated cast of features. The eyes seemed to contract and become more fiery, and slight convulsions passed over the face, as if it was about to be transformed into something hideous. The whole appearance resembled those faces which the imagination summons up when it is disturbed by laudanum, but which do not remain under the visionary's command, and, beautiful in their first appearance, become wild and grotesque ere we can arrest them.

But when Halbert had concluded his bold speech, the White Lady stood before him with the same calm fixed, and melancholy aspect, which she usually bore. He had expected the agitation which she exhibited would conclude in some frightful metamorphosis. Folding her arms on her bosom, the phantom replied,—

"Daring youth! for thee it is well,
Here calling me in haunted dell,
That thy heart has not quail'd
Nor thy courage fail'd,
And that thou could'st brook
The angry look
Of Her of Avenel
Did one limb shiver,
Or an eyelid quiver,
Thou wert lost for ever
Though I am form'd from the ether blue,
And my blood is of the undarken'd dew
And though I am fanned of wind and dust,
'Tis thine to speak, ready I must."

"I demand of thee, then," said the youth, "by what charm it is that I am thus altered in mind and in wishes—that I think no longer of deer or dog, of bow or bolt—that my soul spurns the bounds of this obscure glen—that my blood boils at an insult from one by whose stirrup I would some days since have run for a whole summer's morn, contented and honoured by the notice of a single word? Why do I now seek to mate me with princes, and knights, and nobles?—Am I the same, who but yesterday, as it were, slumbered in contented obscurity, but who am to-day awakened to glory and ambition?—Speak—tell me, if thou canst, the meaning of this change?—Am I spell-bound—or have I till now been under the influence of a spell, that I feel as another being, yet am conscious of remaining the same? Speak and tell me, is it to thy influence that the change is owing?"

The White Lady replied,—

"A mightier wizard far than I Wields o'er the universe his power;
Him owns the eagle in the sky,
The turtle in the bower.
Changeful in shape, yet mightiest still,
He wields the heart of man at will,
From ill to good, from good to ill,
In cot and castle-tower."

"Speak not thus darkly," said the youth, colouring so deeply, that face, neck, and hands, were in a sanguine glow; "make me sensible of thy purpose."

The spirit answered,—

"Ask thy heart, whose secret cell
Is fill'd with Mary Avenel!
Ask thy pride, why scornful look
In Mary's view it will not brook?
Ask it, why thou seek'st to rise
Among the mighty and the wise,—
Why thou spurn'st thy lowly lot,—
Why thy pastimes are forgot,—
Why thou wouldst in bloody strife
Mend thy luck or lose thy life?
Ask thy heart, and it shall tell,
Sighing from its secret cell,
'Tis for Mary Avenel."

"Tell me, then," said Halbert, his cheek still deeply crimsoned, "thou who hast said to me that which I dared not to say myself, by what means shall I urge my passion—by what means make it known?"

The White Lady replied,—

"Do not ask me;
On doubts like these thou canst not task me.
We only see the passing show
Of human joys or ebb and flow;
And view the pageant's idle glance
As mortals eye the northern dance,
When thousand streamers, flashing bright,
Career it o'er the brow of night,
And tracers mark the rising fire gleams,
But feel no influence from their beams."

"Yet thine own fate," replied Halbert, "unless men greatly err, is linked with that of mortals?"

The phantom answered,—

"By ties mysterious link'd, our fated race
Holds strange communion with the sons of men.
The star that rose upon the House of Avenel,
When Norman Ulric first assumed the name,
That star, when culminating in its orbit,
Shot from its sphere in a drop of diamond dew,
And this bright orb received it—and a Spirit
Rose from the fountain, and her date of life
Hath co-existence with the House of Avenel,
And with the star that rules it."

"Speak yet more plainly," answered young Glendinning; "of this I can understand noth what hath forged thy fiendish* link of d the House of Avenel? Say, especially, wh overhangs that house?"

The White Lady replied,—

"Look on my girdle—on this thread of gold
'Tis fine as web of lightest gossamer,
And, but there is a spell on't, would not bind
Light as they are, the folds of my thin robe.
But when 'twas bound'd, it was a massive chu
Such as might bind the champion of the Jev
Even when his locks were longest—it hath d
Hath manish'd in its substance and its streng
As sunk the greatness of the House of Aven
When this frail thread gives way, I to the ele
Resign the principles of life they lent me
Ask me no more of this!—the stars forbid it

"Then canst thou read the stars," an youth, "and mayst tell me the fate of my thou canst not aid it?"

The White Lady again replied,—

"Dim burns the once bright star of Avenel, Dim as the beacon when the morn is nigh,
And the o'er-wearied warder leaves the light
There is an influence sorrowful and fearful,
That dogs its downward course. Disastrous Fierce hate and rivalry are in the aspect
That lowers upon its fortunes."

"And rivalry?" repeated Glendinning; as I feared!—But shall that English silk sume to beard me in my father's house, s presence of Mary Avenel?—Give me to spirit,—give me to do away the vain dist rank on which he refuses me the combat. on equal terms, and gleam the stars with w they will, the sword of my father shall co influences."

She answered as promptly as before,—

"Complain not of me, child of clay,
If to thy harm I yield the way.
We, who soar thy sphere above,
Know not aught of hate or love;
As will or wisdom rules thy mood,
My gifts to evil turn, or good."

"Give me to redeem my honour," said Glendinning—"give me to retort on my p the insults he has thrown on me, and let th as it will. If I cannot revenge my wron sleep quiet, and know nought of my disgra

The phantom failed not to reply,—

"When Piercie Shafton boasteth high,
Let this token meet his eye.
The sun is weshering from the dell,
Thy wish is granted—fare thee well!"

As the White Lady spoke or chanted t words, she undid from her locks a silve around which they were twisted, and gave t bert Glendinning; then shaking her disheve till it fell like a veil around her, the outline form gradually became as diffuse as her flowin es, her countenance grew pale as the moon in quarter, her features became indistinguish she melted into the air.

Habit inures us to wonders; but the youtl find himself alone by the fountain without cing, though in a much less degree, the rev spirits which he had felt upon the phantom disappearance. A doubt strongly pressed mind, whether it were safe to avail himse gifts of a spirit which did not even pretend to the class of angels, and might, for aught have a much worse lineage than that which pleased to avow. "I will speak of it," he Edward, who is clerkly learned, and will tell I should do. And yet, no—Edward is scrup wary,—I will prove the effect of her gift on ce Shafton if he again braves me, and by th will be myself a sufficient judge whether the ger in resorting to her counsel. Home then and we shall soon learn whether that ho longer hold me; for not again will I brook with my father's sword by my side, and Ma spectator of my disgrace."

* Werded—fated.

CHAPTER XVIII.

I give thee eighteenpence a-day,
And my bow shalt thou bear,
And over all the north country,
I make thee the chief rydere.
And I thirteenpence a day, quoth the queen,
By God and by my faye,
Come fetch thy payment when thou wilt,
No man shall say thee nay. — W[illegible]

'HE manners of the age did not permit the inhabitants of Glendearg to partake of the collation which s placed in the spence of that ancient tower, be- the Lord Abbot and his attendants, and Sir Pier- Shafton. Dame Glendinning was excluded, both inferiority of rank and by sex; for (though it was ile often neglected) the Superior of Saint Mary's s debarred from taking his meals in female society. Mary Avenel the latter, and to Edward Glendin- g the former, incapacity attached; but it pleased lordship to require their presence in the apartment, d to say sundry kind words to them upon the ready d hospitable reception which they had afforded him. The smoking haunch now stood upon the table; a pkin, white as snow, was, with due reverence, cked under the chin of the Abbot by the Refectioner; and nought was wanting to commence the repast, ve the presence of Sir Piercie Shafton, who at ngth appeared, glittering like the sun, in a carnan-velvet doublet, slashed and puffed out with cloth silver, his hat of the newest block, surrounded by atband of goldsmith's work, while around his neck wore a collar of gold, set with rubies and topazes rich, that it vindicated his anxiety for the safety of baggage from being founded upon his love of mere ery. This gorgeous collar or chain, resembling se worn by the knights of the highest orders of valry, fell down on his breast, and terminated in edallion.

We waited for Sir Piercie Shafton," said the Ab- , hastily assuming his place in the great chair ich the Kitchener advanced to the table with a dy hand.

I pray your pardon, reverend father, and my good l," replied that pink of courtesy; "I did but wait cast my riding slough, and to transmew myself some civil form meeter for this worshipful com- y."

I cannot but praise your gallantry, Sir Knight," the Abbot, "and your prudence also, for choosing fitting time to appear thus adorned. Certes, had t goodly chain been visible in some part of your progress, there was risk that the lawful owner ght have parted company therewith."

This chain, said your reverence?" answered Sir rcie; "surely it is but a toy, a trifle, a slight thing, ich shows but poorly with this doublet—marry, en I wear that of the murrey-coloured double-piled noa velvet, puffed out with Cyprus, the gems, ng relieved and set off by the darker and more ve ground of the stuff, show like stars giving a tre through dark clouds."

I nothing doubt it," said the Abbot; "but I pray to sit down at the board."

But Sir Piercie had now got into his element, and s not easily interrupted. "I own," he continued, at slight as the toy is, it might perchance hav some captivation for Julian Santa Maria!" d he, interrupting himself; "what was I about to , and my fair and beauteous Protection, or shall I er term her my Discretion, here in presence!— iscreet had it been in your Affability, O most lovely cretion, to suffer a stray word to have broke out the penfold of his mouth, that might overleap the ce of civility, and trespass on the manor of de- um."

"Marry!" said the Abbot, somewhat impatiently, he greatest discretion that I can see in the matter to eat our victuals being hot. Father Eustace, say a Benedicite, and cut up the haunch."

The Sub-Prior readily obeyed the first part of the bbot's injunction, but paused upon the second. "It Friday, most reverend," he said in Latin, desirous at the hint should escape, if possible, the ears of e stranger.

"We are travellers," said the Abbot, in reply, "and viatoribus licitum est—You know the canon—a traveller must eat what food his hard fate sets before him. I grant you all a dispensation to eat flesh this day, conditionally that you, brethren, say the Confiteor at curfew time, that the knight give alms to his ability, and that all and each of you fast from flesh on such day within the next month that shall seem most convenient; wherefore fall to and eat your food with cheerful countenances; and you, Father Refectioner, da mixtus."

While the Abbot was thus stating the conditions on which his indulgence was granted, he had already half finished a slice of the noble haunch, and now washed it down with a flagon of rhenish, modestly tempered with water.

"Well is it said," he observed, as he required from the Refectioner another slice, "that virtue is its own reward; for though this is but humble fare, and hastily prepared, and eaten in a poor chamber, I do not remember me of having had such an appetite since I was a simple brother in the Abbey of Dundrennan, and was wont to labour in the garden from morning until nones, when our Abbot struck the Cymbalum. Then would I enter keen with hunger, parched with thirst, (da mihi vinum, quæso, et merum sit,) and partake with appetite of whatever was set before us, according to our rule; feast or fast-day, caritas or penitentia, was the same to me. I had no stomach complaints then, which now crave both the aid of wine and choice cookery, to render my food acceptable to my palate, and easy of digestion."

"It may be, holy father," said the Sub-Prior, "an occasional ride to the extremity of St. Mary's patrimony, may have the same happy effect on your health as the air of the garden at Dundrennan."

"Perchance, with our patroness's blessing, such progresses may advantage us," said the Abbot; "having an especial eye that our venison is carefully killed by some woodsman that is master of his craft."

"If the Lord Abbot will permit me," said the Kitchener, "I think the best way to assure his lordship on that important point, would be to retain as a yeoman pricker, or deputy ranger, the eldest son of this good woman, Dame Glendinning, who is here to wait upon us. I should know by mine office what belongs to the killing of game, and I can safely pronounce, that never saw I, or any other coquinarius, a bolt so justly shot. It has cloven the very heart of the buck."

"What, speak you to us of one good shot, father?" said Sir Piercie; "I would advise you that such no more maketh a shooter, than doth one swallow make a summer. I have seen this springald of whom you speak, and if his hand can send forth his shafts as boldly as his tongue doth utter presumptuous speeches, I will own him as good an archer as Robin Hood."

"Marry," said the Abbot, "and it is fitting we know the truth of this matter from the Dame herself; for ill-advised were we to give way to any rashness in this matter whereby the bounties which heaven and our patroness provide might be unskilfully mangled and rendered unfit for worthy men's use. Stand forth, therefore, Dame Glendinning, and tell to us, as thy liege and spiritual Superior, using plainness and truth, without either fear or favour, as being a matter wherein we are deeply interested, Doth thy son of thine use his bow as well as the Father Kitchener avers to us?"

"So please your noble fatherhood," answered Dame Glendinning, with a deep curtsy, "I should know somewhat of archery to my cost, seeing my husband —God assoilzie him!—was slain in the field of Pinkie with an arrow-shot, while he was fighting under the Kirk's banner, as became a liege vassal of the Halidome. He was a valiant man, please your reverence, and an honest; and saving that he loved a bit of venison, and shifted for his living at a time as Borderman will sometimes do, I wot not of sin that he did. And yet, though I have paid for mass after mass, to the matter of a forty-shilling, besides a quarter of wheat and four firlots of rye, I can have no assurance yet that he has been delivered from purgatory."

bolt, or bullet through it, (so that right honourable gentleman swerve not, but hold out steady,) and I will forfeit a quarter of barley if he touch but a knot of his ribands. I have seen our old Martin do as much, and so has our right reverend the Sub-Prior, if he be pleased to remember it."

"I am not like to forget it, dame," said Father Eustace; "for I knew not which most to admire, the composure of the young marksman, or the steadiness of the old mark. Yet I presume not to advise Sir Piercie Shafton to subject his valuable beaver, and yet more valuable person, to such a risk, unless it should be his own special pleasure."

"Be assured it is not," said Sir Piercie Shafton, something hastily; "be well assured, holy father, that it is not. I dispute not the lad's qualities, for which your reverence vouches. But bows are but wood, strings are but flax, or the silk-worm's excrement at best; archers are but men, fingers may slip, eyes may dazzle, the blindest may hit the butt, the best marker may shoot a bow's length beside. Therefore will we try no perilous experiments."

"Be that as you will, Sir Piercie," said the Abbot; "meantime we will name this youth bow-bearer in the forest granted to us by good King David, that the chase might recreate our wearied spirits, the flesh of the deer improve our poor commons, and the hides cover the books of our library; thus tending at once to the sustenance of body and soul."

"Kneel down, woman, kneel down," said the Refectioner and the Kitchener, with one voice, to Dame Glendinning, "and kiss his lordship's hand, for the grace which he has granted to thy son."

They then, as if they had been chanting the service and the responses, set off in a sort of duetto, enumerating the advantages of the situation.

"A green gown and a pair of leathern galligaskins every Pentecost," said the Kitchener.

"Four marks by the year at Candlemas," answered the Refectioner.

"An hogshead of ale at Martlemas, of the double strike, and single ale at pleasure, as he shall agree with the Cellarer"——

"Who is a reasonable man," said the Abbot; "and will encourage an active servant of the convent."

"A mess of broth and a dole of mutton or beef at

"A moment's patience, my brethren the Sub-Prior, "and let us not be thu before cause is afforded of our amaz good dame best knoweth the temper and son—this much I can say, that it lieth letters or learning, of which I have in voured to instil into him some tincture less, he is a youth of no common spir like those (in my weak judgment) whon up among a people when he meanet deliverance shall be wrought out with hand and valour of heart. Such men w marked by a waywardness, and even an character, which hath appeared intra stupidity to those among whom they were conversant, until the very oppo arrived in which it was the will of Pro they should be the fitting instrument of g

"Now, in good time hast thou spo Eustace," said the Abbot; "and we swankie before we decide upon the mean ing him.—How say you, Sir Piercie Sha the court fashion to suit the man to th not the office to the man?"

"So please your reverence and lordshi the Northumbrian knight, "I do partl some sort, subscribe to what your wisdo vered- Nevertheless, under reverence Prior, we do not look for gallant leaders deliverers in the hovels of the mean con Credit me, that if there be some flashe spirit about this young person, which I s upon to dispute, (though I have seldom s sumption and arrogance were made go upshot by deed and action,) yet still the insufficient to distinguish him, save in his and lowly sphere—even as the glowwo makes a goodly show among the grass would be of little avail if deposited in a ba

"Now, in good time," said the Sub here comes the young huntsman to spe self;" for, being placed opposite to the could observe Halbert as he ascended the on which the tower was situated.

"Summon him to our presence," sa Abbot; and with an obedient start the t

mpany into which he was so unceremouded, and the greater part of whom were consider him with hauteur, if not with ntempt. But his appearance and reception vote to another chapter.

CHAPTER XIX.

oose thee, gallant, betwixt wealth and honour,
os the pelf, in sum to bear thee through ice of youth, and the turmoil of manhood,
e enough for age's chimney-corner;
hou grasp to it, farewell ambition,
l each hope of bettering thy condition,
in . thy low rank above the churls
l the earth for bread! —Old Play

ssary to dwell for some brief space on the
and demeanour of young Glendinning, eed to describe his interview with the aint Mary's, at this momentous crisis of

as now about nineteen years old, tall and r than strong, yet of that hardy conforma-
and sinew, which promises great strength
rowth shall be complete, and the system
He was perfectly well made, and, like who have that advantage, possessed a atural ease of manner and carriage, which
s height from being the distinguished part al appearance. It was not until you had is stature with that of those amongst or om he stood, that you became sensible ng Glendinning was upwards of six feet
he combination of unusual height with nmetry, ease, and grace of carriage, the
of Glendearg, notwithstanding his rustic ducation, had greatly the advantage even cie Shafton himself, whose stature was his limbs, though there was no particular ect to, were on the whole less exactly pro-
On the other hand, Sir Piercie's very ountenance afforded him as decided an over the Scotsman, as regularity of feabrilliance of complexion could give over were rather strongly marked than beauti-
on whose complexion the "skyey influ-which he was constantly exposed, had red and white into the purely nut-brown
coloured alike cheeks, neck, and forehead,
only in a darker glow upon the former.
yes supplied a marked and distinguished physiognomy. They were large and of a r, and sparkled in moments of animation ncommon brilliancy, that it seemed as if y emitted light. Nature had closely curled dark-brown hair, which relieved and set ires, such as we have described them, dis-
old and animated disposition, much more have been expected from his situation, or vious manners, which hitherto had seemed mely, and awkward.
dress was certainly not of that descrip-
sets off to the best advantage a presence possessing. His jerkin and hose were of e cloth, and his cap of the same. A belt aist served at once to sustain the broad-
h we have already mentioned, and to hold arrows and bird-bolts, which were stuck
the right side, along with a large knife
buck-horn, or, as it was then called, a dud-
r. To complete his dress, we must notice skins of deer's-hide, formed so as to draw
g as high as high as the knee, or at pleahrust down lower than the calves. These ally used at the period by such as either rincipal occupation, or their chief pleasure,
ports, as they served to protect the legs rough and tangled thickets into which of game frequently led them. —And these ticulars complete his external appearance.
o easy to do justice to the manner in which ndinning's soul spoke through his eyes,
ed so suddenly into the company of those earliest education had taught him to treat with awe and reverence. The degree of embarrassment which his demeanor evinced, had nothing in it either meanly servile, or utterly disconcerted. It was no more than became a generous and ingenuous youth of a bold spirit, but totally inexperienced, who should for the first time be called upon to think and act for himself in such society, and under such disadvantageous circumstances. There was not in his carriage a grain either of forwardness or of timidity,
which a friend could have wished away.

He kneeled and kissed the Abbot's hand, then rose and retiring two paces, bowed respectfully to the circle around, smiling gently as he received an encouraging nod from the Sub-Prior, to whom alone he was personally known, and blushing as he encountered
the anxious look of Mary Avenel, who beheld with painful interest the sort of ordeal to which her foster-brother was about to be subjected. Recovering from the transient flurry of spirits into which the encounter
of her glance had thrown him, he stood composedly
awaiting till the Abbot should express his pleasure.

The ingenuous expression of countenance, noble
form, and graceful attitude, of the young man, failed
not to prepossess in his favour the churchmen in whose presence he stood. The Abbot looked round, and exchanged a gracious and approving glance with his counsellor Father Eustace, although probably the appointment of a ranger, or bow-bearer, was one in which he might have been disposed to proceed without the Sub-Prior's advice, were it but to show his own free agency. But the good mien of the young man now in nomination was such, that he rather hastened to exchange congratulation on meeting with so proper a subject of promotion, than to indulge any other feeling. Father Eustace enjoyed the pleasure which a well-constituted mind derives from seeing a benefit light on a deserving object; for as he had not seen Halbert since circumstances had made so material a change in his manner and feelings, he scarce doubted that the proffered appointment would,
notwithstanding his mother's uncertainty, suit the disposition of a youth who had appeared devoted to woodland-sports, and a foe alike to sedentary or settled occupation of any kind. The Refectioner and Kitchener were so well pleased with Halbert's pre-possessing appearance, that they seemed to think that the salary, emoluments, and perquisites, the dole,
the grazing, the gown, and the galligaskins, could scarce be better bestowed than on the active and graceful figure before them.

Sir Piercie Shafton, whether from being more deeply engaged in his own cogitations, or that the subject was unworthy of his notice, did not seem to partake of the general feeling of approbation excited by the young man's presence. He sate with his eyes half shut, and his arms folded, appearing to be wrapped in contemplations of a nature deeper than those arising out of the scene before him. But, notwithstanding his seeming abstraction and absence of mind, there was a flutter of vanity in Sir Piercie's
very handsome countenance, an occasional change of posture from one striking attitude (or what he conceived to be such) to another, and an occasional stolen glance at the female part of the company, to spy how far he succeeded in riveting their attention,
which gave a marked advantage, in comparison to the less regular and more harsh features of Halbert Glendinning, with their composed, manly, and deliberate expression of mental fortitude.

Of the females belonging to the family of Glen-dearg, the Miller's daughter alone had her mind sufficiently at leisure to admire, from time to time, the graceful attitudes of Sir Piercie Shafton; for both Mary Avenel and Dame Glendinning were waiting in anxiety and apprehension the answer which Hal-bert was to return to the Abbot's proposal, and fearfully anticipating the consequences of his probable refusal. The conduct of his brother Edward, for a lad constitutionally shy, respectful, and even timid,
was at once affectionate and noble. This younger son of Dame Elspeth had stood unnoticed in a corner, after the Abbot, at the request of the Sub-Prior,
had honoured him with some passing notice, and asked him a few commonplace questions about his progress in Donatus, and in the Promptuarium Parvulorum, without waiting for the answers. From his corner he now glided round to his brother's side, and keeping a little behind him, slid his right hand into the huntsman's left, and by a gentle pressure, which Halbert instantly and ardently returned, expressed at once his interest in his situation, and his resolution to share his fate.

The group was thus arranged, when, after the pause of two or three minutes, which he employed in slowly sipping his cup of wine, in order that he might enter on his proposal with due and deliberate dignity, the Abbot at length expressed himself thus:

"My son, we your lawful superior, and the Abbot, under God's favour, of the community of Saint Mary's, have heard of your manifold good gifts—ahem—especially touching wood-craft and the huntsman-like fashion in which you strike your game, truly and as a yeoman should, not abusing Heaven's good benefits by spoiling the flesh, as is too often seen in careless rangers—ahem." He made here a pause, but observing that Glendinning only replied to his compliment by a bow, he proceeded,—"My son, we commend your modesty; nevertheless, we will that thou shouldst speak freely to us touching that which we have premeditated for thine advancement, meaning to confer on thee the office of bow-bearer and ranger, as well over the chases and forests wherein our house hath privilege by the gifts of pious kings and nobles, whose souls now enjoy the fruits of their bounties to the church, as to those which belong to us in exclusive right of property and perpetuity. Thy knee, my son—that we may, with our own hand, and without loss of time, induct thee into office."

"Kneel down," said the Kitchener on the one side; and "Kneel down," said the Refectioner on the other.

But Halbert Glendinning remained standing.

"Were it to show gratitude and good-will for your reverend lordship's noble offer, I could not," he said, "kneel low enough, or remain long enough kneeling. But I may not kneel to take investiture of your noble gift, my Lord Abbot, being a man determined to seek my fortune otherwise."

"How is that, sir?" said the Abbot, knitting his brows; "do I hear you speak aright? and do you, a born vassal of the Halidome, at the moment when I am destining to you such a noble expression of my good-will, propose exchanging my service for that of any other?"

"My lord," said Halbert Glendinning, "it grieves me to think you hold me capable of undervaluing your gracious offer, or of exchanging your service for another. But your noble proffer doth but hasten the execution of a determination which I have long since formed."

"Ay, my son," said the Abbot, "is it indeed so?—right early have you learned to form resolutions without consulting those on whom you naturally depend. But what may it be, this sagacious resolution, if I may so far pray you?"

"To yield up to my brother and mother," answered Halbert, "mine interest in the fief of Glendearg, lately possessed by my father, Simon Glendinning; and having prayed your lordship to be the same kind and generous master to them, that your predecessors, the venerable Abbots of Saint Mary's, have been to my fathers in time past; for myself, I am determined to seek my fortune where I may best find it."

Dame Glendinning here ventured, emboldened by maternal anxiety, to break silence with an exclamation of "O my son!" Edward clinging to his brother's side, half spoke, half whispered, a similar ejaculation, of "Brother! brother!"

The Sub-Prior took up the matter in a tone of grave reprehension, which, as he conceived, the interest he had always taken in the family of Glendearg required at his hand.

"Wilful young man," he said, "what folly can urge thee to push back the hand that is stretched out to aid thee? What visionary aim hast thou before thee, that can compensate for the decent and sufficient independence which thou art now rejecting with scorn?"

"Four marks by the year, duly and truly," said the Kitchener.

"Cow's-grass, doublet, and galligaskins," responded the Refectioner.

"Peace, my brethren," said the Sub-Prior; "and may it please your lordship, venerable father, upon my petition, to allow this headstrong youth a day for consideration, and it shall be my part so to indoctrinate him, as to convince him what is due on this occasion to your lordship, and to his family, and to himself."

"Your kindness, reverend father," said the youth, "craves my dearest thanks—it is the continuance of a long train of benevolence towards me, for which I gave you my gratitude, for I have nothing else to offer. It is my mishap, not your fault, that your intentions have been frustrated. But my present resolution is fixed and unalterable. I cannot accept the generous offer of the Lord Abbot; my fate calls me elsewhere, to scenes where I shall end it or mend it."

"By Our Lady," said the Abbot, "I think the youth be mad indeed—or that you, Sir Piercie, judged of him most truly, when you prophesied that he would prove unfit for the promotion we designed him—It may be you knew something of this wayward humour before?"

"By the mass, not I," answered Sir Piercie Shafton, with his usual indifference. "I but judged of him by his birth and breeding: for seldom doth a good hawk come out of a kite's egg."

"Thou art thyself a kite, and kestrel to boot," replied Halbert Glendinning, without a moment's hesitation.

"This in our presence, and to a man of worship!" said the Abbot, the blood rushing to his face.

"Yes, my lord," answered the youth; "even in your presence, I return to this gay man's face the causeless dishonour which he has flung on my name. My brave father who fell in the cause of his country, demands that justice at the hands of his son!"

"Unmannered boy!" said the Abbot.

"Nay, my good lord," said the knight, "praying pardon for the coarse interruption, let me entreat you not to be wroth with this rustical—Credit me, the north wind shall as soon puff one of your rocks from its basis, as aught which I hold so slight and inconsiderate as the churlish speech of an untaught churl, shall move the spleen of Piercie Shafton."

"Proud as you are, Sir Knight," said Halbert, "in your imagined superiority, be not too confident that you cannot be moved."

"Faith, by nothing that thou canst urge," said Sir Piercie.

"Knowest thou then this token?" said young Glendinning, offering to him the silver bodkin which he had received from the White Lady.

Never was such an instant change, from the most contemptuous serenity to the most furious state of passion, as that which Sir Piercie Shafton exhibited. It was the difference between a cannon lying quiet in its embrasure, and the same gun when touched by the linstock. He started up, every limb quivering with rage, and his features so inflamed and agitated by passion, that he more resembled a demoniac than a man under the regulation of reason. He clenched both his fists, and thrusting them forward, offered them furiously at the face of Glendinning, who was even himself startled at the frantic state of excitation which his action had occasioned. The next moment he withdrew them, struck his open palm against his own forehead, and rushed out of the room in a state of indescribable agitation. The whole matter had been so sudden, that no person present had time to interfere.

When Sir Piercie Shafton had left the apartment, there was a moment's pause of astonishment, and then a general demand that Halbert Glendinning should instantly explain by what means he had produced such a violent change in the deportment of the English cavalier.

"I did nought to him," answered Halbert Glendinning, "but what you all saw. Am I to answer for his fantastic freaks of humour?"

"Boy," said the Abbot, in his most authoritative manner, "these subterfuges shall not avail thee. This is not a man to be driven from his tempera-

without some sufficient cause. That cause ven by thee, and must have been known to
I command thee, as thou wilt save thyself orse measure, to explain to me by what means ist moved our friend thus—We choose not that ssals shall drive our guests mad in our very e, and we remain ignorant of the means where-purpose is effected."

may it please your reverence, I did but show s token," said Halbert Glendinning, delivering
e same time to the Abbot, who looked at it
uch attention, and then, shaking his head,
delivered it to the Sub-Prior, without speaking

er Eustace looked at the mysterious token me attention; and then addressing Halbert in and severe voice, said, "Young man, if thou
t not have us suspect thee of some strange dealing in this matter, let us instantly know thou hadst this token, and how it possesses ience on Sir Piercie Shafton?"—It would have tremely difficult for Halbert, thus hard pressed,
either evaded or answered so puzzling a ques-
To have avowed the truth might, in those times,
casioned his being burnt at a stake, although,
, his confession would have only gained for e credit of a liar beyond all rational credibility.
fortunately relieved by the return of Sir Piercie
n himself, whose ear caught, as he entered, the
of the Sub-Prior's question.

out waiting until Halbert Glendinning replied,
e forward, whispering to him as he passed,
et—thou shalt have the satisfaction thou
ed to seek for."

n he returned to his place, there were still
of discomposure on his brow; but, becoming ntly collected and calm, he looked around him, ologized for the indecorum of which he had uilty, which he ascribed to sudden and severe sition. All were silent, and looked on each vith some surprise.

Lord Abbot gave orders for all to retire from artment, save himself, Sir Piercie Shafton, and b-Prior. "And have an eye," he added, "on old youth, that he escape not; for if he hath ed by charm, or otherwise, on the health of rshipful guest, I swear by the alb and mitre
I wear, that his punishment shall be most lary."

y lord and venerable father," said Halbert,
g respectfully, "fear not but that I will abide
om. I think you will best learn from the wor-
l knight himself, what is the cause of his dis-rature, and how slight my share in it has been."

assured," said the knight, without looking up, er, while he spoke, "I will satisfy the Lord
."

these words the company retired, and with young Glendinning.

n the Abbot, the Sub-Prior, and the English
, were left alone, Father Eustace, contrary to stom, could not help speaking the first. "Ex-unto us, noble sir," he said, "by what mys-
means the production of this simple toy could move your spirit, and overcome your patience,
ou had shown yourself proof to all the provo-offered by this self-sufficient and singular
?"

knight took the silver bodkin from the good s hand, looked at it with great composure, and,
examined it all over, returned it to the Sub-saying at the same time, "In truth, venerable
, I cannot but marvel that the wisdom implied
n your silver hairs, and in your eminent rank,
l, like a babbling hound, (excuse the similitude,) thus loudly on a false scent. I were, indeed, slight to be moved than the leaves of the aspen which wag at the least breath of heaven, could ouched by such a trifle as this, which in no way
rns me more than if the same quantity of silver stricken into so many groats. Truth is, that ny youth upward, I have been subjected to such ady as you saw me visited with even now—a
and searching pain, which goeth through nerve and bone, even as a good brand in the hands of a brave soldier sheers through limb and sinew—but it passes away speedily, as you yourselves may judge."

"Still," said the Sub-Prior, "this will not account for the youth offering to you this piece of silver, as a token by which you were to understand something, and, as we must needs conjecture, something disagreeable."

"Your reverence is to conjecture what you will," said Sir Piercie; "but I cannot pretend to lay your judgment on the right scent when I see it at fault. I hope I am not liable to be called upon to account for the foolish actions of a malapert boy?"

"Assuredly," said the Sub-Prior, "we shall prosecute no inquiry which is disagreeable to our guest. Nevertheless," said he, looking to his Superior, "this chance may, in some sort, alter the plan your lordship had formed for your worshipful guest's residence for a brief term in this tower, as a place alike of secrecy and of security; both of which, in the terms which we now stand on with England, are circumstances to be desired."

"In truth," said the Abbot, "and the doubt is well thought on, were it as well removed; for I scarce know in the Halidome so fitting a place of refuge, yet see I not how to recommend it to our worshipful guest, considering the unrestrained petulance of this headstrong youth."

"Tush! reverend sirs,—what would you make of me?" said Sir Piercie Shafton. "I protest, by mine honour, I would abide in this house were I to choose. What! I take no exceptions at the youth for showing a flash of spirit, though the spark may light on mine own head. I honour the lad for it. I protest I will abide here, and he shall aid me in striking down a deer. I must needs be friends with him, an he be such a shot; and we will speedily send down to my Lord Abbot a buck of the first head, killed so artificially as shall satisfy even the reverend Kitchener."

This was said with such apparent ease and good-humour, that the Abbot made no farther observation on what had passed, but proceeded to acquaint his guest with the details of furniture, hangings, provisions, and so forth, which he proposed to send up to the Tower of Glendearg for his accommodation. This discourse, seasoned with a cup or two of wine, served to prolong the time until the reverend Abbot ordered his cavalcade to prepare for their return to the Monastery.

"As we have," he said, "in the course of this our toilsome journey, lost our meridian,* indulgence shall be given to those of our attendants who shall, from very weariness, be unable to attend the duty at prime,† and this by way of misericord or indulgentia."‡

Having benevolently intimated a boon to his faithful followers, which he probably judged would be far from unacceptable, the good Abbot, seeing all ready for his journey, bestowed his blessing on the assembled household—gave his hand to be kissed by Dame Glendinning—himself kissed the cheek of Mary Avenel, and even of the Miller's maiden, when they approached to render him the same homage—commanded Halbert to rule his temper, and to be aiding and obedient in all things to the English knight—admonished Edward to be discipulus impiger atque sine mora—then took a courteous farewell of Sir Piercie Shafton, advising him to lie close, for fear of the English borderers, who might be employed to kidnap him; and having discharged these various offices of courtesy, moved forth to the court-yard, followed by the whole establishment. Here, with a heavy sigh approaching to a groan, the venerable father heaved himself upon his palfrey, whose dark purple housings swept the ground; and, greatly comforted that the discretion of the animal's pace would be no longer

* The hour of repose at noon, which, in the middle ages, was employed in slumber, and which the monastic rules of nocturnal vigils rendered necessary.

† Prime was the midnight service of the monks.

‡ Misericord, according to the learned work of Fosbrooke on British Monachism, meant not only an indulgence, or exemption from particular duties, but also a particular apartment in a convent, where the monks assembled to enjoy such indulgences or allowances as were granted beyond the rule.

disturbed by the gambadoes of Sir Piercie and his prancing warhorse, he set forth at a sober and steady trot upon his return to the Monastery.

When the Sub-Prior had mounted to accompany his principal, his eye sought out Halbert, who, partly hidden by a projection of the outward wall of the court, stood apart from, and gazing upon the departing cavalcade, and the group who had assembled around them. Unsatisfied with the explanation he had received concerning the mysterious transaction of the silver bodkin, yet interesting himself in the youth, of whose character he had formed a favorable idea, the worthy monk resolved to take an early opportunity of investigating that matter. In the meanwhile, he looked upon Halbert with a serious and warning aspect, and held up his finger to him as he signed farewell. He then joined the rest of the churchman, and followed his Superior down the valley

CHAPTER XX.

> I hope you'll excuse me for to think you noble,
> And do me credit with your sweetheart, as he comes
> One gentleman of honour to another;
> All this is fair, sir—you have two days out,
> I'll lead your way. Love's Pilgrimage.

THE look and sign of warning which the Sub-Prior gave to Halbert Glendinning as they parted, went to his heart; for, although he had profited little less than Edward by the good man's instructions, he had a sincere reverence for his person; and even the short time he had for deliberation, tended to show him he was embarked in a perilous adventure. The nature of the provocation which he had given to Sir Piercie Shafton he could not even conjecture; but he saw that it was of a mortal quality, and he was now to abide the consequences.

That he might not force these consequences forward by any premature renewal of their quarrel, he resolved to walk apart for an hour, and consider on what terms he was to meet this haughty foreigner. The time seemed propitious for his doing so without having the appearance of wilfully shunning the stranger, as all the members of the little household were dispersing, either to perform such tasks as had been interrupted by the arrival of the dignitaries, or to put in order what had been deranged by their visit.

Leaving the tower, therefore, and descending, unobserved as he thought, the knoll on which it stood, Halbert gained the little piece of level ground which extended betwixt the descent of the hill, and the first sweep made by the brook after washing the foot of the eminence on which the tower was situated, where a few straggling birch and oak-trees served to secure him from observation. But scarcely had he reached the spot, when he was surprised to feel a smart tap upon the shoulder, and, turning around, he perceived he had been closely followed by Sir Piercie Shafton.

When, whether from our state of animal spirits, want of confidence in the justice of our cause, or any other motive, our own courage happens to be in a wavering condition, nothing tends so much altogether to disconcert us, as a great appearance of promptitude on the part of our antagonist. Halbert Glendinning, both morally and constitutionally intrepid, was nevertheless somewhat troubled at seeing the stranger whose resentment he had provoked, appear at once before him, and with an aspect which boded hostility. But though his heart might beat somewhat thicker, he was too high spirited to exhibit any external signs of emotion—"What is your pleasure, Sir Piercie?" he said to the English knight, enduring, without apparent discomposure, all the terrors which his antagonist had summoned into his aspect.

"What is my pleasure?" answered Sir Piercie; "a goodly question, after the part you have acted towards me!—Young man, I know not what infatuation has led thee to place thyself in direct and insolent opposition to one who is a guest of thy liege-lord the Abbot, and who, even from the courtesy due to thy mother's roof, had a right to remain there without meeting insult. Neither do I ask, or care, by what means thou hast become possessed of the fatal secret by which thou hast dared to offer me open shame. But I must now tell thee, that the possession of it hath cost thee thy life."

"Not, I trust, if my hand and sword can defend it," replied Halbert, boldly.

"True," said the Englishman; "I mean not to deprive thee of thy fair chance of self-defence. I am only sorry to think, that, young and country-bred as thou art, it can but little avail thee. But thou must be well aware, that in this quarrel I shall use no terms of quarter."

"Rely on it, proud man," answered the youth, "that I shall ask none; and although thou speakest as if I lay already at thy feet, trust me, that as I am determined never to ask thy mercy, so I am not fearful of needing it."

"Thou wilt, then," said the knight, "do nothing to avert the certain fate which thou hast provoked with such wantonness?"

"And how were that to be purchased?" replied Halbert Glendinning, more with the wish of obtaining some farther insight into the terms on which he stood with this stranger, than to make him the submission he might require.

"Explain to me instantly," said Sir Piercie, "without equivocation or delay, by what means thou wert enabled to wound my honour so deeply—and shouldst thou point out to me by so doing an enemy more worthy of my resentment, I will permit thine own obscure insignificance to draw a veil over thine insolence."

"This is too high a flight," said Glendinning, fiercely, "for thine own presumption to soar without being checked. Thou hast come to my father's house, as well as I can guess, a fugitive and an exile, and thy first greeting to its inhabitants has been that of contempt and injury. By what means I have been able to retort that contempt, let thine own conscience tell thee. Enough for me that I stand on the privilege of a free Scotchman, and will brook no insult unreturned, and no injury unrequited."

"It is well, then," said Sir Piercie Shafton; "we will dispute this matter to-morrow morning with our swords. Let the time be daybreak, and do thou assign the place. We will go forth as if to strike a deer."

"Content," replied Halbert Glendinning; "I will guide thee to a spot where an hundred men might fight and fall without any chance of interruption."

"It is well," answered Sir Piercie Shafton. "Here then we part.—Many will say, that in thus indulging the right of a gentleman to the son of a clod-breaking peasant, I derogate from my sphere, even as the blessed sun would derogate, should he condescend to compare and match his golden beams with the twinkle of a pale, blinking, expiring, grossfed taper. But no consideration of rank shall prevent my avenging the insult thou hast offered me. We bear a smooth face, observe me, Sir Villagio, before the worshipful inmates of yonder cabin, and to-morrow we try conclusions with our swords." So saying, he turned away towards the tower.

It may not be unworthy of notice, that in the last speech only, had Sir Piercie used some of those flowers of rhetoric which characterized the usual style of his conversation. Apparently, a sense of wounded honour, and the deep desire of vindicating his injured feelings, had proved too strong for the fantastic affectation of his acquired habits. Indeed, such is usually the influence of energy of mind, when called forth and exerted, that Sir Piercie Shafton had never appeared in the eyes of his youthful antagonist half so much deserving of esteem and respect as in this brief dialogue, by which they exchanged mutual defiance. As he followed him slowly to the tower, he could not help thinking to himself, that, had the English knight always displayed this superior tone of bearing and feeling, he would not probably have felt so earnestly disposed to take offence at his hand. Mortal offence, however, had been exchanged, and the matter was to be put to mortal arbitrement.

The family met at the evening meal, when Sir Piercie Shafton extended the benignity of his countenance

f his conversation far more generally an he had hitherto condescended to part of his attention was, of course,
his divine and inimitable Discretion,
rm Mary Avenel; but, nevertheless,
ectional flourishes to the Maid of the ttle of Comely Damsel, and to the t of Worthy Matron. Nay, lest he ate their admiration by the graces of generously, and without solicitation,
s voice; and after regretting bitterly
ns viol-de-gamba, he regaled them
ieh," said he, "the unimitable Astro-tals call Philip Sidney, composed in e muse, to show the world what they his riper years, and which will one
n that not-to-be-paralleled perfection
hie'r he has addressed to his sister,
rtteneope, whom men call Countess work." He continued, "whereof his e mitted me, though unworthy, to l partaker, and whereof I may well
ep affective tale which awaketh
o relieved with brilliant similitudes, us, pleasant poems, and engaging ey seem as the stars of the firmag the dusky robe of night. And
'll how much the lovely and quaint ller by my widowed voice, widowed ger enriched by my beloved viol-deay to give you a taste of the ravish-
the poesy of the un-to-be-imitated

ung without mercy or remorse about es, of which the two first and the lice for a specimen —

gne, even her perfections tell,
each part all pens may dwell.
* * * *
ugh praise and praisful bliss,
he can, Heaven paies is;
mortal fame doth send,
so I must end."

Shafton always sung with his eyes
not until, agreeably to the promise ad fairly made an end, that, looking red that the greater part of his au-
meanwhile, yielded to the charms
Avenel, indeed, from a natural sense contrived to keep awake through
of the divine Astrophel; but Mysie
in dreams back to the dusty atmos-r's mill; Edward himself, who had
for some time, had at length fallen
he good dame's nose, could its tones
ler regulation, might have supplied amented viol-de-gamba. Halbert,
d no temptation to give way to the er, remained awake, with his eyes
ster; not that he was better enter-words, or more ravished with the e rest of the company, but rather
d, or perhaps envied, the composure,
spend the evening in interminable
he next morning was to be devoted

Yet it struck his natural acuteness
at the eye of the gallant cavalier did tively as it were, seek a glance of s if to discover how he was taking his antagonist's composure and

othing in my countenance, thought that can make him think my indiffi-
his own.
n the shelf a bag full of miscella-ected for the purpose, he began with dress hooks, and had finished half-we are enabled, for the benefit of the antiquities of the gentle art of at they were brown hackles) by the cie had arrived at the conclusion of strophes of the divine Astrophel.
tified a magnanimous contempt of
rrow should bring forth.

As it now waxed late, the family of Glendearg separated for the evening; Sir Piercie first saying to the dame that "her son Albert"——

"Halbert," said Elspeth, with emphasis, "Halbert; after his goodsire, Halbert Brydone."

"Well, then, I have prayed your son, Halbert, that we may strive to-morrow, with the sun's earliness, to wake a stag from his lair, that I may see whether he be as prompt at that sport as fame bespeaks him."

"Alas! sir," answered Dame Elspeth, "he is but too prompt, an you talk of promptitude, at any thing that has steel at one end of it, and mischief at the other. But he is at your honourable disposal, and I trust you will teach him how obedience is due to our venerable father and lord, the Abbot, and prevail with him to take the bow-bearer's place in fee; for, as the two worthy monks said, it will be a great help to a widow woman."

"Trust me, good dame," replied Sir Piercie, "it is my purpose so to indoctrinate him, touching his conduct and bearing towards his betters, that he shall not lightly depart from the reverence due to them.—We meet, then, beneath the birch-trees in the plain," he said, looking to Halbert, "so soon as the eye of day hath opened its lids."—Halbert answered with a sign of acquiescence, and the knight proceeded, "And now, having wished to my fairest Discre[illegible] pleasant dreams which wave their pinions [illegible] couch of sleeping beauty, and to this cot[illegible] the bounties of Morpheus, and to all oth[illegible] mon good-night, I will crave you leave to [illegible] to my place of rest, though I may say with the poet,

'Ah rest!—no rest but change of place and posture;
Ah sleep!—no sleep but worn-out Nature's swooning;
Ah bed!—no bed but cushion fill'd with stones:
Rest, sleep, nor bed, await not on an exile'?"

With a delicate obeisance he left the room, evading Dame Glendinning, who hastened to assure him he would find his accommodations for repose much more agreeable than they had been the night before, there having been store of warm coverlets, and a soft feather-bed, sent up from the Abbey. But the good knight probably thought that the grace and effect of his exit would be diminished, if he were recalled from his heroics to discuss such sublunary and domestic topics, and therefore hastened away without waiting to hear her out.

"A pleasant gentleman," said Dame Glendinning; "but I will warrant him an humorous*—And sings a sweet song, though it is somewhat of the longest.—Well, I make mine avow he is goodly company—I wonder when he will go away."

Having thus expressed her respect for her guest, not without intimation that she was heartily tired of his company, the good dame gave the signal for the family to disperse, and laid her injunctions on Halbert to attend Sir Piercie Shafton at daybreak, as he required.

When stretched on his pallet by his brother's side, Halbert had no small cause to envy the sound sleep which instantly settled on the eyes of Edward, but refused him any share of its influence. He saw now too well what the Spirit had darkly indicated, that, in granting the boon which he had asked so unadvisedly, she had contributed more to his harm than his good. He was now sensible, too late, of the various dangers and inconveniences with which his dearest friends were threatened, alike by his discomfiture or his success in the approaching duel. If he fell, he might say personally, "good-night all." But it was not the less certain that he should leave a dreadful legacy of distress and embarrassment to his mother and family,—an anticipation which by no means tended to render the front of death, in itself a grisly object, more agreeable to his imagination. The vengeance of the Abbot, his conscience told him, was sure to descend on his mother and brother, or could only be averted by the generosity of the victor—And Mary Avenel—he should have shown himself, if he succumbed in the present combat, as inefficient in protecting her, as he had been unnecessarily active in bringing disaster on ner, and on the house in which she had been protected from infancy. And to this view of the case were to be added all those embittered and anxious feelings with which the bravest men, even in a better or less doubtful quarrel, regard the issue of a dubious conflict, the first time when it has been their fate to engage in an affair of that nature.

* Humorous—full of whims. Thus Shakspeare, "Humorous as winter."—The vulgar word humorsome comes nearest to the meaning.

But however disconsolate the prospect seemed in the event of his being conquered, Halbert could expect from victory little more than the safety of his own life, and the gratification of his wounded pride. To his friends—to his mother and brother—especially to Mary Avenel—the consequences of his triumph would be more certain destruction than the contingency of his defeat and death. If the English knight survived, he might in courtesy extend his protection to them; but if he fell, nothing was likely to screen them from the vindictive measures which the Abbot and convent would surely adopt against the violation of the peace of the Haladome, and the slaughter of a protected guest by one of their own vassals, within whose house they had lodged him for shelter. These thoughts, in which neither view of the case augured aught short of ruin to his family, and that ruin entirely brought on by his own rashness, were thorns in [illegible]t Glendinning's pillow, that deprived his [illegible]e, and his eyes of slumber.

[illegible]peared no middle course, saving one which [illegible]d by degradation, and which, even if he [illegible] to it, was by no means free of danger. He might indeed confess to the English knight the strange circumstances which led to his presenting him with that token which the White Lady (in her displeasure as it now seemed) had given him, that he might offer it to Sir Piercie Shafton. But to this avowal his pride could not stoop, and reason, who is wonderfully ready to be of counsel with pride on such occasions, offered many arguments to show it would be useless as well as mean so far to degrade himself. "If I tell a tale so wonderful," thought he, "shall I not either be stigmatized as a liar, or punished as a wizard?—Were Sir Piercie Shafton generous, noble, and benevolent, as the champions of whom we hear in romance, I might indeed gain his ear, and, without demeaning myself, escape from the situation in which I am placed. But as he is, or at least seems to be, self-conceited, arrogant, vain, and presumptuous—I should but humble myself in vain—and I will not humble myself!" he said, starting out of bed, grasping to his broad-sword, and brandishing it in the light of the moon, which streamed through the deep niche that served them as a window; when, to his extreme surprise and terror, an airy form stood in the moonlight, but intercepted not the reflection on the floor. Dimly as it was expressed, the sound of the voice soon made him sensible he saw the White Lady.

At no time had her presence seemed so terrific to him; for when he had invoked her, it was with the expectation of the apparition, and the determination to abide the issue. But now she had come uncalled, and her presence impressed him with a sense of approaching misfortune, and with the hideous apprehension that he had associated himself with a demon, over whose motions he had no control, and of whose powers and quality he had no certain knowledge. He remained, therefore, in mere terror, gazing on the apparition, which chanted or recited in cadence the following lines—

> "He whose heart for vengeance sued,
> Must not shrink from shedding blood;
> Tie knot that thou hast tied with word,
> Thou must loose by edge of sword."

"Avaunt thee, false Spirit!" said Halbert Glendinning; "I have bought thy advice too dearly already—Begone, in the name of God!"

The Spirit laughed; and the cold unnatural sound of her laughter had something in it more fearful than the usual melancholy tones of her voice. She then replied,—

> "You have summon'd me once—you have summon'd me twice,
> And without e'er a summons I come to you thrice;
> Unask'd for, unsued for, you came to my glen;
> Unsued and unask'd, I am with you again."

Halbert Glendinning gave way for a moment to terror, and called on his brother, "Edward! waken, waken, for our Lady's sake!"

Edward awaked accordingly, and asked what he wanted.

"Look out," said Halbert, "look up! seest thou no one in the room?"

"No, upon my good word," said Edward, looking out.

"What! seest thou nothing in the moonshine upon the floor there?"

"No, nothing," answered Edward, "save thyself, resting on thy naked sword. I tell thee, Halbert, thou shouldst trust more to thy spiritual arms, and less to those of steel and iron. For this many a night hast thou started and moaned, and cried out of fighting, and of spectres, and of goblins—thy sleep hath not refreshed thee—thy waking hath been a dream.—Credit me, dear Halbert, say the Pater and Credo, resign thyself to the protection of God, and thou wilt sleep sound and wake in comfort."

"It may be," said Halbert slowly, and having his eye still bent on the female form which to him seemed distinctly visible, "it may be—But tell me, dear Edward, seest thou no one on the chamber floor but me?"

"No one," answered Edward, raising himself on his elbow; "dear brother, lay aside thy weapon, say thy prayers, and lay thee down to rest."

While he thus spoke, the spirit smiled at Halbert as if in scorn; her wan cheek faded in the wan moonlight even before the smile had passed away, and Halbert himself no longer beheld the vision to which he had so anxiously solicited his brother's attention. "May God preserve my wits!" he said, as, laying aside his weapon, he again threw himself on his bed.

"Amen! my dearest brother," answered Edward; "but we must not provoke that heaven in our wantonness which we invoke in our misery.—Be not angry with me, my dear brother—I know not why you have totally of late estranged yourself from me—It is true, I am neither so athletic in body, nor so alert in courage, as you have been from your infancy; yet, till lately, you have not absolutely cast off my society—Believe me, I have wept in secret, though I forbore to intrude myself on your privacy. The time has been when you held me not so cheap; and when, if I could not follow the game so closely, or mark it so truly as you, I could fill up our intervals of pastime with pleasant tales of the olden times, which I had read or heard, and which excited even your attention as we sate and ate our provision by some pleasant spring—but now I have, though I know not why, lost thy regard and affection.—Nay, toss not thy arms about thee thus wildly," said the younger brother; "from thy strange dreams, I fear some touch of fever hath affected thy blood—let me draw closer around thee thy mantle."

"Forbear," said Halbert—"your care is needless—your complaints are without reason—your fears on my account are in vain."

"Nay, but hear me, brother," said Edward. "Your speech in sleep, and now even your waking dreams, are of beings which belong not to this world, or to our race—Our good Father Eustace says, that however we may not do well to receive all idle tales of goblins and spectres, yet there is warrant from holy Scripture to believe, that the fiends haunt waste and solitary places; and that those who frequent such wildernesses alone, are the prey, or the sport, of these wandering demons. And therefore, I pray thee, brother, let me go with you when you go next up the glen, where, as you well know, there be places of evil reputation.—Thou carest not for my escort; but, Halbert, such dangers are more safely encountered by the wise in judgment, than by the bold in bosom; and though I have small cause to boast of my own wisdom, yet I have that which ariseth from the written knowledge of elder times."

There was a moment during this discourse, when Halbert had wellnigh come to the resolution of disburdening his own breast, by intrusting Edward with all that weighed upon it. But when his brother reminded him that this was the morning of a high holiday, and that, setting aside all other business or e ought to go to the Monastery and shrive

fore Father Eustace, who would that day confessional, pride stepped in and con-wavering resolution. "I will not avow,"
, "a tale so extraordinary, that I may be as an impostor or something worse—I from this Englishman, whose arm and be no better than my own. My fathers his betters, were he as much distinguished he is by his quaint discourse."
nch has been said to save man, and woom falling, has yet a stronger influence on
when it embraces the cause of passion,
n fails to render it victorious over con-reason. Halbert once determined, though better course, at length slept soundly, and wakened by the dawn of day.

CHAPTER XXI.

ent, but indifferent—pshaw, he doth it not e who is his craft's master—nevertheless even a clown, or a bodily coxcomb
who was a master of defence.—Old Play.

e first gray peep of dawn, Halbert Glen-se and hastened to dress himself, girded pon, and took a cross-bow in his hand, as sport had been his sole object. He groped wn the dark and winding staircase, and as little noise as possible, the fastenings r door, and of the exterior iron grate. At tood free in the court-yard, and looking up
r, saw a signal made with a handkerchief indow. Nothing doubting that it was his he paused, expecting him. But it was el, who glided like a spirit from under the gged portal.
was much surprised, and felt, he knew not ne caught in the act of a meditated tres-presence of Mary Avenel had till that ver given him pain. She spoke, too, in a sorrow seemed to mingle with reproach, sked him with emphasis, "What he was
?"
ed his crossbow, and was about to express
he had meditated, when Mary interrupted

Halbert—that evasion were unworthy of word has hitherto been truth. You medie destruction of the deer—your hand and are armed at other game—you seek to do this stranger."
nerfore should I quarrel with our guest?"
Halbert, blushing deeply.
ire, indeed, many reasons why you should
d the maiden, "nor is there one of avail
you should—yet, nevertheless, such a quar-
now is searching after."
ould you suppose so, Mary?" said Halbert,
ng to hide his conscious purpose.—"he is
's guest—he is protected by the Abbot and
nity, who are our masters—he is of high
,—and wherefore should you think that I , resent a hasty word, which he has per-own out against me more from the wan-
his wit, than the purpose of his heart?"
answered the maiden, "the very asking
on puts your resolution beyond a doubt.
childhood you were ever daring, seeking er than avoiding it—delighting in what-
e air of adventure and of courage; and it fear that you will now blench from your
let it then be from pity! from pity,
your aged mother, whom your death or alike deprive of the comfort and stay of s my brother Edward," said Halbert, turn-ly from her.

s indeed," said Mary Avenel, "the calm,
ninded, the considerate Edward, who has
e, Halbert, without thy fiery rashness,—
is spirit, with more of reason to guide it.
ot have heard his mother, would not have lopted sister, beseech him in vain not to ruin himself, and tear up their future hopes of happiness and protection."

Halbert's heart swelled as he replied to this reproach, "Well—what avails it speaking?—you have him that is better than me—wiser, more considerate—braver, for aught that I know—you are provided with a protector, and need care no more for me."

Again he turned to depart, but Mary Avenel laid her hand on his arm so gently that he scarce felt her hold, yet felt that it was impossible for him to strike it off. There he stood, one foot advanced to leave the court-yard, but so little determined on departure, that he resembled a traveller arrested by the spell of a magician, and unable either to quit the attitude of motion, or to proceed on his course.

Mary Avenel availed herself of his state of suspense. "Hear me," she said, "hear me, Halbert!—I am an orphan, and even Heaven bears the orphan—I have been the companion of your infancy, and if you will not hear me for an instant, from whom may Mary Avenel claim so poor a boon?"

"I hear you," said Halbert Glendinning, "but be brief, dear Mary—you mistake the nature of my business—it is but a morning of summer sport which we propose."

"Say not thus," said the maiden, interrupting him, "say not thus to me—others thou mayest deceive, but me thou canst not—There has been that in me from the earliest youth, which fraud [illegible], and which imposture cannot deceive. For [illegible] has given me such a power I know not; but bred an ignorant maiden in this sequestered valley, mine eyes can too often see what man would most willingly hide—I can judge of the dark purpose, though it is hid under the smiling brow, and a glance of the eye says more to me than oaths and protestations do to others."

"Then," said Halbert, "if thou canst so read the human heart,—say, dear Mary—what dost thou see in mine?—tell me that—say that what thou seest—what thou readest in this bosom, does not offend thee—say but that, and thou shalt be the guide of my actions, and mould me now and henceforward to honour or to dishonour at thy own free will!"

Mary Avenel became first red, and then deadly pale, as Halbert Glendinning spoke. But when, turning round at the close of his address, he took her hand, she gently withdrew it, and replied, "I cannot read the heart, Halbert, and I would not of my will know aught of yours, save what beseems us both—I only can judge of signs, words, and actions of little outward import, more truly than those around me, as my eyes, thou knowest, have seen objects not presented to those of others."

"Let them gaze then on one whom they shall never see more," said Halbert, once more turning from her, and rushing out of the court-yard without again looking back.

Mary Avenel gave a faint scream, and clasped both her hands firmly on her forehead and eyes. She had been a minute in this attitude, when she was thus greeted by a voice from behind: "Generously done, my most clement Discretion, to hide those brilliant eyes from the far inferior beams which even now begin to gild the eastern horizon—Certes, peril there were that Phœbus, outshone in splendour, might in very shamefacedness turn back his car, and rather leave the world in darkness, than incur the disgrace of such an encounter—Credit me, lovely Discretion"—

But as Sir Piercie Shafton (the reader will readily set down these flowers of eloquence to the proper owner) attempted to take Mary Avenel's hand, in order to proceed in his speech, she shook him abruptly off, and regarding him with an eye which evinced terror and agitation, rushed past him into the tower.

The knight stood looking after her with a countenance in which contempt was strongly mingled with mortification. "By my knighthood!" he ejaculated, "I have thrown away upon this rude rustic Phidelé a speech, which the proudest beauty at the court of Felicia (so let me call the Elysium from which I am banished!) might have termed the very matins of Cupid. Hard and inexorable was the fate that sent thee thither, Piercie Shafton, to waste thy wit upon country wenches, and thy valour upon hobnailed clowns! But that insult—that affront—had it been offered to me by the lowest plebeian, he must have died for it by my hand, in respect the enormity of the offence doth countervail the inequality of him by whom it was given. I trust I shall find this clownish roisterer not less willing to deal in blows than in taunts."

While he held this conversation with himself, Sir Piercie Shafton was hastening to the little tuft of birch-trees which had been assigned as the place of meeting. He greeted his antagonist with a courtly salutation, followed by this commentary: "I pray you to observe, that I doff my hat to you, though so much my inferior in rank, without derogation on my part, inasmuch as my having so far honoured you in receiving and admitting your defiance, doth, in the judgment of the best martialists, in some sort and for the time, raise you to a level with me—an honour which you may and ought to account cheaply purchased, even with the loss of your life, if such should chance to be the issue of this duello."

"For which condescension," said Halbert, "I have to thank the token which I presented to you."

The knight changed colour, and ground his teeth with rage. "Draw your weapon!" said he to Glendinning.

"Not in this spot," answered the youth; "we are liable to interruption—Follow me, and I will lead you to a place where we shall encounter no such risk."

He proceeded to walk up the glen, resolving that their place of combat should be in the entrance of the Corri-nan-shian; both because the spot, lying under the reputation of being haunted, was very little frequented, and also because he regarded it as a place which to him might be termed fated, and which he therefore resolved should witness his death or victory.

They walked up the glen for some time in silence, like honourable enemies who did not wish to contend with words, and who had nothing friendly to exchange with each other. Silence, however, was always an irksome state with Sir Piercie, and, moreover, his anger was usually a hasty and short-lived passion. As, therefore, he went forth, in his own idea, in all love and honour towards his antagonist, he saw not any cause for submitting longer to the painful restraint of positive silence. He began by complimenting Halbert on the alert activity with which he surmounted the obstacles and impediments of the way.

"Trust me," said he, "worthy rustic, we have not a lighter or a firmer step in our courtlike revels, and if duly set forth by a silk hose, and trained unto that stately exercise, your leg would make an indifferent good show in a pavin or a galliard. And I doubt nothing," he added, "that you have availed yourself of some opportunity to improve yourself in the art of fence, which is more akin than dancing to our present purpose?"

"I know nothing more of fencing," said Halbert, "than hath been taught me by an old shepherd of ours, called Martin, and at whiles a lesson from Christie of the Clinthill—for the rest, I must trust to good sword, strong arm, and sound heart."

"Marry and I am glad of it, young Audacity, (I will call you my Audacity, and you may call me your Condescension, while we are on these terms of unnatural equality,) I am glad of your ignorance with all my heart. For we martialists proportion the punishments which we inflict upon our opposites, to the length and hazard of the efforts wherewith they oppose themselves to us. And I see not why you, being but a tyro, may not be held sufficiently punished for your outrecuidance and orgillous presumption, by the loss of an ear, an eye, or even of a finger, accompanied by some flesh-wound of depth and severity, suited to your error—whereas, had you been able to stand more effectually on your defence, I see not how less than your life could have atoned sufficiently for your presumption."

"Now, by God and Our Lady," said Halbert, unable any longer to restrain himself, "thou art thyself over presumptuous, who speakest thus daringly of the issue of a combat which is not yet even begun—Are you a god, that you already dispose of my life and limbs? or are you a judge in the justice-air, telling, at your ease and without risk, how the head and quarters of a condemned criminal are to be disposed of?"

"Not so, O thou, whom I have well permitted to call thyself my Audacity! I, thy Condescension, am neither a god to judge the issue of the combat before it is fought, nor a judge to dispose at my ease and in safety of the limbs and head of a condemned criminal; but I am an indifferent good master of fence, being the first pupil of the first master of the first school of fence that our royal England affords, the said master being no other than the truly noble, and all-unutterably-skilful Vincentio Saviola, from whom I learned the firm stop, quick eye, and nimble hand—of which qualities thou, O my most rustical Audacity, art full like to reap the fruits, so soon as we shall find a piece of ground fitting for such experiments."

They had now reached the gorge of the ravine where Halbert had at first intended to stop; but when he observed the narrowness of the level ground, he began to consider that it was only by superior agility that he could expect to make up his deficiency in the science, as it was called, of defence. He found no spot which afforded sufficient room to traverse for this purpose, until he gained the well-known fountain, by whose margin, and in front of the huge rock from which it sprung, was an amphitheatre of level turf, of small space indeed, compared with the great height of the cliffs with which it was surrounded on every point save that from which the rivulet issued forth, yet large enough for their present purpose.

When they had reached this spot of ground, fitted well by its gloom and sequestered situation to be a scene of mortal strife, both were surprised to observe that a grave was dug close by the foot of the rock with great neatness and regularity, the green turf being laid down upon the one side, and the earth thrown out in a heap upon the other. A mattock and shovel lay by the verge of the grave.

Sir Piercie Shafton bent his eye with unusual seriousness upon Halbert Glendinning, as he asked him sternly, "Does this bode treason, young man? And have you purpose to set upon me here as in an embuscata or place of vantage?"

"Not on my part, by Heaven!" answered the youth; "I told no one of our purpose, nor would I for the throne of Scotland take odds against a single arm."

"I believe thou wouldst not, mine Audacity," said the knight, resuming the affected manner which was become a second nature to him; "nevertheless this fosse is curiously well shaped, and might be the masterpiece of Nature's last bed-maker. I would say the sexton—Wherefore, let us be thankful to chance, or some unknown friend, who hath thus provided for one of us the decencies of sepulture, and let us proceed to determine which shall have the advantage of enjoying this place of undisturbed slumber."

So saying, he stripped off his doublet and cloak, which he folded up with great care, and deposited upon a large stone, while Halbert Glendinning, not without some emotion, followed his example. Their vicinity to the favourite haunt of the White Lady led him to form conjectures concerning the incident of the grave—"It must have been her work!" he thought: "the Spirit foresaw and has provided for the fatal event of the combat—I must return from this place a homicide, or I must remain here for ever!"

The bridge seemed now broken down behind him, and the chance of coming off honourably without killing or being killed, (the hope of which issue has cheered the sinking heart of many a duellist,) seemed now to be altogether removed. Yet the very desperation of his situation gave him, on an instant's reflection, both firmness and courage, and presented to him one sole alternative, namely, conquest or death.

"As we are here," said Sir Piercie Shafton, "unaccompanied by any patrons or seconds, it were well you should pass your hands over my side, as I shall over yours; not that I suspect you to use any sword device of privy armour, but in order to comply with the ancient and laudable custom practised on all such occasions."

While, complying with his antagonist's humour, Halbert Glendinning went through this ceremony, Sir Piercie Shafton did not fail to solicit his attention to the quality and fineness of his wrought and embroidered shirt—"In this very shirt," said he, "O mine Audacity, —I say in this very garment, in which I am now to combat a Scottish rustic like thyself, it was my envied lot to lead the winning party at that wondrous match at ballon, made betwixt the divine Astrophel, (our matchless Sidney,) and the right honourable my very good lord of Oxford. All the beauties of Felicia (by which name I distinguish our beloved England) stood in the gallery, waving their kerchiefs at each turn of the game, and cheering the winners by their plaudits. After which noble sport we were refreshed by a suitable banquet, whereat it pleased the noble Urania (being the unmatched Countess of Pembroke) to accommodate me with her own fan for the cooling my somewhat too much inflamed visage, to requite which courtesy, I said, casting my features into a smiling yet melancholy fashion, O divinest Urania! receive again that too fatal gift, which not like the Zephyr cooleth, but like the hot breath of the Sirocco heateth yet more, that which is already inflamed. Whereupon, looking upon me somewhat scornfully, yet not so but what the experienced courtier might perceive a certain cast of approbative affection"——

Here the knight was interrupted by Halbert, who had waited with courteous patience for some little time, till he found, that far from drawing to a close, Sir Piercie seemed rather inclined to wax prolix in his reminiscences.

"Sir Knight," said the youth, "if this matter be not very much to the purpose, we will, if you object not, proceed to that which we have in hand. You should have abidden in England had you desired to waste time in words, for here we spend it in blows."

"I crave your pardon, most rusticated Audacity," answered Sir Piercie; "truly I become oblivious of every thing beside, when the recollections of the divine court of Felicia press upon my weakened memory, even as a saint is dazzled when he bethinks him of the beatific vision. Ah, fortunous Felicaana! delicate nurse of the fair, chosen abode of the wise, the birth-place and cradle of nobility, the temple of courtesy, the fane of sprightly chivalry—Ah, heavenly court, or rather court-ly heaven! cheered with dances, lulled asleep with harmony, wakened with sprightly sports and tourneys, decored with silks and tissues, glittering with diamonds and jewels, standing on end with double-piled velvets, satins, and satinettas!"

"The token, Sir Knight, the token!" exclaimed Halbert Glendinning, who, impatient of Sir Piercie's interminable oratory, reminded him of the ground of their quarrel, as the best way to compel him to the purpose of their meeting.

And he judged right; for Sir Piercie Shafton no sooner heard him speak, than he exclaimed, "Thy death-hour has struck—betake thee to thy sword —Via!"

Both swords were unsheathed, and the combatants commenced their engagement. Halbert became immediately aware, that, as he had expected, he was far inferior to his adversary in the use of his weapon. Sir Piercie Shafton had taken no more than his own share of real merit, when he termed himself an absolutely good fencer; and Glendinning soon found that he should have great difficulty in escaping with life and honour from such a master of the sword. The English knight was master of all the mystery of the stoccata, imbroccata, puntoreverso, incartata, and so forth, which the Italian masters of defence had lately introduced into general practice. But Glendinning, on his part, was no novice in the principles of the art, according to the old Scottish fashion, and possessed the first of all qualities, a steady and collected mind. At first, being desirous to try the skill, and become acquainted with the play of his enemy, he stood on his defence, keeping his foot, hand, eye, and body, in perfect unison, and holding his sword short, and with the point towards his antagonist's face, so that Sir Piercie, in order to assail him, was obliged to make actual passes, and could not avail himself of his skill in making feints; while, on the other hand, Halbert was prompt to parry these attacks, either by shifting his ground, or with the sword. The consequence was, that after two or three sharp attempts on the part of Sir Piercie, which were evaded or disconcerted by the address of his opponent, he began to assume the defensive in his turn, fearful of giving some advantage by being repeatedly the assailant. But Halbert was too cautious to press on a swordsman whose dexterity had already more than once placed him within a hair's-breadth of death, which he had only escaped by uncommon watchfulness and agility.

When each had made a feint or two, there was a pause in the conflict, both as if by one assent dropping their swords' point, and looking on each other for a moment without speaking. At length Halbert Glendinning, who felt perhaps more uneasy on account of his family than he had done before he had displayed his own courage, and proved the strength of his antagonist, could not help saying, "Is the subject of our quarrel, Sir Knight, so mortal, that one of our two bodies must needs fill up that grave?—or may we with honour, having proved ourselves against each other, sheathe our swords and depart friends?"

"Valiant and most rustical Audacity," said the Southron knight, "to no man on earth could you have put a question on the code of honour, who was more capable of rendering you a reason. Let us pause for the space of one venue, until I give you my opinion on this dependence;* for certain it is, that brave men should not run upon their fate like brute and furious wild beasts, but should slay each other deliberately, decently, and with reason. Therefore, if we coolly examine the state of our dependence, we may the better apprehend whether the sisters three have doomed one of us to expiate the same with his blood. Dost thou understand me?"

"I have heard Father Eustace," said Halbert, after a moment's recollection, "speak of the three furies, with their thread and their shears."

"Enough—enough,"—interrupted Sir Piercie Shafton, crimsoning with a new fit of rage, "the thread of thy life is spun!"

And with these words he attacked with the utmost ferocity the Scottish youth, who had but just time to throw himself into a posture of defence. But the rash fury of the assailant, as frequently happens, disappointed its own purpose; for, as he made a desperate thrust, Halbert Glendinning avoided it, and ere the knight could recover his weapon, requited him (to use his own language) with a resolute stoccata which passed through his body, and Sir Piercie Shafton fell to the ground.

CHAPTER XXII.

> Yes, life hath left him—every busy thought,
> Each fiery passion, every strong affection,
> All sense of outward ill and inward sorrow,
> Are fled at once from the pale trunk before me;
> And I have given the spark which spoke and moved,
> Thought, acted, suffer'd as a living man,
> To be a ghastly form of bloody clay,
> Soon the foul food for reptiles.—Old Play.

I BELIEVE few successful duellists (if the word successful can be applied to a superiority so fatal) have beheld their dead antagonist stretched on the earth at their feet, without wishing they could redeem with their own blood that which it has been their fate to spill. Least of all could such indifference be the lot of so young a man as Halbert Glendinning, who, unused to the sight of human blood, was not only struck with sorrow, but with terror, when he beheld Sir Piercie Shafton lie stretched on the green-sward before him, vomiting gore as if impelled by the stroke of a pump. He threw his bloody sword on the ground, and hastened to kneel down and support him, vain!

* Dependence—A phrase among the brethren of the sword an existing quarrel.

striving, at the same time, to stanch his wound, which seemed rather to bleed inwardly than externally.

The unfortunate knight spoke at intervals, when the syncope would permit him, and his words, so far as intelligible, partook of his affected and conceited, yet not ungenerous character.

"Most rustical youth," he said, "thy fortune hath prevailed over knightly skill—and Audacity hath overcome Condescension, even as the kite hath sometimes hawked at and struck down the falcon-gentle. Fly and save thyself! Take my purse—it is in the nether pocket of my carnation-coloured hose—and is worth a clown's acceptance. See that my mails, with my vestments, be sent to the Monastery of Saint Mary's"—(here his voice grew weak, and his mind and recollection seemed to waver)—"I bestow the cut velvet 'erkin, with close breeches conforming—for oh! the good of my soul."

"Be of good comfort, sir," said Halbert, half distracted with his agony of pity and remorse. "I trust you shall yet do well—O for a leech!"

"Were there twenty physicians, O most generous Audacity, and that were a grave spectacle—I might not survive—my life is ebbing fast.—Commend me to the rustical nymph whom I called my Discretion—O Claridiana!—true empress of this bleeding heart—which now bleedeth in sad earnest!—Place me on the ground at my length, most rustical victor, born to quench the pride of the burning light of the most felicitous court of Feliciana—O saints and angels knights and ladies—masques and theatres quaint devices—chain-work and broidery—love, honour, and beauty!"——

While muttering these last words, which slid from him, as it were unawares, while doubtless he was recalling to mind the glories of the English court, the gallant Sir Piercie Shafton stretched out his limbs—groaned deeply, shut his eyes, and became motionless.

The victor tore his hair for very sorrow, as he looked on the pale countenance of his victim. Life, he thought, had not utterly fled, but without better aid than his own, he saw not how it could be preserved.

"Why," he exclaimed, in vain penitence, "why did I provoke him to an issue so fatal! Would to God I had submitted to the worst insult man could receive from man, rather than be the bloody instrument of this bloody deed—and doubly cursed be this evil-boding spot, which, haunted as I knew it to be by a witch or a devil, I yet chose for the place of combat! In any other place, save this, there had been help to be gotten by speed of foot, or by uplifting of voice—but here there is no one to be found by search, no one to hear my shouts, save the evil spirit who has counselled this mischief. It is not her hour—I will essay the spell howsoever; and if she can give me aid, she shall do it, or know of what a madman is capable even against those of another world!"

He spurned his bloody shoe from his foot, and repeated the spell with which the reader is well acquainted; but there was neither voice, apparition, nor signal of answer. The youth, in the impatience of his despair, and with the rash hardihood which formed the basis of his character, shouted aloud "Witch—Sorceress—Fiend!—art thou deaf to my cries for help, and so ready to appear and answer those of vengeance? Arise and speak to me, or I will choke up thy fountain, tear down thy hollybush, and leave thy haunt as waste and bare, as thy fatal assistance has made me waste of comfort and bare of counsel!"—This furious and raving invocation was suddenly interrupted by a distant sound, resembling a hallo, from the gorge of the ravine. "Now may saint Mary be praised," said the youth, hastily fastening his sandal, "I hear the voice of some living man, who may give me counsel and help in this fearful extremity!"

Having donned his sandal, Halbert Glendinning, hallooing at intervals, in answer to the sound which he had heard, ran with the speed of a hunted buck down the rugged defile, as if paradise had been before him, hell and all her furies behind, and his eternal happiness or misery had depended upon the speed which he exerted. In a space incredibly short for any one but a Scottish mountaineer having his nerves strung by the deepest and most passionate interest, the youth reached the entrance of the ravine, through which the rill that flows down Corri-nan-shian discharges itself, and unites with the brook that waters the little valley of Glendearg.

Here he paused, and looked around him upwards and downwards through the glen, without perceiving a human form. His heart sank within him. But the windings of the glen intercepted his prospect, and the person, whose voice he had heard, might, therefore, be at no great distance, though not obvious to his sight. The branches of an oak tree, which shot straight out from the face of a tall cliff, proffered to his bold spirit, steady head, and active limbs, the means of ascending it as a place of out-look, although the enterprise was what most men would have shrunk from. But by one bound from the earth, the active youth caught hold of the lower branch, and swung himself up into the tree, and in a minute more gained the top of the cliff, from which he could easily descry a human figure descending the valley. It was not that of a shepherd, or of a hunter, and scarcely any others used to traverse this deserted solitude, especially coming from the north, since the reader may remember that the brook took its rise from an extensive and dangerous morass which lay in that direction.

But Halbert Glendinning did not pause to consider who the traveller might be, or what might be the purpose of his journey. To know that he saw a human being, and might receive, in the extremity of his distress, the countenance and advice of a fellow-creature, was enough for him at the moment. He threw himself from the pinnacle of the cliff once more into the arms of the projecting oak tree, whose boughs waved in middle air, anchored by the roots in a huge rift, or chasm of the rock. Catching at the branch which was nearest to him, he dropped himself from that height upon the ground; and such was the athletic springiness of his youthful sinews, that he pitched there as lightly, and with as little injury, as the falcon stooping from her wheel.

To resume his race at full speed up the glen, was the work of an instant; and as he turned angle after angle of the indented banks of the valley, without meeting that which he sought, he became half afraid that the form which he had seen at such a distance had already melted into thin air, and was either a deception of his own imagination, or of the elementary spirits by which the valley was supposed to be haunted.

But, to his inexpressible joy, as he turned round the base of a huge and distinguished crag, he saw, straight before and very near to him, a person, whose dress, as he viewed it hastily, resembled that of a pilgrim.

He was a man in advanced life, and wearing a long beard, having on his head a large slouched hat, without either band or brooch. His dress was a tunic of black serge, which, like those commonly called hussar-cloaks, had an upper part, which covered the arms and fell down on the lower; a small scrip and bottle, which hung at his back, with a stout staff in his hand, completed his equipage. His step was feeble, like that of one exhausted by a toilsome journey.

"Save ye, good father!" said the youth. "God and Our Lady have sent you to my assistance."

"And in what, my son, can so frail a creature as I am, be of service to you?" said the old man, not a little surprised at being thus accosted by so handsome a youth, his features discomposed by anxiety, his face flushed with exertion, his hands and much of his dress stained with blood.

"A man bleeds to death in the valley here, hard by. Come with me—come with me! You are aged—you have experience—you have at least your senses—and mine have well-nigh left me."

"A man, and bleeding to death—and here in this desolate spot?" said the stranger.

"Stay not to question it, father," said the youth, "but come instantly to his rescue. Follow me—follow me, without an instant's delay."

"Nay, but my son," said the old man, "we do not lightly follow the guides who present themselves thus suddenly in the bosom of a howling wilderness. Ere I follow thee, thou must expound to me thy name, thy purpose, and the cause."

"There is no time to expound any thing," said Halbert; "I tell thee a man's life is at stake, and thou must come to aid him, or I will carry thee thither by force!"

"Nay, thou shalt not need," said the traveller; "if it indeed be as thou sayest, I will follow thee of free will—the rather that I am not wholly unskilled in leech-craft, and have in my scrip that which may do thy friend a service.—Yet walk more slowly, I pray thee, for I am already well-nigh forespent with travel."

With the indignant impatience of the fiery steed when compelled by his rider to keep pace with some slow drudge upon the highway, Halbert accompanied the wayfarer, burning with anxiety, which he endeavoured to subdue, that he might not alarm his companion, who was obviously afraid to trust him. When they reached the place where they were to turn off the wider glen into the Corri, the traveller made a doubtful pause, as if unwilling to leave the broader path—"Young man," he said, "if thou meanest aught but good to these gray hairs, thou wilt gain little by thy cruelty—I have no earthly treasure to tempt either robber or murderer."

"And I," said the youth, "am neither—and yet—God of Heaven!—I may be a murderer, unless your aid comes in time to this wounded wretch!"

"Is it even so?" said the traveller; "and do human passions disturb the breast of nature even in her deepest solitude?—Yet why should I marvel that where darkness abides the works of darkness should abound?—By its fruits is the tree known.—Lead on, unhappy youth—I follow thee!"

And with better will to the journey than he had evinced hitherto, the stranger exerted himself to the uttermost, and seemed to forget his own fatigue in his efforts to keep pace with his impatient guide.

What was the surprise of Halbert Glendinning, when, upon arriving at the fatal spot, he saw no appearance of the body of Sir Piercie Shafton! The traces of the fray were otherwise sufficiently visible. The knight's cloak had indeed vanished as well as the body, but his doublet remained where he had laid it down, and the turf on which he had been stretched was stained with blood in many a dark crimson spot.

As he gazed round him in terror and astonishment, Halbert's eyes fell upon the place of sepulture which had so lately appeared to gape for a victim. It was no longer open, and it seemed that earth had received the expected tenant; for the usual narrow hillock was piled over what had lately been an open grave, and the green sod was adjusted over all with the accuracy of an experienced sexton. Halbert stood aghast. The idea rushed on his mind irresistibly, that the earth-heap before him enclosed what had lately been a living, moving, and sentient fellow-creature, whom, on little provocation, his fell act had reduced to a clod of the valley, as senseless and as cold as the turf under which he rested. The hand that scooped the grave had completed its work; and whose hand could it be save that of the mysterious being of doubtful quality, whom his rashness had invoked, and whom he had suffered to intermingle in his destinies?

As he stood with clasped hands and uplifted eyes, bitterly rueing his rashness, he was roused by the voice of the stranger, whose suspicions of his guide had again been awakened by finding the scene so different from what Halbert had led him to expect—"Young man," he said, "hast thou baited thy tongue with falsehood, to cut perhaps only a few days from the life of one whom Nature will soon call home without guilt on thy part to hasten his journey?"

"By the blessed Heaven!—by our dear Lady!" ejaculated Halbert—

"Swear not at all!" said the stranger, interrupting him, "neither by Heaven, for it is God's throne, nor by earth, for it is his footstool—nor by the creatures whom he hath made, for they are but earth and clay as we are. Let thy yea be yea, and thy nay nay. Tell me in a word, why and for what purpose thou hast feigned a tale, to lead a bewildered traveller yet further astray?"

"As I am a Christian man," said Glendinning, "I left him here bleeding to death—and now I nowhere spy him, and much I doubt that the tomb that thou seest has closed on his mortal remains!"

"And who is he for whose fate thou art so anxious?" said the stranger; "or how is it possible that this wounded man could have been either removed from, or interred in, a place so solitary?"

"His name," said Halbert, after a moment's pause, "is Piercie Shafton—there, on that very spot, I left him bleeding; and what power has conveyed him hence, I know no more than thou dost."

"Piercie Shafton!" said the stranger; "Sir Piercie Shafton of Wolverton, a kinsman, as it is said, of the great Piercie of Northumberland? If thou hast slain him, to return to the territories of the proud Abbot is to give thy neck to the gallows. He is well known, that Piercie Shafton; the meddling tool of wiser plotters—a harebrained trafficker in treason—a champion of the Pope, employed as a forlorn hope by those more politic heads, who have more will to work mischief, than valour to encounter danger.—Come with me, youth, and save thyself from the evil consequences of this deed. Guide me to the Castle of Avenel, and thy reward shall be protection and safety."

Again Halbert paused, and summoned his mind to a hasty council. The vengeance with which the Abbot was likely to visit the slaughter of Shafton, his friend, and in some measure his guest, was likely to be severe; yet, in the various contingencies which he had considered previous to their duel, he had unaccountably omitted to reflect what was to be his line of conduct in case of Sir Piercie falling by his hand. If he returned to Glendearg, he was sure to draw on his whole family, including Mary Avenel, the resentment of the Abbot and community, whereas it was possible that flight might make him be regarded as the sole author of the deed, and might avert the indignation of the monks from the rest of the inhabitants of his paternal tower. Halbert recollected also the favour expressed for the household, and especially for Edward, by the Sub-Prior; and he conceived that he could, by communicating his own guilt to that worthy ecclesiastic, when at a distance from Glendearg, secure his powerful interposition in favour of his family. These thoughts rapidly passed through his mind, and he determined on flight. The stranger's company and his promised protection came in aid of that resolution; but he was unable to reconcile the invitation which the old man gave him to accompany him for safety to the Castle of Avenel, with the connexions of Julian, the present usurper of that inheritance. "Good father," he said, "I fear that you mistake the man with whom you wish me to harbour. Avenel guided Piercie Shafton into Scotland, and his henchman, Christie of the Clinthill, brought the southron hither."

"Of that," said the old man, "I am well aware. Yet if thou wilt trust to me, as I have shown no reluctance to confide in thee, thou shalt find with Julian Avenel welcome, or at least safety."

"Father," replied Halbert, "though I can ill reconcile what thou sayest with what Julian Avenel hath done, yet caring little about the safety of a creature so lost as myself, and as thy words seem those of truth and honesty, and finally, as thou didst render thyself frankly up to my conduct, I will return the confidence thou hast shown, and accompany thee to the Castle of Avenel by a road which thou thyself couldst never have discovered." He led the way, and the old man followed for some time in silence.

CHAPTER XXIII.

> 'Tis when the wound is stiffening with the cold,
> The warrior first feels pain—'tis when the heat
> And fiery fever of his soul is passed,
> The sinner feels remorse.—Old Play.

THE feelings of compunction with which Halbert Glendinning was visited upon this painful occasion, were deeper than belonged to an age and country in which human life was held so cheap. They fell far short certainly of those which might have affected a mind regulated by better religious precepts, and, more strictly trained under social laws; but still they were deep and severely felt, and divided in Halbert's heart even the regret with which he parted from Mary Avenel and the tower of his fathers.

The old traveller walked silently by his side for some time, and then addressed him.—"My son, it has been said that sorrow must speak or die—Why art thou so much cast down?—Tell me thy unhappy tale, and it may be that my gray head may devise counsel and aid for your young life."

"Alas!" said Halbert Glendinning, "can you wonder why I am cast down?—I am at this instant a fugitive from my father's house, from my mother and from my friends, and I bear on my head the blood of a man who injured me but in idle words, which I have thus bloodily requited. My heart now tells me I have done evil—it were harder than these rocks if it could bear unmoved the thought, that I have sent this man to a long account, unhousseled and unshrieved!"

"Pause there, my son," said the traveller. "That thou hast defaced God's image in thy neighbour's person—that thou hast sent dust to dust in idle wrath or idler pride, is indeed a sin of the deepest dye—that thou hast cut short the space which Heaven might have allowed him for repentance, makes it yet more deadly—but for all this there is balm in Gilead."

"I understand you not, father," said Halbert, struck by the solemn tone which was assumed by his companion.

The old man proceeded. "Thou hast slain thine enemy—it was a cruel deed: thou hast cut him off perchance in his sins—it is a fearful aggravation. Do yet by my counsel, and in lieu of him whom thou hast perchance consigned to the kingdom of Satan, let thine efforts wrest another subject from the reign of the Evil One."

"I understand you, father," said Halbert; "thou wouldst have me atone for my rashness by doing service to the soul of my adversary—But how may this be? I have no money to purchase masses, and gladly would I go barefoot to the Holy Land to free his spirit from purgatory, only that"——

"My son," said the old man, interrupting him, "the sinner for whose redemption I entreat you to labour, is not the dead but the living. It is not for the soul of thine enemy I would exhort thee to pray—that has already had its final doom from a Judge as merciful as he is just; nor, wert thou to coin that rock into ducats, and obtain a mass for each one, would it avail the departed spirit. Where the tree hath fallen it must lie. But the sapling, which hath in it yet the vigour and juice of life, may be bended to the point to which it ought to incline."

"Art thou a priest, father?" said the young man, "or by what commission dost thou talk of such high matters?"

"By that of my Almighty Master," said the traveller, "under whose banner I am an enlisted soldier."

Halbert's acquaintance with religious matters was no deeper than could be derived from the Archbishop of Saint Andrews' Catechism, and the pamphlet called the Twa-pennie Faith, both which were industriously circulated and recommended by the monks of St. Mary's. Yet, however indifferent and superficial a theologian, he began to suspect that he was now in company with one of the gospellers, or heretics, before whose influence the ancient system of religion now tottered to the very foundation. Bred up, as may well be presumed, in a holy horror against these formidable sectaries, the youth's first feelings were those of a loyal and devoted church vassal. "Old man," he said, "wert thou able to make good with thy hand the words that thy tongue hath spoken against our Holy Mother Church, we should have tried upon this moor which of our creeds have the better champion"

"Nay," said the stranger, "if thou art a true soldier of Rome, thou wilt not pause from thy purpose because thou hast the odds of years and of strength on thy side. Hearken to me, my son. I have showed thee how to make thy peace with Heaven, and thou hast rejected my proffer. I will now show thee how thou shalt make thy reconciliation with the powers of this world. Take this gray head from the frail body which supports it, and carry it to the chair of proud Abbot Boniface; and when thou tellest him that thou hast slain Piercie Shafton, and his ire rises at the deed, lay the head of Henry Warden at his foot, and thou shalt have praise instead of censure."

Halbert Glendinning stepped back in surprise. "What! are you that Henry Warden so famous among the heretics, that even Knox's name is scarce more frequently in their mouths? Art thou he, and darest thou to approach the Halidome of Saint Mary's?"

"I am Henry Warden of a surety," said the old man, "far unworthy to be named in the same breath with Knox, but yet willing to venture on whatever dangers my Master's service may call me to."

"Hearken to me, then," said Halbert; "to slay thee, I have no heart—to make thee prisoner, were equally to bring thy blood on my head—to leave thee in this wild without a guide, were little better. I will conduct thee, as I promised, in safety to the Castle of Avenel; but breathe not, while we are on the journey, a word against the doctrines of the holy church of which I am an unworthy—but though an ignorant, a zealous member.—When thou art there arrived, beware of thyself—there is a high price upon thy head, and Julian Avenel loves the glance of gold-bonnet pieces."*

"Yet thou sayest not," answered the Protestant preacher, for such he was, "that for lucre he would sell the blood of his guest?"

"Not if thou comest an invited stranger, relying on his faith," said the youth; "evil as Julian may be, he dare not break the rites of hospitality; for, loose as we on these marches may be in all other ties, these are respected amongst us even to idolatry, and his nearest relations would think it incumbent on them to spill his blood themselves, to efface the disgrace such treason would bring upon their name and lineage. But if thou goest self-invited, and without assurance of safety, I promise thee thy risk is great."

"I am in God's hand," answered the preacher: "it is on His errand that I traverse these wilds amidst dangers of every kind; while I am useful for my master's service, they shall not prevail against me, and when, like the barren fig-tree, I can no longer produce fruit, what imports it when or by whom the axe is laid to the root?"

"Your courage and devotion," said Glendinning, "are worthy of a better cause."

"That," said Warden, "cannot be—mine is the very best."

They continued their journey in silence, Halbert Glendinning tracing with the utmost accuracy the mazes of the dangerous and intricate morasses and hills which divided the Halidome from the barony of Avenel. From time to time he was obliged to stop, in order to assist his companion to cross the black intervals of quaking bog, called in the Scottish dialect hags, by which the firmer parts of the morass were intersected.

"Courage, old man," said Halbert, as he saw his companion almost exhausted with fatigue, "we shall soon be upon hard ground. And yet soft as this moss is, I have seen the merry falconers go through it as light as deer when the quarry was upon the flight."

"True, my son," answered Warden, "for so I will still call you, though you term me no longer father and even so doth headlong youth pursue its pleasures without regard to the mire and the peril of the paths through which they are hurried."

"I have already told thee," answered Halbert Glendinning, sternly, "that I will hear nothing from thee that savours of doctrine."

"Nay, but, my son," answered Warden, "thy spiritual father himself would surely not dispute the truth of what I have now spoken for your edification?"

Glendinning stoutly replied, "I know not how that may be—but I wot well it is the fashion of your brotherhood to bait your hook with fair discourse, and to hold yourselves up as angels of light, that you may the better extend the kingdom of darkness."

"May God," replied the preacher, "pardon those who have thus reported of his servants! I will not

* A gold coin of James V., the most beautiful of the Scottish series; so called because the effigy of the sovereign is represented wearing a bonnet.

, my son, by being instant out of season akest but as thou art taught—yet sure I o goodly a youth will be still rescued, like
m the burning."

thus spoke, the verge of the morass was
d their path lay on the declivity. Green-as, and, viewed from a distance, checkered
arrow and verdant line the dark-brown
h it traversed, though the distinction was ly traced when they were walking on it.*
n pursued his journey with comparative unwilling again to awaken the jealous
young companion for the Roman faith, sed on other matters. The tone of his n was still grave, moral, and instructive.
velled much, and knew both the language
rs of other countries, concerning which cadinning, already anticipating the possi-
ing obliged to quit Scotland for the deed
e, was naturally and anxiously desirous of
n. By degrees he was more attracted by
of the stranger's conversation than re-
he dread of his dangerous character as a l Halbert had called him father more than
e turrets of Avenel Castle came in view.

ition of this ancient fortress was remark-
cupied a small rocky islet in a mountain
n, as such a piece of water is called in and. The lake might be about a mile in ce, surrounded by hills of considerable ch, except where old trees and brushwood
ne ravines that divided them from each bare and heathy. The surprise of the was chiefly excited by finding a piece of ted in that high and mountainous region, dscape around had features which might rmed wild, than either romantic or sub-
the scene was not without its charms.
burning sun of summer, the clear azure of nruffled lake refreshed the eye, and im-mind with a pleasing feeling of deep soli-
inter, when the snow lay on the mountains
ese dazzling masses appeared to ascend their wonted and natural height, while which stretched beneath, and filled their
all its frozen waves, lay like the surface
ned and broken mirror around the black islet, and the walls of the gray castle with as crowned.

castle occupied, either with its principal
or with its flanking and outward walls, cting point of rock, which served as its ned as completely surrounded by water as a wild swan, save where a narrow caused-led betwixt the islet and the shore. But was larger in appearance than in reality;
buildings which it actually contained,
become ruinous and uninhabitable. In f the grandeur of the Avenel family, these cupied by a considerable garrison of fol-retainers, but they were now in a great serted; and Julian Avenel would probably his habitation in a residence better suited nished fortunes, had it not been for the ity which the situation of the old castle
man of his precarious and perilous mode
ded, in this respect, the spot could scarce
more happily chosen, for it could be ren-
at completely inaccessible at the pleasure bitant. The distance betwixt the nearest the islet was not indeed above a hundred
then the causeway which connected them
ely narrow, and completely divided by ne in the midway between the islet and another close under the outward gate of These formed a formidable, and almost able interruption to any hostile approach.
defended by a drawbridge, one of which,
earest to the castle, was regularly raised at ring the day, and both were lifted at night.†

The situation of Julian Avenel, engaged in a variety of feuds, and a party to almost every dark and mysterious transaction which was on foot in that wild and military frontier, required all these precautions for his security. His own ambiguous and doubtful course of policy had increased these dangers; for as he made professions to both parties in the state, and occasionally united more actively with either the one or the other, as chanced best to serve his immediate purpose, he could not be said to have either firm allies and protectors, or determined enemies. His life was a life of expedients and of peril; and while, in pursuit of his interest, he made all the doubles which he thought necessary to attain his object, he often overran his prey, and missed that which he might have gained by observing a straighter course.

CHAPTER XXIV.

I'll walk on tiptoe; arm my eye with caution,
My heart with courage, and my hand with weapon,
Like him who ventures on a lion's den.—Old Play.

When, issuing from the gorge of a pass which terminated upon the lake, the travellers came in sight of the ancient castle of Avenel, the old man paused, and, resting upon his pilgrim staff, looked with earnest attention upon the scene before him. The castle was, as we have said, in many places ruinous, as was evident, even at this distance, by the broken, rugged, and irregular outline of the walls and of the towers. In others it seemed more entire, and a pillar of dark smoke, which ascended from the chimneys of the donjon, and spread its long dusky pennon through the clear ether, indicated that it was inhabited. But no cornfields or enclosed pasture-grounds on the side of the lake showed that provident attention to comfort and subsistence which usually appeared near the houses of the greater, and even of the lesser barons. There were no cottages with their patches of infield, and their crofts and gardens, surrounded by rows of massive sycamores; no church with its simple tower in the valley; no herds of sheep among the hills; no cattle on the lower ground; nothing which intimated the occasional prosecution of the arts of peace and of industry. It was plain that the inhabitants, whether few or numerous, must be considered as the garrison of the castle, living within its defended precincts, and subsisting by means which were other than peaceful.

Probably it was with this conviction that the old man, gazing on the castle, muttered to himself, "Lapis offensionis et petra scandali!" and then, turning to Halbert Glendinning, he added, "We may say of yonder fort as King James did of another fastness in this province, that he who built it was a thief in his heart."‡

"But it was not so," answered Glendinning; "yonder castle was built by the old lords of Avenel, men as much beloved in peace as they were respected in war. They were the bulwark of the frontiers against foreigners, and the protectors of the natives from domestic oppression. The present usurper of their inheritance no more resembles them, than the night-prowling owl resembles a falcon, because she builds on the same rock."

"This Julian Avenel, then, holds no high place in the love and regard of his neighbours?" said Warden.

"So little," answered Halbert, "that besides the jack-men and riders with whom he has associated himself, and of whom he has many at his disposal, I know of few who voluntarily associate with him. He has been more than once outlawed both by England and Scotland, his lands declared forfeited, and his head set at a price. But in these unquiet times, of path, visible when looked at from a distance, seen when you are upon it, is called on the Border ant name of a Blind-road.

ig to search near Melrose for any such castle as is here described. The lakes at the head of the Yarrow, and those at the rise of the water of Ale, present no object of the kind. But in Yetholm Loch, a romantic sheet of water, in the dry march, as it is called, there are the remains of a fortress called Lochside Tower, which, like the supposed Castle of Avenel, is built upon an island, and connected with the land by a causeway. It is much smaller than the Castle of Avenel is described, consisting only of a single ruinous tower.

‡ It was of Lochwood, the hereditary fortress of the Johnstones of Annandale, a strong castle situated in the centre of a quaking bog, that James VI. made this remark.

a man so daring as Julian Avenel has ever found some friends willing to protect him against the penalties of the law, on condition of his secret services."

"You describe a dangerous man," replied Warden.

"You may have experience of that," replied the youth, "if you deal not the more warily: though it may be that he also has forsaken the communion of the church, and gone astray in the path of heresy."

"What your blindness terms the path of heresy," answered the reformer, "is indeed the straight and narrow way, wherein he who walks turns not aside, whether for worldly wealth or for worldly passions. Would to God this man were moved by no other and no worse spirit than that which prompts my poor endeavours to extend the kingdom of Heaven! This Baron of Avenel is personally unknown to me, if not of our congregation or of our counsel; yet I bear to him charges touching my safety, from those whom he must fear if he does not respect them, and upon that assurance I will venture upon his hold. I am now sufficiently refreshed by these few minutes of repose."

"Take then this advice for your safety," said Halbert, "and believe that it is founded upon the usage of this country and its inhabitants. If you can better shift for yourself, go not to the Castle of Avenel - if you do risk going thither, obtain from him, if possible, his safe-conduct, and beware that he swears it by the Black Rood—And lastly, observe whether he eats with you at the board, or pledges you in the cup; for if he gives you not these signs of welcome, his thoughts are evil towards you."

"Alas!" said the preacher, "I have no better earthly refuge for the present than these frowning towers, but I go thither trusting to aid which is not of this earth—But thou, good youth, needest thou trust thyself in this dangerous den?"

"I," answered Halbert, "am in no danger. I am well known to Christie of the Clinthill, the henchman of this Julian Avenel; and, what is a yet better protection, I have nothing either to provoke malice or to tempt plunder."

The tramp of a steed, which clattered along the shingly banks of the loch, was now heard behind them; and, when they looked back, a rider was visible, his steel cap and the point of his long lance glancing in the setting sun, as he rode rapidly towards them.

Halbert Glendinning soon recognised Christie of the Clinthill, and made his companion aware that the henchman of Julian Avenel was approaching.

"Ha, youngling!" said Christie to Halbert, as he came up to them, "thou hast made good my word at last, and come to take service with my noble master hast thou not? Thou shalt find me a good friend and a true; and ere Saint Barnaby come round again, thou shalt know every pass betwixt Milburn Plain and Netherby, as if thou hadst been born with a jack on thy back, and a lance in thy hand.—What old carle hast thou with thee? He is not of the brotherhood of Saint Mary's - at least he has not the buist* of these black cattle."

"He is a wayfaring man," said Halbert, "who has concerns with Julian of Avenel. For myself, I intend to go to Edinburgh to see the court and the Queen, and when I return hither we will talk of your profier. Meantime, as thou hast often invited me to the castle, I crave hospitality there to-night for myself and my companion."

"For thyself, and welcome, young comrade," replied Christie; "but we harbour no pilgrims, nor aught that looks like a pilgrim."

"So please you," said Warden, "I have letters of commendation to thy master from a sure friend, whom he will right willingly oblige in higher matters than in affording me a brief protection. And I am no pilgrim, but renounce the same, with all its superstitious observances."

He offered his letters to the horseman, who shook his head.

"These," he said, "are matters for my master, and it will be well if he can read them himself; for me, sword and lance are my book and psalter since I was twelve years old. But I you to the castle, and the Baron of Avenel self judge of your errand."

By this time the party had reached the along which Christie advanced at a trot, his presence to the warders within the shrill and peculiar whistle. At this signal drawbridge was lowered. The horseman and disappeared under the gloomy portal beyond it.

Glendinning and his companion, advan leisurely along the rugged causeway, stooc under the same gateway, over which frown red freestone, the ancient armorial bearin house of Avenel, which represented a fen shrouded and muffled, which occupied the v The cause of their assuming so singular a c uncertain, but the figure was generally su represent the mysterious being called the W of Avenel.† The sight of this moulderi awakened in the mind of Halbert the st cumstances which had connected his fate of Mary Avenel, and with the doings of the being who was attached to her house, and saw here represented in stone, as he had b her effigy upon the seal ring of Walter Aven with other trinkets formerly mentioned, saved from pillage, and brought to Glendea Mary's mother was driven from her habita

"You sigh, my son," said the old man, the impression made on his youthful con countenance, but mistaking the cause; "if to enter we may yet return."

"That can you not," said Christie of the who emerged at that instant from the side der the archway. "Look yonder, and choose you will return skimming the water like a w or winging the air like a plover."

They looked, and saw that the drawbrid they had just crossed was again raised, and terposed its planks betwixt the setting sun portal of the castle, deepening the gloom of under which they stood. Christie laughed, them follow him, saying by way of encour in Halbert's ear, "Answer boldly and n whatever the Baron asks you. Never stop your words, and above all show no fear of devil is not so black as he is painted."

As he spoke thus, he introduced them into stone hall, at the upper end of which blaze fire of wood. The long oaken table, which, occupied the midst of the apartment, was with rude preparations for the evening mea Baron and his chief domestics, five or six o strong, athletic, savage-looking men, paced down the lower end of the hall, which rang jarring clang of their long swords that cla they moved, and to the heavy tramp of the heeled jack-boots. Iron jacks, or coats of buff the principal part of their dress, and steel- or large slouched hats with Spanish plume ing backwards, were their head attire.

The Baron of Avenel was one of those tal lar, martial figures, which are the favourite of Salvator Rosa. He wore a cloak which once gaily trimmed, but which, by long wea quent exposure to the weather, was now fa colours. Thrown negligently about his tal it partly hid, and partly showed, a short d buff, under which was in some places vis light shirt of mail which was called a secret worn instead of more ostensible armour, t against private assassination. A leathern tained a large and heavy sword on one side the other that gay ponard which had one Sir Piercie Shafton master, of which the hat and gildings were already much defaced, rough usage or neglect.

Notwithstanding the rudeness of his arm han Avenel's manner and countenance had

* Buist—The brand, or mark, set upon sheep or cattle by their owners

† There is an ancient English family, I believe, wh or dun bear, a ghost or spirit passant sable in a field ar seems to have been a device of a punning or canting i

tion than those of the attendants who surrounded
He might be fifty or upwards, for his dark hair mingled with gray, but age had neither tamed
ire of his eye nor the enterprise of his disposi-
His countenance had been handsome, for tv was an attribute of the family; but the lines
roached by fatigue and exposure to the wea-
and rendered coarse by the habitual indulgence
olent passions.
seemed in deep and moody reflection, and was ng at a distance from his dependants along the r end of the hall, sometimes stopping from time
me to caress and feed a goshawk, which sat
his wrist, with its jesses (i. e. the leathern
s fixed to its legs) wrapped around his hand.
bird, which seemed not insensible to its master's tion, answered his caresses by ruffling forward athers, and pecking playfully at his finger. At intervals the Baron smiled, but instantly reed the darksome air of sullen meditation. He not even deign to look upon an object, which could have passed and repassed so often without wing on it a transient glance.
is was a woman of exceeding beauty, rather gay-
n richly attired, who sat on a low seat close by uge hall chimney. The gold chains round her and arms, the gay gown of green which swept loor, the silver-embroidered girdle, with its
of keys, depending in housewifely pride by a chain, the yellow silken courre-feu (Scottice,
) which was disposed around her head, and concealed her dark profusion of hair,—above
le circumstances so delicately touched in the old
l, that "the girdle was too short," the "gown
en all too strait," for the wearer's present shape, have intimated the Baron's Lady. But then owly seat, the expression of deep melancholy,
was changed into a timid smile whenever she
the least chance of catching the eye of Julian el,—the subdued look of grief, and the starting or which that constrained smile was again ex-
ged when she saw herself entirely disregarded, se were not the attributes of a wife, or they were
of a dejected and afflicted female, who had
d her love on less than legitimate terms.
ian Avenel, as we have said, continued to pace
all without paying any of that taute attention is rendered to almost every female either by ion or courtesy. He seemed totally uncon-
s of her presence, or of that of his attendants,
vas only roused from his own dark and gloomy
e notice be paid to the falcon, to which, how-the lady seemed to attend, as if anxious to find an opportunity of speaking to the Baron, or ding something unpleasant in the expressions
he used to the bird. All this the strangers ime enough to remark; for no sooner had they ed the apartment than their usher, Christie of lintmill, after exchanging a significant glance
the menials or troopers at the lower end of the ment, stood to Halbert Glendinning and to his anion to stand still near the door, while he lf, advancing nearer the table, placed himself
a situation as to catch the Baron's observa-
and, could he do so, cast a look around, but ot presuming to intrude himself on his mas-notice. Indeed the look of this man, naturally hardy, and reckless, seemed totally changed
he was in presence of his lord, and resembled ejected and cowering manner of a quarrelsome
hen rebuked by his owner, or when he finds lf obliged to defer to the will not of a supe-versary of his own species.
spite of the novelty of his own situation, and painful feeling connected with it, Halbert felt riosity interested in the female, who sate by urney, unnoticed and unregarded. He marked what keen and troubled sense she watched oken words of Julian, and how her glance stole rds him, ready to be averted upon the slightest
of his perceiving himself to be watched.
ntime he went on with his dalliance with his
ed favourite, now giving, now withholding,
orsel with which he was about to feed the bird,
and so exciting its appetite and gratifying it by turns.
"What! more yet?—thou foul kite, thou wouldst never have done—give thee part thou wilt have all—Ay, prune thy feathers, and plume thyself gay—much thou wilt make of it now—dost think I know thee not?—dost think I see not that all that ruffling and plaming of wing and feathers is not for thy master, but to try what thou canst make of him, thou greedy glead?—well then, take it then, and rejoice thyself—little boon goes far with thee, and with all thy sex—and so it should."

He ceased to look on the bird, and again traversed the apartment. Then taking another small piece of raw meat from the trencher on which it was placed ready cut for his use, he began once again to tempt and tease the bird, by offering and withdrawing it, until he awakened its wild and bold disposition. "What! struggling, fluttering, aiming at me with beak and gorge?—So la! So la! wouldst mount? wouldst fly? the jesses are round thy clutches, fool—thou canst neither stir nor soar, but by my will—Beware thou come to reclaim, wench, clse I will wring thy head off one of these days.—Well, have it then, and well fare thou with it. So ho, Jenkin!" One of the attendants stepped forward.—"Take the foul glead hence to the mew—or, stay; leave her, but look well to her casting and to her bathing—we will see her fly to-morrow.—How now Christie, so soon returned?"

Christie advanced to his master, and gave an account of himself and his journey, in the way in which a police-officer holds communication with his magistrate, that is, as much by signs as by words.

"Noble sir," said that worthy satellite, "the Laird of ——," he named no place, but pointed with his finger in a south-western direction,—"may not ride with you the day he purposed, because the Lord Warden has threatened that he will"——

Here another blank, intelligibly enough made up by the speaker touching his own neck with his left forefinger, and leaning his head a little to one side.

"Cowardly caitiff!" said Julian; "by Heaven! the whole world turns sheer naught—it is not worth a brave man's living in—ye may ride a day and night, and never see a feather wave or hear a horse prance—the spirit of our fathers is dead amongst us—the very brutes are degenerated—the cattle we bring home at our life's risk are mere carrion—our hawks are riflers*—our hounds are turnspits and trindle-tails—our men are women—and our women are"——

He looked at the female for the first time, and stopped short in the midst of what he was about to say, though there was something so contemptuous in the glance, that the blank might have been thus filled up "Our women are such as she is."

He said it not, however, and, as if desirous of attracting his attention at all risks, and in whatever manner, she rose and came forward to him, but with a timorous assumed semblance of affected gayety.—"Our women, Julian—what would you say of the women?"

"Nothing," answered Julian Avenel, "at least nothing but that they are kind-hearted wenches like thyself, Kate." The female coloured deeply, and returned to her seat. "And what strangers hast thou brought with thee, Christie, that stand yonder like two tame stags?" said the Baron.

"The taller," answered Christie, "is, so please you, a young fellow called Halbert Glendinning, the eldest son of the old widow at Glendearg."

"What brings him here?" said the Baron; "hath Lady Avenel sent?"

"Not as I guess," said Christie; "the youth is leaving the country, he was always a wild slip, for I have known him since he was the height of my sword."

"What qualities hath he?" said the Baron.

"All manner of qualities," answered his follower "he can shoot with buck, track a deer, fly a hawk, hallow to a hound, he shoots at the long and cross-bow to a penny's breadth—wields a lance or a sword like mysel'—rides a horse manfully and fairly

* In the Abbot's Glossary of Sandylaw, as Lady Juliana Berners terms it, hawks' talons are called their rifles.

* So termed when they only caught their prey by the feathers.

—I wot not what more a man need to do to make him a gallant companion."

"And who," said the Baron, "is the old miser* who stands beside him?"

"Some cast of a priest as I fancy—he says he is charged with letters to you."

"Bid them come forward," said the Baron; and no sooner had they approached him more nearly, than, struck by the fine form and strength displayed by Halbert Glendinning, he addressed him thus: "I am told, young swankie, that you are roaming the world to seek your fortune—if you will serve Julian Avenel, you may find it without going farther."

"So please you," answered Glendinning, "something has chanced to me that makes it better I should leave this land, and I am bound for Edinburgh."

"What!—thou hast stricken some of the king's deer, I warrant,—or lightened the meadows of Saint Mary's of some of their beeves,—or thou hast taken a moonlight leap over the Border?"

"No, sir," said Halbert, "my case is entirely different."

"Then I warrant thee," said the Baron, "thou hast stabbed some brother churl in a fray about a wench—thou art a likely lad to wrangle in such a cause."

Ineffably disgusted at his tone and manner, Halbert Glendinning remained silent, while the thought darted across his mind, what would Julian Avenel have said, had he known the quarrel, of which he spoke so lightly, had arisen on account of his own brother's daughter!—"But be thy cause of flight what it will," said Julian, in continuation, "dost thou think the law or its emissaries can follow thee into this island, or arrest thee under the standard of Avenel?—Look at the depth of the lake, the strength of the walls, the length of the causeway—look at my men, and think if they are likely to see a comrade injured, or if I, their master, am a man to desert a faithful follower, in good or evil. I tell thee, it shall be an eternal day of truce betwixt thee and justice, as they call it, from the instant thou hast put my colours into thy cap—thou shalt ride by the Warden's nose as thou wouldst pass an old market-woman, and ne'er a cur which follows him shall dare to bay at thee!"

"I thank you for your offers, noble sir," replied Halbert, "but I must answer in brief, that I cannot profit by them—my fortunes lead me elsewhere."

"Thou art a self-willed fool for thy pains," said Julian, turning from him; and signing Christie to approach, he whispered in his ear, "There is promise in that young fellow's looks, Christie, and we want men of limbs and sinews so compacted—those thou hast brought to me of late are the mere refuse of mankind, wretches scarce worth the arrow that ends them: this youngster is limbed like Saint George. Ply him with wine and wassail—let the wenches weave their meshes about him like spiders—thou understandest?" Christie gave a sagacious nod of intelligence, and fell back to a respectful distance from his master.—"And thou, old man," said the Baron, turning to the elder traveller, "hast thou been roaming the world after fortune too?—it seems not she has fallen into thy way."

"So please you," replied Warden, "I were perhaps more to be pitied than I am now, had I indeed met with that fortune, which, like others, I have sought in my greener days."

"Nay, understand me, friend," said the Baron; "if thou art satisfied with thy buckram gown and long staff, I also am well content thou shouldst be as poor and contemptible as is good for the health of thy body and soul—All I care to know of thee is, the cause which hath brought thee to my castle, where few crows of thy kind care to settle. Thou art, I warrant thee, some ejected monk of a suppressed convent, paying in his old days the price of the luxurious idleness in which he spent his youth.—Ay, or it may be some pilgrim with a budget of lies from Saint James of Compostella, or Our Lady of Loretto; or thou mayest be some pardoner with his budget of relics from Rome, forgiving sins at a penny a-dozen, and one to the tale—Ay, I guess why I find th boy's company, and doubtless thou wouldst a strapping lad as he to carry thy wallet, a thy lazy shoulders; but, by the mass, I wil cunning. I make my vow to sun and mo not see a proper lad so misleard as to run th with an old knave, like Simmie and his Away with thee!" he added, rising in w speaking so fast as to give no opportunity being probably determined to terrify the el into an abrupt flight—"Away with thee, clouted coat, scrip, and scallop-shell, or, by of Avenel, I will have them loose the hounds

Warden waited with the greatest patience lian Avenel, astonished that the threats an of his language made no impression on hi in a sort of wonder, and said in a less imper "Why the fiend dost thou not answer me?

"When you have done speaking," said W the same composed manner, "it will be ful reply."

"Say on, man, in the devil's name—but ta beg not here—were it but for the rinds of ch refuse of the rats, or a morsel that my do turn from—neither a grain of meal, nor the n part of a gray groat, will I give to any feigne of thy coat."

"It may be," answered Warden, "that y have less quarrel with my coat if you knew covers. I am neither friar nor mendicant, a be right glad to hear thy testimony against deceivers of God's church, and usurpers of over the Christian flock, were it given in charity."

"And who or what art thou, then," sai "that comest to this Border land, an ther monk, nor soldier, nor broken man?"

"I am an humble teacher of the holy w swered Warden. "This letter from a most son will speak why I am here at this pres

He delivered the letter to the Baron, who the seal with some surprise, and then look letter itself, which seemed to excite still m then fixed his eyes on the stranger, and menacing tone, "I think thou darest not t or deceive me?"

"I am not the man to attempt either," wa cise reply.

Julian Avenel carried the letter to the where he perused, or at least attempted to more than once, often looking from the l gazing on the stranger who had delivered meant to read the purport of the missive i of the messenger. Julian at length called male,—"Catherine, bestir thee, and fetch me that letter which I bade thee keep ready at thy casket, having no sure lockfast place of

Catherine went with the readiness of one be employed; and as she walked, the situat requires a wider gown and a longer girdl which woman claims from man a double the most anxious care, was still more visibl fore. She soon returned with the paper, a warded with a cold—"I thank thee, wenc a careful secretary."

This second paper he also perused and more than once, and still, as he read it, time to time a wary and observant eye up Warden. This examination and re-exa though both the man and the place were the preacher endured with the most com steady countenance, seeming, under the ey ther the vulture eye of the Baron, as unmo der the gaze of an ordinary and peaceful pe length Julian Avenel folded both papers, a put them into the pocket of his cloak, brow, and, coming forward, addressed companion. "Catherine," said he, "I this good man injustice, when I mistook h of the drones of Rome. He is a preacher, —a preacher of the—the new doctrine of of the Congregation."

* Miser, used in the sense in which it often occurs in Spenser, and which is indeed its literal import,—"wretched old man."

† Two questionarii, or begging friars, whose ac and roguery make the subject of an old Scottish sa doctrine of the blessed Scriptures," said the r, "purified from the devices of men."

'est thou?" said Julian Avenel--"Well, thou
call it what thou lists; but to me it is recom-
l, because it flings off all those sottish dreams aints and angels and devils, and unhorses the onks that have ridden us so long, and spur-is so hard. No more masses and corpse-gifts ore tithes and offerings to make men poor-- e prayers or psalms to make men cowards--
e christenings and penances, and confessions rriages."
please you," said Henry Warden, "it is against ruptions, not against the fundamental doc-
of the church, which we desire to renovate,
t to abolish."
thee, peace, man," said the Baron; "we of
y care not what you set up, so you pull merrily
what stands in our way. Specially it suits well s of the Southland fells; for it is our profes-
turn the world up-side down, and we live ever hest life when the dowpher side is uppermost." Jen would have replied; but the Baron allow-not time, striking the table with the hilt of his
, and crying out,—"Ha! you loitering knaves, ur supper-meal quickly. See you not this holy exhausted for luck of food? Heard ye ever t or preacher that devoured not his five meals
"

attendants bustled to and fro, and speedily
t in several large smoking platters, filled with ieces of beef, boiled and roasted, but without riety whatsoever; without vegetables, and al-
without bread, though there was at the upper ew oat-cakes in a basket. Julian Avenel made of apology to Warden.
u have been commended to our care, Sir
er, since that is your style, by a person whom hly honour."
m assured," said Warden, "that the most no-
d"——
thee, peace, man," said Avenel: "what need ing names, so we understand each other? I but to speak in reference to your safety and rt, of which he desires us to be chary. Now, r safety, look at my walls and water. But ng your comfort, we have no corn of our own,
meal-girnels of the south are less easily trans-
than their beeves, seeing they have no legs to
pon. But what though? a stoup of wine thou ave, and of the best—thou shalt sit betwixt
ine and me at the board-end.—And, Christie, look to the young springald, and call to the r for a flagon of the best."
Baron took his wonted place at the upper end
board; his Catherine sate down, and courte-ointed to a seat betwixt them for their reveuest. But notwithstanding the influence both ger and fatigue, Henry Warden retained his ng posture.

CHAPTER XXV.

When lovely woman stoops to folly,
And finds too late that men betray—
* * * * *

AN AVENEL saw with surprise the demeanour
reverend stranger. "Beshrew me," he said,
new-fashioned religioners have fast-days, I
it me—the old ones used to confer these bless-riefly on the laity."
acknowledge no such rule," said the preacher hold that our faith consists not in using or ning from special meats on special days; and
ing we rend our hearts, and not our garments."
e better—the better for yourselves, and the
for Tom Tailor," said the Baron; "but come, rn, or, if thou needs must e'en give us a cast
e office, mutter thy charm."
Baron," said the preacher, "I am in a strange where neither mine office nor my doctrine are
, and where, it would seem, both are greatly derstood. It is my duty so to bear me, that in son, however unworthy, my Master's dignity
may be respected, and that sin may take no confidence from relaxation of the bonds of discipline."
"Ho la! halt there," said the Baron; "thou wert sent hither for thy safety, but not, I think, to preach to, or control me. What is it thou wouldst have, Sir Preacher? Remember, thou speakest to one somewhat short of patience, who loves a short health and a long draught."
"In a word, then," said Henry Warden, "that lady"——
"How!" said the Baron, starting—"what of her?
what hast thou to say of that dame?"
"Is she thy house-dame?" said the preacher, after a moment's pause, in which he seemed to seek for the best mode of expressing what he had to say—
"Is she, in brief, thy wife?"
The unfortunate young woman pressed both her hands on her face, as if to hide it, but the deep blush which crimsoned her brow and neck, showed that her cheeks were also glowing; and the bursting tears, which found their way betwixt her slender fingers, bore witness to her sorrow, as well as to her shame.
"Now, by my father's ashes!" said the Baron, rising and spurning from him his footstool with such violence, that it hit the wall on the opposite side of the apartment—then instantly constraining himself,
he muttered, "What need to run myself into trouble
for a fool's word?"—then, resuming his seat, he answered coldly and scornfully—"No, Sir Priest or Sir Preacher, Catherine is not my wife—Cease thy whimpering, thou foolish wench—she is not my wife, but she is handfasted with me, and that makes her as honest a woman."
"Handfasted?"—repeated Warden.
"Knowest thou not that rite, holy man?" said Avenel, in the same tone of derision; "then I will tell thee. We Border-men are more wary than your inland clowns of Fife and Lothian—no jump in the dark for us—no clenching the fetters around our wrists till we know how they will wear with us—
we take our wives, like our horses, upon trial. When we are handfasted, as we term it, we are man and wife for a year and day—that space gone by, each may choose another mate, or, at their pleasure, may call the priest to marry them for life—and this we call handfasting."*
"Then," said the preacher, "I tell thee, noble Baron, in brotherly love to thy soul, it is a custom li-centious, gross, and corrupted, and, if persisted in,
